haunted him, and that the furies tormented him with whips and burning torches. Besides Octävia, Néro had two wives, Poppæa Sabinä and Statilla Messälinna, great granddaughter of Taurus, the former he first divorced, then murdered, the latter he deprived of life by a kick when she was pregnant. In similar ways he destroyed all connected with him, either by consanguinity or marriage. After fourteen years' submission to the cruelty of this monster, the empire rose against him, determined on his death. Without a single friend either to espouse his cause or attempt his protection, he gladly accepted the house of his freedman, Phäon in the vicinity of Rome, where, with the assistance of Epäphröditus, he thrust a sword through his neck. A centurion in pursuit reached the house, burst in and attempted to stop the wound, when Néro said, "too late," and expired. With his request that his body should be burnt entire, Icëlus a freedman of Galba complied, and his remains were deposited in the family tomb of the Dömütii by two of his nurses, Eclogë and Alëxändria, and his concubine, Actë. He died in the thirty-second year of his age. Crüdëlis Néro (Mart. vii. 21). Adj. Nërönëus, et, Nërönianus, a. um. Nërönëus mensis, April (Tac. Ann. xvi. 12). Nërönia, orum, a. games appointed by Néro. Nëröniana thërma (Mart. vii. 33).—5. A Pseudo-Néro, either a slave from Pöntus, or a freedman from Italy, appeared in the year 69. His resembling the countenance of Néro, having a musical voice, and playing well on the harp, imposed on vulgar minds, and collected a considerable number of adherents, notwithstanding the enormous atrocities of the emperor; but Cälpurnius Aspënas made him prisoner, and his life atoned for his imposition (Tac. Hist. ii. 8 seq.).

M. Dömütius, M. Dömütii, m. a lieutenant-general who, with L. Mänlius, proconsul, was defeated by L. Hërcülëus, questor, under Q. Sërtörus in 79 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 90).

Dömnës, is, m. a man appointed governor of Artaxäta by the king of the Parthians (Flor. iv. 12). Vëllëus Pätërcëlius calls him Addüus q. v.

Dönätüus Välëus, Dönätii Vålëntis, m. one of the four centurions of the eighteenth legion, who attempted to defend the image of Galba in the year 69. Vitëllius ordered all the four for execution for no other crime than fidelity to their own prince (Tac. Hist. i. 56—59).

Doniläus, i, m. a Gallo-grecian, or Galatian, who with Tärëondärius Cästör, the grandson of Dëjötürus, king of Gallo-græcia, contributed 300 horsemen to the assistance of Pompey in the civil war (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

Donotaurus. See Vålërius.

Donüca, æ, f. a mountain of great height in Thräcia, to which the Thracians fled on being overpowered by the Bästürne in 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 58). The exact position of this mountain is unknown.

Dönüsa, æ, f. Donussa, or, Stenosa, one of the Cëclädes. Virgilius calls this island green, which Servius ascribes to the colour of its marble, although the poet may have referred simply to the verdure of its woods and pastures (Æn. iii. 125). Under the Roman emperors, it appears to have been a place of banishment (Tac. Ann. iv. 30).

Dōrcēus, ēos, m. an Arcadian, who fought in the Theban war; and whose appearance Dīana assumed when she addressed Pārthēnōpeus (Stat. Th. ix. 809).—2. A native of Cŷzicus, Chizico, who excelled in music and singing, killed in the Argonautic expedition by Iāson (Val. Flacc. iii. 159).

Dōrcēus, ēos, v. ei, m. (Quickstight), one of Actaeon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 210).

Doricētes, is, m. a king of Thrācia, who made war on Lŷsimāchus in 294 B. C. By conceding part of Mācēdōnia, Lŷsimāchus made peace with this monarch (Just. xvi. 1).

Dorimāchus, i, m. a chief man among the Aetolians, who joined Scōpas, the praetor of that people, in confirming by their own authority the statements and promises of M. Valērius Lāvinus, by which an alliance was formed with the Romans in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 24).

Dōrion, v. Dōtton, i, n. a town of Mēssēniā, at which the poet Thāmŷris lost his sight, because he had challenged the muses in poetry, and having been surpassed they punished him with that deprivation. To this Stātius alludes (Th. iv. 182), and Lūcānus (Phar. vi. 352). Dōrion was in ruins when Pausānias wrote (iv. 33).

Doriphōrus, i, m. a freedman of the emperor Nēro, to whom he was married (Suet. Ner. 29).

Dōris, Idos, f. the wife of Nērēus and daughter of Ocēānus and Tēthys, was the mother of a great number of seamyphs, who, from their father, were called Nērēides, v. Nērēides. Dōris is often used to denote the sea. In the latter period of the Roman state, Dōris was exhibited on the stage, for Jūvenālis describes her, perhaps meaning thereby any seamyph, represented by a Grecian actor, naked, a gross indelicacy which that poet censures (Sat. iii. 94).

Dōris, Idis, f. a district of Grācia Propria in the vicinity of Eta, which Strābo calls Tetrapōlis, from its four cities (629). A part of Cāria also went under the name of Dōris (Herod. i. 6 seq.). Inh. Dōrii, orum, et, Dōres, v. Dōriēnses, ium, m. Some of them appear to have settled in the western part of Gāllia, France (Amm. Mar. xv. 9). Plinius says they were called Phthiōtie (i. 427). Dōris, Idis, f. of Dōris, applied to females or nouns feminine (Virg. Cu. 335). Adj. Dōricus, et, Dōrius, a, um, of Dōris, Grecian. Dōrica gens, a people of Asia Minor (Plin. i. 651). Dōrica rura (Manil. iv. 765). Dōrium carmen, one of the three principal measures used in ancient poetry (Hor. Epod. ix. 6).

Dōriseum, i, n. v. Dōriseus, i, f. a fort of Thrācia, of which Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia obtained possession in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).

Dorostōrus, i, f. Dryst, a town of Thrācia (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Dōrōxānium, i, n. a girl whom a woman of immoral character instructed in lewd and dishonest practices (Prop. iv. 5, 21).

Dōrūlācus, i, m. commander of the Galli Insūbres and Boli with whom L. Valērius Flaccus the Roman praesul engaged at Mēdiolānum, Milan, and slew ten thousand of them in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 46).

Dōrŷelus, i, m. the husband of Bērŷē, whom Virgilius calls Tmārius from Tmārus, Tomour, a mountain of Epirus. Some would wish to read Ismārius, Thracian, since they consider him the brother of Phineus, king of Thrācia (Aen. v. 620).—2. A native of Cŷzicus, Chizico (Val. Flacc. ii. 149).—3. A reputed son of Priāmus, killed by Ajax Telāmōnius (Hom. Il. xi. 489).

Dōrŷleum, i, n. Esiki-Shahr, a town on Sāngārius, the Sakarich.

Dōrŷlāus, i, m. a general of Mithridātes, king of Pontus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 181).

Dōrŷlas, a, m. one of the Nāsāmōnes, a people of Libŷia, who followed Pērsēus, and was slain at his nuptials by Hālcyōneus. He is said to have been very rich in land. (Ov. Met. v. 129).—2. One of the fifty sent by Etēocles to murder Tŷdēus, whom that hero crushed to death with a great stone (Stat. Th. ii. 571).—3. A son of Mōpsus and brother of Icārus, killed by a companion of Harpē as he stood on the walls of Sāgūntum, Muriedro, during the celebrated siege (Sil. Ital. ii. 126).—4. A centaur, who, in the battle with the Lāpithae, was first wounded by Nēstor, and afterwards transfixed by Pēlēus (Ov. Met. xii. 380 seq.).

Dōryphōrus, i, m. a freedman of the emperor Nēro, whom that monster destroyed by poison on a very slender pretence (Tac. Ann. xiv. 65).

Dōsithōē, es, f. daughter of Atrax, king of Thessaly, whom her father expelled in consequence of her pregnancy to Jūpiter. Pāter Dōsithōē, i, e. Atrax (Ov. Ibis 470).

Dōtton. See Dōrion.

Dōto, ūs, f. a daughter of Nērēus, hence she is called Nērēia (Virg. Aen. ix. 102).

Drāces, is, m. a man in the Carthaginian army killed by C. Laellus, when he served in Spain under his friend, Scīpio Africānus (Sil. Ital. xv. 467).

Drāclius, i, m. one of the commanders of the Epēi at Troy (Hom. Il. xiii. 692).

Drānce, arum, m. a people who lived at the foot of Caucāsus. Alexander the Great conquered them in 328 B. C. After his death, they fell under the government of Stasānor (Just. xii. 5 seq.).

Drāncēi, orum, m. a Seythian nation, whom the Argonauts attacked by war. Adj. Drānceus, a, um. Drāncealēgō (Val. Flacc. vi. 507).

Drānces, is, m. a Latin of advanced age, of great wealth, of considerable eloquence and abilities. He spoke better than he fought, and displayed greater address in exciting commotion, than intrepidity in the field of battle. His mother was of noble birth, but of his father nothing certain is known. He bore implacable hatred to Tūrnus and therefore warmly embraced the interest of Aēnēas (Virg. Aen. xi. 122. seq.).

Drāngiāna, a, f. a district of Pērsiā, in which were the sources of the river Arābis. Inh. Drāngē, et, Zurangē, arum, et, Drāngiāni, orum, m. a warlike nation, the enemies of the Bactriāni (Just. xli. 6). From Diōdōrus Sicūlus, their capital appears to have been Drāngiāna.

Draudacum, i, n. a fort of Peneste, which Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, took, in 171 B. C. At that time it was full of men, and was a place of considerable consequence from its advantages of situation (Liv. xliii. 19).

Drausus, i, m. a general of the enemy, whom one of the gens Livia killed, in close combat, and on that account had the surname of Drausus, which the Romans changed to Drusus (Suet. Tib. 3).

Dravus, i. m. the Drave, a considerable river, which has its rise in Noricum, traverses Pannonia, and falls into Danubius, the Danube (Flor. iv. 12).

Drēpānum, i. n. v. Drēpānē, es. f. et, Drēpāna, orum. n. Trapani, a promontory, on the west side of Sicily, with a cognominal town, taken by the Romans from the Carthaginians, in 250 B. C. It was so called, according to Servius, from the curvature of the shore on which it stands, or from the scythe (δρεπανος), with which Sātūrnus mutilated his father, Cōlus, having fallen there.

—2. A town of Lībya.—3. Another town of Līcīa.—4. A mountain of Æthiopia.—5. Drēpāno, a promontory in Achāia, near which Sātūrnus threw into the sea the scythe with which he mutilated his father (Paus. vii. 23. Stat. Th. iv. 50).—6. Two small islands near Lebenthos (Steph.). Drēpānēs, idis. f. applied to nouns feminine. Inh. Drēpāntāni, orum. m. (Plin. i. 346). Adj. Drēpāntānus, a. um. Drēpāntānus pupillus (Cic. Verr. ii. 56).—7. Cap. Trapano, a town of Bithynia, afterwards called Hēlēnōpōlis. It stood near the northern shore of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 8).

Drēpsa, æ. f. a town of Sōgdīāna (Anim. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Drēsus, i. m. a man, killed by Eurýklus (Hon. II. vi. 20).

Drōmas, ādis. c. g. a dromedary, or Arabian camel, which has only one hump or protuberance on the back. Līvius informs us, that Antiochus, king of Syria, had dromedaries in the battle at Thýatira, in 192 B. C. The Arabian bowmen, who rode these animals, had swords four cubits long, in consequence of their great height (Liv. xxxvii. 40).

Drōmas, ādis. f. (Runner), one of Actæon's dogs (Or. Met. iii. 217).

Drumichētes, æ. m. an officer under Mithridates, sent with reinforcements to Archēlaüs, at Piræus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 191).

Drōmos, i. m. a plain, in the neighbourhood of Sparta (Liv. xxxiv. 27).

Drōpides, is. m. an illustrious Athenian, against whom Curtius brings a charge of treachery (iii. 13). See Aristogiton.

Drūentia, æ. m. the Durance, a river, which has its source in that part of the Alps called Mont Genevre, and, running westward, falls into Rhōdānus, the Rhone. Like other streams, which take their rise in elevated situations, it has a rapid and impetuous current, consequently its waters are often discoloured. Līvius states, that of all the rivers of Gaul it was the most dangerous to cross, from the strength of the current, from frequently changing its channels, from forming new shallows and whirlpools, and from rolling down stones. Hannibal passed it with great difficulty (Liv. xxi. 31). Turbidus Drūentia (Sil. Ital. iii. 468).

Drūides, um. v. Drūīde, arum (a term of doubtful etymology), m. the Druids, the priests of the ancient Britons, Gauls, and Germans. Besides supreme authority in all matters of religion, their power extended to all public and private differences, and, what is of much greater consequence, to making, explaining, and executing the laws. This exorbitant jurisdiction was necessarily attended with every mark of power. They presided at human sacrifices (Cæs. B. G. vi. 13 seq.), were exempted from taxes and military service, and their persons held sacred and inviolable. Among the Gauls, there were only two classes of any note, the Drūīdes and Equites, of which that of the Druids was the more illustrious. Their authority, in many instances, surpassing that of the nobles, it is not surprising that they were, in general, sons of the first families. The worship and sacrifices of these priests were performed in deep groves, chiefly under an oak, which was their favourite tree. It was reckoned unlawful to commit any of their doctrines to writing; hence, many of their peculiar tenets are now unknown. It is generally supposed they believed in the immortality of the soul, and also in the metempsychosis. Of natural philosophy, astronomy, arithmetic, and botany, it cannot be doubted their knowledge was very considerable. To the study of rhetoric they paid great attention, and to the charms of their eloquence, much of the admiration and power which they enjoyed, may be justly ascribed. Britania was, according to Cæsar, the great school of the Druids, whose chief settlement was Anglesey, called Mōna by Tācitus. The natives of France and Germany, who wished to be thoroughly versant in the mysteries of Druidism, resorted to this island to complete their studies. At what time the Druids were wholly suppressed in Britania, is uncertain. But from the introduction of Christianity, their power and influence began to decline. It is worthy of remark, that some of their superstitious doctrines, and modes of predicting future events, are not, at this day, entirely forgotten in many parts of the island. Lūcanus is the only poet who has mentioned the Drūīdes (Phar. i. 451 seq.). Suetonius says, that Augustus prohibited the horrible religion of the Gauls, that is, Druidism, and Claudius entirely abolished it (Claud. 25).

Drūsilla, æ. f. granddaughter of M. Antōnius and Clēopātra, queen of Egypt, and wife of Antōnius Felix g. v. (Tac. Hist. v. 9).—2. Elder daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, who was married first to L. Cāsus Longinus, and afterwards to M. Emilius Lēpidus. The purity of history revolts at narrating her conduct with her brother, the emperor Caligula, who decreed her divine honours, after her death, under the name of Pānthēa. She died at the age of twenty-one, in the year 38 (Tac. Ann. vi. 15. Suet. Cal. 24).

Drūso, ōnis. m. a usurer, who attempted historical composition, but most unsuccessfully. When his debtors were unable to pay him principal and interest at the time appointed, he compelled them to submit to prosecution, or to the recital of his wretched histories. To this Hōrātius alludes, and describes the debtors as counterfeiting great attention (pōrrēcto jūgulo), in order to please him, and thus to obtain time to make payment of what they owed this contemptible scribbler (Sat. i. 3. 86).

Drūsus, i. m. son of the Roman emperor Tiberius, by Vipsānia Agrippina, was born about 14 B. C. From Dion, it does not appear that, in point of disposition, he excelled his father. This historian describes him as vicious, passionate, cruel, debauched, and intemperate to a very great degree. In a sedition which arose in Pannonia, his father sent him thither to appease the troops, and he succeeded by his courage and address. At the head of the legions in Illyricum, he encouraged the feuds among the German nations, which both weakened their strength and prevented their inroads on the Roman empire. The destruction of Marobodius affords a proof of his skill, both in political intrigue and military tactics. The pacification which he effected in Germany, procured him the honour of an ovation, which he celebrated a few days before the death of his mother. He married Livilla, or Livia, who bore him twin sons, an event which gave great joy to his father. How long she continued faithful to her husband, history does not inform us. The probability is, that her criminal intercourse with Sejanus had commenced a considerable time before she agreed, at the request of that vicious favourite of Tiberius, to destroy her husband by poison. Drusus had been several times consul with his father, had obtained the tribunicial power, and was every day rising in eminence, when Livilla and her paramour put an end to his days, in the year 23. Tacitus makes Sejanus the murderer of Drusus, but not by the instrumentality of his wife. The senate decreed him the same honours which had been conferred on the memory of his brother Germanicus, and the emperor himself delivered the funeral oration of his son (Tac. Ann. i. 24 seq.).—2. Son of Germanicus and Agrippina. He married Emilia Lepida, daughter of Livilla, who betrayed him to her mother, and she reported the whole to Sejanus. Overreached by the art of this vicious minister, he entered into a conspiracy against his elder brother, Nero, on which account he was declared an enemy to the state, imprisoned, and starved to death. Sejanus did not form that plot to gratify the ambition of Drusus, but with the view of cutting off the whole family, that he himself might succeed to the throne. We do not find him holding any other office except that of praefect of the city (Tac. Ann. iv. 4 seq.).—3. A sleepy, drowsy fellow, mentioned by Juvenalis (Sat. iii. 238), supposed to be Tib. Claudius Drusus Caesar. The reading is disputed, and some have imagined that the word should not be Druso, but urso, which, from the habits of that animal, gives to the passage a better sense.—4. Son of the Roman emperor, Claudius, by Plautia Urgulanilla, who died a minor, at Pompeii, being choked by a pear, which he had tossed up into the air, and, in its fall, caught in his mouth (Suet. Claud. 27).

Drýdes, um (Sing. Drýas, ádis), f. nymphs who presided over the woods. To them oblations of milk, oil, and honey, were offered, and sometimes a goat. Their name was probably derived from the Greek word deus, properly an oak, but frequently used to signify any kind of tree. Rústica Drýas (Mart. ix. 62).

Drýas, ántis, m. one of the Lápithas, a man of great bravery, who, in the battle of the centaurs, wounded Rhoetus with a burnt stick, and compelled him to fly. Many fell by his hand (Ov. Met. xii. 290—311).—2. A king of Thracia. Dryántides, m. a patronymic of Lýcúrgus, son of Drýas (Ov. Ib.

345).—3. A grandson of Orion, who commanded a thousand archers in defence of Thēbae, Theba, in the war between Etēocles and Pólyneices. Státius calls him a Theban, and adds, that he fell by the weapon of Diána, whom he hated, from her having caused the death of Orion, because he had offered her violence (Th. vii. 255: ix. 867—875).—4. A Calydonian, a son of Mars, one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Apol. i. 8).—5. A son of Lýcúrgus, whom his father killed, during the madness with which Bāchus struck him, for the insult which he offered to that god and his attendants (Apol. iii. 5).

Drýmæ, arum, f. an inconsiderable town of Dóris, taken by Philippus, king of Mácēdónia, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 7).

Drýmo, ūs, f. a seamyth, one of the attendants of Cýrēnē (Virg. G. iv. 336).

Drýmus, i, f. a city of Phóciis (Herod. viii. 33).

Drýmūsa, æ, f. an island of Iónia, which the Romans gave as a present to the Clāzōmēnii, after they had defeated the Gallograci, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39).

Drýöpē, es, f. a nymph, who was the mother of Tárquiltus, by Faunus (Virg. Æn. x. 551).—2. Daughter of Eurýtus, sister of Iólē and Andrēmon. She was a native of Echállia in Mēssēnia, and the most beautiful of the Echállides. According to Ovídius, she suffered injury from Apóllo, before she became the wife of Andrēmon. On the bank of a lake, sacred to the nymphs, she broke off the branch of a lotus tree, that her son Amphisus might amuse himself with it. It happened, that the nymph Lótiis, flying from the violence of Priāpus, had been changed into this tree, and, because Drýöpē had violated it, she underwent the same transformation (Ov. Met. ix. 331 seq.).—3. The mother of Chrōmis, called, by Státius, Phœnissa, which may either mean that she was a native of Phœnicia, or, a Theban, from Cádmus, a Phœnician, being the founder of Thēbae, Theba. Her son was born whilst she was employed in celebrating the orgies of Bāchus (Th. ii. 614).—4. A woman of Lēmnos (Val. Flacc. ii. 174).—5. A nymph, who carried off Hýlas, a favourite youth of Hércules (Val. Flacc. iii. 529).

Drýöpes, um (Sing. Drýops, öpis), m. a people of Epirus (Plin. i. 404). They are to be found in various parts of Greece, probably from their migrating frequently, or from their sending out small colonies (Virg. Æn. iv. 146). Hērödótes mentions their being in Pélöppónnēsus (viii. 73). Adj. Drýöpleus, a, um.

Drýöpis, ídis, f. the ancient name of Dóris q. v. (Herod. i. 56).

Drýops, öpis, m. a Trojan, killed by Claudus (Virg. Æn. x. 346).—2. A man in the Trojan army killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 455).

Drypetina, æ, f. a daughter of Mithridates, king of Pontus, by his queen, Lāodice, whom he committed to the care of Menophilus after his defeat by the Romans, at the time he fled to Colchis. To preserve her honour, Menophilus first put her to death and then himself (Amm. Mar. xvi. 7). Vālerius Máximus says she had double rows of teeth (i. 8).

Drysidæ, arum, m. the Druids (Amm. Mar. xv. 9). See Drúides.

Dūbis, is, m. the Doubs, or, Doux, a river of Gallia, France, which has its source at the foot of mount Jura, and after a course of 60 leagues, falls into Arar, the Saone, near to Cabillonum, Chalons (Cæs. B. G. i. 38).

Dūblius Avitus, Dūblius Aviti, m. governor of Lower Germany in the year 58, of whom little is known. Some copies of Tacitus read Vibulus Avitus (Ann. xiii. 54—56).

Dūcarius, i, m. a knight of the Insūbres, who killed, in the battle at Trāsimēnus, the lake of Perugia, C. Flāminius, the consul, but was prevented from stripping him by the Triarii, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 6). Silius Itālicus mentions one of the Boii of this name, who had been wounded in the war carried on against them, by C. Flāminius, an injury which he attempted to revenge in the battle at Trāsimēnus, by causing a shower of darts to be hurled against him, in the midst of which he fell (v. 645). It seems probable that both writers refer to the same person.

Ducēnnius Gēmīnus, Ducēnni Gēmīni, m. a Roman of patrician rank, to whom, with other two, Nēro committed the care of the public imposts. Gālba appointed him prefect of the city (Tac. Ann. xv. 18 seq.).

C. Dūllius, r. Dūllius, C. Dūllii, m. a military tribune, with consular power, in 398 B. C. (Liv. v. 13).—2. One of the five commissioners appointed to settle the difference, which had arisen in the Roman state respecting interest and debts. From their paying out the money they had the name of bankers. Their conduct was marked by the strictest regard to integrity and justice, no complaint from any party, and public tranquillity was thereby restored (Liv. vii. 21).

—3. Consul in 262 B. C., defeated the Carthaginian fleet, for which he had the honour of the first triumph at Rome, obtained for a naval victory. As an additional mark of public approbation, the senate allowed him to be preceded by torches and music, when he returned to his own house in the evening. He enjoyed this celebrated distinction all the days of his life (Sil. Ital. vi. 665. Liv. Ep. 17). He founded the temple of Jānus, Piazza Montanara, in the green-market (Tac. Ann. ii. 49).

Kæso Dūllius, Kæsōnis Dūllii, m. one of the decemviri appointed in 451 B. C. (Liv. iii. 35).—2. Elected consul along with L. Pāpius Crassus, in 335 B. C. They defeated the Ausōnes, a new enemy, who had joined the Sidicini. Dūllius was appointed one of the commissioners for conducting the colony and distributing the lands of Cāles, Calei (Liv. viii. 16).

M. Dūllius, M. Dūllii, m. a tribune of the people, who, with C. Licinius, instituted a criminal prosecution against Appius Claudius, decemvir, in 470 B. C. To him the commons were indebted for valuable assistance in their dispute with the decemviri. He afterwards obtained the same office. At his suggestion, the commons enacted, that whoever should cause the plebeian tribunes to be discontinued, or any magistrate elected, from whom there was no appeal, should be punished by stripes and decapitation. From the greatness of his influence, the senate dreaded no injury, as his whole conduct was distinguished by equity and candour. More inclined to support the laws than promote his own power, he opposed his colleagues who wished to continue in office beyond the legal period (Liv. ii. 58 seq.).—2. A tribune of the people who, with L. Mænius, passed a law in 356 B. C. fixing the rate of interest at 12 per cent. per annum, unciarium fenus, i. e. the twelfth part of an assis per month, which was the Roman manner of charging interest (Liv. vii. 16).

Dulgibini, orum, m. the Dulgibinians, a German nation on the west of Visūrgis, the Weiser, at no great distance from the mouth of that river (Tac. Mor. Ger. 34).

Dūlichium, i, n. Dolichia, a small island in the Ionian sea, opposite to the mouth of the river Achēlōus, the Aspro-potāmo, of which Ulysses was king. Adj. Dūlichias, a, um. Dūlichius jūcenis, Ulysses (Prop. ii. 21. 13). Dūlichius vertex, the head of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 107). Dūlichia manus, the hands of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 425). Ajax, in every instance, uses the adjectives Dūlichus and Ithacus in contempt.

Dūmnōrix, igis, m. one of the Ædūi, and brother of Divitiācus. He persuaded the noblemen of Gallia, France, not to go with Cæsar into Britain, privately withdrew from the Roman camp, and was killed by the soldiers who were sent in pursuit of him, in consequence of his obstinacy in refusing to return. His character will be found in Cæsar (B. G. i. 18).

Duodiēnsē, v. Vodiēnsē Castellum, a fort in Mauritania, the site of which is not certainly known (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Dūra, æ, f. a town of Mēsōpōtāmia, deserted when Ammlānus Marcēllinus wrote (xxiii. 5).—2. Dour, another on the east bank of the Tigris (Amm. Mar. xxv. 6).

Dūrius, i, m. a man killed by Hannibal at the siege of Saguntum, Murciedro (Sil. Ital. i. 438).—2. One of the competitors in the chariot race for the prize given by Scipio Africānus in Spain, on the termination of the war in that country. He called his horse Pelōrus (Sil. Ital. xvi. 366).

Dūrius, i, m. v. Dūria, æ, m. the Douro, or, Duero, a river of Lūsitanā, Portugal, which rises in Hispania, Spain, runs between these kingdoms for many miles, and afterwards crosses Portugal, falling into Mārē Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean, near Cāllē, Oporto. Like most of the rivers of this country in ancient times, it carried down gold dust. Silius Itālicus always writes Dūrius (i. 234). Formōsus Dūria (Claud. xxix. 72).

Dūrōcōrtōrum, i, n. (Dūrōcōrtōra Athēnæ Rēmōrum), Rheims, on the Vesle, one of the branches of Axōna, the Aisne (Cæs. B. G. vi. 44).

Dūrōnia, æ, f. the mother of P. Æbūtilus, who wished her son to be initiated in the rites of Bacchus in 188 B. C., a proof that her morals were very impure (Liv. xxxix. 9).

Dūrōnia, æ, f. a town of Sāmnum, taken by the Romans in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 39).

L. Dūrōnius, L. Dūrōni, m. elected a prætor at Rome, in 183 B. C., when Apūlia became his province, to which the senate added Istria, because the Tārēntini and Brūndisii reported that the country along their coast was infested by foreign pirates. The prætor, on returning to Rome, threw the blame of the piracies on Gēntius, king of Illyricum (Liv. xl. 18).

Dyārdānes, is, m. a river in the eastern part of India, according to Curtius, but not mentioned by any other writer (viii. 9). Strābo has Ēdānes, which some suppose to be the Burrampoot.

Dŷma, arum, f. a town of Achāia, near Arāxis, Cape Papa, perhaps the modern Karavostari, but this is doubtful. Inh. Dŷmaei, orum, m. excelled as slingers, in throwing to a great distance with sure aim and a powerful effect. Livius has described their mode of training to the use of the sling. Adj. Dŷmaeus, a, um, et. Dŷmēnsis, is, e. Dŷmaeus ager (Liv. xxvii. 31). Dŷmēnses funditores (Liv. xxxviii. 29).

Dŷmas, āntis, m. a Trojan, who joined himself to Ēnēas during the night in which Troy was burned, changed his own for Grecian armour, and was afterwards killed by one of his own party (Virg. Ēn. ii. 340).—2. The father of Hēcūba, wife of Priāmus, king of Troy. Dŷmāntis, idis, f. a patronymic of Hēcūba (Ov. Met. xiii. 620).—3. An Arcadian, who in early life surpassed the swiftest horses in speed; but was of great age in the Theban war, and although named among the competitors for the prize in the foot race, one of the games celebrated in honour of Archē-mōrus, he did not come up with either Idas or Pārthēnōpeus. The latter obtained the prize (Stat. Th. vi. 559). Dŷmas lost his life in attempting to recover the body of Pārthēnōpeus. Menālius Dŷmas (Stat. Th. x. 342).—4. A noble Phaeacian (Hom. Od. vi. 22).

Dŷmas, e, m. a river of Sogdiāna. The Iaxartes and Dŷmas form a great marsh according to Ammianus Marcellinus, called Oxia (xxiii. 6).

Dŷmē, es, f. a city of Achāia on the river Caucon, of which the ancient name was Palēa. Pausanias doubts whether the name should be derived from Dŷmē, a woman born there, or from Dŷmas, son of Ēgimius (vii. 17). Its situation appears to be of difficult access, hence Stātiūs has Atia Dŷmē (Th. iv. 124). Inh. Dŷmaei, orum, m. Adj. Dŷmaeus, a, um.

Dŷmnus, i, m. the former of a conspiracy against Alexander the Great. On the discovery of the plot, he was apprehended and evaded trial by a voluntary death (Curt. vi. 7).

Dŷnāmēnē, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 43).

Dŷpsas, āntis, m. a commander of the Scythians in the time of the Argonautic expedition, whom Cārēsus slew (Val. Flacc. vi. 192).

Dŷras, e, m. the Gorga, a river at the distance of twenty furlongs from Sperchius (Herod. vii. 198).

Dŷrāspes, is, m. a very clear river of Scythia, mentioned only by Ovidius (Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 53). It was probably at no great distance from Bōrŷsthēnes, the Dnieper.

Dŷrrāchium, i, n. called by the Greeks Epidāmnus (Liv. xliii. 21), Durazzo, a seaport town of Mācēdōnia on Mārē Hādriāticum, the Gulf of Venice, by which it was nearly surrounded. The common passage between Italy and Greece was from Brūndisium, Brindisi, to Dŷrrāchium, Durazzo. Arces Dŷrrāchii (Luc. Phar. vi. 14). Inh. Dŷrrāchini, orum, m. Adj. Dŷrrāchinus, a, um. Dŷrrāchinum littus (Cic. Sext. 67).

Dŷrrāchius, i, m. a king of Illyricum, and father of Iōnos (Luc. Phar. vi. 402).

Eārīnus Dōmītīānus, Eārīni Dōmītīāni, m. a youth whom Mārtilis celebrates in several of his epigrams (ix. 12 &c.). Some editions read Eārīnus, in order to lengthen the first syllable, which is contrary to etymology, being derived from εἰς, the spring.

Ebōrāeum, i, n. York, a large and ancient town on the eastern coast of England, which gives name to the county in which it stands. The river Ouse divides it into two parts, between which an elegant stone bridge forms a ready communication. In former times, the trade of York was very considerable, but has declined since the Reformation, and many modern towns surpass it, both in wealth and population. The Romans enlarged and ornamented this town with many magnificent and spacious buildings, part of which still remain. The Roman emperor Cōnstantius Chlōrus died at York, in 306, in the arms of his son Constantine the Great (Eutrop. x. 1). It is the see of an archbishop, and the county, of which it is the capital, surpasses, in extent, any other two in England. The cathedral in this town is reckoned the finest specimen of Gothic architecture in the island, except that of Lincoln. Ships of seventy tons burden, sail up the Ouse to York, which is sixty miles from the sea.

Ebūrōnes, um (Ebūrōnes, in some Greek authors), m. a people of Gāllia Bēlgica, the greater part of whose territories lay on the west bank of Mōsa, the Meuse. On their being dispossessed, they were succeeded by the Tūngri. When the Romans first invaded their country, they were under the command of Ambiorix and Cativolcus; but the state appears to have been tributary to the Trēviri. Among other acts of cruelty during his command in Gāllia, France, Caesar attempted to extirpate this nation; which barbarous design, even from his own account, he was unable to carry into full effect (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4 seq.).

Ebūrōvices, um, m. a people of Gāllia, France, on the left bank of Sēquāna, the Seine. The Lēxōvii were between them and the sea. Their chief city was at first called Mēdiolānum, and afterwards Ebūrōvices, now Evreux, on the Iton in Normandy (Cæs. B. G. iii. 17).

Ebūsus, i, m. a Rutulian whom Cōrŷnæus killed (Virg. Ēn. xii. 299).

Ebūsus, i, f. Ivica, or, Eriza, a small island in the Mediterranean, off the eastern coast of Hispānia, Spain. It is about fifteen miles in length and twelve in breadth. Ivica is mountainous but not unfruitful, and exports annually large quantities of salt. The chief city, Ivica, stands on a bay with a good harbour. Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, after defeating the Carthaginian fleet, sailed to Ebūsus, spent two days in storming the capital, but without effect, on which he plundered the country in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 20). Phoeniciæ Ebūsus, built by Phœnicians (Sil. Ital. iii. 362). Vietrix Ebūsus (Manil. iv. 638).

Ecbātāna, orum, n. Hamedan, the capital of Mēdia (Plin. i. 718), founded, according to Herodotus, by Dēiōces, son of Phraortes, the first king of the Medes (Herod. i. 98. Just. xii. 1).

Ecbōlīma, orum, n. a town of India, which Ptolemy calls Embōlīma. It seems to have been not far from the mouth of the river Soastus, a branch of Indus (Curt. viii. 12).

Ecētra, æ, f. Carpineto, a town of the Volsce near Trērus, the Succo. Inh. Ecētrāni, orum, m. The Romans granted them peace, but took from them part of their territory, in 495 B. C. (Liv. ii. 25 seq.).

Echēcles, is, m. son of Actor, hence called Actōrides, prince of the Mýrmidōnes, who married Pōlymēla after she had born Eudōxa to Mērcūrius (Hom. Il. xvi. 189).

Echēclus, i, m. son of Agēnor, killed by Achīlles (Hom. Il. xx. 474).—2. A noble Trojan, killed by Pātrocclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 694).

Echēcrātes, is, m. a man of royal dignity, the father of Antigōnus. He remained the faithful friend of Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, till his death, and convinced that monarch of the innocence of his son Dēmētrius, by proving the accusations preferred against him by his elder son Pērsēus, to be forgeries (Liv. xl. 54—58).

Echēdēmus, i, m. a nobleman of the Acūr-nānes, who was in the interest of Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, and a violent enemy of the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 16, 17).—2. An Athenian, chief of the embassy sent to the Roman consul L. Cōrnēlius Scipio in 192 B. C. as he marched through Greece, on his way to Asia, to make war on Antiochus, king of Sýria (Liv. xxxvii. 7).

Echēdōrus, i, m. a river rising in Crēs-tōniā, flows through Mýgdōniā, and is lost in a marsh near the river Axius. The waters of this stream were insufficient for the army of Xērxes (Herod. vii. 124 seq.).

Echēmon, ōnis, m. a son of Priāmus, killed in the same chariot with his brother Chrōmīus, by Diōmēdes (Hom. Il. v. 160).

Echēnēus, i, m. a noble Phœacian of advanced age, distinguished for his oratory (Hom. Od. vii. 155).

Echēphron, ōnis, m. a son of Nēstor, king of Pylus (Hom. Od. iii. 413).

Echēpōlus, i, m. a son of Anchises, hence called Anchisādēs. He gave Ethē to Agēmēmnon, to procure exemption from going to war at Troy, and to be allowed to remain and enjoy his great riches at Sicyon (Hom. Il. xxiii. 296 seq.).—2. A Trojan, son of Thālēs, killed by Antiochus (Hom. Il. iv. 458).

Echētus, i, m. a king of Epīrus, a man of enormous cruelty. The ancients supposed that he lived not in the age of Ulysses, but in that of Hōmērus (Hom. Od. xviii. 83).

Echīdna, æ, f. a monster sprung from Chrysior and Cāllirhōē, represented as a beautiful woman above the waist, and a serpent below it. The word is often used to signify the Hýdra of Lērna, or any huge venomous serpent. Adj. Echīdnēus, a, um.

Echīdnēa cānis, Cērbērus (Ov. Met. vii. 408).

Echīnādes, um, formerly Echīnæ, arum, f. Curzolari, small islands formed at the mouth of Achēlōus, the Aspro-Potamo, by the alluvion of that river, of which some are uninhabited, and others now joined to the continent. Plinius gives the names of nine, a number in modern times reduced to five, and known by the general appellation of Curzolari (i. 447). They were likewise called Strōphādes q. r. from one of the harpies, which Zēthes and Cālāis, in the Argonautic expedition, drove from the tables of Phīncūs, and pursued, having turned aside to the continent at these islands, and from extreme fatigue, dropped down (Apol. i. 9). The more common opinion is, that these sons of Borēas were not allowed either to extirpate, or chase them farther, therefore on reaching these islands, they turned and joined the Argonauts. See Strōphādes.

Echīnus, i, m. Echīnou, a town of Thessaly, on Māliacus Sīnus, the Gulf of Molo (Liv. xxxii. 33).

Echīon, tōnis, m. one of the men who sprang from the teeth of the dragon which Cādms sowed. He was one of the five who survived, in consequence of his having made to the remaining four, proposals of peace, to which they agreed. With the assistance of these five men, Cādms built Thēbæ, Theba, in Bēōtiā. He married Agavē, by whom he had Penthēus (Apol. iii. 5). Echīōnides, æ, m. Penthēus, the son of Echīon; Pōlyñices, a descendant of Echīon (Stat. Th. vi. 467).

Adj. Echīōnius, a, um, of Echīon, Bēōtian. Echīōniæ Thēbæ, Bēōtian Theba (Hor. Od. iv. 4. 64). Echīōniā plebs, the common people of Thēbæ, Theba (Stat. Th. i. 169).—2. A giant killed by Minērvā in the Gīgāntōmāchia (Claud. xxxvii. 104 seq.).—3. Son of Mērcūrius and Antianira, daughter of Mēnētus, who was one of the Argonauts. He possessed the art and cunning which might be expected in a son of Mērcūrius. On this account, Iāson employed him as a herald and messenger to the different kings and nations with whom he had any intercourse during that celebrated expedition (Hyg. 14. Val. Flacc. i. 440 seq.).

Echīlus, i, m. a noble Greek, father of Mēcistēus, killed by Pōlites, a son of Priāmus (Hom. Il. xv. 339).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Pātrocclus, clad in the armour of Achīlles (Hom. Il. xvi. 415—17).

Echō, ūs, f. a nymph remarkable for her loquacity, said to have been the daughter of Aer and Tēllus. She was one of Juno's attendants, and nearly deprived of speech by that goddess, because she had become the confidant of Jūpiter, in his immoral deeds. Of a number of words, says Ovid, she could only repeat the last. Narcissus having afterwards despised her love, her body from excessive grief pined gradually away, until no part of the nymph remained except her voice and bones. The former continued, but the latter were changed into stone. Such is the ancient and fabulous account of Echo, which modern philosophy has proved to be a sound reflected, or reverberated from a hard solid body, and sometimes, though more rarely, from a fluid. Plane surfaces return the sound better than convex, and concave much better than either. The distance of an echo is easily ascertained, since sound travels at the rate of 1142 feet in a second of time. Some echoes repeat only one word, others, many; and some return the sound but once, whilst others reverberate it distinctly not less than 17 times.

Eclōgē, es, f. a nurse of Nēro, and one of the three women who buried him (Suet. Ner. 50).

Edēsko, ōnis, m. a distinguished Spanish commander, who came over to Scipio Africanus, in 211 B. C., both because his wife and children were in the hands of the Romans, and because he had an irresistible inclination to desert the Carthaginians, on purpose to embrace the interest of that nation. The same propensity induced Indibilis and Māndōnius, unquestionably the first two men in Spain, to withdraw from Hannibal, and to join Scipio with the whole body of their countrymen (Liv. xxvii. 17).

Edēssa, æ, f. Vodina, a town of Mācēdōniā, the capital of that kingdom before Pella, of which Cārānus obtained possession without the knowledge of the inhabitants, having followed a flock of goats flying from a heavy shower in a thick mist. From this circumstance he called the town Egēa, and the inhabitants Egēōdai, and made it the royal residence, which, with its continuing to be the burying-place of the kings, may account for Livy's epithet noble (xlv. 30). Inh. Edēssēl, orum (Sing. Edēssēus, i), m. (Liv. xlii. 51).—2. A town of Mēsōpōtāmīa, now Orpha, or, Roha, which Plinius says was anciently called Antiochia. That author makes Edēssa a town of Arābīa (i. 581). The Roman emperor Cārācālla died at Edēssa in the year 217 (Eutrop. viii. 20). Inh. Edēssēni, orum (Sing. Edēssēnus, i), m. anciently Edēssēi. In some copies of Eutropius, we find Edēssēi, where better editions have Mēsēni (viii. 3). Adj. Edēssēnus, a, um. Edēssēna sepulchra.

Edōnis, Idis, f. a district of Thrācia, on the seacoast between the river Strýmon, the Strumona, and Nēssus, so called, according to Stēphānus, from Edōnus, a brother of Mýgdon; but, according to others, from Edōnus, a mountain of Thrācia, on which the orgies of Bācchus were celebrated by the Thracian women (Plin. i. 445. Luc. Phar. i. 675). Inh. Edōni, orum, v. Edōnes, um, m. (Hor. Od. ii. 7. 27). Edōnis, Idis, f. of Edōnis, applied to females, or nouns feminine, also Thracian. Edōnides mātres, Thracian matrons, worshippers of Bācchus (Ov. Met. xi. 69). Adj. Edōnus, v. Edōnius, a, um, of Edōnis, or the Edōni, Thracian. Edōnus Bōrēas, Thracian Bōrēas (Virg. Æn. xii. 365). Edōna hīemes, Thracian i. e. severe, winters (Claud. xxxi. 123).

Eētōn, ōnis, m. son of Echēcrātes, king of Thēbē, v. Thēba, a city of Mýsia, whom, with a number of his subjects, Achilles killed (Hom. Il. i. 366). He was the father of Andrōmāchē, wife of Hector, consequently an ally of the Trojans. Stātiūs represents him as skilful in the curing of wounds, and stopping effusions of blood (Th. x. 728). Adj. Eētōnēus, a, um. Eētōnēa Thēba (Ov. Met. xii. 110).—2. The ransom of Lýcōn, whom Hōmērus calls Imbrīus, probably from his being a native of the island Imbros (Hom. Il. xxi. 43).—3. A noble Trojan, the father of Pōdes (Hom. Il. xvii. 575—590).

Eficiūs Cālvinus, Eficīi Cālvinī, m. a Roman knight of great riches, who purchased L. Apūleius, and afterwards made him free, on account of the powers of his mind, which raised him to distinction among grammarians (Suet. Il. Gram. 3).

Egālēos, i, m. a mountain of Attica, anciently covered with wood, hence Stātiūs, Egālēos dives nēmōrum (Th. xii. 620).

Egēria, v. Agēria (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 76), æ, f. a nymph, or goddess, whose fountain and grove were at Aricia, where Nūma Pōmpeilius, second king of Rome, pretended to have meetings, and to have received from her all his laws respecting the arts of peace, and the worship of the gods. His interviews with Egēria were in the cave of Cāpēna, or, Cāpēna, under Mōns Avēntinus. Plūtarchus explains this fiction by stating, that Nūma, after the death of his wife, spent much of his time in sacred groves and solitudes. Ovidius says, that she was his wife, and that, after his death, she retired to the grove of Aricia, where she bewailed, with incessant grief, the loss of her husband, which excited the pity of Diāna, who turned her into a fountain (Met. xv. 487 seq.). The epithet which Jūvenālis applies to Egēria is ambiguous; but the character of Nūma will not admit of its bearing an immoral interpretation (Sat. iii. 12 seq.).

Egērius, i, m. the son of Arūns, the brother of Tārquinius Priscus, who had this name on account of his poverty, the consequence of his father predeceasing his grandfather, and the latter, not aware that his son's widow was pregnant, made no provision for him in his will. By his uncle, Lūcōmo, better known by the name of Tārquinius Priscus, he was appointed governor of Cōlātia, whence he was afterwards called Cōlātīnus, a name retained by his posterity (Liv. i. 34).

Egesarētus, i, m. a Thessalian, a native of Lārissa, Lerissa (Greeks), and Yeniseri (Turks), who favoured the interest of Pōmpeius. The Thessalians were divided into two parties. At the head of the one, which declared for the commonwealth or Pōmpeius, was Egesarētus, and at the head of the other was Pētrēius, a young nobleman, who was a zealous partizan of Cæsar (Cæs. B. C. iii. 35).

Egēstāni, orum, m. a people of Sicily, allies of the Carthaginians (Herod. v. 46).

L. Egilius, L. Egili, m. one of the three commissioners appointed to settle a colony at Lūna, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 13).

Egnātia Māximilla, Egnātīe Māximillæ, f. wife of Glicius Gāllus, whom she followed into banishment. The rapacity of government seized on her property, which only proved her fortitude and contentment; for she retained the same evenness of conduct in poverty which she had shown in affluence (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Egnātius, i, m. a Celtiberian, who, according to the custom of his country, washed his teeth every day with urine to render them white and, therefore, to show their fine colour, disregarding time and place, he used to laugh on the most grave and mournful occasions. On purpose to reclaim him from this foolish and unseasonable laughter, Cātūllus endeavours to dissuade him from exposing his teeth, by insinuating, that the more white and polished his teeth were, they proved the greater quantity of urine which he had drunk (xxxix).

Egnātius Mētēllus, Egnāti Mētēlli, m. a Roman, who beat his wife to death with rods, because she had drunk too much wine (Val. Max. vi. 3).

M. Egnātius Rūfus, M. Egnāti Rūfi, m. during the reign of Augustus, entered into a conspiracy which cost him his life (Suet. Aug. 19). To him Tacitus alludes (Ann. i. 10).

P. Egnātius Cēler, P. Egnāti Cēleris, m. a professor of Stoic philosophy, who appeared a witness against his friend Bārēas Sōrānus. Tacitus says, that, under an assumed air of simplicity, he concealed perfidy, avarice, and deception (Ann. xvi. 32). Jūvēnālis calls him simply a Stoic (Sat. iii. 116).

Elon, ōnis, f. an inconsiderable town of the Argīvi, in Pēlōpōnnēsus (Hom. Il. ii. 561). Others think it was a name of the island Cālauria.—2. Another on Strýmon, the Strumona (Herod. vii. 25).

Elōnēus, ēos, m. a Grecian prince, killed by Hēctor (Hom. Il. vii. 11).—2. A Thracian prince, the father of Rhēsus. His horses were most beautiful, of great size, whiter than snow, and equal to the winds in speed. His chariot was of silver and gold, and his arms gold, which armour the gods did not permit men to carry (Hom. Il. x. 434 seq.).

Elaea, ae, f. Klisseli, a town of Æolis, the port of Pērgāmus. Here Eumēnes, king of Asia, had his fleet, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 43). Inh. Elæēses, iur, m. Their lands were desolated by Antiochus, king of Syria, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 19). Adj. Elaiēticus, a, um.—2. Mirza Mumbarack, a town near the Red Sea, on the west side.—3. St. Giovanni, a port or harbour of Epirus.

Elæon, onis, m. a plain in Epirus (Liv. xliii. 23).

Elæus, ūntis, m. a town of Thracian Chērsōnēsus, which Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia, took, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16). Inh. Elæūnti, orum, m. (Herod. ix. 120).

Elāptōnulus, i, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, and one of the conspirators against his life, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 6).

Elāsus, i, m. a noble Trojan, killed by Pātrōclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 696).

Elātiā, ae, f. Baba (Eleuta, Dod. ii. 139), a town of Thessaly, in the pass which leads to Tēmpē, Tenbi, now a large and beautiful village (Liv. xlii. 54).—2. Turcocrorio, a town of Phōcis, on the confines of Thessaly (Liv. xxviii. 7). Inh. Elātiēses, iur, m.

Elātrēus, ēos, m. a Phæacian, and a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcīnōus. He gained the prize for throwing the quoit (Hom. Od. viii. 111).

Elātus, i, m. a Thessalian, the father of Cēnis, v. Cēnēus. Adj. Elātēlus, a, um. Elātētia Cēnis (Ov. Met. xii. 189). Elātētus Cēnicus (Ov. Met. xli. 497). Antōnīnus makes Cēnis the daughter of Atrāx, an opinion seemingly likewise adopted by Ovidius (Met. xii. 209); although a few lines before he has Elātētia Cēnis. This discrepancy may, perhaps, be removed by supposing him to have used Atrācidas to denote a Thessalian, or that Elātus and Atrāx were in the same line of descent. If neither of these be admitted, then Ovidius must submit to the charge of a contradiction.—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Agāmēmnon (Hom. Il. vi. 33).—3. One of the lovers of Pēnēlōpē, killed by Eumēus (Hom. Od. xxii. 267).—4. Father of Pōlyphēmus, one of the Argonauts, hence called Elātides (Orph. 168).

Elātus, i, m. Monte Scopo, a mountain in the island Zācynthus, Zante, about fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea.

Elāver, ēris, m. the Allier, a river of Gāllia, which rises at the foot of mount Lozere, runs nearly north, and, after a course of seventy-two leagues, falls into Ligēris, the Loire, about three miles above Nevers. This river, says Caesar, could not be forded before autumn, which must have been in consequence of the melting of the snow on the mountains, in which it and the streams by which it is fed, have their sources (Cæs. B. C. vii. 34 seq.).

Elbō, ūs, f. an island in Egypt (Herod. ii. 140).

Elēzārus, i, m. a commander of one party of the Jews, killed by a band of assassins, who, likewise, cut off his whole party, in the year 70. Under pretence of performing a sacrifice, John sent these banditti for that particular purpose, and this atrocious deed put him in possession of the temple which Elēzārus then held (Tac. Hist. v. 12).

Elēctra, ae, f. one of the Oecēnides, who, by Thaumās, became the mother of the Harpies, Aēllō and Ocypētē (Apol. i. 2).—2. Daughter of Dānāus, and wife of Pērithēnes.—3. A daughter of Atlas, and mother of Dārdānus, by Jūpiter. Atlāntis, idis, f. Elēctra (Apol. iii. 2). Virg. Æn. viii. 135).—4. The sister of Orēstes, a woman of manly resolution, who joined her brother in accomplishing the death of Ægisthus and their own mother (Vel. Pat. i. 1. Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 140).

Elēctra, ae, f. a name of Sāmōthrācē, Samothraki, derived, according to some, from Elēctra, mother of Dārdānus, and, according to others, from Elēctra, the mother of Hārmōniā. The former appears to be the true derivation. Adj. Elēctrius, a, um. Elēctria tēllus, Sāmōthrācē (Val. Flacc. ii. 431).

Elēctrae, arum, f. one of the seven gates of Thēbæ, Theba, at which Drýas commanded in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 356).

Elēctrum, i, n. amber, a solid, hard, semipellucid, bituminous substance, respecting the origin of which, and the class of bodies it belongs to, naturalists have been greatly divided. Some considered it a vegetable, others a mineral, and several an animal, substance. Poland, Prussia, and Germany, afford great quantities of amber, dug out of the earth, or found on the banks of the rivers, or on the shores of the Baltic. It is chiefly of two colours, white and yellow; in medicine, the former, and in the manufacture of beads and toys, the latter is preferred. When once melted, it loses both its hardness and beauty, which by no process yet known can be recovered. Amber forms the basis of all varnishes. For the fictitious account of its formation, see Heliades and Phaëthon. There is a kind of metal under this name, of which four parts are gold and one silver. To it Silius Itālicus alludes (i. 229).

Elēūs, ēos, m. one of the names of Bācchus, from a kind of cry loudly repeated by the worshippers of that god during his festivals. Elēū was a warlike acclamation among the Greeks. Elēūs, ēidos, f. a priestess, or female worshipper of Bācchus. Elēūdes acta furis Bacchi (Ov. Ep. Her. iv. 47).

Elēlichthon, ōnis, m. a Greek name of Nēptūnus, from shaking the earth (Pin. Pyth. vi. 49).

Elēon, ōnis, f. a town of Bæōtia (Hom. Il. ii. 500).

Elēphāntinē, es, f. Fleur, or, Ell-Sag, an island in Nilus, the Nile, above Sŷēnē, Es-souan. Tacitus writes, that it and Sŷēnē were the ancient boundaries of the Roman empire; but when he composed his history they extended to the Red Sea (Ann. ii. 61).

Elēphāntis, idis, f. a poetess, who wrote verses of the most filthy kind, of which the emperor Tiberius kept copies, that his guests might have precedents for every kind of impurity (Mart. xii. 43. Suet. Tib. 43).

Elēphāntus, i, m. an elephant. Hōmērus mentions ivory, but does not seem to have heard of the elephant (Paus. i. 12). The Romans first engaged these animals in battle, when Pŷrrhus, king of Epirus, invaded Italy, afterwards in the second Punic war, in Asia, when they fought against Antiochus, and in Africa against Jūgūrtha. The driver sat on the neck, and the warriors fought from turrets on their backs. Hāsdrūbal, a brother of Hānnibal, discovered a method of putting elephants to death, whenever they became ungovernable. The manager, or driver, had a tradesman's knife, and a small mallet, and, having lost all power over the animal, he placed the knife behind the ears, in the joint which connects the neck with the head, and, with the mallet, gave it the strongest blow which his strength permitted, and the animal instantly dropped down lifeless. This invention was considered of great importance, since, on becoming furious, they often turned on their own troops, threw the ranks into confusion, and destroyed a number of lives.

Elēphēnor, ōris, m. son of Chālēcōdon, who commanded the Abāntes in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ii. 540 seq.).

Elēsiūm, i, n. a town of Bæōtia, which stood on marshy ground, whence the name (Hom. Il. ii. 499).

Elēusis, e. Elēusin, inis, f. Elefsis, Elefsin, Leisina, or, Leusina, a town of Attica, at which was a famous temple of Cēres. Philippius, king of Mācēdōnia, attempted to surprise this religious edifice, without success, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 25, 26). Here Triptolēmus began to cultivate the soil, and to sow grain, an art till then unknown (Just. ii. 6). This town, says Pausanias, had its name from Elēusin, who, according to some, was the son of Mercūrius and Dātra, a daughter of Ocēānus, and, according to others, the son of Ogŷgus. It is now a miserable village of thirty mud huts, but finely situated on the declivity of a hill, which stretches from the mountain Kerāta, in the direction of N. E. to S. W., and is distant about half a mile from the sea. Inh. Elēusini, orum (Sing. Elēusinius, i), m. Adj. Elēusinus, Elēusiniacus, et, Elēusinius, a, um. Elēusina sacra, sacrifices to Cēres (Suet. Claud. 25). Elēusiniūm cōrtāmēn, games in honour of Cēres (Gel. xv. 20). Elēūsina mātēr, Cēres (Virg. G. i. 163). Elēusiniūcus sinus (Strab. 531).

Elēuthēri, orum, m. This word occurs only twice in Caesar, and both times in B. G. vii. 75). It is applied, in the former instance, to the Cādūrci, who lived on Dūrānūs, the Dordogne, probably to distinguish them from the Cādūrci, who lived on Oltis, e. Otis, the Olt, and, in the latter, to the Sūcsciōnes, a people whose territories lay between Mātrōna, the Marne, and Isāra, the Oise, branches of Sēquāna, the Seine, perhaps to point them out from other tribes of the same name. The readings, in the chapter above quoted, are very different. That which seems most approved, and, on that account, adopted in the best editions, has Elēuthēri only once conjoined with Cādūrci.

Elēuthērōpōlis, is, f. a city of Pālēstina (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Elēlus, i, m. a surname of Jūpiter (Ov. Fast. iii. 328).

Elīmēa, æ, f. a city and district of Ilŷŷri-cum (Liv. xxxi. 40). Inh. Elīmēi, orum, m.

Elīmōtis, idis, f. a district of Mācēdōnia, which, with Aētātānia and Stŷmphilis, formed part of the fourth division of Mācēdōnia, after that kingdom was reduced to a Roman province, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 50).

Elis, is, e. idos, et, Elēa, æ, f. a district of Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, bounded on the S. by Mēssēnia, on the W. by Mārē Iōniūm, the Ionian Sea, on the N. by Achāia, and on the E. by Arcādia. The principal city, which bore the same name, now Belvidere (Paleopoli, Leake), stood on the south bank of Pēnēs, the Igiako, at a considerable distance from the sea. Pōlybius says, it was the most populous and fertile district of Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea. After Iphītus re-established the Olympic games, the whole territory was sacred to Jūpiter, the inhabitants were exempted from warfare, and the territory was inviolable. The Grecian states bound themselves by the most solemn obligations to abstain from invading it, an engagement which was long observed with the strictest fidelity, but at last, Agis, king of Spārta, led his army to this district, and desolated the consecrated ground. In Elis was raised fine flax, which grew nowhere else in Greece; in smallness it approached to that of the Hebrews, but was not so yellow (Paus. v. 5). Inh. Elēi, orum, et, Elēenses, ium, m. Elēas, iādos, et, Elēis, idos, f. of Elis, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Elēides equa, mares which gained the prize at Olŷmṗia, a town of Elis (Virg. G. i. 59). Adj. Elēus, a, um. Elēa palma, the palm of Olŷmṗia (Hor. Od. iv. 2. 17). Elēus carcer, the starting-place at the Olympic races (Ov. Ep. Her. xviii. 166). Elēum flūmen, Alphēus, the Roufia (Ov. Met. v. 576). Elēus Tōnans, Olympic Jūpiter (Claud. xvii. 290). Elēus ager (Liv. xxvii. 31).—2. The only city of the Aētōli (Herod. viii. 73).

Elissa, Elisa, e. Elŷsa, æ, f. better known by the nickname of Dido, equivalent to Virāgo in Latin, was a daughter of Bēlus, king of Phœnicia. Dives Elŷsa, rich Dido, alluding to her carrying off the wealth of her brother Pŷgmālōn (Stat. Syl. iii. 1. 74). Adj. Elissæus, a, um, of Dido; Carthaginian. Elissæus tŷrānnus, Hānnibal (Sil. Ital.

ii. 239). Elissæ aræ, Carthaginian altars (Sil. Ital. iii. 82).

Elissa, v. f. a Carthaginian ship, of six banks of oars, burned in a naval engagement off Sicily, between M. Claudius Marcellus, the Roman consul, and Himilco, in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 573).

Elissus, i. m. a river of Achæa, which Statius describes full of windings, Elissus incircus (Th. iv. 52).

Elitovius, i. m. a Gaul, who conducted an emigration of the Cénomani into Italy, through Saltus Taurinus, following the steps of Bellovæsus. These new-comers were indebted to the friendship of that prince, and they settled in that part of the country possessed by the Libii, where the cities Brixia and Verona afterwards stood (Liv. v. 35).

Elis, i. m. a freedman, who rose to honours, and acquired great riches, during the reign of the emperor Nero (Tac. Hist. i. 37).

Elorus, i. m. See Hektorus.

Elpënor, ôris, m. one of the companions of Ulysses, whom Circe transformed into swine. According to Hómërus, Elpënor, when drunk in the house of that goddess, fell and was killed (Od. x. 552). To this Ovidius alludes (lb. 483), and Martialis (xi. 83).

Elpiniçæ, esæ, f. daughter of Miltiades, who was first the wife of her brother Cimon, and afterwards of Cillias. She agreed to marry the latter, on condition that he paid the fine for which her father had died in prison, and for which her husband was then in confinement (Cor. Nep. Cim. 1). See Cillias.

Elusa, v. f. Eluse, or, Eause, a town of Aquitania (Ammianus Marcellinus says, of Narboune), belonging to the Elusætes (Amm. Mar. xv. 11).

Elusætes, ium, m. a people of Aquitania, who lived on Atur, the Adour, whose principal city was Elusa, Eause (Cæs. B. G. iii. 27).

Elýces, v. m. a man, killed by Përsëus (Ov. Met. v. 87).

Elýmæis, Idis, f. a country to the south of Mædia. Sūsiana lay between it and Sinus Përsicus, the Persian Gulf. The capital was of the same name, at which was a temple of Jupiter, that contained great riches. See Antiochus Magnus. Inh. Elýmæi, orum, m. the Elymeans. Livius says, their name was scarcely heard before the ambassadors of Antiochus, king of Syria, mentioned it in the council, at Ægium, in 194 B. C. The Elymeans, who fought in the army of this king at Thyatira, Akhisar, two years after, were archers (Liv. xxxv. 48 seq.). When Tacitus wrote, the Romans knew this part of Asia much better than they did in the days of Livius (Tac. Ann. vi. 44). Adj. Elýmæus, a, um. Elýmæus Jupiter (Just. xxxii. 2).

Elýsi, orum, m. the Elysians, a German nation, whose particular situation geographers have not ascertained. Some place them between Vistula, the Vistula, and Viadrus, the Oder (Tac. Ger. 43).

Elýsius, a, um. Elýsi campi, v. Elýsi-um, i. n. the place of the righteous after death, according to the notions of the Greeks and Romans. Some authors suppose the fable of Elýsium to have been borrowed from the Phœnicians, deriving the name from a Phœnician word, which signifies to rejoice, or to be in joy. Others derive it from the Greek verb λύω, I set loose, or, disengage, because in Elýsium the souls of men were freed from the fetters and incumbrance of the body. Bochartus conjectures, that Hómërus borrowed his idea of the Elysian fields and of the infernal regions from the exaggerated description of Hispania Bætica given by the Phœnicians. Elýsia unda, the Styx (Virg. Cu. 259). Elýsium iter, the road which leads to Elýsium (Virg. Æn. vi. 542).

Emānus, i. m. a commander of the Gauls under Brënnus q. v. (Just. xxiv. 7).

Emāthia, v. Emāthia, v. f. a district of Mæcëdônia, formerly called Pædônia, but often used by the Latin poets in so indefinite a sense as to include not only all Mæcëdônia, but likewise all Thëssalia. It lay at the top of Sinus Thërmæicus, the Gulf of Salonica. Its chief town was Pella, Palatiza, in which both Philippos and his son, Alexander the Great, were born. The name has been derived from Emāthion, one of the ancient kings of the country. Emāthis, Idis, f. of Emāthia, applied to a female, and to a noun feminine. Emāthis tellus (Luc. Phæ. vi. 580). Emāthides, um, f. the daughters of Përus, the rivals of the Muses (Ov. Met. v. 669). Adj. Emāthius, a, um, of Emāthia, of Mæcëdônia, of Thëssalia, or of Philippi. Emāthii campi, Macedonian plains (Ov. Met. v. 313). Emāthia cades, the carnage at Philippi (Ov. Met. xv. 824).—2. A city of Thracia, called by Hómërus, Æsýna q. v. (Liv. xliii. 7).

Emāthion, ônis, acc. ôna, m. a son of Titan and Aurôra, who was king of Mæcëdônia. From him the country was called Emāthia, before it was known by the former name. Emāthis, Idos, f. Macedonian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Emāthius, a, um, of Emāthion, or Emāthia; Macedonian, &c.—2. An old man who was killed by Chrômis, whilst he embraced the altar, at the marriage of Përsëus and Andromëda (Ov. Met. v. 100).

Embölon, i. n. a district of Lycia, nearly opposite the island Rhodus. The inhabitants chiefly worshipped the sun (Pin. Ol. vii. 35).

Emërta, orum, n. Merida, a town of Spain, in the province of Extremadura. Inh. Emërîtenses, ium, m. (Tac. Hist. i. 73).

Emësa, v. f. Hems, an ancient city of Phœnicia, in which was an elegant temple of Elagabalus, or the sun (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).

Emodus, i. m. supposed to be the snowy mountains, a continuation of Imius (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Empëdöcles, is, m. a native of Agrigéntum, Girgenti, who was eminent both as a philosopher and a poet. He wrote a poem of considerable length on the causes of things, in which he endeavoured to solve the phenomena of nature by sympathies and antipathies. Cicero censures with severity his philosophical opinions, and it must be acknowledged, not without justice. He believed that there were four primitive elements, an idea still generally prevalent (Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 5). Nothing certain respecting his death is known. Some maintain that he lived to a great age, others that he perished in mount Ætna, when he went to examine into the volcano, while others assert, that, wishing to be considered a god, consequently endowed with immortality, he leaped into Ætna to conceal his death. The last seems to have been the idea of Hôrâtius (Art. Poet. 465).

Excessive vanity is seldom gratified, and, if such was the expectation of Empedocles, the event completely frustrated it, for the volcano ejected one of his slippers, and thus rendered it indubitable, that he had perished in the flames. Adj. Empedoclēus, a, um. Empedoclēus sanguis (Cic. Tusc. i. 17).

Emphylēus, i, m. an intimate friend of Phocion, who met him on his way to execution, and with tears exclaimed, "O Phocion, how unworthily you suffer!" (Cor. Nep. Phoc. 4).

Empōria, æ, f. v. Empōria, orum, n. a district of Africa, which forms the coast of Syrtis Minor, is very fertile, and was subject to the Carthaginians. The inhabitants, whom Livius calls barbarians, were unwarlike, a consequence of the fertility of the soil, a circumstance by no means uncommon. Lēptis is one of the towns of Empōria (Liv. xxix. 25 seq.).

Empōria, arum, f. Ampurias, a town of Hispania, Spain, near the foot of the Pyrenees. Strictly speaking, Empōria formed two towns, of which the one was built by the Phœacienses (others say the Māssilienses who came from Phœcia in Iōnia), the other by the Spaniards. This seems to have been the opinion of Livius, who states, that the Grecian town was open towards the sea, that its walls did not exceed four hundred paces, that the Spanish town was farther from the sea, and was three thousand paces in circumference. C. Jūlius Cæsar planted a colony of Romans here, after the defeat of the sons of Pōmpēius. These three classes had incorporated when Livius wrote, and had been admitted citizens of Rome. The Greek inhabitants had no intercourse with their Spanish neighbours, except in selling to them the articles which they had imported, for the natives were ignorant of navigation, but a fierce and warlike race, against whom it was necessary to be perpetually on guard. Cn. Cōrnēlius Scipio landed here in 220 B. C., with the forces which he had received from his brother the consul, and his nephew P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, afterwards Africānus, when he went to take the command of the army, after both his father and uncle had fallen in that country (Liv. xxi. 60 seq.). Phœaciæ Empōria (Sil. Ital. iii. 369). Inh. Empōritāni, orum (Sing. Empōritānus, i), m. (Liv. xxxiv. 16).

Empōrium, i, n. a town of Italy near Plācēntia.—2. Another on the Tiber (Liv. xxi. 57 seq.).

Empūlum, i, n. a town belonging to the Tibūries, taken by the Romans, in 354 B. C. (Liv. vii. 18).

Eneās, i, m. son of Hippocōon, one of the hunters at Cālŷdon, whom the boar struck, and killed (Ov. Met. viii. 362).

Enarēes, um, m. a Scythian nation, skilled in divination, which Vēnus communicated to them (Herod. i. 105).

Enaulus, i, m. a precipitous torrent, running in a narrow channel (Orph. Arg.).

Encēlādus, i, m. a son of Titan and Tērra, one of the giants whom Jūpiter struck with lightning, and placed under mount Ætna, whence that mountain emits flames, and all Sicily shakes when he stirs himself (Virg. Æn. iii. 578 seq.). Hērātius represents him as darting trees which he had torn up by the root (Od. iii. 4. 56).—2. A distinguished grammarian. Grēmūs Encēlādi, the lap, i. e. the pocket of Encēlādus (Juv. Sat. vii. 215).—3. A freedman of Augustus, whom the emperor honoured with a respectable office. Some editions of Suetonius join this name with Licinius, the word before, but falsely; as Licinius was a different person (Aug. 67).

Enchēlia, æ, f. a town of Illyricum, which some suppose had this name from Cādus and Hērmiōnē being changed there into dragons (Luc. Phar. iii. 189). Inh. Enchēlia, arum, m. Enchēlis, idis, f. of Enchēlia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Enchēlius, a, um.

Encōlpus, i, m. a servant or slave, who vowed his whole hair to Apōllo, from regard to his master Pūdēs, on his becoming the first centurion of the legion, which he fulfilled on the promotion of Pūdēs to that rank (Mart. i. 32—v. 49).

Endāis, v. Endēis, idis, f. a daughter of Chiron, and wife of Æacus, by whom she became the mother of Pēlēs and Telāmon. Endāidæ, arum, m. Pēlēs and Telāmon (Pin. Nem. v. 21).

Endŷmion, ōnis, m. son of Æthlius, or Jūpiter and Cālŷcē, who led a colony from Thēssalia to Elis. In consequence of his uncommon beauty, Lūna fell ardently in love with this youth. Jūpiter having promised him whatever he should ask, and he having requested that he might sleep continually in undecaying youth, the goddess descended nightly to embrace him on mount Lātms. To him she bore fifty daughters, which Pausānias considers fabulous, and adds, that he had three sons, Pæon, Epēus and Ætōlus, and one daughter, Eurŷcŷdē, by Astērōdia, or, Chrōmia, daughter of Itōnus, or, Hŷpērīppē. Such uncertainty prevails respecting his wives. He offered his crown to his sons as the prize for the swiftest runner at the Olympic games, which Epēus gained. According to the Hērāclēōtæ, he withdrew to the mountain Lātms, where he died, yet the Elēi showed his monument at their city. Hence it is probable, that the king of Elis was a different person from the one who slept on mount Lātms, and who is hence called Lātmins, Lātmins vōnātor, &c. (Val. Flacc. viii. 28). Plinius accounts for the fiction of his intercourse with Lūna, from his being the first who explained the phases of the moon, and by his studying astronomy on Lātms. Adj. Endŷmionēus, a, um. Endŷmionēi sōpōres (Auson. cccxxv. 41).

Engūon (3 syl.), v. Engŷon, i, n. Gangī, an inland town of Sicily, near the sources of Himēra, the River of Tērmīni (Sil. Ital. xiv. 249). Inh. Engūini, orum, m. (Plin. i. 346).

Enicēus, ēos, m. a man celebrated by Pindārus for throwing the javelin (Ol. x. 86).

Eniēnes, um (Sing. Eniā. ānis), m. a people of Thessaly, who had their name from the town Eniā.

Enlōpēus, ēos, m. son of the brave Thēbrus, the charioteer of Hector, killed by Diōmēdes (Hom. Il. viii. 120).

Euipēus, ēos, m. a man who excelled in animating the troops to acts of martial bravery, by the clarion (Stat. Th. xi. 50).

Euipēus, ēos, m. the Malathria, or, Gura, a river of Thessaly, which has its source near mount Othrys, and joins Apidānus, the Sataldge, before it falls into Pēnēus, the Salampria. Ovid's description of this river is directly opposed to that of Lūcānus, the former makes it a rapid-running stream (Met. i. 579), and the latter slow, until it is lost in the Sataldge (Phar. vi. 373), in which he agrees with Valērius Flaccus (i. 357).—2. A river in Mācēdōniā, which rises near Olympos, is small in summer, rapid when swelled by winter rains, runs over huge rocks, forming whirlpools, and making deep gulfs, by sweeping away the earth at the bottom into the sea, and thus by sinking in the middle of the channel renders both its banks high and steep. It falls into Sinus Thērmāicus, the Gulf of Salonica, to the south of Dium, Stan-dia. This river is celebrated for the resistance which Persēus, the last king of Mācēdon, made on its banks against the advancement of the Roman army under Q. Mārcius Philippus (Liv. xlv. 8 seq.).—3. The river of Floha, a branch of Alphēus, the Roufia (Leake).

Enōspē, es, f. a town of Arcādiā, mentioned by Hōmērus. According to Pausānias, some supposed that Enōspē, Strātōē, and Rhīpē, were islands in the river Lādon; an error for which he finds it difficult to account, since that stream is not large enough to form islands. Stāsius has ventōsa Enōspē, an epithet adapted to its elevated situation (Th. iv. 286).

Enna. See Henna.

Enna, ae, f. the wife of Nēvius Sērtōrīns Mīcro who made her throw out the lure to secure the affections of Cālligūla, which, to her disgrace, she both did, and succeeded (Tac. Ann. vi. 45). By his order, she as well as her husband suffered a violent death (Suet. Cal. 26).

L. Ennius, L. Ennī, m. a Roman knight, who was accused of treason, because he had melted down a silver statue of the emperor Tiberius, and converted it to domestic purposes. The emperor stopped the proceedings (Tac. Ann. iii. 70).

Q. Ennius, Q. Ennī, m. the most distinguished Latin poet at the period in which he lived, was a native of Rūdiā in Cālābria, where he was born in 239 B. C. His descent has been referred to the ancient sovereign, Mēssāpus (Sil. Ital.). Cāto brought him from Sārdīniā to Rome, which Cōrnēlius Nēpos considers an honour, equal to the noblest triumph over that island (Cat. i). He was the father of Epic poetry among the Romans, and chose for his subject the military achievements of the elder P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, whose praises he had celebrated in his Roman annals, another poetical work which extended to eighteen books. He translated from Greek into Latin prose a work on the origin of the gods, and the Hēcūba of Eurīpides in verse. He composed satires, tragedies, comedies, epigrams, and phagētica, v. phagesia. Respecting the last, learned writers are not agreed. He died at the age of seventy. To him must be attributed the merit of improving the Latin language, which he enriched with many new words; but although more refined in the writings of Ennius than in earlier compositions, it did not approach in elegance to the style of the Augustan writers. Hence the latter commend him more for originality and strength of thought, than for purity of diction, or harmony of numbers. His character drawn by himself will be found in Gēllius (xii. 4); some consider it, that of Gēmīnus Sērillus. Pērsius sneers at Ennius for adopting the extravagant doctrine of the Mētēpsychōsis from Pŷthāgōras (Sat. vi. 10). Some understand Quintus to be the prænomen of Ennius, others the numeral adjective, the fifth. According to the latter idea, the soul of a peacock had first passed into Euphōrbus, next into Hōmērus, then into Pŷthāgōras, and afterwards into Ennius, so that he stood fifth, ex Pŷthāgōrēō parōne, from the peacock, called by the poet "Pythagorean," because Pŷthāgōras was the founder of the doctrine of the mētēpsychōsis among the Greeks (Pers. Sat. vi. 11). Silius Itālicus introduces him as a brave soldier (xii. 393). Several fragments of the poetry of Ennius have been preserved. There was a statue of Ennius outside of Pōrta Cāpēna (Liv. xxxviii. 56). Ennius carens arte, without art, i. e. without skill or elegance in composition (Ov. Amor. i. 15. 19). Adj. Ennīanus, a, um. Ennīani vērsum (Gel. xx. 10).

Ennōmos, e, us, i, m. a Trojan prince killed by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 260).—2. A Trojan augur (Hom. Il. xvii. 218).

Ennōsigeus, i, m. a name of Neptūnus, from his presiding over the waters of the sea, which, the ancients supposed, penetrate into different parts of the earth and occasion earthquakes (Juv. Sat. x. 182).

Enōpē, es, f. one of the cities on the shore of Sinus Mēssēniācus, the Gulf of Kalamata, belonging to Agāmēmnon, which, with other gifts, he offered to Achilles if he returned to the war (Hom. Il. ix. 150 seq.). It was afterwards called Gērēniā q. v.

Enōps, ōpis, m. a Greek, the father of Clŷtōmēdes (Hom. Il. xxiii. 634).

Enōsidas, v. Ennōsidas, ae, m. a name of Neptūnus (Pin. Pyth. iv. 58).

Entēlla, ae, f. a town of Siciliā, Sicily, on the western bank of Crimīsus, the Belici, Bractolomeo, or Caltabellotta, built by Acēstes. Silius Itālicus commends it for the excellence of its wines (xiv. 204). It is now in ruins. Respecting the founder of this town, authors differ, but all are agreed as to its antiquity, referring its foundation either to the year that Troy was taken, or the following year. Inh. Entēllini orum (Sing. Entēllinus, i), m. (Plin. i. 346).

Entēllus, i, m. a Sicilian, who excelled at the Cestus, and surpassed Dāres at that exercise. He possessed the cestus of Erŷx, by whom he had been taught the use of it (Virg. Œn. v. 387 seq.).—2. A friend of Mārtiālis, whose lands the poet prefers to the gardens of Alcīnōus (viii. 68).

Enthēus, et, Enthēutus, a, um, drunken, mad, infuriated. Enthēa mātēr, Cŷbēlē (Mart. v. 42). Enthēa tūrba, worshippers of Cŷbēlē (Mart. xi. 85).

Enŷallus, i, m. a name of Mars (Pin. Ol. xii. 149. Hom. Il. ii. 651).

Enŷō, ŷs, f. the Greek name of Bēllōna, hence Mārtis Enŷō (Stat. Th. v. 155).

Eōrdna, ae, f. a town of Mācēdōniā, to the south of the river Erīgōnus. Inh. Eōrdai, orum, m. They, the Lŷncēstas, and Pelāgōnes possessed the fourth district, after Mācēdōniā became a Roman province in 169 B. C. To them were annexed Atintāniā, Stŷmphālīs and Elīmōtiūs. The district is cold, unfavourable for culture, and rough, to which, says Livi^{us}, the dispositions of the people bear a strong resemblance (xiv. 30).

Eōus, i, m. one of the four horses of the sun (Ov. Met. ii. 153).

Eōus, i, m. the morning. Adj. Eōus, a, um, of the morning; eastern.

Epāltes, is, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Pātroc^{lus} clad in the armour of Achil^{les} (Hom. Il. xvi. 415-17).

Epāminōndas, æ, m. a Theban, son of Pōlynnis. His family was more distinguished for rank than wealth, yet he received an excellent education, from which he reaped every advantage that great abilities and sedulous application could command. A sound constitution, united with great personal strength, enabled him to excel in all the exercises which require agility, force, and dexterity. To these accomplishments, he joined that requisite of a great commander, a ready, forcible, and impressive eloquence, which both fitted him for discussion in the cabinet, and for direction in the field. He raised the character of his country to the highest honour among the Grecian states, by the wisdom which he displayed in all his counsels, and by the victory which he gained over Clēm- brōtus at the battle of Lēuctra, Lefka. This success exalted him to such pre-eminence in the opinion of the Greeks, that they considered no place secure, or no army of sufficient strength to resist him. Even the Lacedæmonians trembled for their own safety, and, therefore, formed a league with the Athenians and other states to overwhelm the Boeotians. The hostile armies met at Māntinea, Miltas, and Epāminōndas defeated the combined forces with great slaughter. A mortal wound received during the action, terminated the life of this great man in the moment of victory. Knowing that he would instantly expire if he extracted the weapon, he allowed it to remain, until assured that he had gained the victory, on which he exclaimed, "I have lived long enough, since I die unconquered." Then having drawn out the weapon, he instantly breathed his last. Pausānias relates that he stood after being wounded, and saw the result of the engagement. From this circumstance, the place which he occupied was afterwards called Scōpē (viii. 11). Cōrnēlius Nēpos concludes his life with this observation, that Thēba, Theba, both before the birth and after the death of Epāminōndas, was always subject to a foreign power; on the contrary, as long as he governed the commonwealth, it was the head of all Greece (Cor. Nep. Epam.).

Epāntērī orum, m. mountaineers who inhabited some part of the Alps, but their exact situation is unknown. In 207 B. C. they were at war with the Ingauni, with whom Māgo, brother of Hannibal, formed an alliance and resolved to attack the Epāntērī (Liv. xxviii. 46).

Epāphrōditus, i, m. a freedman of the emperor Nērō (Tac. Ann. xv. 55), who accompanied him in his last flight (Aur. Vic. Ep. 5). See L. Dōmīti^{us} Ahēnōbārbus.

Epāphus, i, m. the son of Jūpiter and Io, who married Mēmph^{is}, the daughter of the Nile, and built a city to which he gave his wife's name, Mēmph^{is}, now Menshee a Dashoo, a small village. According to Apōl- lodōrus, his daughter Libya had to Nēptūnus two sons, Agēnor and Bēlus; the former became king of Phoenicia, and the latter of Ægyptus, Egypt. Dānāus and Ægyptus, so celebrated in the writings of the Greeks, were the sons of Bēlus. Hērōdōtus informs us, that the Epāphus of the Greeks was the god Apis of the Egyptians (ii. 153). The same author states that Mēnes built Mēmph^{is}, and that to him the name must be referred. This large and magnificent city, the ancient capital of Egypt, is supposed to have stood about 15 miles S. of the Delta, on the W. bank of Nilus, the Nile. Of its former magnitude no idea can be formed from its ruins, or from the inconsiderable village of Menshee a Dashoo (Ov. Met. i. 748 seq.).

Epēi, v. Epī, orum, m. a people of Elis, anciently called Elii. The common copies of Jūstinus have "Epirorum urbs," a false reading, instead of "Epiōram, v. Epēōrum, urbs" (xxvi. 1).

Epērētus, i, m. son of Aphīdas. Ulýs^{ses} pretended to his father, that he was Epērētus (Hom. Od. xxiv. 305).

Epēus, i, m. the builder of the Trojan horse, and one of those who entered the city in it (Virg. Æn. ii. 264). See Mētāpōntum. —2. Son of Pānōpēus, excelled in the cestus, to which he challenged the whole Greek army (Hom. Il. xxiii. 665).

Epārmōstus, i, m. a native of Opūs, who gained the prize for wrestling at the Olympic games (Pin. Ol. ix).

Ephēmēris, idis, f. a diary, daybook, or journal, in which the transactions of each day are recorded (Ov. Amor. i. 12. 25).

Ephēsus, i, f. Aiosolue, a famous city of Iōnia in Asia Minor, Natolia, near the mouth of the river Cāyster, the Kutchak Meinder, built, according to Plin^{ius} and Mēla, by the Amazons, Ephēsus Amāzōnum opus; according to Strābo, by Andrōcl^{us}, the son of Cōdrus; and, according to others, by Ephēsus, the son of Cāyster. This diversity of opinion might, perhaps, arise from there being more than one city of the same name, built at different times and in different places, an opinion which seems supported by Strābo; or, perhaps with greater truth, from the city being built, according to Plin^{ius} and Livi^{us}, at the common expense of the Asiatic states. The temple of Diana at Ephēsus, 425 feet long, 220 broad, and the roof supported by 127 marble pillars, 60 feet high, was one of the wonders of the world, and not completed till 220 years after its foundation was laid. The riches which it contained were immense, and Scipio intended to have carried them off during the Civil war, had not he received orders instantly to join Pōmpēius, with the troops under his command (Cæs. B. C. iii. 33). It was burned, on that night on which Alexander was born, by Eratostrātus, to immortalize his memory. Diāna pleaded as an apology for permitting her temple to be destroyed, that she was necessarily absent from Ephēsus that night, in consequence of her attendance being indispensable at Pēlla on the birth of the Macedonian hero. Vitruvius considers this temple as the first edifice in which architecture was brought to perfection, and the first in which the Ionic order was employed. Soon after it was built, it was destroyed, but was rebuilt with additional splendour and magnificence. At what time it was again laid in ruins, is unknown. Only a few fragments of some of its pillars remain. Iah. Ephēsi, orum (Sing. Ephēsius, i), m. the Ephesians. Ephēsia, orum, n. festivals of Diāna at Ephēsus. Adj. Ephēsius, et Ephēsius, a, um. Ephēsia litēra, magical letters, supposed to contain some spell or charm, from the inhabitants being exceedingly addicted to magic. See Acts of Apostles, xix. 19.

Ephialtes, m. m. a giant, whose left eye Apollo, and whose right eye Hēracles, destroyed by their arrows. He was the son of Nēptūnus and Iphimēdia, wife of Alōeus, and twin brother of Otus, who grew eighteen inches in breadth and a yard in height every year. When nine years old, they were nine cubits broad, and as many yards high, which emboldened them to make war upon Jūpter, when they placed Ossa upon Olympus, and Pēlion above Ossa. Ephialtes demanded Jāno, and Otus Diāna, in marriage, and they bound Mārs in chains, whom Mērcūrius afterwards freed by a stratagem. Diāna, having assumed the appearance of a stag, sprang through betwixt them, on which the one killed the other, intending to destroy the beast of chase (Apol. i. 6 seq.).—2. An Athenian of great bravery, who fell in battle at Hālīcārūssus, Bodrūa, fighting for Dārius against the Lacedæmonians. Vālerius Māximus has recorded an instance of his integrity and judgment, not, however, without a stain on his moral character (iii. 8).—3. A Trachinian, son of Eurȳdēmus, who showed to the Persians the path which led to the summit overhanging the pass of Thērmōpȳlæ (Herod. vii. 213).

Ephōrus, i, m. the highest magistrate among the Lacedæmonians.

Ephȳra, ie, e. ē, es, f. an ancient name of Cōrinthus, now called by the Greeks Corintho, and by the Turks and Venetians, Corinti. Ephȳriās, adis, f. of Corinth, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Ephȳriādes pūllas, Corinthian girls (Claud. xxvi. 629). Stātus uses Ephȳriāde as an adjective. Perhaps the proper reading should be Ephȳriādes r. Ephȳriādas (Th. vi. 652). Adj. Ephȳrius, Ephȳrius, et Ephȳrius, a, um, of Ephȳrē, of Corinth; of Dyrrāchium. Ephȳriā ara, Corinthian brass (Virg. G. ii. 464). Ephȳra rura, the territory of Cōrinthus (Stat. Th. ii. 207). Ephȳrēum litus, the Corinthian shore, i. e. the Isthmus, on which the games were celebrated (Stat. Th. vi. 253). Ephȳra Crēusa, Corinthian Crēusa, i. e. Crēusa, daughter of Crēon, king of Corinth (Ov. Art. Am. i. 535).—2. A town in Thēsprotia, a district in Epirus (Vel. Pat. i. 1).

Epicūsus, i, m. a friend of Plātor, a man of activity, whom Gēntius, king of the Ilȳrii, put to death with Ettritus, for no other known reason, than that they were the friends of Plātor whom Gēntius had murdered to secure the crown (Liv. xlv. 30).—2. Commanded two thousand foot of the Pārthinoi, which joined the Roman prætor, L. Anicius Gāllus, when he marched against Gēntius, king of the Ilȳrii, in 170 B. C. (ibid.).

Epichāres, is, f. a woman who entered with keenness into the conspiracy against the emperor Nēro. The plot having been discovered, and Epichāres confronted with the informer, she baffled every attempt to prove her guilt, although she had urged the very man, who narrated the whole to the emperor, to excite an insurrection among the soldiers. Neither stripes, nor fire, nor the brutal cruelty of the executioner could extort one single word of confession from her lips, even when the rack was dislocating her joints. Firm, close, and undaunted, she remained silent, maintaining her fidelity inviolate under the most excruciating torture, and the prospect of death. The executioners provided a chair to convey her to the place of torture the second day, when she formed a noose with the girdle that bound her clothes, and, having fastened the other end to the top of the chair, by one powerful effort sprang from her seat and expired by strangulation (Tac. Ann. xv. 51—57).

Epichārmus, i, m. a native of Cos, but who went to Sicily when only three months old; hence generally considered a Sicilian. It is supposed that he lived about 450 B. C., in the time of Pȳthagōras, under whom he studied. He wrote a number of comedies, of which species of composition some have considered him the inventor. He treated of physical subjects in verse, and, from his writings, Plāto is said to have borrowed very liberally. Cicēro has recorded some of his sayings and opinions, and Plautus copied his manner, if not his writings (Hor. Epist. ii. 1. 58). He was banished from Sicily, for having spoken disrespectfully of the wife of Hērō, tyrant of Sȳracūse. A few fragments of his writings only remain. Adj. Epichārmus, a, um. Epichārmium illud (Gel. i. 15).

Epicles, is, m. a companion of Sārpēdon, and a man of courage, killed by Tēlāmōnius Ajax, who deprived him of life by a stone of prodigious weight (Hom. Il. xii. 379).

Epicrātes, is, m. a Rhodian, sent with four ships in 192 B. C. to guard the strait of Cēphallēnia, which was then infested with pirates, so that the passage was shut up against convoys from Italy (Liv. xxxvii. 13 seq.).

Epicūrus, i, m. a Grecian philosopher of great celebrity, who was born at Gārgētus, a village of Attica, about 340 B. C. He bought a fine garden at Athēna, Athēna. In his own house there, he passed his time in great tranquillity, and took pleasure in educating a great number of scholars, who lived in common with their master, and paid the utmost respect to his opinions. He wrote a number of books which are all lost. His philosophy divided itself into three parts; canonical, which related to rules of judging, in which he did not show very great acuteness, for he considered the evidence of the senses as an infallible test of truth. In physics, he held atoms, space, and gravity as the first principles of all things; and maintained that the Deity was a blessed immortal being, above taking any concern in human affairs. In ethics, he asserted that pleasure was the supreme good, consequently pain, the supreme evil. This doctrine was liable to be misinterpreted; accordingly his followers divided into two classes, one placing happiness in the pure pleasures of the mind; the other in the gratification of the appetites. Many of the ancients regarded the doctrine of Epicūrus in the worst sense; hence Hōrātius, pōrcus de grēge Epicūri, a hog from the sty of Epicūrus. In the judgment of those who adopted his opinions, his tenets did not justify that interpretation. Cicēro records many of the sayings and opinions of Epīcūrus, who died, at the age of seventy-two, of a very painful disease, suppression of urine. Epīcūreus, i, m. a follower of Epicurus (Cic. Fin. i. 2). Adj. Epīcūreus, a, um.

Epīcēdes, is, m. the brother of Hippocrates, whom Hannibal sent with a young man of his own name, to negotiate a peace with Hiērōnēmus, king of Syracūse, in 217 B. C. The grandfather of these brothers had been banished from that city, so that by their father's descent they were Syracusans, and by their mother's, Carthaginians. After concluding the peace, Hannibal approved of their remaining with Hiērōnēmus, and they commanded two thousand horse, which that king sent before him to Lēontini, where he was killed. With the consent of the prætors, they might have returned to Hannibal, agreeably to their wish; but they first attempted to effect a counter-revolution, by insinuating that the senate and nobility intended to bring Syracūse under the dominion of the Romans. A disorderly crowd, after Andranodōrus and Thēmistus had been put to death, declared them prætors in their room; an appointment to which the other prætors were obliged to accede. They then began more boldly to pursue the measures which they had in view, and being encouraged by hearing that a Carthaginian fleet had arrived at Pachynum, they ravaged the nearest part of the Roman provinces, killing a number of the Roman soldiers, sent to protect the territories of the allies. To a remonstrance made by Mārcellus to the Lēontini, he received an insolent answer, and therefore advanced against their city, which he carried at the first assault, and the Creteans who had served under Epīcēdes and his brother, prevented their being given up to the Syracusans in the reign of Hiērōnēmus, by taking them under their protection. The activity and valour of Epīcēdes appear conspicuous, both by his plans and attacks of the enemy, recorded by Līvius. Although ultimately unsuccessful, he contrived to elude falling into the hands of the Romans, and effected his escape to Africa in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 6—xxvi. 40).—2. A prefect of the former, surnamed Sindon, killed at Syracūse, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 28).

Epīdāmnus, i, n. v. Epīdāmnus, i, f. Toulsin, the Greek name of a seaport town of Mæcēdōnia on Mārē Hādriātīcūm, the Gulf of Venice, built by the Cōrēfriei. The Romans considered this name unlucky, on that account changed it into Dyrāchūm, Durazzo, q. v., the name of the peninsula on which it stood. Illyris Epīdāmnus (Luc. Phar. ii. 624). Inh. Epīdāmnī, orum, m. (Val. Max. i. 5).

Epīdānos, i, m. a river of Achāia, in Thesaly (Herod. vii. 196).

Epīdāphnē, es, v. Epīdāphna, a, f. a town of Syria, near Antiōchia, Antakie (Tac. Ann. ii. 83).

Epidaurus, i, f. v. um, i, n. afterwards called Dyrāchūm, Ragusa, a seaport town of Illyricum, to the south of the island Mēlita, v. Mēlītē, now Meleda, on which the apostle Paul is thought by some to have been wrecked. See Acts of Apostles, chap. xxvii. 27: xxviii. 1. It contains about eight thousand inhabitants, and behind the town is a mountain called Sniesnitsa, which abounds with medicinal plants. It became a republic in the eleventh century, is now annexed to the Austrian dominions. The whole territory is not above fifty-five miles in length, and twenty in breadth. Meleda, Lagosta, and a few other islands belong to it.—2. Pedavro, or, Palatia Monemvasia, a village which stands on the ruins of Epidaurus, an ancient and very celebrated city of Argolis, five miles from the temple of Æsculāpius, of which there are considerable remains. It was a place of great strength, the plain is fertile and well cultivated, but of small dimensions. The wine has lost its ancient celebrity. It is said to have been called Drāco, from the Greek verb drakō, to see. Æsculāpius was worshipped at Epidaurus under the form of a serpent. Inh. Epīdaurī, orum, m. Adj. Epīdaurīus, a, um. Epīdaurīus (dēus), Æsculāpius (Ov. Met. xv. 723). Epīdaurīus scōpiens (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 27); introduced by the poet, from the ancients believing that animal was remarkable for acuteness of sight.

Epīdīus, i, m. a rhetorician, who had, amongst his scholars, M. Antōnius and Augustus. From a remark of C. Canutius, it appears, he was addicted to slander. According to his own account, he was a descendant of that Epīdīus, who was thrown into the source of the river Sarnus, out of which he arose with horns, soon after disappeared, and was ranked in the number of the gods (Suet. Clar. Rhet. 4).

C. Epīdīus Mārūllus, C. Epīdī Mārūllī, m. a tribune of the Roman people, whom, with Cæsētius Flāvus, another tribune of the people, C. Jūlius Cæsar deprived of office in 46 B. C., for exciting hostility against him, as if he had aspired to the crown (Liv. Ep. 116).

Epīgōnī, orum, m. the sons born in the army of Alexander the Great after he entered Asia, and were brought up in the camp (Just. xii. 4).

Epīgōnīus, i, m. a philosopher of Lēda, put to death at the same time with Eusēbius (Amm. Mar. xiv. 7 seq.).

Epīmēnes, is, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, and one of the conspirators against his life, in 328 B. C. Of this crime he afterwards repented, and discovered the plot (Curt. viii. 6).

Epīmēnides, is, m. a Cretan poet, born at Gnōssus, who is said to have slept in a cave, fifty-seven years (Pausanias says, forty, i. 14), and foretold future events by inspiration from the gods. To him the Athenians were indebted for deliverance from a plague. The credit which he received for inspiration, most probably resulted from natural good sense, accurate observance of human character, and that proneness in the mind of men to pry into futurity, which is generally conjoined with a great degree of credulity. One of his remarks on his countrymen is quoted by the Apostle Paul, in the epistle to Titus (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 4). It is said that the Lacedæmonians brought him from his native city to Argolis, where they put him to death, because he predicted what was offensive to them (Paus. ii. 21).

Epīmēthēs, ēos, m. a son of Iāpētus and Clēmēnē. He married Pāndōra, by whom he had Pŷrrha, who, according to Hŷgius, was the first mortal (142). Epīmēthēs, idis, f. a patronymic of Pŷrrha (Ov. Met. i. 390), whom Hēsiodus calls foolish, from her opening the box of Pāndōra (Th. 511).

Epiphānes, is, m. son of Antiochus IV., supported the cause of Otho, and was wounded in an engagement with the Vitellians (Tac. Hist. ii. 25).

Epiphānia, is, f. Hamah, a town of Cilicia (Amm. Mar. xxii. 11).

Epipōle, arum, f. a part of Sýracūse (Liv. xxv. 24).

Epirus, i, f. Lower Albania, a mountainous and barren tract of land, bounded on the E. by Thēssalia, Thessaly; on the N. by Mācedōnia; on the S. by Acarnānia, Karili; and on the W. by the Ionian Sea; population 400,000. The shore of Epirus is composed of high hills of a parched and dingy aspect, except toward their bases, which are well cultivated, laid out with olives and vineyards. Tota Epirus (Cæs. B. C. iii. 12). Potens Epirus (Manil. iv. 688). Inh. Epīrōte, arum (Sing. Epīrōta, is, m. Adj. Epīrēnsis, is, e, et, Epīrōticus, a, um. Epīrōticum mulum, an apricot. Epīrōtica tellūs (Plaut. Amph. iv. 3. 17). Epīrōtica signa (Sil. Ital. i. 627).

Epīstor, ōris, m. a noble Lycian, killed by Pātrōclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).

Epīstrōphus, i, m. son of Iphitus and brother of Schēdius. These two commanded the Phōcēnses at Troy (Hom. Il. ii. 517).—2. A celebrated commander of the people of Lyrncēssus, killed by Achilles. He was the son of Evēnus and brother of Mynes, the husband of Briseis, who both fell by the hand of Ulysses (Hom. Il. ii. 692).—3. A commander of the Hālizzōnes (Hom. Il. ii. 856).

Epītus, i, m. a king of Alba Lōnga, son of Albas and father of Cāpys (Ov. Fast. iv. 44). Livius calls this king Atys; Eusēbius, Silvius Athis; and Diōnysius, Cāpētus. The last adds, that he reigned twenty-six years.

Epīzēphyrū. See Lūeri.

Epōna, is, f. See Hippōna.

Epōpeus, ēs, e, ei, m. one of the Tuscan sailors who attempted to injure Bāchus, and was changed into a dolphin (Ov. Met. iii. 619).

Epōps, ōpis, c, g. a lapwing, the bird into which Tereus was transformed (Ov. Met. vi. 674).

Epōrēdia, is, f. Jura, or, Icrée, a municipal town at the foot of the Alps (Tac. Hist. i. 70).

Epōrēdōrix, īgis, m. one of the Ædūi, who revolted from Cæsar, and exhorted his countrymen to take up arms against the Romans. He was made prisoner in that engagement, in which Vercingetōrix was totally subdued. Before the arrival of Cæsar in Gallia, France, he commanded the forces of the Ædūi against the Sēquāni (Cæs. B. G. vii. 38 seq.).

Epōsōgnātus, i, m. the only chieftain in Asia Minor, who had remained in alliance with Eumēnes (Liv. xxxviii. 18).

Epponina, is, f. wife of Jūlius Sābinus, whom she attended in his various places of concealment during nine years. At last discovered in a cavern, they were both brought to Rome, where she suffered death. Plūtarchus says the condemnation of Epponina was the disgrace of Vespasian's reign. This biographer writes her name Euipōnē (Tac. Hist. iv. 67).

Eprīus Mārcellus, Eprīi Mārcelli, m. held the office of prætor for one day. His eloquence was keen and powerful, which rendered him very dangerous under such an emperor as Nēro, whom he excited and exasperated against many. Nēro rewarded his violent impeachment of Pætus Thrāsca, Hēlvidius Priscus, and Cūrtius Mōntānus, with five millions of sesterces—about forty thousand pounds. His conspiracy against Vespasian cost him his life. The senate condemned him, and he cut his own throat with a razor (Tac. Ann. xii. 4 seq.).

Epūlo, ōnis, m. a Rutulian killed by Achates (Virg. Æn. xii. 459).

Epūtides, is, m. the faithful guardian of Iūlus (Virg. Æn. v. 547). The name, and the passage in which it occurs, seems to have been suggested to the mind of Virgilius from the Iliad xvii. 324, where Epūtides is a patronymic of Pēriphas, the son of Epytus.

Epýtus, i, m. a Trojan of great warlike reputation, who joined Æneas, when Troy was in flames (Virg. Æn. ii. 340). The inferior editions have here Iphytus.

Equiria, ium, n. horseraces appointed in honour of Mārs by Rōmulus (Ov. Fast. ii. 859).

Equites, um (Sing. Eques, itis), m. horsemen, men who served in war on horseback. In the Roman government, before the Equites formed a separate order in the state, it is probable that the appellation Equites was equivalent to that of dragoons in the British army. Even after Rōmulus had divided his subjects into three centuries, or tribes, and had chosen three hundred Equites, to discharge the double duty of cavalry and a body-guard, the term continued to denote merely horsemen or dragoons. To the original number, Tullus Hostilius added other three hundred, selected from his new subjects, the Albans. During the reign of Tāquinius Priscus, the Equites increased to eighteen hundred. In the division of the citizens into classes, Sērvius Tullius appointed eighteen centuries of Equites, forming twelve new centuries of the chief men of the state, and six centuries from the original number appointed by Rōmulus. History, it has been maintained, gives no certain information respecting the precise period at which the Equites first constituted a separate order in the state. It cannot, however, be doubted, if confidence may be placed in the epitomes of Livius, that this establishment, from which resulted so many benefits and advantages to the state, had its origin at the siege of Vēii, in 402 B. C. The Equites, or knights, were chosen both from the patricians and plebeians, and formed a bond of union between these two orders, among whom they had a powerful influence. The distinguishing badges of the knights were a horse, a gold ring, angustus clāvus, or, tunica angusticlāvia; and from 68 B. C. fourteen rows of seats, or benches, next to those of the senators, were assigned to this order, at all public exhibitions. Nor were the horses purchased at their own expense. For this purpose the state allowed each knight ten thousand pounds' weight of brass, and a tax was laid on widows, otherwise exempt from public burdens, for the maintenance of the horses. In 402 B. C., those of the equestrian fortune, who had not received horses from the public, first purchased them with their own money, and first accepted pay, which was three times that allowed to foot soldiers. Under the emperors, and in the latter years of the republic, the fortune of the knights was rated at four hundred sesteria; when reduced below that sum, they fell from their order. At first, fortune does not appear to have formed a necessary requisite, and, for some centuries, the amount of their wealth must, from the narrowness of the Roman territories, have been very small. Military duty for many years formed the only employment of the knights. Afterwards, however, when the senators became corrupted, and the highest tribunal in Rome venal, in 123 B. C., the Equites were nominated to act as judges or jurymen. This honourable appointment added greatly to the dignity of the equestrian order. At a subsequent period, the jurisdiction again returned to the senate by the agency of Sulla, but it was afterwards enjoyed both by the senatorian and equestrian orders. The farming of the public revenues conferred great influence on the knights at Rome; in the provinces, the reverse was the case, for the publicani, or, tax-gatherers, were detested, in many cases most justly, on account of their extortion and cruelty. No doubt, this charge would often more directly apply to those under them, than to the knights themselves, who stood high in the opinion of the citizens of Rome, and their dignity received some addition from the splendour which they exhibited in a formal procession which they made through the city every year, on the 15th of July. Every fifth year, at this procession, the Censor, seated in a curule chair before the capitol, reviewed the knights. On any one being convicted of vicious morals, or of neglecting his horse, he was disgraced by the censor ordering him to sell his horse. To the knight whose conduct was irreprehensible, the censor simply said, "Lead along your horse." The knight neither lost his rank nor his horse by being appointed a magistrate, or by being elected into the senate. See Æquites.

L. Equitius Firmianus, L. Equitii Firmiani, m. pretended that he was the son of Tib. Sēmproulus Gracchus, and this false statement procured him the office of tribune of the people. According to Appianus, he lost his life the first day he held that office, nor is his death to be regretted, as he set no bounds to his sedition and turbulence (Val. Max. ix. 7).

Erāsīnus, i. m. the Kephalari, a large river of Argolis, which has its source at Stymphālus, the Lake of Vouni. After a subterranean course of two hundred stadia, it issues from a cavern of mount Chāon, where Pān and Bācchus were worshipped in ancient times, and where there is a church in modern times. The Kephalari is joined by Phrixus. Ancient authors frequently mention the disappearing of this river (Ov. Met. xv. 276). —2. The Rasina, a large stream, which descends from Pōtāmia and joins Eurōtas, the Vasillipotamo.

Erāsīstrātus, i. m. a physician of some note, who wrote against Plāto on the nature of the stomach. Valērius Māximus has recorded an instance of his skill, and Gellius relates the ground of his difference of opinion from Plāto (Gel. xvii. 11. Val. Max. v. 7).

Erātīdæ, arum, m. a tribe or clan of the Rhodians (Pin. Ol. vii. 172).

Erātō, ūs, f. one of the muses, who were the daughters of Jūpiter and Mnēmōsīnē, hence Ovidius addressing Cŷbēlē calls them her learned grand-daughters (Fast. iv. 191). —2. A queen of Armēnia, who succeeded to the crown on the death of Ariōbāzēs. Her reign was short; at its termination, Vōnōnes, the expelled king of Pārthia, obtained the sovereignty (Tac. Ann. ii. 4).

Erātōsthēnes, is, m. a native of Cŷrēnē (Cŷrēneus), the scholar of Callimāchus, and of Aristo of Chios, Scio, and the second who was intrusted with the Alexandrian library, devoted his time to criticism and philosophy. He was eminent as a poet and mathematician; but more distinguished as an astronomer and geographer. He is supposed to have invented the Armillary Sphere. He died in the 82d year of his age, 194 B. C. A few fragments of his writings only now remain (Cæs. B. G. vi. 24).

Erātōstrātus, i. m. a native of Ephēsus, who burned the temple of Diāna in that city, with no other view, than to immortalize his name. His townsmen passed a decree forbidding his name to be mentioned, nor would it soon have been known, unless Thēōpompus had introduced it into his writings (Val. Max. viii. 14).

Erēbus, i. m. the son of Chāos and Tenēbræ, i. e. darkness, who married Nox, by whom he had Lux, i. e. the light, and Dies, i. e. the day. Varro makes Erēbus the son of Nox. The poets often put Erēbus for the Infernal Regions. Regina Erēbi, Proserpina (Ov. Met. v. 543). Hōmērus uses Erēbūnē, as an epithet of night. Virgo Erēbi, Tisiphōnē (Val. Flacc. iv. 407). Adj. Erēbēus, a, um, of Erēbus; infernal. Erēbōa cōlūbra (Ov. Ib. 227).

Erēctheūs, eos, v. ei, m. the sixth king of Athens, was the son of Pāndion and brother of Prōcnē and Philōmēla, Hōmērus makes him a son of the earth (Il. ii. 548). From him the Athenians were called Erēcthīdæ, arum. In a war with the Eleusinians, by an oracular response, he immolated one of his daughters to obtain the victory, on which all the rest cut their own throats, or, according to some authors, they killed each other. After this sacrifice, the hostile armies engaged, and Erēctheūs killed Eumōlpus (Apol. iii. 15). Hŷgīnus states that the daughters of this monarch had previously entered into a determination, that if one of them died the rest would put an end to their own lives. Nēptūnus demanded of Erēctheūs the sacrifice of one of them to prevent his rejoicing at the death of Eumōlpus, and the king having offered Otīōnā or Cōlōphōnā, the rest killed themselves. Erēcthis, idos, f. of Erēctheūs, Athenian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Erēcthis, Orithŷia (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 343). Adj. Erēctheūs, et, Erēcthōnūs, a, um. Erēctheā arces, the citadels of Athens (Ov. Met. viii. 547). Erēctheum litus (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Erētmēus, eos, m. a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcīnōus (Hom. Od. viii. 112).

Erētrīa, æ, f. Troceco, a town of Eubœa, Negropont, built by Athenians. Hōmērus writes Eirētrīa (Il. ii. 537), and Strābo informs us, that it was anciently called Mēlā-næis, and Arōtrīa. Hērōdōtus states, that the Persians took it by stratagem, and Līvius, that L. Quinctius Flāminius besieged it, 200 B. C., in which he had the aid of Attalus, king of Asia, and Agēsīmbrotus who commanded the Rhodian fleet. On its falling into their hands, they found little gold or silver; but a greater number of statues, pictures of the ancient artists, and ornaments of that kind, than could have been expected either from the size or opulence of the town. At the conclusion of the war with Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, the Romans declared Eretia, Trocca, free, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 16 seq.). Inh. Eretrienses, ium, m. Adj. Eretrius, et, Eretriacus, a, um.—2. Aicani, a town of Thessaly, burned by Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, who took along with him the inhabitants, and allowed them to carry away as much of their property as they could. His object was to prevent its falling into the hands of the Romans, who were following him, 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13). There was another town of this name in Thessaly, to the E. of Pharsalus.

Eretum, i, n. Monte Rotondo, or rather, Rimane, a town of the Sabines near Tiber, the Tevers, a hundred and forty stadia from Rome. At this town, the last battle was fought between the Romans and Etrusci in 583 B. C. Here too the Sabines were defeated by Tārcūniū Sūpērbus, and afterwards by C. Naucius, a Roman consul (Liv. iii. 29). Adj. Eretinus, a, um. Eretinus ager, the territory of Eretum (Tibul. iv. 8. 4).

Ereuthalion, ōnis, m. a prince of Arcadia, a brave warrior, who bore the arms of Arēthōus, and was killed in single combat by Nēstor (Hom. II. vii. 136 seq.).

Ergavin, æ, f. a town of Cātūberia, which yielded to the Roman propraetor Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchus in 181 B. C. Some authors allege that it was a treacherous surrender, and that the inhabitants soon rebelled (Liv. xl. 50). Some editions read Ergavica, which seems a mistake.

Ergenna, æ, f. the Tuscan name of the priest, who directed the expiations, rendered necessary by lightning having struck any person or thing, which he did by inspecting the entrails of sheep (Pers. ii. 26). Some erroneously make Ergenna the proper name of an individual, and not the common designation of an office.

Ergētum, et, Hērgētium, e. Sērgētium, i, n. Citadella, an inland town of Sicily near Symethus, the Iaretta, now in ruins (Sil. Ital. xiv. 230). Inh. Ergētini, orum, m. (Plin. i. 346).

Erginus, i, m. a son of Nēptūnus, one of the Argonauts, who had a knowledge of the stars, the winds, and the sea, on which account Tiphys, the pilot, when wearied at the helm, entrusted the steering to him with safety. After the death of Tiphys, he became the pilot of the Argo (Val. Flacc. i. 415 seq.).

Eriboia, e. Eēriboia (5 syl.), æ, f. the stepmother of Mīra, whose liberation from prison she procured by informing Mērcūrius (Hom. II. v. 389).

Eriboetes, is, m. son of Tēlēon, one of the Argonauts, according to Hēgēnius and Vālērius Flāccus. His name does not occur in Orphēus or in Apollōdōrus. His father Tēlēon must not be confounded with the father of Būtes. He had a knowledge of medicine; but of his origin and history little is known. Some write Eurýbates (Val. Flacc. i. 402).

Eriētes, is, m. a man in the army of Aēneas, called Lijēōnūs, either from his being a son of Lijēōn, or more probably from his being a native of Lijēōnia, an inland district of Nōtolia. He was killed by Mēsāpus (Virg. Aen. x. 749).

Erichthō, ūs, f. a sorceress of horrible wickedness, mentioned by Ovidius (Epist. Her. xv. 139), and Lūcānus (Phar. vi. 508).

Erichthōnius, i, m. the father of Pāndion, fourth king of Athens (Hyg. 48).—2. Sixth king of Athens, son of Vūlcānus and Tērra, who sprang up from what had fallen on the earth from that god, at the time he attempted force with Mīnērvā, whence his name (απο της γης και της θεας). The upper part of his body was human, the under, that of a serpent. Mīnērvā secretly brought up Erichthōnius, and gave him, in a basket, to be kept by the daughters of Cēcrōps. A crow discovered to the goddess, that they had opened the basket, for which she struck them with madness, and they threw themselves into the sea. He surprised Jūpter by his ingenuity in inventing four-horse chariots, and, after death, became a constellation, which the Latins called the charioteer, Auriga, and the Greeks, Erichthōnius. If the authority of Jūstinus may be relied on, men first began to cultivate the land and sow grain in his reign, the merit of which discovery he attributes to Triptōlēmus of Elēusis (ii. 6). Some consider him the same with Erēthēus. Adj. Erichthōnius, a, um, of Erichthōnius, Athenian. Erichthōnius populus, the Athenian people (Prop. ii. 6. 4).—3. Son of Dār-dānus. Hōmērus calls him the wealthiest of mankind, adding, that he had three thousand mares, each of which had a foal. They had snow-white manes. Twelve of these mares had foals to Bōrēas, so fleet that the grass did not bend under them, and they ran on the surface of the deep (II. xx. 219).

Ericlium, i, n. a town in the western extremity of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, to the N. W. of Gōmphi. Amynānder, king of the Athēniānes, took possession of Ericlium in 193 B. C., and the combined army of the Mæcedonians and Romans retook it the same year (Liv. xxxvi. 18).

Eridānus, i, m. the Greek name of Pādus, the Po, the largest river in Itāliā, Italy. This appellation very frequently occurs in Latin poetry, but not in prose. The Po takes its rise in mount Viso, in Piedmont, runs in an eastern direction, and divides into several channels before it reaches the sea. In its course, which may be estimated at 200 miles, the Po receives a vast number of rivers on both banks, which by the rapidity of their currents, bringing down a prodigious quantity of earth and stones, have greatly filled up its channel, and made embankments, 80 feet high in many places, necessary to prevent the inundation of the adjacent country. Its northern branches descending from Alps, the Alps, render it largest in the summer months, by the melting of the snow on these lofty mountains. The Po disembogues into Māre Hādrīaticum, e. Adriaticum, quod et Sūpērrum, the Gulf of Venice, by seven mouths, of which two were formed by nature, and the other five by art (Ov. Met. ii. 324).

It has been maintained that the Erīdānus of Ovidius is not the Po, which is a mistake. In enumerating the rivers of Italy, Claudianus mentions Erīdānus as having suffered the loss of Phaethon's destruction (i. 258). Lucianus gives a magnificent description of Erīdānus, the Po, and affirms that into this river Phaethon fell (Phar. ii. 409 seq.), and Statius mentions his smoking in Pādus, the Po (Th. xii. 414).—2. A branch of Ilissus q. v.

Erīgōnē, es, f. the daughter of Icārus q. v. Her father having lost his life by violence, she accomplished her own death by strangulation, and passed into the sign Virgo (Hyg. 243). Among the ancients, the generally received opinion was, that the daughter of Astræus, after her death, became the constellation Virgo. Adj. Erīgōnēus, a, um. Erīgōnēus cūnis, Mera (Ov. Fast. v. 723).

Erīgōnus, i, v. Erigon, ōnis, m. the Katchuk Carason, a river of Macedōnia, which has its rise in Illyricum, runs through Pæonia, and falls into Axius, the Vardari. On it Philippus, king of Macedōnia, encamped, when the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Galba, was encamped on Ospāgus, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 39 seq.).—2. v. Riginia, the Erhene, a river of Thracia.

Erīgýtus, i, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, who overcame Satibárzānes q. v. in single combat. He dissuaded Alexander from making war on Scythia, and was afterwards killed amongst other illustrious commanders, in an engagement with the Bactriāni (Curt. vi. 4 seq.).

Erīndes, is, m. perhaps the Ester, a river of Hýrcānia, mentioned only by Tācitus (Ann. xi. 10).

Erīnnys, ýis, acc. in, f. a common name of the Furies, who were three in number, Tisýphōnē, Alcēto, and Mégiera. They were said to be the daughters of Plūto and Proserpina, or rather of Achēron and Nox. Their office was to execute the vengeance of the gods upon the guilty, on earth, by war and pestilence, and, in the infernal regions, by flagellation and torment. Their head and arms were surrounded by serpents (Virg. G. iv. 483), their countenances were grim and horrible, and their robes, dark and bloody. In the one hand they held a torch, and the other grasped a whip. Æschylus was the first who represented them with snakes in their hair (Paus. i. 28). Their attendants were Grief, Fear, Terror, and Madness (Ov. Met. iv. 484).

Erīōpis, idis, f. the wife of Oileus, king of the Locrians, and mother of Ajax (Hom. II. xiii. 697).

Erīphýlē, es, f. daughter of Tālāus, and wife of Amphīlārus, who, from his skill in augury, knew that if he went to Thēbæ he would lose his life, on which account he concealed himself. Bribe by her brother Adrīstus, king of Argos, with a golden necklace set with gems, she discovered the place of her husband's concealment. Amphīlārus, compelled to take up arms and join his countrymen, instructed his son Alcæmon to revenge his death, and the son no sooner heard that his father was dead, than he killed his mother, for which he was tormented by the Furies. Juvénalis uses this word in the plural to denote women who, like Erīphýlē, would prefer a brilliant ornament to their husband's life (Sat. vi. 655). Adj. Erī- phýlēus, a, um. Erīphýlēi pēnātes (Stat. Th. iv. 211).

Erīsānē, es, f. a town of Spain, in the possession of Viriāthus, which Q. Pōmpeius Aulus besieged, but did not take (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 293).

Erīsichthon, ōnis, m. a Thessalian, son of Triōpa, who despised the gods, neglected their worship, and cut down a wood sacred to Cēres, on which account the goddess punished him with an enormous and insatiable hunger. After devouring his whole estate, he sold his daughter Mēstra, and purchased food by the price of her liberty. Having at last exhausted all that she could furnish, and his dreadful disease increasing, he tore his own limbs, and fed upon his own body. From his father he is called Triōpēus (Ov. Met. viii. 751), and his daughter Triōpēis (Ov. Met. viii. 872).

Erīthos, e, us, i, m. a son of Actor, hence called Actōrides, who was killed by Pērsēus (Ov. Met. v. 79).

Erītium, i, n. a town of Thēssālia, taken possession of by the Roman proprietor, M. Bæbius Tāmphilus, in 193 B. C., who placed a garrison in it (Liv. xxxvi. 13).

Erīza, e, f. a town of Cārīa (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Erōcus, i, m. a king of the Germans. Others read Crōcus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 81).

Erōdus, i, m. a man mentioned by Orpheus (688).

Erōpon, ōntis, m. an ambassador of Pērsēus, king of Macedōnia, to Eumēnes, king of Asia, in 170 B. C. His embassy was unsuccessful (Liv. xlv. 24—28).

Erōpus, i, m. took Lýchnidus by bribery, and several villages of the Dassāretli in 210 B. C., which, with his rousing the Dardāni, alarmed Philippus, king of Macedōnia, and recalled him from Achæcum bellum to his own country (Liv. xxvii. 32).

Erōtimus, i, m. a king of the Arabians, who had seven hundred sons, and acquired great reputation as a warrior by plundering Egypt and Sýria (Just. xxxix. 5). Josephus calls him Aretas.

Erōtton, i, f. daughter of Frōnto and Flācilla, on whose death Mārtiālis writes an epigram (v. 35).

Erýalus, i, m. a Trojan killed by Patrōclus with a stone (Hom. II. xvi. 411).

Erýcina, e, f. a surname of Vēnus, from Eryx, San Giuliano, a mountain on the western coast of Sicily, where she had a temple. Ridens Erýcina, smiling Vēnus (Hor. Od. i. 2. 33).

Erýgdūpus, i, m. a combatant at the battle between the *Centaur*s and Lāpithæ, whom Mācārēus stretched on the ground, by forcing a lever against his breast (Ov. Met. xii. 453).

Erýmānthus, i, m. a town, a river, and a mountain of Arcādia. The river is a branch of Alphēus, the Roufia, now Dhomoko (Leake). The mountain is noted for the huge wild boar which was killed on it by Hēracles, hence monstrifēr Erýmānthus (Stat. Th. iv. 298). Nigræ silvæ Erýmānthi, the dark, i. e. shady woods of Erýmānthus (Hor. Od. i. 21. 7). Erýmānthi, idis, et, Erýmānthias, īadis, f. of Erýmānthus, applied to females or nouns feminine, also Arcadian. Erýmānthides silvæ, Arcadian woods (Ov. Met. ii. 499). Erýmānthiōdes nympha (Stat. Th. iv. 329). Adj. Erýmānthius, et, Erýmānthēus, a, um, of Erēmāthūs; Arcadian. Erēmāthia pēstis, the boar killed on Erēmāthūs by Hērēkūles (Sil. Ital. iii. 38). Erēmāthēa umbra, (Claud. viii. 467).—2. A river of India, according to Curtius, but it does not occur in any other author (viii. 9).

Erēmas, āntis, m. a Trojan killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 702).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Pātrocclus clad in the armour of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 415).

Erēmus, i. m. a man of Cēzicus, Chizico, who excelled in hunting (Val. Flacc. iii. 194).

Erēthēa, ae, f. an island on the south coast of Spain, supposed by some to be Cádiz, or lying between it and the continent. Erēthēis, idis, f. of Erēthēa, with relation to a female or a noun feminine. Erēthēia prada, the cattle brought from that island by Hērēkūles (Ov. Fast. v. 649). Adj. Erēthēus, a, um. Erēthia littora (Sil. Ital. xvi. 194).

Erēthia, ae, f. a town of Pāphlāgōnia, which Apōllōnius Rhōdius calls Erēthini. Cēlei Erēthini (Apol. Rhod. ii. 941).

Erēthra, arum, f. Pyrgo, a village at the foot of Cithaeron, Elatias, so called from Erēthros, son of Pōsēidon and Amphimēdūsa. The inhabitants joined the Thebans, and fought under Eurymēdon against Pōlyneices (Stat. Th. vii. 265).—2. Erethri, a town of Iōnia in Asia Minor, Natolia (Tac. Ann. vi. 12). Inh. Erēthraei, orum, m. (Liv. xxxvi. 43). Adj. Erēthraeus, a, um. Erēthraea tēra (Liv. xxxvi. 45).—3. A town of Ætōlia, near Naupāctus, Lepanto, or, Nepaktos, at which Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, made a descent in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 8).

Erēthrea, ae, f. a town of Crēta, Candia, taken by Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Crēticus in 70 B. C. (Flor. iii. 7).

Erēthraus, a, um. Erēthraeum mārē, the northern part of the Indian Ocean. Ancient writers do not describe with sufficient accuracy the expanse of water denominated Erēthraeum mārē, nor does it appear that they prefixed any precise idea to these terms. It included both the Persian and Arabian Gulfs. The Romans, understanding Erēthraeum to signify red, substituted Rōbrum in its place, although they seem to have restricted its application almost wholly to the Arabian Gulf, or, Red Sea. Much has been written on the etymology of this word, but Bochart's derivation, in point both of simplicity and probability, ought to be preferred. Edom signifies red, and as the Edomites inhabited the greater part of Arabia, the adjoining sea naturally took its name from them, which the Greeks translated literally, after them the Romans, whose example the nations of Europe have adopted. Erēthraea gēmma (Claud. viii. 605). Erēthraeus dens, an elephant's tooth (Mart. xiii. 101). Erēthraei lapilli, pearls or gems found in that sea (Mart. ix. 14).

Erēthras, ae, m. a king of India, whence, according to some, Erēthraeum Mārē (Curt. viii. 9).

Erēthron, i. n. Furcell, a place in Africa, a part of Rēgio Cērenāica. Adj. Erēthreus, a, um (Catal. lxi. 206).

Erētus, i. m. son of Mērcūrius by Antīāna, daughter of Mēnētus (Pin. Pyth. iv. 319).

Erētus, žeis, m. a king of India, who attempted to stop the progress of Alexander the Great; but was deserted, and killed by his own troops (Curt. viii. 12).—2. A son of Būtes and Vēnus, a man of prodigious strength, who challenged all strangers with whom he met to fight him with the Cēstus. At last Hērēkūles accepted the challenge, killed Erētus, and buried him upon a mountain on the western coast of Sicily, Sicily, which retained his name, now San Giuliano. In grandeur, says Pōlybius, Erētus surpasses all the mountains of that island except Ætna. Cēstus Eryx (Luc. Phar. ii. 666). Here was a town of the same name, now Trapani del Monte, in which was a temple of Vēnus, from which she received the name of Erēcina. The Romans took this town from the Carthaginians in 250 B. C. (Flor. ii. 2). Adj. Erēcinus, a, um. Erēcina regio, a district in Sicily (Herod. v. 45). Erēcinus vertex, top of mount Erētus (Virg. Æn. v. 759). Erēcinum littus, the coast adjoining to that mountain (Virg. Æn. x. 36).—3. A man who was turned into stone at the sight of the Gorgon's head (Ov. Met. v. 196).—4. A man in the army of Etēocles, whom Hippomēdon killed in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 128).

Eryxias, ae, m. the last of the archons of Athens, who held the office for ten years (Vel. Pat. i. 8). Esculānus, i. m. a man to whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (vi. 74). Esēpus, i. m. the Sataldere, a river of Mýsila. Esūs Prōcūlus, Esū Prōcūli, m. son of a centurion of the first rank, and a man of great size, whom the emperor, Cālgūla, first treated with the greatest insult, and afterwards butchered (Suet. Cal. 35).

Esquillae, arum, f. Monte Esquilino, one of the hills on which Rome stood. The name has been derived from excubiae, watches, which Rōmūlus, according to some, kept there, because he distrusted Titus Tatius; but the name is more probably used in the plural because it included two hills, Mons Esquilinus and Cispius. Servius Tullius, when he extended the boundaries of the city, fixed his residence there, on purpose to induce others to build on this hill. Adj. Esquilinus, Esquilinarius, et. Esquilinus, a, um. Esquilinus mons (Ov. Fast. ii. 435). Esquilinarius collis (Liv. i. 48). Esquilinae ulites, birds of prey; from the bodies of criminals, after execution, being exposed there (Hor. Epod. v. 100). Pōntifex Esquilini vērūfici, pontiff of Esquiline incantation. From the poor being interred there, Hōrātius represents Cānidia as seeking the means of practising her incantations by violating the sepulchres of the dead, or from sorcerers assembling there among the tombs to exercise their art (Epod. xviii. 6). Esquilina porta (Flor. iii. 21).

Essēdon, ōnis, f. Lop, a town of Sērica (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).—2. Hara-Shar, a town of Scythia.

Essēdōnes, r. Issēdōnes, um, m. a Seythian nation, according to Plinius, near Palūs Mēotis, the Sea of Azoph, adjoining to the Saurōmāte. Sōlinus only mentions their being in Asia, consequently on the east of that sea. He describes them as cannibals, tearing in pieces the bodies of the dead with their teeth, mixing the flesh with that of animals, and forming cups of the skulls, which they lined with gold. To this shocking description may be added, the barbarous custom of their celebrating the funerals of their parents with songs. That geographer mentions Essēdōnes along with the Māssāgētae, probably a different tribe from the Essēdōnes just mentioned, as the Māssāgētae were nearly a thousand miles to the east of the Sea of Azoph. Adj. Essēdōnius, a, um. Essēdōnia gēntes (Luc. Phar. iii. 230).

Essius, i, f. an island in the Ionian Sea. Inh. Essii orum, m. joined the Romans in the Illyrian war (Ap. Bel. Illyr.).

Essii, orum, m. supposed to be also called Saii, orum, a people of Gallia, France, whose territories lay on Oliua, the Orne, a southern branch of Séquana, the Seine, adjoining to the Djāblintes and Aulerci Ebūrōnes (Cæs. B. G. v. 24).

Esus, v. Hēsus, i, m. a deity worshipped by the Gauls and Germans. His sacrifices, like those of Thēūtēs, appear to have been of a shocking kind (Luc. Phar. i. 445).

Etēcles, ēos, v. Etēcles, is, m. a son of Cēdipus and Iocūsta. His father gave the kingdom of Thēbe, Theca, jointly to him and his brother Pōlyūces, and appointed each to assume the government during one year alternately. Etēcles, in right of his seniority, first ascended the throne, and, at the expiry of the year, refused to resign the monarchical dignity to his brother. Upon this, Pōlyūces fled to Adrastus, king of Argos, who gave him his daughter Argia in marriage, and raised an armament to compel Etēcles to transfer the government to his brother in terms of his father's Will. The two brothers engaged in single combat and fell by mutual wounds. Etēcles left at his death a son named Lāōdāmas. According to the Boeotians, he was the first who sacrificed to the Graces (Paus. ix. 35).

Etēoneus, ēos, m. son of Bōēthōus the principal servant of Mēnelāus (Hom. Od. iv. 22).

Etēonus, i, f. a city of Boeōtia, which Hōmērus calls many-hilled (Il. ii. 497), and Stāsius, Etēonus dēnsa jūgis iniquis (Th. vii. 266). Strābo mentions that it was afterwards called Scārphē. Stēphānus makes Etēonus a town of Eubœa. Inh. Etēonūi, orum (Sing. Etēonius, i), m. were commanded by Eurymēdon in the Theban war.

Etēsia, arum, m. a periodical wind which blows in the Mediterranean from the north-west (Liv. xxxvii. 23).

Ethēclus, i, m. a man killed in the Theban war by Tāgus (Stat. Th. x. 308).

Ethēlus, i, m. a man of Cyāzicus, killed by Aneus in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 138).

Ethēmōn, ōnis, m. a man whom Pērsēus killed. He was a native of Arābia, hence called Nābūthēus (Ov. Met. v. 163).

Ethōpia, æ, f. Gribovo, a town of Athāmānia, advantageously situated for commanding Argithēa, which Philippus sent Zēno to occupy, 196 B. C., after Amynānder, king of Athāmānia, had driven his garrison from that country, and recovered his paternal kingdom. Perhaps it was rather an eminence than a town, as Livius calls it lōcus (xxxviii. 2).

Etlēva, æ, f. wife of Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, who was carried captive to Rome with her husband and the rest of the royal family in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 42).

Etōvissa, æ, f. a city of the Edētāni in Spain, by which Hannibal marched his troops when advancing to the Ebro on the seacoast. Here he had a remarkable dream which Livius has recorded (xxi. 22).

Etrūria, æ, f. Tuscany, a district of Italy, bounded on the west by Mārē Tyrrhēnum, v. Tūscum, on the north by Līgūria and Gālīa Cisālpīna, on the east by Umbria, and on the south by Lātium and the country of the Sābini. Inh. Etrūsci, v. Tūsci, orum, m. the Etrurians, or Tuscans, appear to have excelled in the knowledge of augury, and in the worship of the gods. In these respects, the Romans seem to have done little more than adopted the ceremonies and institutions of their neighbours, who were, for several ages, their determined and powerful enemies. After long continued war and much carnage, the Romans obtained a complete victory over them, and compelled them to submit to such conditions as they chose to dictate. The Etrūsci were divided into twelve states, of which each adopted that form of government which seemed most agreeable; and although they were united by one common bond, mutual jealousies were almost unavoidable, and contributed to their final subjugation to the power of Rome. As a punishment, they bound a dead body to a living one, each part directly opposite to the other, in which horrid state they rotted together (Val. Max. ix. 2). Adelung maintains that the Etrūsci were a Celtic nation, who migrated from Rhœtia, Tyrol, by Trente, and the valley of the Adige into Italy, about 1000 B. C., expelled the Umbri, another Celtic nation, who occupied the banks of the Po, and afterwards formed a connexion with the Pēlāgi, who were, before that time, settled in the middle of Italy. This rejects the opinion of Hērōdōtus, who states, that the Etrūsci came from Lydīa, in which he is followed by Livius. Obēsus Etrūscus, the fat Etrurian, from the numerous and rich sacrifices in which they delighted (Catul. xxxix. 11). Adj. Etrūscus, Tūscus, Tūscānus, et, Tūscānicus, a, um. Etrūscum aurum, Tuscan gold, i. e. the bullā, which was made of gold, adopted by the Romans, from the Tuscans, and at first worn only by the children of the nobles (Juv. Sat. v. 164). Tūscus amnis, the Tevere, which, according to Virgilius, was the father of Oenus (Æn. viii. 473 seq.). Tūscus alecūus, the Tecere (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 28). Tūscus eques, Mæcenas (Mart. viii. 56). Tūscāna cōlūmna, a Tuscan column, i. e. a column of the Tuscan order (Vitruv. iv. 7), which, according to Plinius, who calls it Tūscānica cōlūmna, should be, in thickness, one-seventh part of its height (v. 338).

Etrūscus, i, m. a Roman, on whose father Martialis writes an epitaph. Of this name that poet mentions two, father and son. The emperor Dōmītiānus banished the former, whom the latter voluntarily accompanied, and afterwards procured his return (Mart. vi. 83: vii. 39).

Etrūtus, i, m. a man of activity, whom Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, put to death at the same time with Epīcādus, for no other known reason, than that they were friends of Plātor, whom that monarch had previously murdered to secure the crown, 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 30).

Etūta, æ, f. daughter of Honūnus, prince of the Dardanians, betrothed to Plätör, and, after his death, married by his brother Gēntius (Liv. xlv. 30).

Evādē, es, f. a daughter of Iphīs, the wife of Cāpāneis, who was so attached to her husband, that, when his body was burning, she threw herself on the funeral pile, and was, at the same time, reduced to ashes. She appears to have been pregnant when she put an end to her life (Stat. Th. xii. 126—801). From her father she is called Iphias (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 23).—2. The mother of Iāmus, by Apōllo. Pindārus narrates her life (Ol. vi. 50 seq.).

Euemōn, ōnis, m. father of Eurypylus, who is hence called Euemōnides (Hom. Il. xi. 809).

Evāgōras, as, m. a king of Cyp̄rus, who had obtained possession of the greater part of that island by his bravery in arms. Artāxērēs, king of Pērsia, endeavoured to crush him by a very numerous and powerful army, against which he made a long and able resistance. In this contest he had the aid of the Athenians under Chābrās, and likewise of the Egyptians. To an overwhelming superiority of numbers his valour at last gave way, yet he retained the sovereignty of Sālāmīs, for which he paid a small annual tribute to the Persian monarch. The conditions of peace, so honourable to the conquered, showed in what estimation Artāxērēs held the military talents of Evāgōras (Cor. Nep. Chab. Just. v. 6).

Evāgrus, i, m. one of the Lāplithæ, whom Rhōtus killed, in the battle with the Centaurs, by thrusting down his throat reddening flames (Ov. Met. xii. 290).

Evān, antis, m. a name of Bāchus (Ov. Met. iv. 15). Evāus, antis, shouting in praise of Bāchus, frantic, raging like a bacchanal. Both words are probably derived from Evōē, Evōhē, v. Euōē, an exclamation of the bacchanals.

Evānder, v. Evāndrus, i, m. son of Mērcūrius and Cārmēnta, who was afterwards called Nicōstrātē (Aur. Vic. Orig. 5 seq.), of Mērcūrius and Nympha, daughter of Lādon (Paus. viii. 43), and grandson of Pāllas, king of Arcādia, hence Ovidius calls him Pāllantius hērōs (Fast. v. 647). Livius only mentions his mother, called, by him, Cārmēnta, who possessed the gift of prophecy. He was a native of Arcādia, but Vālērīus Māximus says, of Argos (ii. 2), and surpassed his countrymen in wisdom and warlike bravery. Having conducted a colony from Pāllantēum, he built a town on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere, which afterwards formed a part of Rome, and called it by the name of his native city, which has been transmitted through many ages, suppressing two letters, l and n, softening Pāllantēum to Pālātium. A colony of the Pēlāsgī, from Arcādia, is said to have settled in that part of the country, sixty years before the taking of Troy. Justinus says, Faunus gave him lands, and the hill, afterwards called Pālātium (xliii. 1). According to some, Evānder introduced a knowledge of letters among the Italians, which gave great dignity and reverence to his character, heightened by the supposed divinity of his mother. He was of a very advanced age when Æneas came to Italy, whose cause he espoused, and sent his only son, Pāllas, to assist him in the war against Tūrnus. He built an altar and temple to Hērēclēs, which were destroyed by fire, in the year 65 (Tac. Ann. xv. 41), and, according to Jūstinus, one to Lycopēus, whom the Greeks called Pan, and the Romans Lāpērcus. Jūvenālīs uses Evānder to denote a man of hospitality, or, perhaps, a poor and frugal entertainer (Sat. xi. 61). Adj. Evāndrius, a, um. Evāndrius ensis, the sword of Pāllas, the son of Evānder (Virg. Æn. x. 394). Evāndrius cōllis, mōns Pālātīnus (Stat. Syl. iv. 1. 7), which Claudiānus calls mōns Evāndrius (xxviii. 11).—2. A Cretan, of infamous character, who commanded auxiliaries in the army of Pērcēus, king of Mācēdōniā, and, at the suggestion of that monarch, undertook to murder Eumēnes, king of Asia, as he went to Dēlphi, Castri, to sacrifice to Apōllo. Having carefully examined the ground, the assassins concealed themselves on a declivity, where the king could only pass alone, whence they tumbled down great stones, one of which struck him on the head, and he fell from the steep path down a precipice, over which they threw a number of stones. Supposing him dead, they fled to the top of Pārnāsus, Liakura, in such haste, that they killed one of their own number, who fell behind, lest he should be taken, and make a discovery. To the Macedonian king he was afterwards of considerable benefit, by his advice and military services. After the battle near Pēdna, where Pērcēus was defeated, he was one of the three who accompanied the king to Sāmōthrācia, Samothraci, where he was charged, by L. Atīllus, a Roman youth of distinction, with an attempt to murder Eumēnes. With the Samothracians, it was held a religious duty to keep the temple free from profanation, on which account they informed the king, that, if innocent, he must plead his cause, and, if guilty, quit the sacred place. Pērcēus advised Evānder not to stand trial, but to kill himself. To this plan, although he had agreed, lest he should effect his escape, or the king be suspected of protecting a murderer, Pērcēus caused Evānder to be killed (Liv. xlii. 15 seq.).

Evānthes, is, m. a Phrygian, killed by Mēzēntius (Virg. Æn. x. 702).—2. A Ciconian, father of Māron, and grandson of Diōnysius (Hom. Od. ix. 197).

Evārchus, i, m. a river of Cōlehis, which abounded with swans, and discharged itself into the Black Sea (Val. Flacc. vi. 102). This is probably the river called, by Pīnīus, Cyp̄āncōs, which some make a branch of Phāsīs, and had this name from the colour of its waters. Others say it was called Cēgnus, Cēgnus, v. Cēgnēus. Ptolēmæus considers it a separate river.

Eubia, as, f. a woman, whom Antiochus Māgnus married in Greece (Ap. Bel. Syr. 98).

Eubius, i, m. a historian, mentioned by Ovidius, whose work ought never to have been published, and has fortunately perished. Even the name of the author would have experienced the fate of his History, had not Ovidius perpetuated his infamy by half a line (Trist. ii. 416).

Eubœa, as, f. Negropont, an island of Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, in length about ninety miles, and varies in breadth from twenty-five to six. It abounded with corn, wine, and fruits of various kinds. The copper and iron mines were a source of wealth to the ancient inhabitants; but they have been quite neglected under the Turkish Government. There is a bridge over Euripos, v. as, the Strait of Negropont, which affords a ready communication between the island and the continent. From this junction at Aulis, we find, in Ovidius, Aulida Eubœicam, although Aulis was a city of Boœtia, not of Eubœa (Met. xiii. 182). Inh. Eubœenses, iun. m. (Herod. vii. 156). Datis and Artaphernes carried some of the inhabitants of Eubœa into Asia, to whom Darius gave Andérica in Cissia. Curtius calls them Eubœicæ gentes (iv. 12). Adj. Eubœicus, v. Eubœus, a. um, of Eubœa; of Cùmæ. Eubœicum litus, the shore of Cùmæ (Virg. Æn. ix. 710). Virgilius frequently uses the adjective in that sense, because Cùmæ was built by a colony from Chalcis, the capital of Eubœa, hence called Eubœica urbs (Ov. Met. xiv. 155). Eubœici montes, the mountains of Negropont (Manil. iv. 631).

Eubulidas, a. m. a native of Chalcis, whom the Romans demanded to be given up, by Antiochus, in 192 B. C. In the treaty with that king, two years after, a clause to this effect was added (Liv. xxxvii. 45 seq.).

Euburates, iun. m. a people of Ligûria, conquered at the same time with the Ingauni (Flor. ii. 3).

Eucærus, i. m. a native of Alexândria, whom Pöppea suborned a domestic servant to accuse of being guilty of adultery with Octavia q. v. wife of the emperor Nêro. Tacitus mentions, that he played well on the flute (Ann. xiv. 60).

Euchænor, ôris. m. son of Pölydus, a native of Corinth, killed by Pâris (Hom. Il. xiii. 663).

Euchærius, i. m. son of Stilicho, mentioned by Claudianus (x. 338).

Eucides, is. m. a fictitious character, on which Mârtialis writes an epigram (v. 36). —2. A native of Mægâra, and scholar of Sôcrâtes, at the time his townsmen were prohibited from entering Athens, under penalty of death. He went nightly in a female dress (Gel. vi. 10).

Eucritides, is. m. a king of the Bætri, who ascended the throne in 181 B. C., allowed the Parthians to gain important advantages over him; yet, he fought many battles with great bravery, conquered Dêmétrius, king of the Indians, by whom he had been besieged five months, and reduced India under his dominion. His son, whom he had made his partner in the kingdom, murdered him as he returned, avowed the commission of that crime, drove the chariot through his blood, and ordered his body to be cast out without burial, in 147 B. C. (Just. xli. 6).

Euctemon, ônis. m. an astronomer, who flourished about 413 B. C. (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 1).

Euctus, i. m. the præfect of Pella, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 43). —2. A man, who had a vanity in collecting and showing cups, for which Mârtialis ridicules him (viii. 6).

Eudemus, is. m. commanded the Thracians under Alexander the Great, and succeeded to the office held by Philippus, on his being put to death by the Indians in 325 B. C. (Curt. x. 1).

Eudæmus, i. m. commanded a Rhodian fleet, 192 B. C., and fought a successful battle with the fleet of Antiochus, king of Syria, under Hännibal, off Sida. By his advice, L. Æmilius Régillus saved the Roman squadron, in the Archipelago, consequently he was the cause of the victory which the combined fleet obtained over that of Antiochus, under Pölyxénidas, at Mýonnêsus (Liv. xxxvii. 12 seq.).

Eudæmus, i. m. the friend and physician of the empress Livia, whom Sējānus prevailed upon to enter into the conspiracy against her, on purpose to terminate her life, a crime which he afterwards confessed on the rack (Tac. Ann. iv. 3—11). The physicians of this period engaged in every species of crime, poisoned, intrigued, and forged false Wills, which rendered them both dangerous and contemptible (Plin. iv. 670).

Eudieru, n. indec. a tower, or fort, of Mæcêdônia, taken by the Romans, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 3).

Eudôrus, i. m. the son of Mèretrius and Pölymêla, commanded part of the troops of Achilles, at Troy, where he distinguished himself both in running and in fighting (Il. xvi. 186).

Eudôses, um. m. the Eudosiens, a German nation, mentioned by Tacitus along with six others, as worshippers of the earth. History furnishes no information to ascertain their exact geographical position (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

Eudôxus, i. m. appears to have been either an able astronomer, or a resolute sailor, since, flying from Lathûrus, king of Egypt, he sailed down Mærê Rôbrum, the Red Sea, and arrived at Gâdes, Cadiz, consequently he had doubled the Cape of Good Hope (Plin. i. 221). —2. A native of Cnîdus, embraced the opinions of Pythâgoras, and acquired great distinction from his knowledge of geometry and philosophy. Ancient accounts, respecting the masters under whom he studied, differ, and also respecting his visit to Egypt. To the priests of that country, there can be no doubt that he was indebted for the first principles of astronomy. On his return to Greece, he regulated the year, before undetermined; which he made to consist of three hundred and sixty-five days. The Greeks esteemed him highly as an astronomer, and it is to be regretted that none of his writings have descended to modern times. Aratus in his poem on astronomy, is said to have adopted the opinions of Eudôxus. This philosopher died in the fifty-third year of his age, about 388 B. C. (Luc. Phar. x. 187).

Eucnêtus, i. m. the father of Dêlphônus, the soothsayer, kept the sheep sacred to the Sun in Apôllônia. On him the gift of prescience, and certain lands were bestowed, after he had lost his sight, a punishment inflicted by the people of that district, for his having fallen asleep and allowed about sixty of the flock to be devoured by wolves (Herod. ix. 92 seq.).

Evênor, ôris. m. father of Læôcritus. Evênôrîdes, is. m. Læôcritus (Hom. Od. ii. 242).

Evênus, i. m. son of Mârs and Dêmônîcê. Apôllo wished to marry his daughter Mârpessa; but Idas, son of Aphâreus, having received a winged vehicle from Nêptûnus, carried her off, and her father having pursued him in a chariot, came to the river Lÿcôrmas without overtaking him, there killed his horses, and then threw himself into the river, which afterwards bore his name (Apol. i. 7 seq.). Filius Evēni, Mārpessa (Prop. i. 2. 18).—2. A son of Iāson and Hýpsipylē, who was the brother of Nēphrōphōnos (Apol. i. 9).—3. Son of Sclēpius, king of Lyrnēssus and Thēba, hence called Sclēpiādes, and father of Mynes and Epistrōphus (Hom. Il. ii. 693).

Evēnus, i, m. the Phidari, a river of Ætōlia, of which the most ancient name, according to Ovidius and Plūtarchus, was Lyeōrmas, an appellation which Ovidius has also used (Met. ii. 245). It was called Evēnus, from Evēnus q. v., son of Mars. It falls into the Ionian sea by two mouths. Adj. Evēninus, a, um. Evēnina mētres, matrons of Cālydon; because that city stood on the banks of the Phidari (Ov. Met. viii. 527).—2. The Kosak, a river of Mýsia, falls into Euxineus Sinus, the Gulf of Sandarli.

Evērgētae, arum, m. a people who lived at the foot of mount Caucāsus, and were conquered by Alexander the Great, in 328 B. C. (Just. xii. 5). Tribes or nations of this name occur in different parts of the ancient world.

Evērsa, æ, m. a Theban prince, whose murder the Roman ambassadors, by insinuation, ascribed to Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, and that monarch maintained that Evērsa perished by shipwreck in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 40, 41).

Eugānēi, orum, m. a people in the north of Italy, between Lācus Cōmēnsis and Athēsis, the Adige. Their name is of Greek derivation, but does not occur in any Greek author. It is probable, that at first they inhabited the coast, from which district they were expelled by the Hēnēti, and Trōjāni, under Antēnor, as recorded by Līvius (i. 1). Adj. Eugānēus, a, um. Eugānēa agna. The sheep of the Eugānēi yielded the finest and softest wool in all Italy. The Romans esteemed softness and delicacy unmanly qualities, hence Jūvénalis uses Eugānēa agna, to denote the greatest effeminacy (Sat. viii. 15).

Eugānus, i, m. a hill in the Venetian territory, according to the Scholiast, which Lūcānus calls Eugānēus cōllis (Phar. vii. 192). It afforded excellent pasture.

Eugēnium, i, n. a town of Illyricum, which, in the treaty with Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in 207 B. C., was to belong to the Romans (Liv. xxix. 12).

Euhēges, um, m. Gallic philosophers, who spent their time in the study of nature, which they communicated to the youth who resorted to them for that kind of information. This order appears to have been inferior to the Drūides, properly so called, who searched into the occult sciences, to which they added that of morals (Amm. Mar. xv. 9). See Drūides.

Euhýdrum, i, n. a town of Thessaly, which Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, burned, 200 B. C., to prevent its falling into the hands of the Romans, and he carried the inhabitants along with him (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Eupippē, æ, f. a native of Pæōnia (Pæōnis), a country of Mācēdōnia, daughter of Lēucon, was the wife of Pīērus, and mother of the Pīērides, who, for their audacity in presuming to challenge the Muses to a trial in music, were turned into magpies (picæ) (Ov. Met. v. 203).

Eupippus, i, m. an Arcadian mentioned by Stātilius (Th. ii. 258).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Pātrocclus clad in the arms of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 417 seq.).

Evlus, i, m. a name of Bācchus, which some derive from eu, a word of the Bacchanals, and others, from Jūpiter hailing him on his return from the conquest of the giants with eu in, "well done, O son" (Hor. Od. i. 18. 9). Adj. Evlus, a, um. Evlā tērga, the backs or skins (i. e. the drums) of Bācchus (Stat. Ach. ii. 154).

Eulæus, i, m. the Karoon, called also Chōāsper q. v.

Q. Eulōgius, Q. Eulōgii, m. a Roman who wrote on the origin and rank of the Vitellian family. His book was addressed to Q. Vitellius q. v. (Suet. Vit. 1).

Eulōgus, i, m. a man mentioned by Mārtialis (vi. 8).

Eumāchus, i, m. a son of Lacedæmonian Xanthippus and Bārcē, killed by Virbius (Sil. Ital. iv. 392).—2. A general under Mithridātes, who put to death a number of the Romans with their wives and children, overran several districts of Asia Minor, until defeated with great slaughter by Dēiōtārus (Ap. Bel. Mith. 222).

Eumæus, i, m. by birth a Syrian, became the property of Lāertes by purchase, and proved afterwards a very faithful slave, or servant, to his son Ulýsses (Stat. Syl. ii. 6. 57).

Eumēda, æ, m. a mountain of Scythia, supposed to be the same with Emōdus (Val. Flacc. vi. 143).

Eumēdes, is, m. the father of Dōlon, mentioned by Ovidius (Trist. iii. 4. 27).—2. Son of Dōlon, and grandson of the former, a brave warrior whom Turnus killed, adding insult to his violence (Virg. Æn. xii. 346).

Eumēdon, ōntis, m. son of Bācchus and Ariādne, who accompanied Iāson in the Argonautic expedition, according to Hýginus.

Eumēlus, i, m. a Trojan, a very old man, who remained with the women at the ships, after they had gained the Italian coast, whilst the rest were celebrating games, and gave notice at the tomb of Anchises and at the theatre, that the women had set the ships on fire (Virg. Æn. v. 665).—2. First king of Pātrea, Patra, whose daughter was killed by falling from the chariot of Triptolēmus, and changed into a bird (Ov. Met. vii. 390).—3. A native of Chalcis, Egripo, a town of Eubœa, Negropont, who conducted a colony to Nēapōlis, Naples. Eumēlis, idis, f. Pārthēnōpæa, daughter of Eumēlus (Stat. Syl. iv. 8. 49). Some suppose this name to be derived from eu and melus, brave, an epithet applied to Phālērus by Apōllōnius Rhōdius (i. 96). The quantity forms a powerful objection to this supposition.—4. Son of Admētus, king of Phœre, and Alcēstis, excelled in driving the chariot. He married Iphthima, daughter of Icārus, and sister of Pēnelōpē. Having joined his countrymen, he set sail for Troy with eleven ships, and engaged in the horserace, having excellent mares, which had been bred by Apōllo (Hom. Il. ii. 714 seq.).

Eumēnes, is, m. a native of Cārdia, Heramili, who, at the age of twenty, became secretary to Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in which office he continued for seven years, and afterwards discharged the same duty during thirteen years under his son Alexander the Great. The distinguished talents of Eumenes, and his inviolable fidelity, qualified him, in an eminent degree, for that situation, which he held till the death of Alexander, in spite of the envy and prejudice of the Lacedæmonian commanders, who despised him both as a foreigner, and a man of mean birth. The attachment of Eumenes to the king did not end with his life, for he adhered with inflexible steadfastness to Përdicæus, to whom Alexander, on his deathbed, had given his ring in token of his conferring on him the principal management, and the whole tenor of his conduct showed, that his sole object was the security of the kingdoms to the children of that monarch. His valour procured important victories over his enemies, who frequently obliged him to take the field, and his prudence formed such regulations as would have benefited the state, had they been properly observed. After obtaining a complete triumph over his inveterate enemy Antigonus, to the infamy of the Macedonian soldiers, called Argyraspides, it must be recorded, that they delivered up their commander to that general, who kept him some time in confinement, and the guards put an end to his life, after fasting for three days, by strangulation, in the forty-fifth year of his age (Cor. Nep. Eum.). Justinus states, that, on the death of Alexander, he received Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, to which Caria, Lydia, and Phrygia, were afterwards added. Little dependence can be placed on the accuracy of this historian, since he mentions Paphlagonia twice (xiii. 4, 6). Curtius says, he declined accepting the government of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia (x. 10).—2. A son of Demetrius (Just. xvii. 2). Here the reading probably ought to be Nicomædes.—3. A king of Bithynia, who overcame Antiochus Hierax and the Gauls, or inhabitants of Gallia, in 242 B. C. In consequence of this success, he took possession of the greater part of Asia Minor (Just. xxvii. 3).—4. A son of Attalus, king of Asia, who was an active, faithful, and zealous ally of the Roman people during the war in Greece, against the Macedonians, and also against Antiochus, king of Syria. He went to Rome in 174 B. C., on purpose to inform the senate, that Persæus, king of Mæcedonia, was making preparations for war against the Romans. Suspecting the object of his journey, Persæus hired assassins to murder him, and left him for dead, as he went to Dèlphi, Castrè, on his way from Rome to his own kingdom. Livius has recorded numerous instances of his aid and services to the Roman state, and the advantages which he received from that alliance (xxxiii. 34—Ep. 46).—5. An officer under Persæus, king of Mæcedonia, who, with Athénagoras, had the command at Thessalonica, Saloniki, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).

Euménia, æ, f. a town of Phrygia, built by Eumenes, brother of Attalus, king of Asia, from whom it received that name. Plinius makes it a city of Caria (i. 398), in opposition to Strabo and Ptolémæus, who agree with Eutrôpius in placing it in Phrygia (Eutrop. iv. 4).

Euménis, idos (Luc. Phar. i. 576), f. a Fury; Plur. Euménides, dam, the Furies. See Erinyes.

Eumôpius, adis, f. the ancient name of Philippópolis q. v. (Amm. Mar. xxii. 2).

Eumôpus, i, m. a Thracian, son of Nèptunus and Chionê, whom his mother, to conceal her crime, threw into the sea; but his father preserved his life, and carried him to Æthiopia, where he was brought up by Amphitritê and her daughter Benthëscymê. When he arrived at man's estate, the husband of Benthëscymê gave him one of his daughters in marriage. Some time after, he was banished, for having offered violence to a sister of his wife. Apollodorus does not mention whether he took his wife along with him or not, but his son Ismârus accompanied him to Tëgýrius, king of Thracia, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismârus. Prompted by ambition, Eumôpus plotted against the Thracian monarch, and the discovery of his design obliged him to quit the country, when he went to Eleusis, Lefina, where he formed a friendship, and continued until Tëgýrius recalled him to Thracia on the death of Ismârus. Having settled their differences, Eumôpus succeeded to the crown, and soon after came with a powerful army to assist the Eleusinians against the Athenians. He fell by the hand of Erêctheus q. v. (Apol. iii. 15 seq.). Eumôpus first held the office of chief priest of Ceres at Eleusis, an office which his descendants continued to enjoy for a succession of ages. Eumôpidæ, arum, m. the posterity of Eumôpus, who were the priests of Ceres, and presided at all the festivals and solemnities of that goddess at Eleusis.—3. The instructor of Hércules in music (Theoc. xxiv. 108).

Eunæus, i, m. a native of Bœotia, and a worshipper of Bæchus, who joined his countrymen in the Theban war. Stâtius describes him dressed in all the finery of a modern fop, whom Capanæus deprived of life, but not before he had uttered some improper sentiments (Stat. Th. vii. 649 seq.).

Eunæus, v. Euménus, et, Euménus, i, m. a Trojan, son of Clýtius, killed by Càmilla (Virg. Æn. xi. 666).

Eunæus, i, m. one of the sons of Iâson and Hýpsipylê. He was the twin-brother of Thôas, and had his name from the prosperous voyage (eu, well, nav, I sail) of the ship Argo, or that it might be ominous of a good voyage. To this Stâtius alludes, omine dictus Eunæos Argæo (Th. vi. 344). Iâsonides, æ, m. Eunæus (Hom. Il. vii. 468).

Eunôê, es, f. a Moor, the wife of Bôgud, king of Mauritanîa, on whom C. Julius Cæsar bestowed many large presents, in consequence of their immoral conduct (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 52).

Eunômia, æ, f. daughter of Thémis (Pis. Ol. ix. 26).

Eunômus, i, m. prætor of the Thessalians, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 39).

Eunônes, is, m. prince of the Aorsi q. v. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—19).

Eunûchus, i, m. a mutilated man, employed to guard the seraglios of eastern noblemen. The name has been derived from eun, to keep, or guardian, of the bed, and their office naturally leads to this etymology, provided it were certain that the term was of Greek origin. In modern, as well as in ancient times, this ill-used class of men have been treated with unmerited obloquy and contempt. Avarice impelled slave-dealers to this act of cruelty; by which many lives are destroyed; but the value of the survivors is so greatly enhanced as to be more than a compensation for the number killed by the operation. The same principle induces many parents in Italy to injure their children, on purpose to qualify them for theatres and operas. Great numbers of eunuchs, however, have risen to distinction, which overturns the injurious opinion, that this personal violence renders them cowardly, and weakens the powers of the mind. Eutrōpius, who made such a distinguished figure at the court of Arcādius, was a eunuch, and Claudianus has written a bitter invective against him; Omnia cesserunt eunūcho consule monstra, i. e. Omnia monstra sunt minora eunūcho consule (xviii. 8).

Eunus, i. m. a slave, by birth a Syrian, was the author of an insurrection of slaves in Sicily. To his standard flocked a great number of agricultural slaves, and he obtained others by breaking open the prisons. Clēon, another of the same people, raised about seventy thousand men, and their united forces frequently engaged the Roman armies, in 136 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 56). By concealing in his mouth a nutshell full of brimstone and fire, he emitted a flame amidst his words, and convinced the slaves that he acted by the direction of the gods (Flor. iii. 19).

Evōdus, i. m. a freedman of the emperor Claudius (Tac. Ann. xi. 37).

Eupālamos, i. m. one of the hunters at Cālydon, whom the boar stretched on the ground, and his companions afterwards carried off (Ov. Met. viii. 360).

Eupallum, i. n. a city of Lōcris, according to Thūcýdides and Stēphānus (Liv. xxviii. 8). It stood near Erythræ q. v., in Etōlia.

Eupātōria, w. f. Inkürman (Tchekineh, D'Auv.), a town of Chērsōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea, built by Miltiades Eupātor, hence the name (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Euphānes, is, m. an eminent poet of antiquity (Pin. Nem. iv. 144).—2. A Cretan commander, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 13).

Euphēmus, i. m. one of the Argonauts, son of Nēptūnus and Eurōpa, born on the banks of Cēphissus, the Macroneri, is said by the Scholiast on Pindārus to have been king of Tēnārus (Val. Flacc. i. 365). There are different accounts of his origin.—2. A favourite with the Roman emperor Dōmītiānus, to whom Mārtiālls writes an epigram on the most proper time for reading his poem to that monarch (iv. 8).

Euphōrbus, i. m. the son of Pānthōus, hence called Pānthōides, a valiant Trojan, who first wounded Pātrocclus, the friend of Achīlles, when clad in the armour of the Thessalian hero, whom Hēctor afterwards killed. He was himself slain by Mēnēläus, who, after the termination of the war, hung up his shield in the temple of Jūno, at Argos. Pýthāgōras asserted that he was once Euphōrbus, and remembered many things which he did when his soul animated that intrepid soldier. To prove the truth of his assertion, he went to Argos, Argo, and pointed out, at first sight, the shield of Euphōrbus, hanging amidst many other Trojan spoils of the same kind, in the temple of Jūno, where it had been placed by Mēnēläus. An ancient author maintains, that Pýthāgōras invented this fiction to conceal the meanness of his real ancestry, by identifying himself with one of Homer's heroes (Ov. Met. xv. 161. Hom. Il. xvii. 70).

Euphōrion, ōnis, m. a native of Chāleis, lived during the reign of Ptōlōmaus Evērgētes. He wrote tragedy, but none of his writings have been transmitted. The obscurity of his style was censured by Cicēro, yet the Roman emperor Tiberius admired it so much, that in his Greek poems he imitated the phraseology of Euphōrion (Suet. Tib. 70).

Euphrānor, ōris, m. a famous Greek statuarius and painter. Plinūs commends his figure of Pāris, which exhibited, at one glance, the judge of the goddesses, the lover of Hēlēna, and the slayer of Achīlles. That author, too, extols him highly for having been the first who introduced dignity into the figures of his heroes, and the first who attended to symmetry, yet his execution of particular parts was superior to the general expression of the whole. He wrote some books on symmetry and colours, which are lost (Plin. v. 124—226).

Euphrātes, is, m. called in modern times different names by different nations, as the Euphrātes by the British; El-Frat by the Arabs; Mourāt by the Turks, &c.; a celebrated river in Asia, which takes its rise in the mountains of Armēnia, Turcomania, a few miles to the N. E. of Arz Roum. The Morad, or, Murad, perhaps the Omiris of the ancients, one of its branches, which almost doubles the course of this river, has its source in mount Ararat, Ari-dag (Rennel). The Euphrātes divides about 140 miles from the sea into two channels, by one of which the famous city of Bābýlon was divided into two parts nearly equal. Besides the great canal which connected it with the Tigris when it rose to a certain height, there was a number of smaller branches in the neighbourhood of that celebrated city, which are probably referred to, under the appellation of the rivers of Babylon, in the Psalms of David (cxxxvii. 1). After a course of 1400 miles, the Euphrātes falls into Sinus Pērsicus, the Persian Gulf, by two or three mouths. It is navigable for a considerable distance from the sea, and great vessels might ascend to its junction with the Tigris, if the channel were clear of the stones, by which it is in some places choked up. The exact time when the Tigris and Euphrātes begin to swell is not precisely ascertained. Bābýlōnius Euphrātes, the Babylonian Euphrātes, from Bābýlon standing on its banks (Ov. Met. ii. 248). Pālestina aqua, the Euphrātes, because it washes Sýria, of which Pālestina anciently formed a part (Ov. Fast. ii. 464). Cisēuphrātēnses, ium, m. people living on the west side of that river (Ap. Bel. Syr. 118).

Euphrōsýnē, es, f. one of the Graces (Pin. Ol. xiv. 20). See Grātia.

Euphēthes, is, m. an Ithacan nobleman, the father of Antinōus, after whose death he attempted to raise a civil war, in which he lost his life (Hom. Od. i. 383).

Euplēa, v. Euplēa, w. f. an island in Sinus Pūtēolānus, which had this name (from eu, well, and plēa, I sail), from being a good station for ships, hence Stātius, vāgis omēn fēlix Euplēa cārinit (Syl. ii. 2. 79).

Euplēmīa, w. f. daughter of Mýrmīdon, and the mother of Æthāides by Mercury (Orph. 131. Apol. Rhod. i. 55).

Eupōlēmus, i. m. entered, with a thousand men, Ambrācia, when besieged by the Romans, in 191 B. C. This dexterous movement, which he accomplished during the night, was of little advantage; since dread of the Romans induced him to quit the place, and ravage Acarnania (Liv. xxxviii. 4).—2. The chief man of the Hÿpætæi, through whom the public faith was pledged to eighty exiles of distinction belonging to that city. He and others went out to meet them on their return to their native city, and, after congratulations, conducted them within the walls, where they were put to death (Liv. xli. 25).

Eupolis, is (Idis, Gel. i. 15), m. an elegant writer of ancient comedy, who was contemporary, or nearly contemporary, with Cratinus and Aristophanes. He wrote seventeen plays, of which seven gained the prize for that species of composition. He lost his life in a sea engagement between his countrymen, the Athenians, and the Lacedæmonians. The former bewailed his death so bitterly, that they resolved that no poet should, in future, be a soldier (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 1). Some have maintained that Alcibiades, sailing with him into Sicily, threw him into the sea, which seems to have been the idea of Cicero, although he acknowledges that Eratosthenes maintained a different opinion, and mentioned the plays which Eupolis published after that time (Cic. Brut. 9 seq.). Ovidius states that he died the first night after his marriage (Ib. 530).

Euporus, i. m. a slave of C. Sëmproniüs Græchus. According to some, that turbulent youth, at his own request, fell by the hand of this slave (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 65).

Euripides, is, m. an eminent Greek poet, who excelled in writing tragedy. His father, whose name was Mnësarchus, appears to have been in a very low state of society. Clitö, the mother of the poet, was an herbwoman. Why his parents left Athens, no certain authentic account has been transmitted, but it is certain that Euripides was born on the island Sälamis, Colouri, the day after the powerful army of Xerxes had been defeated by the Greeks. Passing over the various statements about his name, and the manner in which he is said to have spent his early years, from their not being supported by unquestionable evidence, it may be observed, that at the age of eighteen he began earnestly to cultivate the powers of his mind. Under Anäxagöras he acquired a knowledge of natural philosophy, and of rhetoric under Prödicus. It has been maintained, that he studied moral philosophy under Söcrätes, an assertion resting solely on that great philosopher attending the theatre only when the plays of Euripides were acted. The preference given to the writings of Euripides should be referred to the beautiful morality with which they abound, and to the elegant diction in which it is expressed. If confidence may be placed on the dates at which their births were said to have happened, it was impossible for the poet to have had the benefit of that great moralist's instruction, since, when the former had attained his eighteenth year, the latter was only in his fifth. Contradictory accounts have been given of his love and abhorrence of the fair sex, the latter founded on the base and vicious female characters represented in his tragedies, and the former from his having had at one period two wives. Although at Athens he enjoyed the friendship of many of the illustrious characters in that learned city, yet it does not appear that his life had been very comfortable, since he retired to the court of the Macedonian king, Archëlaus, a great admirer of literature, and patron of learned men. Here the poet came to an untimely end, having been torn in pieces by the dogs of that monarch, when walking alone in deep meditation in a wood. This melancholy event, which happened in the seventy-fifth year of his age, was lamented with every expression of sorrow both by the Macedonians and Athenians. Archëlaus celebrated his funeral rites in a very magnificent manner, and erected a monument to his memory at Pella, "which," Plütarchus says, "was struck by lightning, a proof that he was a favourite of the gods!" Some authors state that Euripides wrote ninety-two tragedies, others limit the number to seventy-five, of which nineteen only remain, and these of very unequal merit. Notwithstanding the excellence of his writings, only five carried the different prizes for which he contended. In regard to the excellence of this poet, it is enough to quote the words of Cicero, "Whatever number of lines I read in Euripides, I find as many moral maxims." Adj. Euripideus, v. Euripidius, a. um. Euripideum carmen (Cic. Tusc. iii. 25).

Euripus, i. m. the Strait of Negropont, by which Eubœa, Negropont, is separated from the continent of Greece. An old heavy bridge of three arches, built by the Venetians at Chalcis, Egripo, forms a communication between the island and the adjacent coast. Here the Strait is not above fifty yards broad, part of which is occupied by two massy piers, on which the arches rest. Upon this strait, Antlöchus, king of Syria, erected his tents of gold and silk, when he went to make war against the Romans in Greece, in 193 B. C. (Flor. ii. 8). The change of the tide in this strait formed the subject both of observation and discussion among the ancients, and has not been overlooked in modern times. Sträbo, Plinius, and Pömponius Mëla, agree in stating, that it flowed and ebbed seven times in the twenty-four hours, and this uniformity, most probably, proceeds from their copying each other; but Sëneca makes the change fourteen times every day. In this point the moderns differ considerably, and, perhaps, no account yet published can be confidently relied on. Some state that the tides are regular during the last three days of the old moon, and the first eight days of the new moon, then irregular for five days, regular again for the next seven, and irregular during the other six. The swell is inconsiderable, never exceeding two feet, and often not one-half of that height. A Greek, with whom a late traveller conversed, stated that when the wind blows directly either up or down the strait, the change does not exceed four times in twenty-four hours; but when the wind is in other directions the flux and reflux vary, it may be ten or twelve times a-day. The current was strongest before full moon. The informant had resided on the strait for three years. The Turks on the spot knew nothing whatever of the matter. In opposition to this statement, the inhabitants informed another traveller, that the tide changed every six hours, unless high winds interfered with the regular course of the waters. Babin, a Jesuit priest, studied the tides of this strait with great attention, and the result of his observations determined him to the usual tides, except on the first five days of the moon's first and last quarters, during which the current seemed to follow no regular order. During the ebbing, the rapidity is equal to that of the tide in the Thames at London bridge. To these varying accounts of Euripus, that of Livius may be added. The sea, from being of considerable width at each side, contracts into a strait, presenting, at first view, two harbours facing the two coasts; but a fleet can scarcely have a more dangerous station. For the winds instantly and furiously rush down from the very high mountains on each side, and the strait itself does not vary seven times a-day, at stated periods, according to report; but rushes impetuously like a torrent tumbling from a steep mountain, so that ships are tossed both night and day (Liv. xxviii. 6 seq.). Chalcidicus Euripus, to distinguish it from Euripus at Cæsandræa (Liv. xlv. 11).

Eurition, onis, m. a man, in the army of Etæcles, whom Parthénopæus, in the Theban war, deprived first of his left eye, and then of the right, by triple barbed arrows, which Diāna had substituted in place of his own (Stat. Th. ix. 749).

Eurōmus, i, m. a town of Cária, called, by Livius, Eurōmēnsium urbs, of which Philipus, king of Macedōnia, had taken possession, and from which the Rhodiens, in the conference between that prince and T. Quinctius Flamininus, who was accompanied by the Roman allies, in 199 B. C., insisted that he should lead off his garrison (Liv. xxxii. 33). Iah. Eurōmēuses, ium, m. (Liv. xlv. 23).

Eurōpa, æ, f. Europe, one of the three grand divisions of the world among the ancients, is said to have obtained that name from Europæa, the daughter of Agænor, king of Phœnicia. Fabulous history informs us that Jupiter, captivated by the elegance and beauty of this princess, assumed the form of a bull when she was gathering flowers with her companions, crossed the sea with her on his back, and landed her in Cræta, Candia. In explanation of this fable, some have been of opinion, that Minos had violently taken her away from Phœnicia in a ship, which had a bull painted on its prow; and others have conjectured that a Cretan captain, whose name was Taurus, carried her from her native country, brought her to Cræta, Candia, and had by her three sons, Minos, Sarpædon, and Rhædamanthus. She is in general represented sitting dejected, under the shade of a plane-tree, and an eagle near her, to which she seems turning her back. If the fiction of Europæa originated in truth, the name would be at first confined to the western shores of the Archipelago, and strait of Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles. Thence it might gradually extend over the adjacent countries, until it became a common appellation of the whole tract of land lying on the W. of Asia, and N. of the Mediterranean. It is proper to add, that the name of this division of the world is of doubtful derivation, and that nothing certain respecting it is known. Europe is bounded on the east by Mārē Agæum, or simply, Agæum, the Archipelago, Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles, Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, Thræcius Bosphorus; the Strait of Constantinople, Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, Cimmerius Bosphorus, the Strait of Caffa, and Pālūs Misōtis, the Sea of Asoph, Tānāis, the Don, and other rivers of Russia, which form the boundary between Europe and Asia. On the S. the Mediterranean Sea, called, by the Romans, Nōstrum Mārē, and, by the Greeks, Intērnum Mārē, separates it from Africa. Mārē Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean, which was known among the Greeks by the appellation of Mārē Estērnum, washes the western, and the Frōzen Ocean, the northern shores of Europe. When geographers divided the ancient world into two parts, Europe included Africa. Of this extensive tract of country, containing about two millions and a half of square miles, and, in modern times, one hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants, only the southern parts were known to the Greeks and Romans. With Norway, Sweden, Russia, Prussia, Poland, Denmark, and the north of Germany, they were wholly unacquainted. Their knowledge, even of the countries lying along the south bank of the Danube, was by no means accurate. It is only of late years that the northern parts of Europe have been known with precision. Adj. Eurōpæus, a, um. Eurōpæus dux, Minos (Ov. Met. viii. 23). Eurōpæi aduersarii, European opponents (Cor. Nep. Eun. 3). Eurōpæus orbis (Amm. Mar. xvii. 7).

Eurōpē, es, f. a Sicilian or Carthaginian ship, which the Roman consul, Marcellus, burned, in a naval engagement with Himilco, off Sicily, towards the end of the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 568).

Eurōpus, i, m. a king of Europæa, which Justinus seems to consider as a part of Macedōnia, or a district near that country. Perhaps from this monarch, first the capital, and afterwards the kingdom, received its name, so that to him the name of one of the three divisions of the ancient continent may be referred, rather than to the daughter of Agænor (Just. vii. 1). See Europæa.

Eurōpus. See Arsæla.

Eurōtas, æ, m. the Vasilipotāmo, i. e. the Royal River, but its most common appellation is the Iri, a river of Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, which runs near Lacædæmon, and empties itself into Sinus Lacōnicus, the Gulf of Colchythia, on which was the town of Tienarus; hence Tanārius Eurōtas (Ov. Met. ii. 247). Rigidus Eurōtas, stern, severe, Eurōtas; alluding to the manners and discipline of the Lacedæmonians (Stat. Th. x. 491).

Eurus, i, m. the southeast wind, according to Vitrælius; according to Aristoteles and Timosthēnes, southeast $\frac{1}{4}$ east, in which it corresponded with the Latin Vultūrus. When the ancients only reckoned four winds, Eurus was the east, Nōtus the south, Zephyrus the west, and Boræus the north, and it still denoted the same point of the compass, until the number exceeded eight. Adj. Eurōus, a, um.

Eurysades, æ, m. one of the lovers of Penelope, killed by Telēmachus (Hom. Od. xxii. 267).

Eurysalē, es, f. one of the Amazons (Val. Flacc. v. 615).—2. One of the Gorgons, sister of Sthēno, who were both immortal. The third, Mēdusa, was mortal (Pin. Pyth. xii. 35).

Eurýalus, i. m. a Trojan, son of Ophéltes, of uncommon personal beauty, great military valour, and kindness of disposition, who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and to whom Virgilius has given immortality by celebrating, in the most beautiful strains of poetry, his friendship with Nisus. His mother, though of a great age, clung to him when he left the Trojan shores. She was of the ancient family of Priamus. Eurýalus and Nisus were candidates for the prize which Æneas offered for excelling in running. Nisus surpassed all the competitors in swiftness, Sálus was second, and Eurýalus third. The last obtained the prize by a stratagem of his friend, who himself having fallen purposely occasioned the fall of Sálus who was next him, and before he could regain what he had lost by this injury, Eurýalus had reached the goal. The prize was a horse highly caparisoned. The two friends formed a design of attacking the Rútúli during the night, in which they showed astonishing courage and bravery. After putting many of the enemy to death, Eurýalus was killed by Vólscénsus he attempted to return (Virg. Æn. v. 294 seq.; ix. 179 seq.). Ovidius uses his name to denote a true and faithful friend (Trist. v. 4. 26).—2. A sword player (Juv. Sat. vi. 81).—3. Son of Mécisteus, who killed several of the Trojans, engaged Epéus at the céstus and was defeated (Hom. Il. vi. 20 seq.). Apollódorus makes him one of the Argonauts.—4. A noble Phœncian, a man of great courage, and a combatant in the games exhibited by Alcínous before Ulysses (Her. Od. viii. 115).

Eurýalus, i. m. the acropolis of Epípólæ q. v. (Liv. xxv. 25).

Eurýbates, is, m. the servant of Agamémnon (Ov. Ep. Her. iii. 9).—2. Herald of Ulysses (Hom. Il. ii. 184 seq.). Héródôtus mentions an eminent general of the Argives of this name. It is probable, that it was at first a common rather than a proper name; and denoted a herald, as the word signifies to be heard speaking at a great distance. Dámn observes that there were many men of this name, but all artful knaves.

Eurýbiades, is, m. a king of Læcædæmon, Misitra, who commanded the Lacedæmonian fleet in the battle with Xêrxes, king of Pêrsia, at Artémisium, and afterwards at the decisive engagement off Sálamis, Colouri (Cor. Nep. Them. 3, 4).

Eurýclæa, a, f. daughter of Ops. Pirates carried her off in early life, and sold her for twenty oxen to Læertes, who treated her with great kindness, and made her keeper of his son Ulysses. The affection which she had for Ulysses she transferred to his son Têlémachus, and, through the whole Odyssey, her character is that of an affectionate, prudent, and faithful domestic (Hom. Od. i. 429 seq.).

Eurýdamas, antis, m. son of Cüménus, a Dolopian, one of the Argonauts (Apol. Rhod. i. 67).—2. A man who killed Thrásyllus, and was himself, in revenge for his brother's death, slain by Simon, who dragged his body three times round the tomb of Thrásyllus at his chariot wheels (Ov. Ib. 331). The Scholiast on Hómêrus says, that it was a very ancient practice in Thessaly to drag the bodies of their slain enemies around the tomb of those who had fallen by their hands.—3. A man who traced his descent from the lover of Pênêlôpê, who bore the same name. He was killed at the siege of Sâgîntum, Murciro, by Asbýrê (Sil. Ital. ii. 178).—4. Father of Abas and Pôlýdus, skilled in dreams (Hom. Il. v. 149).—5. One of the lovers of Pênêlôpê, killed by Ulysses (Hom. Od. xxii. 233).—6. Son of Írus and Dêmônassa, an Argonaut, but not mentioned by Valérius Flaccus.

Eurýdica, a, f. the mother of Gêntius, king of the Ilýrii (Liv. xxxiv. 30).

Eurýdicê, a, f. the wife of Orphêus, whom he endeavoured to recover after death, and for that purpose he descended to the infernal regions, where, by the sweetness of his music, he prevailed on Plúto to restore her. His request was granted, on condition that he should not look back until he had reached the upper regions; but the greatness of his affection for his wife rendered him forgetful, or unmindful of the injunction, and, when he was on the borders of light, he turned round to look at Eurýdicê, on which she vanished from his sight. Virgilius has, in strains of unrivalled beauty, sung this adventure of Orphêus (G. iv. 453 seq.). Ovidius says, that he attempted in vain to procure her return from the mansions of the dead; but, that after death, he found her in the regions of the happy (Met. x. 31 seq.).—2. The wife of Lyeurgus, king of Nêméa, to whom Státius alludes (Th. v. 632).—3. The wife of Amýntas II., king of Mácêdônla, by whom she became the mother of Alexander, Pêrdiccas, and Philippos, father of Alexander the Great, and a daughter named Eurýônê. She formed an attachment to her son-in-law, laid plans for accomplishing the death of her husband, and transferring the kingdom to her gallant, but Eurýônê informed her father of her intentions, and thus saved his life (Just. vii. 4). Córnelius Nêpos mentions only two of her children, Pêrdiccas and Alexander (Iphic. 3), both of whom she killed (Just. vii. 5).—4. Wife of Arídeus, who, abusing the weakness of her husband, usurped the government, acted unfaithfully, and fell with him by order of Olympias (Just. xiv. 5).—5. Daughter of Lysimachus and wife of Antipater, son of Cássander (Just. xvi. 2).—6. The sister and wife of Ptôlémæus Philôpator, by whom she was put to death about 204 B. C. (Just. xxx. 1).—7. The oldest daughter of Clýmênus, and wife of Nêstor (Hom. Od. iii. 452).

Eurýlêo, onis, m. a name of Aseânus (Aur. Vic. Orig. 14).

Eurýlôchus, i. m. the only one of the companions of Ulysses sent by him to Círcê, who was not transformed into a sow. His refusing to taste the cup of that sorceress, not only preserved himself from transformation, but was the cause of his associates regaining the human form. He was married to Cümênê, the sister of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiv. 287).—2. A Lacedæmonian nobleman, brother of Epímênes, killed by Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 6).—3. A principal man and chief magistrate among the Magnêtes, who, from aversion to a son of Philippos being put in possession of Dêmêtrius, wished rather to see a total change of measures by the arrival of Antiôchus and the Etolians. He fled to the latter, as they intended to revolt. None of his measures succeeded, and at last he killed himself (Liv. xxxv. 31 seq.).

Eurymachus, i. m. one of the lovers of Penelope during the absence of her husband, and preferred by the father of that princess, who, notwithstanding, refused him her hand (Ov. Ep. Her. i. 92).

Eurymedon, ontis, m. a son of Faunus (of Pan, Stat. Th. xi. 34), of whom Statius gives an animated description. He joined the Thebans against the Argives (Th. vii. 262).—2. The twin brother of Lycoramas, and very like him. Both killed themselves, when their town Saguntum was besieged, rather than surrender to Hannibal (Sil. Ital. ii. 637 seq.).—3. An Athenian commander, sent with Demosthenes to Sicily where he fell in battle, fighting with great bravery against the Lacedæmonian general Gylippus, in 413 B. C., (Just. iv. 4 seq.).—4. King of the giants, and father of Peribœa (Hom. Od. vii. 58).—5. The son of Ptolemaeus, charioteer of Agamemnon (Hom. Il. iv. 228).

Eurymedon, ontis, m. the Zacuth, a river of Pamphylia (Liv. xxxiii. 41. Plin. i. 589).

Eurymedusa, e, f. an attendant of Nausicla, daughter of Alcinoüs (Hom. Od. vii. 8).

Eurymene, arum, f. a city of Thessalia, Thessaly, disputed between the Thessali and Philippos, king of Macedônia, in 187 B. C.; Philippos maintained that it anciently belonged to the Ætolii (Liv. xxxix. 25).

Eurymus, i, m. the father of the prophet Telæmus. Eurymides, e, m. a patronymic of Telæmus (Ov. Ibis 270).

Eurynome, es, f. daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who married Orchamus, king of the Achaemenians or Persians, to whom she bore Leucothoe q. v. (Ov. Met. iv. 210). She and Thetis received Vuleanus when thrown down from heaven (Hom. Il. xviii. 399).—2. A Lemnian woman, who bewailed the absence of her husband in Thræcia, and probably, like the rest, murdered him on his return (Val. Flacc. ii. 136).—3. A faithful servant of Penelope (Hom. Od. xvii. 495).

Eurynomus, i, m. a centaur killed, at the marriage of Pirithous, by Drjas (Ov. Met. xii. 310).—2. An Ithacan, son of Egypsius, and one of the lovers of Penelope (Hom. Od. ii. 22 seq.).

Eurynoe, es, f. the daughter of Amyntas II. by his wife Eurynice, who discovered the turpitude of her mother, and her design to murder her husband (Just. vii. 4).

Eurypylus, i, m. the son of Euemon; a Thessalian who went to the Trojan war with forty ships. He was an intrepid soldier, hence called Pærox (Ov. Met. xii. 357).—2. Son of Hércules, a prince in the island Cos (Hom. Il. ii. 677).—3. A Thessalian prince (Hom. Il. ii. 736).—4. Son of Teléphus, a man of great beauty, killed at Troy by Neoptolémus (Hom. Od. xi. 518—521).—5. King of Libya in ancient times, and brother of Triton (Pin. Pyth. iv. 57 seq.).

Eurysaces, e, m. son of Ajax, and grandson of Telamon, who prevented his uncle Teucer from taking possession of Salamis, Colouri, on the death of Telamon (Just. xiv. 3).

Eurysthenes, is, m. one of the kings of Sparta, whilst his twin brother, Procles, was the other. These Spartan monarchs traced their descent from Hércules. Their mother refused to tell which of the two was the elder, on purpose that they might enjoy equal dignity, and their descendants continued on the Spartan throne, the former during thirty-one successive reigns, and the latter during twenty-four (Cor. Nep. Ages. 1). Eurysthénides, arum, m. the descendants of Eurysthenes.

Eurystheus, eos, m. son of Sthenelus and Astydámia (Thuc. Schol. i. 9); according to Tzetzes, of Archippé; but according to the Scholiast on Hómérus, of Leucippé; was king of Argos and Mýcænæ. Jūno accelerated his birth by two months, hence he is called Septimēstris, that he might have the ascendancy over Hércules, and retarded the delivery of Alcmena, at whom she had an inveterate hatred, because by the appointment of Júpiter, whichever of the two was first born was to reign over the other. Hence Eurystheus imposed on that hero, the twelve labours. On that account, Virgilius calls him Dūrus (G. iii. 4).

Eurýtion, onis, m. son of Lycion and brother of Pandarus. He was one of the three competitors for the prize for shooting with the arrow, which he gained (Virg. Æn. v. 495—516).—2. A centaur who died from excessive drinking (Prop. ii. 33. 31). Some consider him the same with Eurýtus, who was the cause of the battle at the nuptials of Pirithous (Ov. Met. xii. 220).—3. Anætiæ man, one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 311).—4. Son of Irus and Demônassa, brother of Eurýdamas, one of the Argonauts, and often confounded with Eurýtus (Val. Flacc. i. 978).

Eurýtus, i, m. an ingenious artist, who excelled in armoury. Eurýtides, e, m. Glonus, who made the belt of Pallas. He had this name either from his being the scholar of Eurýtus, or from his adopting the mode and elegance of that artist (Virg. Æn. x. 499).—2. Twin brother of Echion, son of Mæcærius and Antianira, king of Echalia; was one of the Argonauts. He promised his daughter Iolæ to the man who surpassed himself in shooting. Being overcome by Hércules, and refusing to fulfil the conditions of the combat, that hero made war upon him, in which both he and his sons fell by the hand of that hero. Eurýtis, idis, f. Iolæ, daughter of Eurýtus (Ov. Met. ix. 395).—3. A centaur, the cause of the uproar and battle at the nuptials of Pirithous, whom Thæseus killed with a goblet (Ov. Met. xii. 220—237). By some he is called Eurýtion.—4. A Spaniard born at Sætābis, who gained the prize for the foot race, given by Scipio Africānus at the end of the Spanish war, (Sil. Ital. xvi. 473—526).—5. A Thessalian, father of Iphitus. Eurýtides, e, m. Iphitus (Hom. Od. xxi. 14).

Eusebius, i, m. an orator, who suffered a cruel death, in the year 353 (Amm. Mar. xiv. 7 seq.).—2. A prefect of the bedchamber, and a man of a bad disposition, who had great influence with the emperor, but was at last put to death (Id. xiv. 10 seq.).—3. Sur-named Mattiocōpas, a man of considerable influence in the imperial court, about the year 355 (Id. xv. 5).—4. A respectable character, who held the consulship with his brother Hypatius. Afterwards he was accused of treason (Id. xviii. 1 seq.).—5. The celebrated bishop of Cæsāræa, who joined the defenders of Arius, assisted at the council of Nicea, Nice, and appears to have taken a part against Athanasius. He died in the year 338, leaving several valuable works which have immortalized his name.—4. A bishop of Nicomedia, the relation and instructor of the emperor Julianus (Amm. Mar. xii. 9).

Eusebi, arum, m. an Indian nation, whose country lay on the east of Persia (Amm. Mar. xvi. 9).

Eusebius, i, m. a Thracian, the father of Arctas (Hom. Il. vi. 8).

Eutēpe, ex, f. one of the muses. She presided over music, consequently the invention of the flute and other wind instruments was ascribed to her, agreeably to the following line of Ausonius, Delicatas citharas Eutēpe flutibus erget (ccclxvii. 4). Diódorus Siculus derives her name from delighting scholars with the benefit of a good education (l. 252). See Muse.

Euthymēnis, is, m. a native of Ægina, who had been victorious at the Nemean games. Pylhios was his sister's grandson (Pin. Nem. v. 75 seq.).

Euthymidas, æ, m. a nobleman driven from Chalcis by the Roman party, because he was friendly to the Ætolians. He and Hierodorus of Cius endeavoured in vain to put that city under the power of the Ætolians in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 37).

Euthymon, ouis, m. a native of Cymæ, a town of Æolia, had been made prisoner by the Persians, but obtained his liberty on Persæpolis falling into the hands of Alexander the Great (Curt. v. 5).

Eutrēsis, is, f. a city of Beotia, which Zethus and Amphion surrounded with walls (Hom. Il. ii. 502).

Eutrōpius, i, m. a native of Egypt, was in early life a slave, and, to increase his value to his master, had been rendered a eunuch. At Rome, he rose to great eminence, and held the consulship for one year, at the end of which, if we may rely on the statement of Claudianus, he was banished. This poet writes two severe invectives against him, full of the bitterest sarcasm, and most contemptuous ridicule. Perhaps Claudianus deepened the shades of his character with the view of rendering the virtues of his patron, Stilicho, more conspicuous (Claud. xviii. xx). The sixth is merely an introduction to the xxth, of which it ought to be reckoned a part.—2. See Flavius Eutrōpius.

Eutychus, i, m. a youth who was drowned, on whose death Martial writes an epigram (vi. 63).—2. A man to whom Phædrus addresses the prologue to the third, and epilogue to the fourth, book of his fables; but an uncertainty prevails respecting the office or rank which he held in the court of the Roman emperor Tiberius. That he was in imperial favour admits of no doubt; he probably paid little attention either to Phædrus or his writings; although he is indebted solely to them for the transmission of his name to future ages.—3. A charioteer to whom the emperor, Caligula, gave a present of two millions of sesterces (Suet. Cal. 55).

Euxēnide, arum, m. a tribe, or clan in Ægina (Pin. Nem. vii. 103).

Euxinus, a, um. Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, lies between Europe and Asia, and its circumference is computed at about three thousand eight hundred miles. It communicates with the Mediterranean by Thracius Bosphorus, the Strait of Constantinople, Propontis, the Sea of Marmora, Hællēspōntus, the Dardanelles, and Mææ Ægæum, the Archipelago. The modern name has been referred by some to its local rocks, and by others to its tempestuousness, which renders it extremely dangerous to navigators. Besides, it has few good harbours, which gives additional horror to the furious agitation of its waves; because the sailor knows that places of safety are not numerous, and frequently of very difficult access. The ancients remarked the comparative sweetness of its waters, and modern naturalists have confirmed the truth of that observation. Ovidius mentions the freezing of this sea (Trist. ii. 196). Clarke has recorded, that a severe winter froze the northern coast to the breadth of a hundred miles, and to the depth of forty-five feet. Snow afterwards fell which raised the surface thirty feet. Hierodorus calls it the northern sea (iv. 37). As Eurais rōis, from the shores of the Black Sea (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 9. 2).

Euxinus, i, m. a companion of Enceas, whose mother that hero buried between Minus and Avernus. Adj. Euxinus, a, um. Euxinus stans (Aur. Vic. Orig. 16).

Exellus, i, m. one of the Lapithæ, who, at the nuptials of Pirithous, deprived Gryneus of his eyes, by the horns of a stag (Ov. Met. xii. 396 seq.).

Exicipinus, i, m. a young man of great elegance of form and manner, in the army of Alexander the great (Curt. vii. 9).

Exercitus, ūs, m. an army. The Romans, from their strong propensity to war, naturally adopted such measures as they judged most likely to accomplish the objects of their ambition. With this view, they did not at first intrust the battles of the state to the lowest of the people, rightly judging, that those who had the deepest interest in the country, were most to be depended upon in the field. On this account, for 349 years, pay in the Roman army was unknown. The senate decreed, in 405 B. C., pay to the foot-soldiers; the army then was besieging Veii. This regulation gave to many of the citizens very great offence, nor did they fail to predict many of the unhappy consequences which would result from the enactment. To the general opinion respecting that innovation in military affairs, may, perhaps, be referred the long period which elapsed between the Roman citizens first accepting pay, and the admission of mercenary troops into the army. On the authority of Livius, it may be stated, that the Cætibæri were the first whose services were rewarded with pay in the armies of Rome, and that this departure from ancient practice took place in 215 B. C. (xxiv. 49).

Soon after the consuls entered on office, they fixed a day on which all of the military age, that is, from seventeen to forty-six, should attend in the capitol, where they, seated in their curule chairs, held a levy. At these enrolments, the military tribunes assisted the consuls. Interruptions were often occasioned by the tribunes of the people, by whose interference great agitation was excited, and much mischief frequently resulted to the state. Unless when these turbulent magistrates interposed their authority, the consuls determined, by lot, the order in which the Tribes should be called, chose whomsoever they wished, and the individual named was obliged to answer, or give in his name, otherwise he was subjected to a high penalty. In some instances, recourse was had to compulsion, and the recusant was subjected to fine, imprisonment, personal punishment, or sold as a slave. The name of each man chosen was written in a book, on which he took the military oath, the form of which seems to have varied considerably. Unless in dangerous conjunctures, those who had completed their period of military service, or whose age exceeded fifty, were exempted from warfare. When the Romans considered the state in danger, all able to bear arms were required to join the standards, even those under seventeen, or above fifty, years of age. A consular army consisted, in the earlier ages, of two legions. See Légion. As the state advanced, the number of legions naturally increased, till, at last, it exceeded thirty.

Marching constituted an important part of the military discipline of the Romans. Whenever the commander had resolved to decamp, the signal was first given to strike the tents, and to pack up the baggage (ad vasa colligenda) conclamatum est. At the second signal, the baggage was laid on the animals kept for carrying it, and the third signal was for the commencement of the march. On ordinary occasions, the allies of the right wing, and the Extraordinarii, formed the van; these were followed by the legions; and the allies of the left wing, with part of the cavalry, closed the rear. In an enemy's country, or in the vicinity of an enemy, the troops were so arranged as most effectually to repel any charge which might be made on them. It was reckoned a disgrace to the commander to allow himself to be surprised, or the enemy to gain an advantage, in consequence of the troops being on a march. To prevent loss, or reproach on this account, scouts, who reconnoitred the ground, and watched the movements of the enemy, preceded the army, and communicated with the general. Besides, the scouts chose the ground for the camp, before the coming up of the forces. The character of the soldiers depended much on the steadiness and regularity of their conduct when marching. To the military step, the legions were drilled with the greatest care, and, from attention to this part of the commander's duty, resulted most important advantages.

An ordinary march (justum iter), twenty miles, was generally accomplished in about five hours, sometimes in a shorter period. This rate of travelling must be reckoned very quick, when it is considered that each soldier carried, besides his arms, which he considered part of himself, victuals for fifteen days, a saw, a basket, a mattock, an axe, a hook, a leathern thong, a pot, &c., and, at least, three or four stakes for the vallum, which, in all, did not weigh less than sixty pounds. At times, this load was greatly increased, by provisions for more than fifteen days, and by twelve, instead of four, stakes.

In 402 B. C., the whole Roman army, both horse and foot, for the first time received pay, three asses a-day, the centurions double, and the Equites q. v. triple. From Roman history it appears, that the pay of the army received no addition until C. Julius Cæsar doubled it. By his successor, Augustus, the foot-soldier was allowed ten asses a-day, and the pay of the centurions and Equites was raised in the same proportion. To this allowance, Domicianus added an annual grant of three pieces of gold. Each common soldier had four bushels of corn a-month, and received, likewise, his clothing from the state, for which, part of his pay was retained.

Military rewards; see Côrôna. Rewards of an inferior description were of various kinds, such as Hâsta pûra; a lance, with a pendant or streamer of different colours; a twisted golden chain (aurêa tôrques), or, consisting of rings (câtella); and a buckle or clasp for fastening either clothes or a belt. To these may be added trappings for horses. All these rewards of merit were given publicly, worn on all great occasions, and kept with the greatest care.

Military punishments among the Romans were of two kinds; the milder were, withholding part or whole of the pay; forfeiture of the spears; expulsion from the tent, and also from the camp; standing at meals, while the rest sat; being stationed, in a particular dress, before the prætorium; receiving barley instead of wheat; degradation from rank, which consisted of being joined to an inferior corps, or employed in less honourable service, &c.

Of the severer punishments, several are mentioned by ancient authors—beating with rods; scourging, and being sold for a slave; death by beating with sticks; overwhelming with stones and hurdles; beheading; and stabbing with the swords of the soldiers. Punishments of a more shocking kind were inflicted under the emperors, such as, exposure to wild beasts; burning alive, &c. For quitting their standards, desertion, or cowardice, the punishment of the soldiers was death. The army under Appius Claudius, in 471 B. C., fled, and he put all to death, who had left their arms, the standard-bearers, who had not brought away their standards, and the centurions who had quitted their posts. Of the rest, every tenth man, chosen by lot, was punished (Liv. ii. 59).

Exercitus lustrandus. In Mæcêdônia, the ceremony of purification was thus performed in 184 B. C.: the head of a dog, cut through the middle, and the forepart were placed on the right, and the hinder part with the entrails on the left side of the road. Between the parts of the victim thus divided, the forces marched along. In the van was carried the remarkable armour of all the kings of Mæcêdônia from its remotest origin, next followed the king himself, with his children, then the royal cohort and his body-guards, and the remaining multitude of the Macedonians closed the rear. On the purification being completed, the army went through their exercise, and then, being divided into two equal parts, began a mock battle (Liv. xl. 6).

Exômâtæ, arum, m. a Scythian nation, who appear to have been adjoining to the Törini and Sâtärechæ (Val. Flacc. vi. 144).

Extärechæ, is, m. a general of Alexander the Great, who, on the death of that conqueror, obtained the Päräpammëni, or, Päröpâmisi, and the country near mount Caucasus (Just. xiii. 4).

F

Fābāris, is, m. the Farfā, a river of the Sabines, which falls into Tiber, the Tevere (Virg. Æn. vii. 715). Ovidius calls it Fār-fārus, whence probably the modern name. Its banks seem to have been shaded with wood, amena Farfārus umbra (Ov. Met. xiv. 330).

Fābā Tērēntia, Fābīe Tērēntiæ, f. a vestal virgin, whom Clōdīus, a tribune, brought to trial for violation of her vow. From the character of her paramour, L. Sērgius Cātīlinus, it may naturally be supposed that the public would readily believe that the accusation was well founded, and give credit to Clōdīus for the rectitude of his motives. So far from this being the case, several of the most respectable citizens, either convinced of her innocence, or willing to thwart the tribune, exerted themselves in her defence with such success, that she not only obtained sentence of acquittal, but her prosecutor was obliged to flee from Rome. Cāto, Cātīllus, and Cicēro espoused her cause. She was the sister of Tērēntia, the wife of Cicēro, and to her Sallūstius alludes in the expression Cum sacerdotē Vestæ (Cat. 15).

Fābīanus, i. m. an old friend of Mārtiālis, whom he accuses of arrogance and unreasonableness in requiring the same punctilious attention, as if they had become newly acquainted.—2. Another friend, of whom the same poet gives an excellent character, and disapproves of his quitting the country, as the purity of his morals unfitted him for living at Rome (iv. 5).—3. A man who mocked people subject to hernia, and in the hot bath of Nēro (thermæ Nērōnīanæ) suddenly saw himself affected with the same disease, on which he ceased to laugh at others distressed by that complaint (Mart. xii. 85).

Fābīus, et, Fābīanus, a. um. Fābīa gens, the clan of the Fābīi, one of the most distinguished at Rome, who are said to have had their name from Fābīus, son of Hērclēs and Vindīna, daughter of Evānder, on which account Silius Itālicus calls Fābīus, Tirynthia prōles (ii. 3), and Ovidius, Hērclēa gēns (Fast. ii. 237). Plīnius derives their name from excelling in the culture of beans (a fābīs) (iii. 435). This clan alone undertook the war against the Veīēntes, in 478 B. C., to be carried on by themselves personally, and at their own private expense. Their whole number was only three hundred and six who could bear arms, and they with great bravery and success at first maintained the contest against the Veīēntes, but their intrepidity and rashness, at last, drove them into a snare, which the enemy had artfully laid for them, and from which not one of the whole corps escaped. A boy, whose tender years prevented his going to war, alone survived of all the male Fābīi; consequently from him the subsequent Fābīi were descended. This unfortunate battle took place on Crēmēra (Sil. Ital. ii. 6. Liv. ii. 50). Fābīæ sōrōres, daughters of M. Fābīus Ambūstus q. v.

Fābīus, i. m. one of the Pēlignī, hence called Pēlignus, in Curio's army, who treacherously attempted to kill Vārus; but was surrounded by the soldiers of that officer and slain (Cæs. B. C. ii. 85).—2. A wretch, whom Mārtiālis accuses of secretly procuring the death of his wives. The poet requested Vēnus to unite him with Christilla, who by the same practice had frequently become a widow, that the murderers might employ their artifices against each other to the mutual destruction of both (viii. 43).—3. A man to whom Bithynicus, a legacy-hunter, gave six thousand a-year in order to procure his favour; but he died poor, and left him nothing. Mārtiālis says, Bithynicus ought not to complain, since Fābīus had given more to none, and had bequeathed him six thousand a-year, i. e. this sum which Bithynicus presented him annually (ix. 10).

Fābīus Dōssēnnus, Fābī Dōssēnni, m. a comic poet whose writings are lost (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 173). Plīnius quotes a few of his lines (iii. 143).

Fābīus Fābūllus, Fābī Fābūlli, m. an officer of the fifth legion, who was appointed joint commander-in-chief with Cāssius Lōngus, by the troops which declared for Vitēllius (Tac. Hist. iii. 14).

Fābīus Pictor. See Q. Fābīus Pictor.

Fābīus Prīseus, Fābī Prīsci, m. a commander of the fourteenth legion, which he marched from Gēsōrlācum, Boulogne, to Atūtāta, Tongres, in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 79).

Fābīus Rōmānus, Fābī Rōmāni, m. one of the intimate friends of the poet Lūcānus, whom M. Annæus Mēlla provoked, by proceeding with too great eagerness to recover the whole property of his brother, and framed a charge against the father, which he proved to the satisfaction of Nēro, by means of forged letters (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17).

Fābīus Rūsticus, Fābī Rūstici, m. a historian, whose authority Tācitus questions, but commends highly for his eloquence. He was the friend of Sēneca (Tac. Ann. xiii. 20).

Fābīus Vālēs, Fābī Vālētis, m. a native of Anāgnīna, Anagni, a town of Lātīum, was descended from a family of equestrian rank. His character, from extreme profligacy, did injustice to the powers of his mind. Easy, gay, and spirited, he passed for a man of elegant accomplishments, and set no bounds to his lascivious indulgences. Amongst the performers of pantomime in the Jūvénālīa, he gained the approbation of the audience by displaying talents which raised the actor, but degraded the man. Under Virgīnius, he obtained the command of a legion, and murdered Fōntēus Cāpito. His fidelity to Vitēllius, in some measure, atoned for his perfidy to Gālba, and his conduct towards the end of life, formed a contrast to the general depravity of that period. His merits as a soldier were respectable, yet many of his actions can be neither approved nor vindicated. Paulinus made him prisoner at Stechādes insula, the Hieres; and he was put to death at Urbīnum, Urbino, in the year 69. The fate of Vālēs destroyed the hope of Vitēllius, and Vēspāsīanus succeeded to the imperial throne (Tac. Hist. i. 7 seq.).

C. Fābīus, C. Fābī, m. (Surnamed in con-

cal. Ambustus), consul in 357 B. C., who incautiously engaged with the Tarquinians, who defeated him, and put three hundred and seven Roman soldiers, their prisoners, to death. Two years after, he was elected an interrex (Liv. vii. 12-17).—2. Substituted master of the horse in room of Q. Aulius, in 315 B. C. (Liv. ix. 23).—3. One of Caesar's lieutenant-generals.

C. Fabius Dorsus, C. Fabii Dorsōnis, m. a Roman of great fortitude, who descended from the capitol when it was besieged by the Gauls in 389 B. C., passed through the midst of the enemy's posts, carrying the sacred utensils, and proceeded to the Quirinal hill, where he performed the solemn rites, which, at stated times, that clan observed there. Unintimidated by the threats of the Gauls, he returned by the same way in safety to the capitol, to the astonishment both of his countrymen and their besiegers (Liv. v. 46).

C. Fabius Hadrīanus, C. Fabii Hadrīani, m. a Roman praetor, who was burned alive in his own tent in Africa, in consequence of his cruelty and avarice (Liv. Ep. 84 seq.).

C. Fabius Licinus, C. Fabii Licini, m. held the office of consul with C. Claudius Cnētor in 275 B. C., and this is all of his history which is known. In the consular calendar, he is called C. Fabius Dorsus Licinus. In some copies of Eutropius, we find him called Lūscinus, which is a false reading (ii. 13).

C. Fabius Pictor, C. Fabii Pictoris, m. a Roman consul, who had Q. Ogulnius Gallus for his colleague, in 271 B. C. These two consuls made war on the Picēntes; whom their successors conquered (Eutrop. ii. 16). Plineus informs us, that silver was first coined at Rome this year, which, he states, was the four hundred and eighty-fifth of Rome, and five years before the first Punic war (v. 27).

Kæso Fabius, Kæsōnis Fabii, m. (Surnamed in con. cal. Vibullānus), a Roman who, in his quaestorship, arraigned the consul Sp. Cassius, for treason in 483 B. C. The patricians procured his election to the consulship in 484 B. C., in opposition to the commons, who detested the Fabii; because Q. Fabius, consul, in the former year, had sold the booty taken from the Volscians and Æquans, and paid the amount into the treasury. The same interest raised his brother Marcus to the consulship next year, and this appointment added to the reputation of the Fabian clan, in which the senate found skilful commanders, whose valour and knowledge of military tactics led the armies to victory and conquest. Livius has extolled both the personal bravery and military knowledge of Kæso, who defeated the Veīentes and Etrūsci, prevented the former from cutting off the army of his colleague T. Virginus in his third consulship, and made a vigorous, but unsuccessful, attempt to reconcile the patricians and plebeians. The Fabian family then offered to conduct the war against the Veīentes without expense to the state, and Kæso made to the senate the proposal, which was gratefully accepted. Next day, he marched at the head of this noble family against that formidable enemy, whom they would probably have conquered, had not rashness, the natural result of uncommon bravery, exposed them to an artful stratagem, from which not one individual of the whole number effected his escape (Liv. ii. 41-50).

Kæso Fabius Ambustus, Kæsōnis Fabii Ambūsti, m. elected a quaestor in 408 B. C.; at subsequent periods, he was three times a tribune of the soldiers with consular power (Liv. iv. 54-v. 24).

L. Fabius, L. Fabii, m. one of the three ambassadors sent by Scipio Africānus, to Carthage in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 25).—2. A centurion of the eighth legion in the Gallic war. He showed great valour at the siege of Gergōvia, Gergoie (Ces. B. G. vii. 47 seq.).

M. Fabius, M. Fabii, m. a brother of Kæso Fabius, obtained the consulship in 483 B. C., and again in 480 B. C. with Cn. Mānlius. In an engagement with the Veīentes, Mānlius was killed, for which reason, as well as for the death of his brother Quintus, M. Fabius declined the honour of a triumph, which the army had deserved, and the senate was proceeding to vote (Liv. ii. 42-47). In the consular calendar, he is surnamed Vibullānus.—2. Chief pontiff, prescribed the form in which the noble and ancient Romans devoted themselves for the safety of their country, and fellow citizens, on the approach of the Gauls in 389 B. C. (Liv. v. 41).—3. An interrex in 365 B. C. (Liv. vii. 17).—4. One of the three commissioners for conducting the colony, and distributing the lands at Cales, Calesi, in 333 B. C., where he had been detained a prisoner by the enemy, from whom he had effected his escape (Liv. viii. 16).—5. By some he is called Kæso, and by others, C. Claudius, maternal brother of the consul Q. Fabius, who, having been educated at Cærē, Cereteri, and familiar with the Etrurian language, undertook to explore the country about Ciminus saltus, v. Ciminia silva, and, disguised in the dress of a shepherd, penetrated as far as the Cāmertes Umbri, with whom he concluded a treaty favourable to the Romans, in 310 B. C. (Liv. ix. 36).

M. Fabius Ambustus, M. Fabii Ambūsti, m. a noble Roman, whose three sons the senate sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, then besieging Clusium, Chiusi, to persuade them to desist. The embassy terminated unsuccessfully from the violent temper of both parties, who immediately prepared for an appeal to the sword. Their personal intrepidity and love of arms, rendered the Fabii neglectful of the sacred office with which they were invested, and, grasping their weapons, they rushed to battle, where Q. Fabius slew a general of the Gauls with his own hand, and was recognised while stripping him of his armour. On this discovery, the Gauls sounded a retreat, and sent immediately to Rome, demanding that the Fabii should be given up to them. Instead of complying with this request, the commons, with whom they had great influence, elected them military tribunes next year, at which the Gauls, being exceedingly enraged, marched directly against Rome (Liv. v. 35).—2. Twice appointed a military tribune with consular authority. His elder daughter was married to Ser. Sulpicius, the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, a plebeian, with whom he concerted a plan for one of the consuls being elected from that order (Liv. vi. 22-26. Flor. i. 26).—3. A consul in 359 B. C., who, in consequence of his success against the Hērñeti, obtained an ovation. Elected a second time in 355 B. C., and was routed by the Fālsici and Tārquīniēnses in the first engagement; but, afterwards, defeated the enemy. He held the office of interrex twice, the consulship for a third time, and the dictatorship once, when Q. Sērvilius was given to him as master of the horse. This nomination did not proceed from any alarm of war, but to prevent the operation of the Licinian law, and to secure the consulship for two patricians. The measure failed in accomplishing the intended effect. He exerted his utmost efforts for the preservation of his son, who, when master of the horse, had fought in the absence, and against the order, of L. Pāpīrius, the dictator, on that account had incurred his resentment, and become liable to capital punishment (Liv. vii. 11—viii. 33).—4. Master of the horse to A. Cōrnēlius Arvīna, conducted himself with great bravery and judgment against the Samnites, who, crushed by the success of the dictator, and master of the horse, begged for peace. A. Cōrnēlius Arvīna had the honour of a triumph in 322 B. C., and Fābius marched to Apūlia, whence he carried off abundance of spoil. An uncertainty prevails respecting the command of this war; whether vested in the consuls, or in the officers just mentioned (Liv. viii. 38, 39).—5. Cōrnēlius Nēpos, as quoted by Sōlinus, mentions an M. Fābius Ambūstus consul with T. Quinctius Cāpitōlinus in the year of Rome 385, which must be a mistake, since military tribunes were appointed not only that year, but for several years both before, and after it. M. Fābius Būtēo, M. Fābii Būtēōnis, m. named dictator by C. Tērēntius Vārro, consul, for the purpose of choosing members into the senate. Prudence, moderation, and judgment marked his whole conduct in that office, and, on electing one hundred and seventy-seven members into the supreme council of the state, he resigned the dictatorship. Fābius had no master of the horse (Liv. xxiii. 22, 23).—2. Obtained first the curule edileship, and afterwards the praetorship, when Sārdīniā fell to his lot, in 203 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 26—40). He held the office of consul with L. Caeilius Mētēllus in 249 B. C., and, two years after, he was re-elected to the same office with C. Atilius Bālbus. He gained a complete victory over the Carthaginians at Āgūmūrus, Zīmbra. His fleet, laden with Carthaginian spoils, was wrecked in a storm, and the greater part of the splendid treasure was lost (Flor. ii. 2).

M. Fābius Dōrso, M. Fābii Dōrsōnis, m. was elected consul in 344 B. C. From an apprehension that the whole Latin nation would join the Auruncians, L. Fōrius was created dictator, and this nomination superseded the offices of the consuls (Liv. vii. 28).

M. Fābius Quīntiliānus, M. Fābii Quīntiliāni, m. the father, or rather the grandfather, of the Rhetorician of the same name, who composed a hundred and forty-five declamations.—2. Was born at Cālāgūrris, Calahorra, a town of Hispāniā, Spain, whence, on the death of Nēro, he was brought to Rome by Gālba, and studied under Pālemon, the grammarian. On his first appearance at the bar, his eloquence commanded general approbation. He afterwards taught rhetoric for twenty years; among his scholars were the grandsons of the emperor Domitian's sister, and Pliny, the younger. Some state, that Jūvēnālīs studied under him; this, perhaps, rests on no better authority than the opinion of the Satirist, who speaks with great respect of this most excellent and learned man, whose name he frequently introduces, as denoting all that is praiseworthy in the human character (Sat. vi. 75). The poet considers him as rich (Sat. vii. 186), and, in comparison of himself, perhaps Quīntiliānus might be so denominated; for we have the authority of his scholar, Plinius, for stating that his fortune was moderate. This fact seems established, that although his wealth bore no proportion to the immense possessions of many Romans at that period, yet he did not, like many learned men, suffer under the united pressure of poverty and contempt. He composed, after his retirement from the drudgery of teaching, his work de Institutione Oratoriā in twelve books, the most perfect and accurate system of oratory extant. He describes the education calculated to form a perfect orator, from infancy to the consummation of rhetorical fame, either at the bar, or in the senate. Throughout the whole of that work, he displays an elegant taste, intermixed with much judicious criticism. To the great resources of his own acute and powerful understanding, he added the deep comprehension of Aristōtēles and the delightful graces of Cicēro, combining, in that treatise, the collected efforts of ancient genius, on the captivating subject of eloquence. We have little certain information respecting the private life of this amiable man, and distinguished author. That he held the office of consul, and that he owed his wealth to his scholar, Pliny the younger, must be considered statements rashly advanced on insufficient authority. Pliny's letter gives indubitable evidence of the strong attachment and high opinion which he entertained of his teacher, but a letter of respect must not be confounded with a donation equal to a moderate fortune. The dialogue on the causes of the corruption of eloquence, is generally considered as the composition of Tācitus, although some ascribe it to the orator. He had a son of the same name, whom he frequently mentions with great praise. Neither the year of his birth nor death is accurately known. To him Mārtiālīs writes a complimentary epigram (ii. 90).

M. Fābius Vibulānus, M. Fābii Vibulāni, m. elected consul in 442 B. C., with Pōstūmus Ebūstus Elva, and they exerted themselves to erase entirely from the minds of men the infamy of the sentence of the people, with respect to the ground disputed by the Ardēātes and Aricini. In the war against the Fidēnātes and Vēēntes, Māmēreus Āmilius, dictator, appointed Fābius a lieutenant-general, and, at a future period, he was nominated a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority (Liv. iv. 11—25).

Nūmērius Fābius Ambūstus, Nūmērii Fābii Ambūsti, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 405 B. C. From Livius, it appears that he had previously discharged the same office (iv. 53).

Nūmērius Fābius Būtēo, Nūmērii Fābii Būtēōnis, m. elected praetor in 175 B. C., and obtained the north of Spain for his province, but died on his way to that country, at Mässilia, Massilles (Liv. xli. 28).

Numerius Fabius Vibulanus, Numerii Fabii Vibulani, m. elected consul in 421 B. C., when the war against the Æquans fell to his lot. Their cowardice afforded him no opportunity of displaying his bravery, for which reason the senate refused him a triumph, but allowed him an ovation, because he had brought the war to a termination, and thus effaced the ignominy of the defeat under C. Sémpronius, consul of the former year. He afterwards obtained twice the office of tribune of the soldiers with consular power (Liv. iv. 43-47).

Paulus Fabius, Paullii Fabii, m. (surnamed Persicus), obtained the consulship with L. Vitellius in the year 34 (Tac. Ann. vi. 28).

Q. Fabius, Q. Fabii, m. elected consul in 485 B. C., and re-elected three years after. He fell by the hand of a Tuscan in battle against the Veientians (Liv. ii. 41-46). In the consular calendar he is surnamed Vibulanus.—2. Elected consul in 467 B. C. He was the only one of the Fabian clan who remained alive after the battle at Créméra. He rebelled against the Æquans whom his arrival intimidated, and they sued for peace. On his re-election to the consulship, that province was assigned him by particular appointment (extra ordinem), and he took severe revenge for the ravages which they had committed on the Roman territories, stripping them of their plunder, desolating their country, and compelling them to take shelter in their towns. He returned to Rome with great renown, and an immense quantity of spoil. When prefect of the city, he made a resolute and successful resistance against C. Tereñtillus Arsa, a tribune of the people, who attempted to procure a law which would diminish the consular authority. In his third consulship, he conquered the Volsi, and carried assistance to the Tusculani, by which they compelled the Æqui to submission. He was appointed one of the decemviri from whose decision no appeal should lie, in 451 B. C., and who should arrange and write out the laws brought by the commissioners from Greece. Livius reckons him a leading man among the decemviri, and adds, that he was considered rather inconstant in good, than strenuous in bad, pursuits; that the office of decemvir, by the example of his colleagues, entirely changed his character, and rendered him more like Appius than himself. This noble Roman, who had previously obtained great distinction, both in his civil and military conduct, tarnished his reputation by his deviation from rectitude, and spent the remainder of his life in banishment (Liv. iii. 1-58). In the consular calendar he is surnamed Vibulanus.—3. Elected consul in 322 B. C., with L. Fulvius Cævus. They were superseded by the nomination of a dictator (Liv. viii. 33).—4. Son of the sister-in-law of T. Quinctius Flamininus (Liv. xxxii. 36).—5. A questor under L. Mæmilius, consul, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 29).

Q. Fabius Ambustus, Q. Fabii Ambusti, m. created consul in 411 B. C. During that year, a pestilence broke out, which was followed by a famine from the neglect of agriculture (Liv. iv. 52).—2. One of the three sons of M. Fabius Ambustus, who were sent, by the senate, ambassadors to the Gauls then besieging Clusium, Chiusi, to induce them to discontinue their hostilities, but, the embassy having failed, the Clusini took up arms, in which they were joined by the Fabii. Q. Fabius slew a general of the Gauls and was recognised whilst he was stripping him of his armour. In place of the Romans giving him and his two brothers up to the Gauls, as was demanded, he and they next year were elected tribunes of the soldiers with consular authority, at which the Gauls, as might be expected, were greatly provoked, marched immediately to Rome, and burned it to the ground. After that ferocious army had been expelled from the Roman territory, and Rome rebuilt, as soon as he went out of office, C. Mæcius, a tribune of the people, instituted a prosecution against him, because, being sent an ambassador to the Gauls, he had fought against them, contrary to the law of nations. From this trial he was delivered by a death so seasonable, that it was generally considered to be voluntary (Liv. v. 35 seq.).—3. Master of the horse to P. Valerius Publicola in 343 B. C. (Liv. vii. 28).—4. Nominated dictator in consequence of the disgrace of the consuls at the Caudine forks in 321 B. C., on purpose to preside at the elections. From some irregularity in his appointment, he abdicated the office, and another was substituted in his place (Liv. ix. 7).

Q. Fabius Buteo, Q. Fabii Buteonis, m. elected prætor in 198 B. C., and obtained the south of Spain for his province (Liv. xxxiii. 24 seq.).—2. Elected prætor in 183 B. C., and the lots assigned him Gallia, France, for his province. He was continued next year in the command of that country, and afterwards appointed a triumvir for planting a Latin colony among the Pisani. A dispute having arisen between the Pisani and Roman colonists, in a subsequent year, respecting certain lands claimed by both, Fabius and other four were appointed to fix the boundaries and terminate the dispute (Liv. xl. 18 seq.).

Q. Fabius Gurgæ, Q. Fabii Gurgæti, m. son of Q. Fabius Mæximus, in early life had nearly ruined his fortune by extravagance, which procured him the surname of Gurgæ. The virtues of his maturer years compensated for the follies of his youth, and his name appears among the celebrated Romans of that age. He prosecuted some matrons, before the people, for the crime of adultery, and, with the fines which they were obliged to pay, built a temple to Venus near the circus in 297 B. C. The senate would have taken from him the command of the army, in consequence of an unsuccessful battle with the Samnites, when he was consul in 294 B. C., had not his father deprecated the disgrace, and promised to serve as a lieutenant-general under his son. In a subsequent battle, Gurgæ, by his father's assistance, defeated the Samnites, and this victory procured him the honour of a triumph, in which C. Pöntius, the commander of the enemy, adorned the procession; and was afterwards beheaded (Liv. x. 31—Ep. 11). Juvénalis mentions Gurgæ amongst other Romans of strict morals (Sat. vi. 266).

was city quaestor with L. Aurélius in 193 B. C., when an order passed for making the last payment to private persons for the money contributed to the support of the war; and these quaestors demanded it from the augurs and pontiffs, because they had not paid it during the continuance of hostilities. The priests resisted this order, and appealed to the people, but in vain; for they were obliged to discharge their whole arrears. On being elected praetor in 192 B. C., he obtained the fleet, with which he sailed to Cræta, Candia, and Mārē Egæum, the Archipelago. At Pătra he destroyed, or burned, fifty decked ships, and performed other services, for which he had the honour of a triumph; although opposed by the tribunes of the people. After several inefficient canvasses for the consulship, he succeeded in 185 B. C., and, at a future period, was appointed a pontiff in room of L. Valérius Flăcus cut off by a pestilence (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).

Q. Făbius Măximus, Q. Făbiū Măximi, m. (surnamed Rŭlliănus), son of M. Făbius Ambŭstus, who three times held the office of consul and once that of dictator, was appointed curule edile in 331 B. C., and, according to some authors, a second time thirty years after. In the former edileship, a servant maid discovered to him the cause of the public calamity, by which the principal persons in the state had been cut off. See Cornălia. L. Păpirius Cŭrsor, having been nominated dictator, appointed Q. Făbius Măximus Rŭlliănus master of the horse. Like the dictator, he bore a high character for military talents, and both obtained notoriety by the quarrel which arose betwixt them, and was carried almost to the very extremity of violence. After they had entered the territory of the Sămnites, against whom they were to carry on war, some informality about the omens obliged the dictator to return to Rome to take them anew, and he prohibited the master of the horse both from changing his position, and from engaging the enemy, in his absence. The latter, understanding that the Sămnites might be attacked with advantage, disregarded the command of his superior officer, fought the enemy, and gained a great victory. Either to fulfil a vow to some god, or to exclude the dictator from any share in that victory, he collected the arms of the slain, calculated at twenty thousand, and burned them. Instead of announcing his success to Păpirius, he sent notice directly to the senate, which enraged the dictator, both from neglect, and disregard of his authority, and he returned to the army, resolved to revenge that flagrant act of disobedience. Făbius, dreading his resentment, solicited the protection of the soldiers, who rescued him after the dictator had ordered him to be stripped, and the rods and axes to be in readiness. The solicitations of the officers in his behalf, instead of soothing, exasperated the rage of the dictator, on which account, Făbius fled to Rome, convened the senate, and proceeded to lay his case before them. Scarcely had he begun his speech, when the dictator, boiling with rage, entered that assembly, and insisted on seizing him. To no purpose both his father and the senate befriended Făbius, on which he brought his cause before the people. On his side were the dignity of the senate, the favour of the people, the countenance of the

tribunes, and the regard of the absent army; against him were the inviolable authority of the Roman government, the discipline of the army, the edict of the dictator, always observed as the mandate of a deity, and the severity of Mănlius, who preferred public utility to parental affection. The latter confounded the tribunes who wished to befriend the master of the horse, and, whilst they were perplexed, and not less solicitous for their own than for his situation, the people relieved them from anxiety, by having recourse to supplication and intreaty, begging, that for their sakes, the dictator would remit the punishment. Both father and son giving up the contest, fell at the feet of the dictator, deprecating his wrath, on which he pardoned the offender, but prohibited him from acting in any case as a magistrate. Făbius was created consul in 322 B. C. His next appointment was that of interrex, and some time after he had the honour of obtaining the dictatorship, when M. Aulius Cerrētănus was named master of the horse. From L. Āmilius, the dictator, he received the army besieging Săticŭla of which he got possession by capitulation. In his second consulship, he gained a great victory over the Etrŭsci, and another over the people who lived near the foot of Ciminŭs mŭns, whom he attacked when asleep, killing and making prisoners sixty thousand men, besides taking their camp the same day. This victory was followed by the principal cities in Etruria, begging peace and an alliance with the Romans, to which the senate granted a truce for thirty years. A deputation from the senate requested Făbius to appoint L. Păpirius Cŭrsor, dictator, in consequence of his colleague having fought a doubtful battle with the Sămnites, and the manner in which he complied with this request showed that he had not, without great difficulty, overcome his resentment. Other victories, obtained in Etruria, Tuscany, procured him a triumph, and his successes, in point of importance, surpassed those of the dictator. A continuation in the consulship necessarily resulted from his valour in arms, and Sămnium fell to his lot, where the same good fortune attended every enterprise. After the expiration of the consulship, the senate continued him in command, and his success justified the measure. In 305 B. C., P. Dēcus and he were elected censors. To prevent the elections from remaining with the lowest of the people, according to the arrangement of Apŭlius Claudius, the corrupter of the senate, he purged the tribes of the rabble of the fŭrum, and divided them into four tribes, which he called city tribes. This regulation procured him the surname of Măximus, an appellation which his numerous victories had not obtained. The annual review of the knights, on the Ides of July, is said to have been an institution of his. Against his inclination, he was appointed consul, in 289 B. C., and marched with his colleague, P. Dēcus Mŭs, who had been nominated at his request, against the Sămnites, over whom he obtained a victory by means of a stratagem. After refusing the consulship, he was appointed for the fifth time with the same P. Dēcus Mŭs, and he wished to obtain Etruria, Tuscany, for his province, without having recourse to the lots, to which the plebeians objected, and Dēcius joined them. On referring the matter to the people, an unanimous vote procured him the object of his wish. Having restored the discipline of the army, and finding the war more difficult than he had apprehended, he applied to the senate to have another general appointed along with him; to this request they agreed, and allowed him to select the person whom he judged best qualified. Exercising sound discretion, he chose his own colleague, P. Dēcius Mūs, a measure which gave universal satisfaction. After they had collected a powerful army, they brought on a general engagement, which appearing doubtful, Dēcius devoted himself and the enemy to the Dii Mīnes. This voluntary death inspired the Romans to almost more than human bravery, and Fābius obtained a complete victory in the territory of the Sēntinātes, for which he had the honour of a triumph. In fulfilment of a vow to Jāpter Victor, he burned the spoils, and to that god he likewise vowed a temple during the engagement. Hostilities having recommenced in Etrūria, he killed of the Pērūsinī upwards of four thousand, and allowed seventeen hundred prisoners to be ransomed at three hundred and ten asses each. All the rest of the spoil he gave to the soldiers (Liv. viii. 18. seq.).—2. An illustrious Roman, first mentioned by Livius when sent on an embassy to Carthage with L. Āmilius, Q. Bābius, C. Licinius, and M. Livius. The Carthaginians had besieged Sāgūntum, Murciedro, and the Romans sent these ambassadors to inquire whether that violation of the treaty proceeded from public or private design. On a violent harangue being made by a senator of Carthage, Fābius, who was the principal member of the deputation, folded a part of his Tōga, and said, "here we bring you peace or war, take which you choose." The Carthaginians with equal warmth cried out, he may give which he chooses. Fābius then threw out the fold, and said he gave war, when they replied, "we take it, and shall carry it on with the same spirit which we have shown in its acceptance." Agreeably to their instructions, these ambassadors went over to Spēin and solicited the states of that country, if they did not join the Romans, at least to withdraw from Hānnibal. The Bārgūnī only acceded to their request, and in Gāllia they had no better success, the Massiliāns only agreed to their proposal. After the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia, Fābius was appointed prodicator, and he named M. Minūcius Rūfus, master of the horse. Veneration for the gods persuaded Fābius that the dreadful disaster resulted not more from the ignorance and rashness of C. Flāminius, than from neglect of certain religious observances, and, therefore, at his request, the Sibylline books were consulted, from which it was reported that certain ceremonies must be performed, on which he left the charge to M. Āmilius, prātor, and put himself at the head of the troops. He pitched his camp within sight of Hānnibal, with whom he declined an engagement, which disconcerted that general, who found himself unable to devise any expedient by which Fābius could be prevailed on to depart from his resolution. To induce a belief that he had a secret agreement with Fābius, Hānnibal saved his farm whilst he desolated all around it. Neither this insidious conduct, nor the discontent of his own troops, almost on the verge of mutiny, because he refused to lead them against the Carthaginian army, had the least effect in making him deviate from the plan on which he had resolved to act. In the first Punic war, the Roman and Carthaginian generals had agreed, that, in the interchange of prisoners, whoever might receive the greater number, should pay two pounds and a half weight of silver for each man of the over number. Without consulting the senate, the dictator acted on this regulation, and having received two hundred and forty-seven prisoners from the Carthaginians more than he had given them, their ransom had frequently come before that assembly, and been delayed, because he had not previously obtained their sanction, he sold the farm which Hānnibal had spared, and paid the stipulated sum, which both cleared the public faith, and added to his own honour. On account of some religious ceremonies, his presence was required in Rome, and he both ordered and entreated the master of the horse not to engage the enemy during his absence. Availing himself of the eagerness of the troops for battle, and vain of his military skill, the master of the horse disobeyed his orders, and fought not unsuccessfully with the Carthaginians. The enemies of the dictator magnified it into a victory, and the people made him equal in command with Fābius, a measure equally absurd and unprecedented. On returning to the army, the dictator divided the forces between him and the master of the horse, and the latter soon risked an engagement with Hānnibal, who would have either killed or made the whole prisoners, had not Fābius come seasonably to his relief. The master of the horse saw and confessed his error, and placed himself again under Fābius, whom, from gratitude, he called his father. The six months having expired, he abdicated the dictatorship, earnestly recommending L. Āmilius Paullus to adopt the plan which he had formed, and to guard against the rashness of his colleague, C. Tērēntius Varrō. The ignorance and inconsideration of the latter brought on the battle of Cānna, after which Fābius made some judicious proposals for quelling the agitation at Rome, and the senate sanctioned them by their approval. After he had been created Pōntifex, his countrymen bestowed on him again the consulship, when he took some towns from the enemy, watched the movements of Hānnibal, and desolated the lands of the Cāmpāni, who had joined the Carthaginians. At the elections, T. Otācilius and M. Āmilius Rēgillus, were chosen consuls. Fābius made a powerful speech against the appointment of both, although Otācilius had married his sister's daughter. To him he objected on the ground of incompetency, because, when he commanded the fleet, he had effected none of the purposes for which it had been given him. Āmilius, being the Flāmen of Quirīnus, would remain at home and neglect the war. He then ordered back the Cēntūrīa Athēnīcēnsis jūniōrum, on whom the lot had fallen to give the first vote, on purpose to vote again, when he was himself named consul for the fourth time, with M. Claudius Mārcellus for the third time. As soon as he received information that

Hannibal had departed from Arpi, where he had spent the winter, he hastened back to the army, travelling night and day, concerted measures for besieging Cäsiliunum which he took by assault. In the same manner he obtained possession of Compulteria, Telésia, Teles, Compsa, Conza, Mela, Melissa, Fulfule, Monte Fusco, and Orbitanium, in the district of Samolium, Blande, Maratea, in Lucania, and Ecce, Troja, in Apulia. In these towns twenty-five thousand of the enemy were either taken or killed, and three hundred and twenty deserters were, on being sent to Rome, beaten with rods in the Comitium and thrown over the Tarpeian rock. At Suessula he came on horseback to the camp as lieutenant-general under his son, who went out to meet him, and eleven of the lictors, from respect to his age and character, allowed him to pass, on which the consul said to the twelfth, "Take care." The lictor then called out "Alight," and having dismounted, he said, "My son, I wished to try whether you sufficiently knew that you were consul." Of his military talents and accurate knowledge of Hannibal's plans, he gave a remarkable instance in the senate, when that general, finding it impossible to raise the siege of Capua, threatened Rome. Fabius declared that Hannibal had no expectation of taking the city, since he had not dared to march against it after the battle of Cannae; that his sole object in advancing towards the capital was to raise the siege of Capua, which ought not to be discontinued, and that the troops then in Rome were sufficient for its defence. The senate increased the armed force within the walls, pushed on the siege of Capua, and Hannibal's feint with respect to Rome proved the accuracy of Fabius. The Carthaginian general did indeed appear in some force near the city, but not a single movement indicated, that he had any serious intention of storming the walls. In the fifth consulship of Fabius, the senate assigned to him the war at Tarentum, Taranto, where he displayed his usual activity, prudence, and military skill. P. Sempronius Tuditanus appointed him Prince of the senate, a nomination opposed by his colleague, M. Cœnilius Cethegus, who contended that the practice transmitted from their ancestors ought to be observed, which was to make the oldest censor living, Prince of the senate. According to precedent, this honour should have been conferred on T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius maintained that the lot left him at full liberty to choose whom he would, and that he had chosen the consul, because that, even in the opinion of Hannibal, he was the first of the Romans. To this election, after a long dispute, the other censor yielded his assent, and Fabius obtained that honourable appointment. By the capture of Caulonia, Cistra Vetere, Manduria, Manduria, and Tarentum, Taranto, he obtained a prodigious quantity of booty, besides taking a great number of prisoners. It appears surprising that he opposed P. Cœnilius Scipio in his proposal to conquer Hannibal in Africa. Against the whole plan he delivered a long and forcible speech, which Livius has recorded (xxviii. 40-44). He attacked the character of Cœnilius with great violence, in consequence of the Lœcœnes complaining to the senate of the cruelty, lewdness, and injustice of the Roman army, both officers and men, since it was the duty of Cœnilius, as their commander, to have prevented the commission of these crimes. His motion failed with respect to Cœnilius, but the senate, agreeably to his proposal, ordered restitution to be made to that people, and the commissioners, appointed to examine into the facts, reported to the senate that the conduct of Cœnilius, instead of meriting censure, claimed high approbation. He died in extreme old age, in 205 B. C., after he had been, according to some, augur for sixty-two years. In honourable offices, says Livius, he surpassed his father, and equalled his grandfather, and his uncommon merit rendered him worthy of the great surname, even if he had been the first who bore it (Liv. xxi. 18.-xxx. 26). His caution proceeded not from indolence or timidity, but from a conviction of its utility, and success justified its adoption. He restored the state, says Ennius, by judicious delay. Victrices mœra Fabii, i. e. the slow and cautious measures of Fabius, by which he overcame Hannibal (Prop. iii. 3. 9). To him Claudianus alludes in his poems, and Sallustius, Jug. 4.-3. Son of the former, who, after holding the offices of curule edile and prætor, was elected consul, in 215 B. C. at the time he was absent in his province, Apulia. Livius relates an anecdote of this noble Roman which shows the scrupulous attention paid to the honours of office. See former article. Dæsius Albinus, of Arpi, came privately by night to Fabius, offering to betray his native city to the Romans for an adequate reward. Some thought that Albinus ought to be put to death as a traitor; but the father of the consul proposed a more lenient plan which was adopted. See Dæsius Albinus. It does not appear from the Roman historian, that this man equalled the merits of his father, in whose room a son of the same name was chosen augur, and died in 193 B. C., before he had obtained any public office (Liv. xxiv. 9 seq.). —4. Elected prætor in 183 B. C., when the jurisdiction of the city fell to his lot (Liv. xl. 18). —5. Son of L. Æmilius Paulus Mæcedonicus, consul, and brother of Scipio Africanus Numantinus, sent by his father with some others to announce the victory over Perseus, king of Mæcedonia, in 170 B. C. Nothing further of his history is mentioned by Livius, except his being placed at the head of plundering parties, a practice in the Roman army more frequent than honourable (Liv. xlv. 35 seq.). —6. Surnamed Servilius, was the brother of Cn. and Q. Servilius Cæpio, but adopted into the Fabian clan. In his proconsulship, he took a great number of towns in Lusitania, Portugal, and recovered the greatest part of the country, in 144 B. C. By him the war was brought to a successful termination with Viriathus, with whom he concluded a treaty on terms of equality (Liv. Ep. 53, 54). Of his high sense of moral purity, Valerius Maximus has given a remarkable proof (vi. 1). —7. Grandson of L. Æmilius Paulus, who fought successfully against the Allobroges and Bituitus, king of the Arverni, during his consulship, in 123 B. C. For this victory he was surnamed Allobrogius (Liv. Ep. 61). Valerius Maximus says, that none was more infamous in youth, and none more honourable in old age (vi. 9). His name occurs often in the writings of Cicero. Plinius makes him the brother of the younger Scipio Africanus, which appears to be a mistake, and is in opposition to Velleius Paterculus and the Fasti (Plin. v. 68).—8. Obtained the consulship during 47 B. C., probably from the resignation of C. Julius Caesar, or from its being his wish that Maximus should be raised to that honour. On his entering the theatre, the licitor proclaimed that the people should observe that the consul was coming; the whole called out that he was no consul, from his only holding that office for three months (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 80).—9. Was consul with Julius Antonius, in 12 B. C., and, in the consular calendar, is called Q. Fabius Maximus Africanus. He was the confidential friend of Augustus, whom he secretly accompanied on a visit to Agrippa, in the island of Planasia, Pianosa. Livy obtained information of this interview through Mæcla, the wife of Fabius, to whom he had communicated it, and, soon after, he died, perhaps by his own hand (Tac. Ann. i. 5).

Q. Fabius Pictor, Q. Fabii Pictoris, m. was sent by the Roman senate, in 218 B. C., to consult the oracle at Delphi, by what means or worship they could appease the gods offended by Vestals violating their vow and other immoralities, from which he brought back an answer in verse, written in the Greek language, of which Livius has recorded part (xxii. 57 seq.). Some suppose him the same with the historian q. v.—2. Flamen Quirinalis, who, after he had been elected prætor, was prevented by the Pontifex Maximus from quitting the city on account of his office. He died in 168 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 47 seq.).—3. A Roman, of senatorian dignity, who flourished during the second Punic war. He wrote Annals in Latin, and Livius frequently quotes from his pages. Dionysius Halicarnassensis censures him for inaccuracy with respect to time, and the remarks of Polybius tend to lessen his fidelity as a historian. Some fragments of his writings remain. Eutropius calls him Fabius Historicus (iii. 5).

Q. Fabius Sanga, Q. Fabii Sangæ, m. a Roman, of senatorian dignity, who patronised the state of the Allôbruges, and, on that account, their deputies at Rome discovered to him the conspiracy of Cætilina, and he immediately communicated the information to M. Tullius Cicero, the consul (Sal. Cat. 41).

Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Fabii Vibulani, m. elected consul, with C. Sémpronius Atratinus, in 423 B. C. Except his appointment, there is scarcely any reference to him during his consulship, yet he twice afterwards obtained the office of a military tribune, with consular authority, besides once that of interrex (Liv. iv. 57—51).

Fabrâterna, a. f. Falcaterra, a town of the Volsci, on Liris, the Gariigliano (Sil. Ital. viii. 396). Ich. Fabrâterni, orum, m. admitted into the alliance of Rome, in 329 B. C. (Liv. viii. 19). Plinius mentions Fabrâterni vêtères, and Fabrâterni novi, from which it appears certain, either that there were two towns of this name, or that colonies had been planted there at two different times, and that they had remained distinct (i. 329).

Fabrici, orum, m. the name of a plebeian clan at Rome. Adj. Fabricius, a, um. Fâ- bricia gens, the tribe or clan of the Fabricii. Fabricius pons, a bridge, which formed a communication between Rome and an island in Tiber, the Tevere, now called Bartolomeo, built by some one of the Fabricii.

A. Fabricius Veiento, A. Fabricii Veientonis, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, who escaped the cruelty, and obtained the favour, of Domitianus, by his adulation, and acting the part of a diligent informer. He appears to have been a man of great caution and prudence, with which he must have conjoined a certain degree of acuteness, otherwise, in so public a character, he could scarcely have secured his personal safety in these bloody and perilous times. Juvénalis mentions him in several of his satires (iii. 185 &c.). In certain writings, which he called Last Wills of persons deceased, he inserted many keen sarcastic remarks on senators and priests, for which Tâllus Gémînus brought him to trial, and added, that he disposed of the honours of the state by setting them to sale, for which the emperor Nêro brought the matter before his own tribunal, and Fabricius was banished from Italy. His books were ordered to be burnt, but this sentence caused them to be read with great eagerness, for the restriction was no sooner removed than they sunk into oblivion (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50).

C. Fabricius Luscînus, C. Fabricii Luscini, m. in his censorship expelled from the senate P. Cœnêllus Rûfinus, who had been twice consul, and as often dictator, on account of his luxury, in 277 B. C. (Val. Max. ii. 9). To him Juvénalis alludes (Sat. ix. 142).—2. An eminent Roman, who distinguished himself by his military knowledge, contempt of riches, and unsullied integrity. He rejected, most indignantly, the gold with which Pÿrrhus, king of Epîrus, attempted to bribe him to his interest, and, at an after period, sent back to that monarch his physician, who had proposed to Fabricius to take off his master by poison, and made him acquainted with the design formed by that domestic against his life. From gratitude to Fabricius, Pÿrrhus returned all the Roman prisoners without ransom. To rival that act of generosity, the Romans set at liberty an equal number of Târentini and Sânnites. On Pÿrrhus quitting Italy, Fabricius gained a decisive victory over the united forces of the Brûtti, Lûcâni, and Sânnites, for which he had the honour of a triumph (Liv. Ep. 13, 14). To him Claudîanus refers (iii. 201).—3. Enjoyed the office of city prætor, in 197 B. C. Under L. Cœnêllus Scipio, consul, he was afterwards a lieutenant-general (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—4. A native of Alêtrium, and twin brother of L. Fabricius, who was the most intimate friend of Oppianus (Cic. pro. Cluen. 16, 17).

L. Fabricius, L. Fabricii, m. twin brother of C. Fabricius Luscînus q. v.

Q. Fabricius, Q. Fabricii, m. a tribune of the people, who introduced a bill for revoking the sentence of banishment against Cicero, and for recalling him to his native country (Cic. Sext. 35).

Fâbulla, a, f. an adulteress (Juv. Sat. ii. 68).—2. A young woman of wealth and beauty, whom Martiâlis charges with vanity, and overrating her merits (i. 65). That poet mentions a woman of the same name, who deserted her husband; but whether the same or a different person it is not material to inquire (iv. 9). Perhaps Martialis did not in every instance describe a real character, when he uses the word Fabūla, which occurs frequently in his writings.

Fabūllus, i. m. a man of excellent moral character, whose goodness of heart induced him to believe all equally virtuous as himself, consequently exposed him to frequent imposition (Mart. xii. 51).—2. An intimate friend of Catullus, to whom he addresses one of his poems (xiii).

Facēlina, æ. f. a place in the north of Sicily, where Diāna had a temple. Servius states, that Orēstes and Pylādes carried off the image of Diāna from Taurica Chersōnēsus, the Crimea, in a bundle of wood (fascē lignorum). Hence she was called Facēlis. This is also the opinion of Hyginus (261). It would be difficult to give a reason why the e in the primitive is suppressed in the derivative, which looks towards a different etymology. The absurdity of the omission is sufficiently proved by Lūcilius, who writes not Facēlis, but Fascēlis, itis, agreeably to analogy (iii. 13). Adj. Facēlinus, a. um. Facēlina Diāna; here the good editions of Lūcilius read Fascēlitis (iii. 13). Facēlina sodes (Sil. Ital. xiv. 260).

Fādus, i. m. a Rutulian, of low birth, who fell by the hand of Eurýalus (Virg. Æn. ix. 544).—2. An Italian, killed by Hannibal, at Trasimēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 565).

Fæsidus, i. m. a pleader, whom the people applauded at the bar, in expectation of being rewarded with a large dole, hence Juvēnalis says, it was the dole-basket which sounded his praises when declaiming (Sat. xiii. 32).

Fæsūla, æ. et. Fæsūlae, arum, f. Fiezola, a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, east of Flōrēntia, Florence, towards the foot of the Apennines. In modern times it is rather a village than a town. Here Catullina executed part of his nefarious design, when he raised the standard of rebellion against the laws of his country, and the lives of his fellow-citizens (Sil. Ital. viii. 477. Sal. Cat. 24, 27). Inh. Fæsūlā-i, orum (Sing. Fæsūlānus, i.), m. Adj. Fæsūlānus, a. um. Fæsūlānus ager (Sal. Cat. 43). Quemdam Fæsūlānum, i. e. quemdam hominem nātum Fæsūlis, i. e. P. Fūrium q. v. (Sal. Cat. 59).

Fālānus, i. m. a Roman knight, accused of admitting into one of the societies formed in honour of Augustus Cæsius, a comedian of vicious conduct, and of selling, along with his gardens, a statue of Augustus. The emperor Tiberius interfered, and the proceedings ceased (Tac. Ann. i. 73).

Fālārica, æ. f. a weapon, used by the Sāguntini, so called from fālis, or, phālis, i. e. wooden towers, whence it was thrown by a cātipūla. The shaft was of fir, round in all places except towards the end, where, like a javelin, it was square, rolled round with tow, and covered with pitch. The part of it which was iron, measured about three feet in length, so that it could both pass through the armour and wound the body. No sooner did a fālārica pierce the shield, than the soldier, from necessity, threw it down, from the middle part of the instrument being set on fire before it was discharged. The rapidity of the motion increased the violence of the flame, nor could he save himself from being burned, but by casting away his shield, consequently he then stood exposed to the weapons of the enemy (Liv. xxi. 8).

Fālērīi, orum, m. Falari (Civitas Castellana, Cluv.), a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, built by the Greeks, according to some, from Argos, according to others, from Chaleis. Inh. Fālērīi, orum (Sing. Fālēriscus, i.), m. like many of the other Italian states, continued their hostility to Rome until resistance would have been vain, but they voluntarily surrendered to M. Fūrius Cāmillus, in 393 B. C. (Liv. v. 27). It does not appear they were ever distinguished either for personal bravery, or military knowledge. Virgilius calls them just (Æn. vii. 695), because they furnished to the Romans the laws of proclaiming war (jura feciālia), and some supplements to the twelve tables. Stātius describes them as addicted to gormandising (Syl. iv. 9. 35), and some authors mention that they were the first people who ate the flesh of swine, which the Lucāni likewise greedily devoured. From Silius Itālicus, their dress appears to have been chiefly linen, or they must have excelled in making that kind of cloth (iv. 223). Ovidius derives their name from Hālēsus, a son of Agāmēmnōn (Fast. iv. 74). Adj. Fālēriscus, a. um. Fālēriscus ager, the territory of Fālērīi (Plin. i. 252). Cattle, by drinking the water of this district, were said to become white.

Fālērnis, a. um. Fālērnis ager, a district of Cāmpānia, which was divided among the commons of Rome 339 B. C. In it was a mountain (Fālērnis mons, Monte Barbaro), celebrated for its wines. Fālērnia cella, Falernian cellars i. e. Falernian wine (Virg. G. ii. 93). Fālērnia vites; Fālērnum vinum (Plin.). The last phrase often suppresses the noun, as ardens Fālērnum (vinum), strong Falernian wine (Hor. Od. ii. 11. 19). Amāriores cālces Fālērni (vini), more bitter cups of Falernian wine (Catul. xxvii. 1). The poet probably means Falernian wine which had acquired additional pungency from age, and this may be the meaning of the expression in Hōrātius, Sēcūri Fālērni (Od. i. 27. 10). From the adjective in both these expressions, it is manifest that the Falernian wine was reckoned strong.

Fānna, æ. f. the person to whose house at Mintūrnæ, C. Mārius was brought, after he had been declared an enemy by the senate (Val. Max. i. 5).

Fānnius, i. m. a man guilty of suicide (Mart. ii. 80).

Fānnius Cæpio, Fānnii Cæpiōnis, m. a Roman who attempted to excite a conspiracy against Augustus (Suet. Aug. 19), whom Tiberius, afterwards emperor, arraigned, and procured sentence of condemnation against him (Suet. Tib. 8).

C. Fānnius, C. Fānnii, m. son-in-law of C. Lælius, acquired considerable reputation by his historical writings, which have not been transmitted. Little is known respecting them, but what occurs in the pages of Cicero. It may, however, be inferred, that their merit was very considerable, since Brutus, who conspired against Cæsar, formed an abridgment of them. Adj. Fānnianus, a. um (Cic. Brut. 26 seq.).

C. Fānnius Strābo, C. Fānnii Strābonis, m. a Roman, who was consul in 163 B. C.

He passed a sumptuary law, regulating the expenditure of entertainments &c., and another for expelling philosophers and rhetoricians from the city (Gel. ii. 24). Adj. Faunus, a, um. Finnia lex (ib.).

Fañum, i, n. now, according to some, Faño, and according to others, Metro, a seaport town of Italy on MARE ADRIATICUM, the Gulf of Venice, in the country of the SĒNŌNES, at the mouth of the rapid river MĒTAURUS, the Metro. This city had its name from containing a famous temple dedicated to Fortuna. The SĒNŌNES, in Umbria, must not be confounded with those of GALLIA, France, who lived on SĒQUANA, the Seine, above LUTĒTIA, Paris (Cæs. B. C. i. 11).

Fara, æ, f. an island belonging to PĒRSIA (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Farfarus, i, m. a man killed by CRŶXUS (SIL. Ital. iv. 182).

Farfarus, i, m. the Farfa, a river in the country of the Sabines, which falls into Tiber, the Tevere. See FĀLĀRIS.

Fatua, æ, f. the wife of Faunus, according to JŪSTINUS, who states, she had this name from being constantly under the influence of inspiration, but VIRGILIUS calls her MĀRICA (Virg. Æn. vii. 47). She was always under a divine impulse, foretold future events every day, and appeared mad; hence persons endowed with that gift were said, fatuari (Jus. xliii. 1).

Faucula Clāvia, Faucule Clāvīæ, f. a woman of CĀPIA, who had formerly lived by prostitution, yet vice had not destroyed the female feelings, for she pitied the Roman prisoners, when almost starving, during the siege of CĀPIA, and secretly supplied them with food. For this generous conduct, the senate ordered her effects to be restored after the town had fallen, and if she wished any thing else, she had only to repair to Rome (Liv. xxvi. 33 seq.).

Faventia, æ, f. Faenza, a city of ROMAGNA, a district of Italy, which forms part of the dominions of the Pope. At one period, it had considerable manufactories of earthenware, which, from superiority of quality, brought high prices (SIL. Ital. viii. 596). Inf. Faventini, orum (SING. Favēntinus, i), m. Adj. Favēntinus, a, um. Favēntina (lina) (PLIN. iii. 560).

Favēntinus, i, m. a usurer, from whom SĀNFĒLUS had borrowed money, to gratify his vanity by hiring a crowd of attendants (Mart. ii. 74).

Favēria, æ, f. a town of IŒRIA, which the Roman consul, C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, took by storm, and destroyed, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 11).

Faunus, i, m. son of PIEUS, was king of LATIUM, who married MĀRICA, a Laurentian, by whom he had LĀTINUS g. e. (Virg. Æn. vii. 47). His name has been derived a fando, because he used to foretell future events in verse (Aur. Vic. Orig. 4). JŪSTINUS says his wife's name was PĀTHA (xliii. 1). Faunigēni, æ, m. a descendant of Faunus, LĀTINUS (Ov. Met. xiv. 449).

Faunus, i, m. a Faun, a rural deity, who, according to the poets, had the form of a goat from the middle downwards, and the horns and ears of the same animal, but the rest of his body was human. These demigods, or rural divinities, seem to have led a more harmless and inoffensive life than the Satyrs, and to have interested themselves chiefly in agricultural and pastoral affairs. Although they lived to a great age, they were not supposed to be immortal. They possessed the gift of prescience, which would be of less utility to men, as their residence was in the deepest groves, and they were very seldom seen. This species of god, or semi-god, does not occur in Grecian mythology. HORĀTIUS reckons Faunus a tutelary deity of poets and men of genius, from his being the god of the country, particularly of his Sabine villa, and because the poets ascribed to him whatever was peculiar to the Pan of the Greeks (Od. ii. 17. 28). Antēndrēs Faunus, the Faun who presided over the territory of PĀTĀVIUM, Padua (Mart. iv. 25). Bicornis Faunus (Ov. Fast. v. 99). Semlāper Faunus (Ov. Fast. v. 101). Mādiū Fauni, drunken Fauns (Mart. ix. 62).

Fāvōnius, i, m. the west wind, the same with ZĒPHYRUS (Catul. xxvi. 2).

M. Fāvōnius, M. Fāvōnii, m. an officer in Pompey's army, whom Scipio left on the banks of the river HĀLLACMON, the Indus Mauro, with eight cohorts to guard the baggage of his legions. Being afterwards proscribed on account of Caesar's assassination, he fell into the hands of his enemies, and was put to death (Cæs. B. C. iii. 36).—2. A Roman, of considerable distinction, who accused P. CŌRNĒLIUS SCIPIO NĀSICA, the father-in-law of Cn. PŌMPĒIUS, and expressed his disapprobation of M. TŪLLIUS CĪCĒRO defending him. M. PŌRCIUS CĀTO was his model, whom he imitated so closely, that he was called Cato's ape. Fāvōnius possessed great fortitude, and those of consular dignity, confiding in his resolution, remonstrated with severity against the extraordinary powers conferred on Cn. PŌMPĒIUS. He attached himself to BRŪTUS, and, after the battle at PHILIPPI, he was brought in chains before M. ANTONIUS, whom he saluted in the most handsome manner; but reviled OCTĀVIUS in the foulest language, on which account he was slain (Suet. Aug. 13). He had held the consulship with PŌMPĒIUS, in 52 B. C. He joined BIBŪLUS CĀLPIURNIUS CĪCĒRO in defending the liberties of the natives of TĒNĒDOS (Cic. Ep. ad Quint. frat. ii. 11. Vel. Pat. ii. 53).

Fausta, æ, f. daughter of L. CŌRNĒLIUS SĪLLA, was married to T. AMILIUS MĪLO. With her SĀLLUSTIUS, the historian, had a criminal intrigue, and having been caught, disguised in the dress of a slave, by her husband, received a most unmerciful chastisement, besides, he paid a sum of money for his offence. From HORĀTIUS we learn, that more of her lovers submitted to the indignity of corporeal punishment. The poet names two of her gallants, VILLIUS and LŌNGĀRĒUS (Sat. i. 2. 64). Her brother FAUSTUS wittily remarked, on her being blamed for an adulterous intimacy with PŪLVIVS PŪLLO, and PŌMPĒIUS MĀCULĀ; miror sororem meam habere maculam cum PŪLLŌnem habeat (Macrob. Satur. ii. 2). Some editions read PŪLLĒm fulvius filium. Fausta was distinguished for her uncommon beauty, and, from what has already been stated, it is scarcely necessary to add, that she was equally remarkable for her numerous and gross immoralities.—2. Daughter of MĀXIMILIĀNUS HĒRĒCLĒUS, and wife of the emperor CŌNŒNTINUS the Great, whose history is involved in doubt and un-Fābāris, i. m. the Farfa, a river of the Sabines, which falls into Tiber, the Tevere (Virg. Æn. vii. 715). Ovidius calls it Fār-fārus, whence probably the modern name. Its banks seem to have been shaded with wood, amēna Fār-fārus umbra (Ov. Met. xiv. 330).

Fābia Tērēntia, Fābia Tērēntia, f. a vestal virgin, whom Clōdus, a tribune, brought to trial for violation of her vow. From the character of her paramour, L. Sērgius Cātīlinus, it may naturally be supposed that the public would readily believe that the accusation was well founded, and give credit to Clōdus for the rectitude of his motives. So far from this being the case, several of the most respectable citizens, either convinced of her innocence, or willing to thwart the tribune, exerted themselves in her defence with such success, that she not only obtained sentence of acquittal, but her prosecutor was obliged to flee from Rome. Cāto, Cātullus, and Cicero espoused her cause. She was the sister of Tērēntia, the wife of Cicero, and to her Sallustius alludes in the expression Cum sacerdote Vesta (Cat. 15).

Fābiānus, i. m. an old friend of Mārtiālis, whom he accuses of arrogance and unreasonableness in requiring the same punctilious attention, as if they had become newly acquainted.—2. Another friend, of whom the same poet gives an excellent character, and disapproves of his quitting the country, as the purity of his morals unfitted him for living at Rome (iv. 5).—3. A man who mocked people subject to hernia, and in the hot bath of Nēro (thermæ Nērōnīanæ) suddenly saw himself affected with the same disease, on which he ceased to laugh at others distressed by that complaint (Mart. xii. 85).

Fābius, et, Fābiānus, a. um. Fābia gens, the clan of the Fābii, one of the most distinguished at Rome, who are said to have had their name from Fāblus, son of Hērclēs and Vindūna, daughter of Evānder, on which account Silius Itālicus calls Fāblus, Tirynthia prōles (ii. 3), and Ovidius, Hērclēa gēns (Fast. ii. 237). Plinius derives their name from excelling in the culture of beans (a fābis) (iii. 435). This clan alone undertook the war against the Vēntēs, in 478 B. C., to be carried on by themselves personally, and at their own private expense. Their whole number was only three hundred and six who could bear arms, and they with great bravery and success at first maintained the contest against the Vēntēs, but their intrepidity and rashness, at last, drove them into a snare, which the enemy had artfully laid for them, and from which not one of the whole corps escaped. A boy, whose tender years prevented his going to war, alone survived of all the male Fābii; consequently from him the subsequent Fābii were descended. This unfortunate battle took place on Crēmēra (Sil. Ital. ii. 6. Liv. ii. 50). Fābia sōrōres, daughters of M. Fābius Ambūstus q. v.

Fābius, i. m. one of the Pēlignī, hence called Pēlignus, in Curio's army, who treacherously attempted to kill Vārus; but was surrounded by the soldiers of that officer and slain (Cæs. B. C. ii. 35).—2. A wretch, whom Mārtiālis accuses of secretly procuring the death of his wives. The poet requested Vēnus to unite him with Christilla, who by the same practice had frequently become a widow, that the murderers might employ their artifices against each other to the mutual destruction of both (viii. 43).—3. A man to whom Bithynicus, a legacy-hunter, gave six thousand a-year in order to procure his favour; but he died poor, and left him nothing. Mārtiālis says, Bithynicus ought not to complain, since Fāblus had given more to none, and had bequeathed him six thousand a-year, i. e. this sum which Bithynicus presented him annually (ix. 10).

Fābius Dōssēnnus, Fābii Dōssēnni, m. a comic poet whose writings are lost (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 173). Plinius quotes a few of his lines (iii. 143).

Fābius Fābūllus, Fābii Fābūlli, m. an officer of the fifth legion, who was appointed joint commander-in-chief with Cāssius Lōngus, by the troops which declared for Vitēllius (Tac. Hist. iii. 14).

Fābius Pictor. See Q. Fābius Pictor.

Fābius Priscus, Fābii Prisci, m. a commander of the fourteenth legion, which he marched from Gēsōrlācum, Boulogne, to Atiātūca, Tongres, in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 79).

Fābius Rōmānus, Fābii Rōmāni, m. one of the intimate friends of the poet Lūcānus, whom M. Anneus Mēlla provoked, by proceeding with too great eagerness to recover the whole property of his brother, and framed a charge against the father, which he proved to the satisfaction of Nēro, by means of forged letters (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17).

Fāblus Rūsticus, Fābii Rūstici, m. a historian, whose authority Tācitus questions, but commends highly for his eloquence. He was the friend of Sēneca (Tac. Ann. xiii. 20).

Fāblus Vālēs, Fābii Vālētis, m. a native of Anāgnōa, Anagni, a town of Lātium, was descended from a family of equestrian rank. His character, from extreme profligacy, did injustice to the powers of his mind. Easy, gay, and spirited, he passed for a man of elegant accomplishments, and set no bounds to his lascivious indulgences. Amongst the performers of pantomime in the Juvēnālia, he gained the approbation of the audience by displaying talents which raised the actor, but degraded the man. Under Virgōlius, he obtained the command of a legion, and murdered Fōntēius Cāpito. His fidelity to Vitēllius, in some measure, atoned for his perfidy to Gālba, and his conduct towards the end of life, formed a contrast to the general depravity of that period. His merits as a soldier were respectable, yet many of his actions can be neither approved nor vindicated. Paulinus made him prisoner at Stōchādēs insule, the Hiercs; and he was put to death at Urbinum, Urbino, in the year 69. The fate of Vālēs destroyed the hope of Vitēllius, and Vēspāsianus succeeded to the imperial throne (Tac. Hist. i. 7 seq.).

C. Fābius, C. Fābii, m. (Surnamed in con.

cal. Ambustus), consul in 357 B. C., who incautiously engaged with the Tarquinians, who defeated him, and put three hundred and seven Roman soldiers, their prisoners, to death. Two years after, he was elected an interrex (Liv. vii. 12-17).—2. Substituted master of the horse in room of Q. Aulus, in 313 B. C. (Liv. ix. 23).—3. One of Caesar's lieutenant-generals.

C. Fabius Dorsus, C. Fabii Dorsensis, m. a Roman of great fortitude, who descended from the capitol when it was besieged by the Gauls in 389 B. C., passed through the midst of the enemy's posts, carrying the sacred utensils, and proceeded to the Quirinal hill, where he performed the solemn rites, which, at stated times, that clan observed there. Unintimidated by the threats of the Gauls, he returned by the same way in safety to the capitol, to the astonishment both of his countrymen and their besiegers (Liv. v. 46).

C. Fabius Hadrilianus, C. Fabii Hadriliani, m. a Roman praetor, who was burned alive in his own tent in Africa, in consequence of his cruelty and avarice (Liv. Ep. 84 seq.).

C. Fabius Licinus, C. Fabii Licini, m. held the office of consul with C. Claudius Caninus in 275 B. C., and this is all of his history which is known. In the consular calendar, he is called C. Fabius Dorsus Licinus. In some copies of Eutropius, we find him called Luscinius, which is a false reading (R. 13).

C. Fabius Pictor, C. Fabii Pictoris, m. a Roman consul, who had Q. Ogulnius Gallus for his colleague, in 271 B. C. These two consuls made war on the Picentes, whom their successors conquered (Eutrop. ii. 16). Pictor informs us, that silver was first coined at Rome this year, which, he states, was the four hundred and eighty-fifth of Rome, and five years before the first Punic war (v. 27).

Kaeso Fabius, Kaesonis Fabii, m. (Surnamed in con. cal. Vibulanus), a Roman who, in his quaestorship, arraigned the consul Sp. Cassius, for treason in 436 B. C. The patricians procured his election to the consulship in 434 B. C., in opposition to the commons, who detested the Fabii; because Q. Fabius, consul, in the former year, had sold the booty taken from the Volscians and Aequans, and paid the amount into the treasury. The same interest raised his brother Marcus to the consulship next year, and this appointment added to the reputation of the Fabian clan, in which the senate found skilful commanders, whose valour and knowledge of military tactics led the armies to victory and conquest. Livius has extolled both the personal bravery and military knowledge of Kaeso, who defeated the Veientes and Etrusci, prevented the former from cutting off the army of his colleague T. Virginus in his third consulship, and made a vigorous, but unsuccessful, attempt to reconcile the patricians and plebeians. The Fabian family then offered to conduct the war against the Veientes without expense to the state, and Kaeso made to the senate the proposal, which was gratefully accepted. Next day, he marched at the head of this noble family against that formidable enemy, whom they would probably have conquered, had not rashness, the natural result of uncommon bravery, exposed them to an artful stratagem, from which not one individual of the whole number effected his escape (Liv. ii. 41-50).

Kaeso Fabius Ambustus, Kaesonis Fabii Ambusti, m. elected a quaestor in 408 B. C.; at subsequent periods, he was three times a tribune of the soldiers with consular power (Liv. iv. 54-v. 24).

L. Fabius, L. Fabii, m. one of the three ambassadors sent by Scipio Africanus, to Carthage in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 25).—2. A centurion of the eighth legion in the Gallic war. He showed great valour at the siege of Gergovia, Gergole (Caes. B. G. vii. 47 seq.).

M. Fabius, M. Fabii, m. a brother of Kaeso Fabius, obtained the consulship in 483 B. C., and again in 480 B. C. with Cn. Manlius. In an engagement with the Veientes, Manlius was killed, for which reason, as well as for the death of his brother Quintus, M. Fabius declined the honour of a triumph, which the army had deserved, and the senate was proceeding to vote (Liv. ii. 42-47). In the consular calendar, he is surnamed Vibulanus.—2. Chief pontiff, prescribed the form in which the noble and ancient Romans devoted themselves for the safety of their country, and fellow citizens, on the approach of the Gauls in 389 B. C. (Liv. v. 41).—3. An interrex in 355 B. C. (Liv. vii. 17).—4. One of the three commissioners for conducting the colony, and distributing the lands at Cales, Calei, in 333 B. C., where he had been detained a prisoner by the enemy, from whom he had effected his escape (Liv. viii. 16).—5. By some he is called Kaeso, and by others, C. Claudius, maternal brother of the consul Q. Fabius, who, having been educated at Caere, Cerosteri, and familiar with the Etrurian language, undertook to explore the country about Ciminus saltus, r. Ciminia silva, and, disguised in the dress of a shepherd, penetrated as far as the Camertes Umbri, with whom he concluded a treaty favourable to the Romans, in 310 B. C. (Liv. ix. 36).

M. Fabius Ambustus, M. Fabii Ambusti, m. a noble Roman, whose three sons the senate sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, then besieging Clusium, Chiusi, to persuade them to desist. The embassy terminated unsuccessfully from the violent temper of both parties, who immediately prepared for an appeal to the sword. Their personal intrepidity and love of arms, rendered the Fabii neglectful of the sacred office with which they were invested, and, grasping their weapons, they rushed to battle, where Q. Fabius slew a general of the Gauls with his own hand, and was recognised while stripping him of his armour. On this discovery, the Gauls sounded a retreat, and sent immediately to Rome, demanding that the Fabii should be given up to them. Instead of complying with this request, the commons, with whom they had great influence, elected them military tribunes next year, at which the Gauls, being exceedingly enraged, marched directly against Rome (Liv. v. 35).—2. Twice appointed a military tribune with consular authority. His elder daughter was married to Ser. Sulpicius, the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, a plebeian, with whom he concerted a plan for one of the consuls being elected from that order (Liv. vi. 22-36. Flor. i. 26).—3. A consul in 359 B. C., who, in consequence of his success against the Hernici, obtained an ovation. Elected a second time in 355 B. C., and was routed by the Fálsci and Tárquiníenses in the first engagement; but, afterwards, defeated the enemy. He held the office of interrex twice, the consulship for a third time, and the dictatorship once, when Q. Servilius was given to him as master of the horse. This nomination did not proceed from any alarm of war, but to prevent the operation of the Licinian law, and to secure the consulship for two patricians. The measure failed in accomplishing the intended effect. He exerted his utmost efforts for the preservation of his son, who, when master of the horse, had fought in the absence, and against the order, of L. Pápirius, the dictator, on that account had incurred his resentment, and become liable to capital punishment (Liv. vii. 11—viii. 33).—4. Master of the horse to A. Córnelius Arvina, conducted himself with great bravery and judgment against the Samnites, who, crushed by the success of the dictator, and master of the horse, begged for peace. A. Córnelius Arvina had the honour of a triumph in 322 B. C., and Fáblius marched to Apúlia, whence he carried off abundance of spoil. An uncertainty prevails respecting the command of this war; whether vested in the consuls, or in the officers just mentioned (Liv. viii. 38, 39).—5. Córnelius Népos, as quoted by Sólínus, mentions an M. Fáblius Ambústus consul with T. Quíntius Cápitolínus in the year of Rome 385, which must be a mistake, since military tribunes were appointed not only that year, but for several years both before, and after it.

M. Fáblius Bútéo, M. Fábii Bútéónis, m. named dictator by C. Tércéntius Várró, consul, for the purpose of choosing members into the senate. Prudence, moderation, and judgment marked his whole conduct in that office, and, on electing one hundred and seventy-seven members into the supreme council of the state, he resigned the dictatorship. Fáblius had no master of the horse (Liv. xxiii. 22, 23).—2. Obtained first the curule edileship, and afterwards the praetorship, when Sárdínia fell to his lot, in 203 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 26—40). He held the office of consul with L. Cæcilius Météllus in 249 B. C., and, two years after, he was re-elected to the same office with C. Atílius Bálbis. He gained a complete victory over the Carthaginians at Egímúrus, Zímbrá. His fleet, laden with Carthaginian spoils, was wrecked in a storm, and the greater part of the splendid treasure was lost (Flor. ii. 2).

M. Fáblius Dórsó, M. Fábii Dórsónis, m. was elected consul in 344 B. C. From an apprehension that the whole Latin nation would join the Auruncians, L. Fórus was created dictator, and this nomination superseded the offices of the consuls (Liv. vii. 28).

M. Fáblius Quíntillánus, M. Fábii Quíntilláni, m. the father, or rather the grandfather, of the Rhetorician of the same name, who composed a hundred and forty-five declamations.—2. Was born at Caláгурris, Calabrorra: a town of Hispánia, Spain, whence, on the death of Néro, he was brought to Rome by Gálba, and studied under Pálemón, the grammarian. On his first appearance at the bar, his eloquence commanded general approbation. He afterwards taught rhetoric for twenty years; among his scholars were the grandsons of the emperor Domitian's sister, and Pliny, the younger. Some state, that Juvénális studied under him; this, perhaps, rests on no better authority than the opinion of the Satirist, who speaks with great respect of this most excellent and learned man, whose name he frequently introduces, as denoting all that is praiseworthy in the human character (Sat. vi. 75). The poet considers him as rich (Sat. vii. 186), and, in comparison of himself, perhaps Quíntillánus might be so denominated; for we have the authority of his scholar, Plinius, for stating that his fortune was moderate. This fact seems established, that although his wealth bore no proportion to the immense possessions of many Romans at that period, yet he did not, like many learned men, suffer under the united pressure of poverty and contempt. He composed, after his retirement from the drudgery of teaching, his work de Institutione Oratoris in twelve books, the most perfect and accurate system of oratory extant. He describes the education calculated to form a perfect orator, from infancy to the consummation of rhetorical fame, either at the bar, or in the senate. Throughout the whole of that work, he displays an elegant taste, intermixed with much judicious criticism. To the great resources of his own acute and powerful understanding, he added the deep comprehension of Aristótéles and the delightful graces of Cicéro, combining, in that treatise, the collected efforts of ancient genius, on the captivating subject of eloquence. We have little certain information respecting the private life of this amiable man, and distinguished author. That he held the office of consul, and that he owed his wealth to his scholar, Pliny the younger, must be considered statements rashly advanced on insufficient authority. Pliny's letter gives indubitable evidence of the strong attachment and high opinion which he entertained of his teacher, but a letter of respect must not be confounded with a donation equal to a moderate fortune. The dialogue on the causes of the corruption of eloquence, is generally considered as the composition of Tacitus, although some ascribe it to the orator. He had a son of the same name, whom he frequently mentions with great praise. Neither the year of his birth nor death is accurately known. To him Mártiális writes a complimentary epigram (ii. 90).

M. Fáblius Vibúlánus, M. Fábii Vibúláni, m. elected consul in 442 B. C., with Póstúmus Ebbúlius Elva, and they exerted themselves to erase entirely from the minds of men the infamy of the sentence of the people, with respect to the ground disputed by the Ardéates and Aricini. In the war against the Fidéñates and Veñentes, Mámércus Émilíus, dictator, appointed Fáblius a lieutenant-general, and, at a future period, he was nominated a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority (Liv. iv. 11—25).

Númércius Fáblius Ambústus, Númércii Fábii Ambústi, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 405 B. C. From Livius, it appears that he had previously discharged the same office (iv. 68).

Númércius Fáblius Bútéo, Númércii Fábii Bútéónis, m. elected praetor in 175 B. C., and obtained the north of Spain for his province, but died on his way to that country, at Messina, Marselles (Liv. xli. 28).

Numerius Fabius Vibulanus, Numerii Fabii Vibulani, m. elected consul in 421 B. C., when the war against the Æquans fell to his lot. Their cowardice afforded him no opportunity of displaying his bravery, for which reason the senate refused him a triumph, but allowed him an ovation, because he had brought the war to a termination, and thus effaced the ignominy of the defeat under C. Sempronius, consul of the former year. He afterwards obtained twice the office of tribune of the soldiers with consular power (Liv. iv. 43-57).

Paulus Fabius, Pauli Fabii, m. (surnamed Persicus), obtained the consulship with L. Vitellus in the year 34 (Tac. Ann. vi. 28).

Q. Fabius, Q. Fabii, m. elected consul in 435 B. C., and re-elected three years after. He fell by the hand of a Tuscan in battle against the Veintians (Liv. ii. 41-46). In the consular calendar he is surnamed Vibulanus.—2. Elected consul in 467 B. C. He was the only one of the Fabian clan who remained alive after the battle at Créméra. He rebelled against the Æquans whom his arrival intimidated, and they sued for peace. On his re-election to the consulship, that province was assigned him by particular appointment (extra ordinem), and he took severe revenge for the ravages which they had committed on the Roman territories, stripping them of their plunder, desolating their country, and compelling them to take shelter in their towns. He returned to Rome with great renown, and an immense quantity of spoil. When prefect of the city, he made a resolute and successful resistance against C. Terentillus Arsa, a tribune of the people, who attempted to procure a law which would diminish the consular authority. In his third consulship, he conquered the Volsi, and carried assistance to the Tusculani, by which they compelled the Æqui to submission. He was appointed one of the decemviri from whose decision no appeal should lie, in 451 B. C., and who should arrange and write out the laws brought by the commissioners from Greece. Livius reckons him a leading man among the decemviri, and adds, that he was considered rather inconstant in good, than strenuous in bad, pursuits; that the office of decemvir, by the example of his colleagues, entirely changed his character, and rendered him more like Appius than himself. This noble Roman, who had previously obtained great distinction, both in his civil and military conduct, tarnished his reputation by his deviation from rectitude, and spent the remainder of his life in banishment (Liv. iii. 1-58). In the consular calendar he is surnamed Vibulanus.—3. Elected consul in 322 B. C., with L. Fulvius Curvus. They were superseded by the nomination of a dictator (Liv. viii. 38).—4. Son of the sister-in-law of T. Quinctius Flamininus (Liv. xxxii. 36).—5. A questor under L. Mænius, consul, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 29).

Q. Fabius Ambustus, Q. Fabii Ambusti, m. created consul in 411 B. C. During that year, a pestilence broke out, which was followed by a famine from the neglect of agriculture (Liv. iv. 52).—2. One of the three sons of M. Fabius Ambustus, who were sent, by the senate, ambassadors to the Gauls then besieging Clusium, Chiusi, to induce them to discontinue their hostilities, but, the embassy having failed, the Clusini took up arms, in which they were joined by the Fabii. Q. Fabius slew a general of the Gauls and was recognised whilst he was stripping him of his armour. In place of the Romans giving him and his two brothers up to the Gauls, as was demanded, he and they next year were elected tribunes of the soldiers with consular authority, at which the Gauls, as might be expected, were greatly provoked, marched immediately to Rome, and burned it to the ground. After that ferocious army had been expelled from the Roman territory, and Rome rebuilt, as soon as he went out of office, C. Mæcius, a tribune of the people, instituted a prosecution against him, because, being sent an ambassador to the Gauls, he had fought against them, contrary to the law of nations. From this trial he was delivered by a death so seasonable, that it was generally considered to be voluntary (Liv. v. 35 seq.).

—3. Master of the horse to P. Valerius Publicola in 343 B. C. (Liv. vii. 28).—4. Nominated dictator in consequence of the disgrace of the consuls at the Caudine forks in 321 B. C., on purpose to preside at the elections. From some irregularity in his appointment, he abdicated the office, and another was substituted in his place (Liv. ix. 7).

Q. Fabius Buteo, Q. Fabii Buteonis, m. elected prætor in 198 B. C., and obtained the south of Spain for his province (Liv. xxxiii. 24 seq.).—2. Elected prætor in 183 B. C., and the lots assigned him Gallia, France, for his province. He was continued next year in the command of that country, and afterwards appointed a triumvir for planting a Latin colony among the Pisans. A dispute having arisen between the Pisans and Roman colonists, in a subsequent year, respecting certain lands claimed by both, Fabius and other four were appointed to fix the boundaries and terminate the dispute (Liv. xl. 18 seq.).

Q. Fabius Gurgæ, Q. Fabii Gurgæis, m. son of Q. Fabius Maximus, in early life had nearly ruined his fortune by extravagance, which procured him the surname of Gurgæ. The virtues of his maturer years compensated for the follies of his youth, and his name appears among the celebrated Romans of that age. He prosecuted some matrons, before the people, for the crime of adultery, and, with the fines which they were obliged to pay, built a temple to Venus near the circus in 297 B. C. The senate would have taken from him the command of the army, in consequence of an unsuccessful battle with the Samnites, when he was consul in 294 B. C., had not his father deprecated the disgrace, and promised to serve as a lieutenant-general under his son. In a subsequent battle, Gurgæ, by his father's assistance, defeated the Samnites, and this victory procured him the honour of a triumph, in which C. Pontius, the commander of the enemy, adorned the procession, and was afterwards beheaded (Liv. x. 31—Ep. 11). Juvénalis mentions Gurgæ amongst other Romans of strict morals (Sat. vi. 266).

Q. Fabius Labæ, Q. Fabii Labæonis, m.

was city quæstor with L. Aurélius in 198 B. C., when an order passed for making the last payment to private persons for the money contributed to the support of the war; and these quæstors demanded it from the augurs and pontiffs, because they had not paid it during the continuance of hostilities. The priests resisted this order, and appealed to the people, but in vain; for they were obliged to discharge their whole arrears. On being elected prætor in 192 B. C., he obtained the fleet, with which he sailed to Cræta, Candia, and Mærë Ægæum, the Archipelago. At Pâtra he destroyed, or burned, fifty decked ships, and performed other services, for which he had the honour of a triumph; although opposed by the tribunes of the people. After several inefficient canvasses for the consulship, he succeeded in 185 B. C., and, at a future period, was appointed a pontiff in room of L. Vâlérius Flaccus cut off by a pestilence (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).

Q. Fâbius Mâximus, Q. Fâbi Mâximi, m. (surnamed Rûliânus), son of M. Fâbius Ambûstus, who three times held the office of consul and once that of dictator, was appointed curule edile in 331 B. C., and, according to some authors, a second time thirty years after. In the former edileship, a servant maid discovered to him the cause of the public calamity, by which the principal persons in the state had been cut off. See Cornelia. L. Pâpirius Cûrsor, having been nominated dictator, appointed Q. Fâbius Mâximus Rûliânus master of the horse. Like the dictator, he bore a high character for military talents, and both obtained notoriety by the quarrel which arose betwixt them, and was carried almost to the very extremity of violence. After they had entered the territory of the Sâmnites, against whom they were to carry on war, some informality about the omens obliged the dictator to return to Rome to take them anew, and he prohibited the master of the horse both from changing his position, and from engaging the enemy, in his absence. The latter, understanding that the Sâmnites might be attacked with advantage, disregarded the command of his superior officer, fought the enemy, and gained a great victory. Either to fulfil a vow to some god, or to exclude the dictator from any share in that victory, he collected the arms of the slain, calculated at twenty thousand, and burned them. Instead of announcing his success to Pâpirius, he sent notice directly to the senate, which enraged the dictator, both from neglect, and disregard of his authority, and he returned to the army, resolved to revenge that flagrant act of disobedience. Fâbius, dreading his resentment, solicited the protection of the soldiers, who rescued him after the dictator had ordered him to be stripped, and the rods and axes to be in readiness. The solicitations of the officers in his behalf, instead of soothing, exasperated the rage of the dictator, on which account, Fâbius fled to Rome, convened the senate, and proceeded to lay his case before them. Scarcely had he begun his speech, when the dictator, boiling with rage, entered that assembly, and insisted on seizing him. To no purpose both his father and the senate befriended Fâbius, on which he brought his cause before the people. On his side were the dignity of the senate, the favour of the people, the countenance of the

objected, and Dēcius joined them. On referring the matter to the people, an unanimous vote procured him the object of his wish. Having restored the discipline of the army, and finding the war more difficult than he had apprehended, he applied to the senate to have another general appointed along with him; to this request they agreed, and allowed him to select the person whom he judged best qualified. Exercising sound discretion, he chose his own colleague, P. Dēcius Mūs, a measure which gave universal satisfaction. After they had collected a powerful army, they brought on a general engagement, which appearing doubtful, Dēcius devoted himself and the enemy to the Dii Mīnes. This voluntary death inspired the Romans to almost more than human bravery, and Fābius obtained a complete victory in the territory of the Sēntinates, for which he had the honour of a triumph. In fulfilment of a vow to Jūpter Victor, he burned the spoils, and to that god he likewise vowed a temple during the engagement. Hostilities having recommenced in Etrūria, he killed of the Pērūsinī upwards of four thousand, and allowed seventeen hundred prisoners to be ransomed at three hundred and ten asses each. All the rest of the spoil he gave to the soldiers (Liv. viii. 18 seq.).—2. An illustrious Roman, first mentioned by Livius when sent on an embassy to Carthage with L. Æmilius, Q. Bæbius, C. Licinius, and M. Livius. The Carthaginians had besieged Sīgūntum, Murciedro, and the Romans sent these ambassadors to inquire whether that violation of the treaty proceeded from public or private design. On a violent harangue being made by a senator of Carthage, Fābius, who was the principal member of the deputation, folded a part of his Tōga, and said, "here we bring you peace or war, take which you choose." The Carthaginians with equal warmth cried out, he may give which he chooses. Fābius then threw out the fold, and said he gave war, when they replied, "we take it, and shall carry it on with the same spirit which we have shown in its acceptance." Agreeably to their instructions, these ambassadors went over to Spain and solicited the states of that country, if they did not join the Romans, at least to withdraw from Hännibal. The Bārgūsū only acceded to their request, and in Gāllia they had no better success, the Massilians only agreed to their proposal. After the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia, Fābius was appointed prodicator, and he named M. Minūcius Rūfus, master of the horse. Veneration for the gods persuaded Fābius that the dreadful disaster resulted not more from the ignorance and rashness of C. Flāminius, than from neglect of certain religious observances, and, therefore, at his request, the Sibylline books were consulted, from which it was reported that certain ceremonies must be performed, on which he left the charge to M. Æmilius, prætor, and put himself at the head of the troops. He pitched his camp within sight of Hännibal, with whom he declined an engagement, which disconcerted that general, who found himself unable to devise any expedient by which Fābius could be prevailed on to depart from his resolution. To induce a belief that he had a secret agreement with Fābius, Hännibal saved his farm whilst he desolated all around it. Neither this insidious conduct, nor the discontent of his own troops, almost on the verge of mutiny, because he refused to lead them against the Carthaginian army, had the least effect in making him deviate from the plan on which he had resolved to act. In the first Punic war, the Roman and Carthaginian generals had agreed, that, in the interchange of prisoners, whoever might receive the greater number, should pay two pounds and a half weight of silver for each man of the over number. Without consulting the senate, the dictator acted on this regulation, and having received two hundred and forty-seven prisoners from the Carthaginians more than he had given them, their ransom had frequently come before that assembly, and been delayed, because he had not previously obtained their sanction, he sold the farm which Hännibal had spared, and paid the stipulated sum, which both cleared the public faith, and added to his own honour. On account of some religious ceremonies, his presence was required in Rome, and he both ordered and entreated the master of the horse not to engage the enemy during his absence. Availing himself of the eagerness of the troops for battle, and vain of his military skill, the master of the horse disobeyed his orders, and fought not unsuccessfully with the Carthaginians. The enemies of the dictator magnified it into a victory, and the people made him equal in command with Fābius, a measure equally absurd and unprecedented. On returning to the army, the dictator divided the forces between him and the master of the horse, and the latter soon risked an engagement with Hännibal, who would have either killed or made the whole prisoners, had not Fābius come seasonably to his relief. The master of the horse saw and confessed his error, and placed himself again under Fābius, whom, from gratitude, he called his father. The six months having expired, he abdicated the dictatorship, earnestly recommending L. Æmilius Paullus to adopt the plan which he had formed, and to guard against the rashness of his colleague, C. Tērēntius Vārro. The ignorance and inconsideration of the latter brought on the battle of Cānnæ, after which Fābius made some judicious proposals for quelling the agitation at Rome, and the senate sanctioned them by their approval. After he had been created Pōntifex, his countrymen bestowed on him again the consulship, when he took some towns from the enemy, watched the movements of Hännibal, and desolated the lands of the Cāmpāni, who had joined the Carthaginians. At the elections, T. Otācilius and M. Æmilius Rēgillus, were chosen consuls. Fābius made a powerful speech against the appointment of both, although Otācilius had married his sister's daughter. To him he objected on the ground of incompetency, because, when he commanded the fleet, he had effected none of the purposes for which it had been given him. Æmilius, being the Flāmen of Quīrinus, would remain at home and neglect the war. He then ordered back the Cēntūria Athēniēnsis jūniōrum, on whom the lot had fallen to give the first vote, on purpose to vote again, when he was himself named consul for the fourth time, with M. Claudius Mārcellus for the third time. As soon as he received information that

Hannibal had departed from Arpi, where he had spent the winter, he hastened back to the army, travelling night and day, concerted measures for besieging Cäsiliunum which he took by assault. In the same manner he obtained possession of Compulteria, Telésia, Teles, Compa, Conza, Mela, Melissa, Füllula, Monte Fusco, and Orbitanium, in the district of Samnium, Blandæ, Maratea, in Lucania, and Æcie, Troja, in Apulia. In these towns twenty-five thousand of the enemy were either taken or killed, and three hundred and twenty deserters were, on being sent to Rome, beaten with rods in the Comitium and thrown over the Tarpeian rock. At Suessula he came on horseback to the camp as lieutenant-general under his son, who went out to meet him, and eleven of the licitors, from respect to his age and character, allowed him to pass, on which the consul said to the twelfth, "Take care." The licitor then called out "Alight," and having dismounted, he said, "My son, I wished to try whether you sufficiently knew that you were consul." Of his military talents and accurate knowledge of Hannibal's plans, he gave a remarkable instance in the senate, when that general, finding it impossible to raise the siege of Capua, threatened Rome. Fabius declared that Hannibal had no expectation of taking the city, since he had not dared to march against it after the battle of Cümæ, that his sole object in advancing towards the capital was to raise the siege of Capua, which ought not to be discontinued, and that the troops then in Rome were sufficient for its defence. The senate increased the armed force within the walls, pushed on the siege of Capua, and Hannibal's feint with respect to Rome proved the accuracy of Fabius. The Carthaginian general did indeed appear in some force near the city, but not a single movement indicated that he had any serious intention of storming the walls. In the fifth consulship of Fabius, the senate assigned to him the war at Tarentum, Taranto, where he displayed his usual activity, prudence, and military skill. P. Sæmpronius Tuditanus appointed him Prince of the senate, a nomination opposed by his colleague, M. Cœnilius Cethegus, who contended that the practice transmitted from their ancestors ought to be observed, which was to make the oldest censor living, Prince of the senate. According to precedent, this honour should have been conferred on T. Manlius Torquatus. Sæmpronius maintained that the lot left him at full liberty to choose whom he would, and that he had chosen the consul, because that, even in the opinion of Hannibal, he was the first of the Romans. To this election, after a long dispute, the other censor yielded his assent, and Fabius obtained that honourable appointment. By the capture of Caulonia, Castro Vetere, Manduria, Manduria, and Tarentum, Taranto, he obtained a prodigious quantity of booty, besides taking a great number of prisoners. It appears surprising that he opposed P. Cœnilius Scipio in his proposal to conquer Hannibal in Africa. Against the whole plan he delivered a long and forcible speech, which Livius has recorded (xxviii. 40—44). He attacked the character of Cœnilius with great violence, in consequence of the Lœrœnses complaining to the senate of the cruelty, lewdness, and injustice of the Roman army, both officers and men, since it was the duty of Cœnilius, as their commander, to have prevented the commission of these crimes. His motion failed with respect to Cœnilius, but the senate, agreeably to his proposal, ordered restitution to be made to that people, and the commissioners, appointed to examine into the facts, reported to the senate that the conduct of Cœnilius, instead of meriting censure, claimed high approbation. He died in extreme old age, in 205 B. C., after he had been, according to some, augur for sixty-two years. In honourable offices, says Livius, he surpassed his father, and equalled his grandfather, and his uncommon merit rendered him worthy of the great surname, even if he had been the first who bore it (Liv. xxi. 18.—xxx. 26). His caution proceeded not from indolence or timidity, but from a conviction of its utility, and success justified its adoption. He restored the state, says Ennius, by judicious delay. Victrices mœra Fabii, i. e. the slow and cautious measures of Fabius, by which he overcame Hannibal (Prop. iii. 3. 9). To him Chudianus alludes in his poems, and Sallustius, Jug. 4.—3. Son of the former, who, after holding the offices of curule edile and prætor, was elected consul, in 215 B. C. at the time he was absent in his province, Apulia. Livius relates an anecdote of this noble Roman which shows the scrupulous attention paid to the honours of office. See former article. Dæsius Albinus, of Arpi, came privately by night to Fabius, offering to betray his native city to the Romans for an adequate reward. Some thought that Albinus ought to be put to death as a traitor; but the father of the consul proposed a more lenient plan which was adopted. See Dæsius Albinus. It does not appear from the Roman historian, that this man equalled the merits of his father, in whose room a son of the same name was chosen augur, and died in 193 B. C., before he had obtained any public office (Liv. xxiv. 9 seq.).—4. Elected prætor in 183 B. C., when the jurisdiction of the city fell to his lot (Liv. xl. 18).—5. Son of L. Æmilius Paulus Mæcedoniens, consul, and brother of Scipio Africanus Numantinus, sent by his father with some others to announce the victory over Perses, king of Mæcedonia, in 170 B. C. Nothing further of his history is mentioned by Livius, except his being placed at the head of plundering parties, a practice in the Roman army more frequent than honourable (Liv. xlv. 35 seq.).—6. Surnamed Servilianus, was the brother of Cn. and Q. Servilius Cæpio, but adopted into the Fabian clan. In his præconsulship, he took a great number of towns in Lusitania, Portugul, and recovered the greatest part of the country, in 144 B. C. By him the war was brought to a successful termination with Viriathus, with whom he concluded a treaty on terms of equality (Liv. Ep. 53, 54). Of his high sense of moral purity, Valerius Maximus has given a remarkable proof (vi. 1).—7. Grandson of L. Æmilius Paulus, who fought successfully against the Allobroges and Bituitus, king of the Arverni, during his consulship, in 123 B. C. For this victory he was surnamed Allobrogeus (Liv. Ep. 61). Valerius Maximus says, that none was more infamous in youth, and none more honourable in old age (vi. 9). His name occurs often in the writings of Cicero. Plinius makes him the brother of the younger Scipio Africanus, which appears to be a mistake, and is in opposition to Valerius Paterculus and the Fasti (Plin. v. 68).—8. Obtained the consulship during 47 B. C., probably from the resignation of C. Julius Caesar, or from its being his wish that Maximus should be raised to that honour. On his entering the theatre, the licitor proclaimed that the people should observe that the consul was coming; the whole called out that he was no consul, from his only holding that office for three months (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 80).—9. Was consul with Julius Antonius, in 12 B. C., and, in the consular calendar, is called Q. Fabius Maximus Africanus. He was the confidential friend of Augustus, whom he secretly accompanied on a visit to Agrippa, in the island of Planasia, Pianosa. Livla obtained information of this interview through Marcia, the wife of Fabius, to whom he had communicated it, and, soon after, he died, perhaps by his own hand (Tac. Ann. i. 5).

Q. Fabius Pictor, Q. Fabii Pictoris, m. was sent by the Roman senate, in 218 B. C., to consult the oracle at Delphi, by what means or worship they could appease the gods offended by Vestals violating their vow and other immoralities, from which he brought back an answer in verse, written in the Greek language, of which Livius has recorded part (xxii. 57 seq.). Some suppose him the same with the historian q. v.—2. Flamen Quirinalis, who, after he had been elected praetor, was prevented by the Pontifex Maximus from quitting the city on account of his office. He died in 163 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 47 seq.).—3. A Roman, of senatorian dignity, who flourished during the second Punic war. He wrote Annals in Latin, and Livius frequently quotes from his pages. Dionysius Halicarnassensis censures him for inaccuracy with respect to time, and the remarks of Polybius tend to lessen his fidelity as a historian. Some fragments of his writings remain. Eutropius calls him Fabius Historicus (iii. 5).

Q. Fabius Sanga, Q. Fabii Sanga, m. a Roman, of senatorian dignity, who patronised the state of the Allobroges, and, on that account, their deputies at Rome discovered to him the conspiracy of Catilina, and he immediately communicated the information to M. Tullius Cicero, the consul (Sal. Cat. 41).

Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Fabii Vibulani, m. elected consul, with C. Sempronius Atratinus, in 423 B. C. Except his appointment, there is scarcely any reference to him during his consulship, yet he twice afterwards obtained the office of a military tribune, with consular authority, besides once that of interrex (Liv. iv. 37—51).

Fabrateria, ae. f. Falvaterra, a town of the Volsci, on Liris, the Garigliano (Sil. Ital. viii. 396). Ich. Fabraterni, orum, m. admitted into the alliance of Rome, in 329 B. C. (Liv. viii. 19). Plinius mentions Fabraterni veteres, and Fabraterni novi, from which it appears certain, either that there were two towns of this name, or that colonies had been planted there at two different times, and that they had remained distinct (i. 329).

Fabricii, orum, m. the name of a plebeian clan at Rome. Adj. Fabricius, a, um. Fä- brica gens, the tribe or clan of the Fabricii. Fabricius pons, a bridge, which formed a communication between Rome and an island in Tiber, the Tevere, now called Bartolomeo, built by some one of the Fabricii.

A. Fabricius Veiento, A. Fabricii Veientonis, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, who escaped the cruelty, and obtained the favour, of Domitianus, by his adulation, and acting the part of a diligent informer. He appears to have been a man of great caution and prudence, with which he must have conjoined a certain degree of acuteness, otherwise, in so public a character, he could scarcely have secured his personal safety in these bloody and perilous times. Juvénalis mentions him in several of his satires (iii. 185 &c.). In certain writings, which he called Last Wills of persons deceased, he inserted many keen sarcastic remarks on senators and priests, for which Tilius Gémellus brought him to trial, and added, that he disposed of the honours of the state by setting them to sale, for which the emperor Néro brought the matter before his own tribunal, and Fabricius was banished from Italy. His books were ordered to be burnt, but this sentence caused them to be read with great eagerness, for the restriction was no sooner removed than they sunk into oblivion (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50).

C. Fabricius Luscinius, C. Fabricii Luscini, m. in his censorship expelled from the senate P. Cornélius Rufinus, who had been twice consul, and as often dictator, on account of his luxury, in 277 B. C. (Val. Max. ii. 9). To him Juvénalis alludes (Sat. ix. 142).—2. An eminent Roman, who distinguished himself by his military knowledge, contempt of riches, and unsullied integrity. He rejected, most indignantly, the gold with which Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, attempted to bribe him to his interest, and, at an after period, sent back to that monarch his physician, who had proposed to Fabricius to take off his master by poison, and made him acquainted with the design formed by that domestic against his life. From gratitude to Fabricius, Pyrrhus returned all the Roman prisoners without ransom. To rival that act of generosity, the Romans set at liberty an equal number of Tarentini and Samnites. On Pyrrhus quitting Italy, Fabricius gained a decisive victory over the united forces of the Bruttii, Lucani, and Samnites, for which he had the honour of a triumph (Liv. Ep. 13, 14). To him Claudianus refers (iii. 201).—3. Enjoyed the office of city praetor, in 197 B. C. Under L. Cornélius Scipio, consul, he was afterwards a lieutenant-general (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—4. A native of Alatrium, and twin brother of L. Fabricius, who was the most intimate friend of Oppianicus (Cic. pro. Cluen. 16, 17).

L. Fabricius, L. Fabricii, m. twin brother of C. Fabricius Luscinius q. v.

Q. Fabricius, Q. Fabricii, m. a tribune of the people, who introduced a bill for revoking the sentence of banishment against Cicero, and for recalling him to his native country (Cic. Sext. 35).

Fabulla, ae. f. an adulteress (Juv. Sat. ii. 68).—2. A young woman of wealth and beauty, whom Martialis charges with vanity, and overrating her merits (i. 65). That poet mentions a woman of the same name, who of the orator other three of this name occur, of whom little is known.

Fulvius Kälēnus, Fūli Kälēni, m. one of Caesar's lieutenant-generals, who had the charge of transporting the troops from Brūndisium, Brindisi, into Greece. Caesar afterwards sent him with an army to Achāia, when a number of towns submitted voluntarily, and others were carried by storm.

C. Fūlvius Gēmīnus, C. Fūli Gēmīni, m. was consul with C. Rūbēllius Gēmīnus, in 29, the year fixed on by Lactāntius and others, during which the Saviour suffered crucifixion at Jerusalem. The moderns, in general, place that great event four years later, corresponding to the nineteenth year of the reign of the emperor Tiberius, and 33 of our era. His mother lost her life because she bewailed his violent death (Tac. Ann. v. 1: vi. 10).

Fūgītīvus, i. m. a man who merely deserts, but does not voluntarily take up arms against his countrymen. Pērfūga not only quitted the standard of his country, but joined that of the enemy. On being taken, the pērfūga were frequently put to death; the punishment of the fūgītīvi was in general less severe; the latter were guilty only of desertion, the former to desertion added treason. Trānsfūga is nearly of the same import with pērfūga. Scipio Africānus Minor, after the destruction of Carthage, exposed both fūgītīvi and trānsfūga to wild beasts. His father, after the conquest of Mācēdōnia, had punished both in the same manner (Liv. Ep. 61).

Fūlcīnīus Triō, Fūlcīni Trīōnis, m. a noted informer, possessed of great abilities, but regardless of moral character. He enjoyed the office of consul; at that period, however, it did not add much to dignity of character, being often held by men both worthless and contemptible. At last the informers joined against him, and, knowing that his death was determined on, he put an end to his own life in the year 35 (Tac. Ann. ii. 28 seq.).

C. Fūlcīnīus, C. Fūlcīni, m. a Roman ambassador, put to death by Lārs Tōlūmīnus, king of the Vēntēs, in 437 B. C. Statues of Fūlcīnīus and the other three ambassadors were set up near the forum at the public expense (Liv. iv. 17).

Fūlfūla, arum, f. a town of Sāmīnium, taken by the Roman consul Q. Fābius Māximus in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Fūlgīnīum, i. e. Fūlgīnula, orum, n. Foligno, a town of Umbria, on the western side of the Apennines (Sil. Ital. iv. 545). Inh. Fūlgīnātes, ium (Sing. Fūlgīnas, ātis), m. (Plin. i. 364).

Q. Fūlgīnīus, Q. Fūlgīni, m. first centurion of the Hāstātī of the 14th legion, who had risen to that station from the ranks. He was killed near Ilērda, Lerida (Cæs. B. C. i. 46).

Fūlvīa, v. f. a Roman woman of high rank, but of vicious life, with whom Q. Cūrius, one of the accomplices in the conspiracy of Cātūlina, had a criminal connexion. Although she had lost all regard for personal purity, she retained a strong attachment for her native country, and for the lives of the citizens, and therefore made a full discovery of the danger which threatened both. M. Tūllius Cicerō, through her agency, prevailed on Q. Cūrius to disclose every measure of the traitor as soon as resolved upon, and thus crushed one of the most powerful combinations ever formed for the overthrow of the Roman state (Sal. Cat. 23, 28). Flōrus, in opposition to Sāllūstius and Plūtārchus, describes her as a lewd woman of the most degraded kind (iv. 1).—2. Daughter of Fūlvius Flāccus, was a Roman of high rank, great ambition, and determined resolution. She was first married to Clōdīus, next to Cūrlo, and afterwards to M. Antōnīus. She appears to have entered with keenness into all the schemes and measures of her husband, for her breast was a stranger to the finer feelings of her sex. Plūtārchus has recorded an instance of her great barbarity. When the assassins had deprived the Roman orator of life, and brought his head to Antōnīus, Fūlvīa gratified her cruelty by piercing the tongue with a bodkin. To remove every obstruction to his marriage with Clēōpātra, Antōnīus divorced her, on which she solicited Augūstus to make war on her husband. She made other proposals which, if Mārtiālis has done the parties justice, reflects equal infamy on her and on Augūstus. The poet has recorded her wish in language which cannot be too much reprobated. Falling in her plans with regard to this nobleman, she next endeavoured to accomplish his ruin by exciting a faction against him, in which she prevailed on her brother-in-law L. Antōnīus to take part. Mortified again by disappointment, she set out for the east, met with Antōnīus, who treated her with the greatest neglect, and soon after she expired from grief.

Fūlvius, i. m. a celebrated gladiator, whom Hōrātius joins with Rūtūba and Plācidīānus (Sat. ii. 7. 96).

Fūlvius Aurēlius, Fūlvī Aurēli, m. the lieutenant-general, or commander, of a legion, who obtained consular ornaments in consequence of the Sarmatians being defeated with great slaughter by M. Apōnius Sātūrnīnus, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 79).

Fūlvius Flāccus, Fūlvī Flācci, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 12).

Fūlvius Pōstūmus, Fūlvī Pōstūmi, m. pretor of the ninth legion at Dyrārchium, Durazzo (Cæs. B. C. iii. 62).

A. Fūlvius, A. Fūlvī, m. the son of a Roman senator, who joined Cātūlina, was taken, brought back to the city, and put to death by his father's orders (Sal. Cat. 39).

C. Fūlvius, C. Fūlvī, m. a Roman quæstor, whom the Ligurians seized by treachery, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 59).—2. A lieutenant-general, who commanded a legion and two confederate squadrons at the surrender of Cāpua, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 14 seq.).

C. Fūlvius Cūrvus, C. Fūlvī Cūrvī, m. was a plebeian edile, in 298 B. C., when he and his colleague L. Ælius Pætus exhibited games, and placed golden bowls in the temple of Cēres, out of the fines paid by the farmers of the public pastures (Liv. x. 23).

C. Fūlvius Flāccus, C. Fūlvī Flācci, m. was elected consul, in 136 B. C., and carried on war in Sicily against the slaves, who had proved too powerful for the pretor (Liv. Ep. 56).

C. Fūlvius Pōstūmus, C. Fūlvī Pōstūmi, m. one of Caesar's officers, whom he joined in command at Dyrārchium, Durazzo, with Lentulus Mæcellinus, on account of the latter being in an infirm state of health (Cæs. B. C. iii. 62).

Cn. Fulvius, Cn. Fulvii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Céntumālus), a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, under the dictator M. Valerius Maximus, in 303 B. C. Three years after, he obtained the consulship; in that office, for his victory over the Sāmmites, he had the honour of a triumph. The same success attended him in Etruria, when he only held the rank of prætor (Liv. x. 4 seq.).—2. Chosen prætor, in 192 B. C., when the foreign jurisdiction fell to his lot (Liv. xxxvi. 45 seq.).—3. Held the office of prætor in 169 B. C., and obtained for his province the north of Spain (Liv. xlv. 16).

Cn. Fulvius Céntumālus, Cn. Fulvii Céntumāli, m. rose to the consulship at Rome, in 231 B. C., and with his colleague, L. Pōstūmus Albinus, who had previously filled the same office, carried on war against the Illýrii, took a number of cities, allowed some princes to surrender, and had the honour of the first triumph over that nation (Eutrop. iii. 4. Flor. ii. 5).—2. A Roman who passed through the gradations of edile and prætor; after which his fellow-citizens raised him to the consulship with P. Sulpicius Gālba, and they entered on their office on the Ides of March, in 213 B. C. Apulia was his province, where he performed nothing memorable, yet the senate continued his authority for another year, when Hannibal, who surpassed him in judgment, attacked him unawares, routed his army, killed himself, and took his camp (Liv. xxiv. 43 seq.). Eutropius calls this the tenth year of the second Punic war (iii. 14). If confidence may be safely reposed in the consular calendar, the facts mentioned in this and former article apply to the same person.

Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, Cn. Fulvii Flacci, m. obtained the office of prætor at Rome, in 214 B. C. In Apulia, which was his province, he acted at first with caution, but, success having rendered him careless, he neglected all military discipline, of which Hannibal had no sooner been informed, than he marched into that district, gained a complete victory over Fulvius, and took his camp. For his loss of the troops, and misconduct in command, C. Sēmpronius Blæsus brought him to trial; he was first fined in a sum of money, afterwards arraigned for treason, on which he withdrew into banishment at Tarracina. He was the brother of Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who was four times consul (Liv. xxv. 2 seq.).—2. A Roman senator who was degraded by his own brother Quintus, when censor, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 27).

L. Fulvius Cūrvus, L. Fulvii Cūrvii, m. enjoyed the highest office at Rome, in 322 B. C., and had Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus for his colleague. At a subsequent period he was master of the horse to L. Æmilius (Liv. viii. 38 seq.).

M. Fulvius, M. Fulvii, m. was, according to some authors, substituted consul in place of T. Minucius, in 306 B. C. The narrative of Livy shows that he was not of that opinion (ix. 44).—2. A tribune of the soldiers in the Roman army, under Q. Fabius Maximus, who sent him and M. Valerius of the same rank, with a message to the cavalry, when engaged with the Sāmmites.—

3. Another tribune of the soldiers, in 211 B. C., killed in an engagement with Hannibal that year (Liv. xxvii. 12).—4. A tribune of the people, in 201 B. C. With one of his colleagues, he attempted to prevent T. Quinctius Flamininus from standing candidate for the consulship, as he had only been quæstor, neither edile nor prætor (Liv. xxxii. 7).—5. One of the three deputies whom C. Sulpicius nominated, by order of the senate, in 173 B. C., to quit Rome that day, and to travel with all possible speed to the consul, with instructions to charge him not to undertake any war except by permission of the senate (Liv. xliii. 1).

M. Fulvius Céntumālus, M. Fulvii Céntumāli, m. a Roman prætor, to whom the lots gave the jurisdiction of the city, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 10 seq.).

M. Fulvius Flaccus, M. Fulvii Flacci, m. a decemvir, appointed to survey, and distribute, among the veteran soldiers, the lands in Samnium and Apulia, which were the property of the Roman people, in 203 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 4).—2. A triumvir commissioned to settle two colonies at Pótentia in Picenum, and at Pisaurum in the territory of the Gauls, in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 44).—3. Was deputed by the Roman senate to go along with M. Cæcilius Rēbilus to Mæcēdōnia, in 172 B. C., and to bring certain information respecting all transactions there, as apprehensions were entertained of the designs of Pērseus (Liv. xliii. 11).—4. A Roman who held the consulship with M. Plautius Hypsæus, 127 B. C., and was the first who subdued the Trānsalpīni Lígures, having been sent to the assistance of the Māssilienses against the Salluvii Galli, who were desolating their lands, 130 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 60). He afterwards joined C. Sēmpronius Gracchus in his tumultuary measures which embroiled the state, and, on that account, he was killed by L. Opimius, consul (Id. 61). To his fate for joining in that sedition Sallustius refers (Jug. 42). The Romans, accounting him a traitor, confiscated his property, levelled his house with the ground, and adjudged the area on which it stood to the public. Adj. Flaccianus, a. um. Flacciana arca, the space occupied by the house of M. Fulvius Flaccus, which, after it had remained long waste, Q. Lutatius Catulus adorned with the spoils taken from the Cimbri, 101 B. C. (Val. Max. vi. 3).

M. Fulvius Nobilior, M. Fulvii Nobilioris, m. a Roman who passed through the regular gradations of edile and prætor; after which he was elected consul, in 191 B. C. In his prætorship, when governor of the north of Spain, he gained a complete victory over the Væcæi, Vettōnes, and Celtiberi, and similar success attended him wherever he went. Ætolia became his province in the consulship, where he attacked, with a very powerful force, Ambracia, and his best efforts were baffled both above and below ground. At the request of the Athenian and Rhodian ambassadors, the Ambracienses surrendered on certain terms, which were referred to the senate, and they presented the consul with a golden crown of one hundred and fifty pounds weight, which did not prevent him from robbing the town of the best paintings, and of all the statues, both of marble and brass. The Sāmæi stood a siege of four months, and would have made a longer resistance, had he not obtained slingers from Ægium, Pătra, and Dyma, who soon cleared the walls by the certainty of their aim and the force of their stroke. The possession of Sămē gratified the rapacity of the soldiers, and the severity of the consul, who sold the brave inhabitants for slaves. After settling some differences in the Morea, he went to Rome to hold the elections, and was continued in command for another year; but, soon after, the senate ordered him to withdraw his troops, to quit the province, and return to the city, where, at the suggestion of M. Æmilius Lepidus, the Ambracienses accused him of injustice and cruelty. The trial was delayed until Fulvius arrived. In the meantime, a law favourable to the accusers was passed, and a thin house decreed, that their town did not appear to have been taken by force. Through the interest of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, who overcame all opposition, he obtained the honour of a triumph, with great pomp. After being a triumvir for settling two colonies at Pôtentia and Pisaurum, he was appointed censor, in 181 B. C., with M. Æmilius Lepidus, his inveterate enemy, between whom a reconciliation immediately took place, and they discharged their duties with great harmony. He contracted for a harbour, and the piers of a bridge over Tiber, the Tecere, on which arches were thrown many years after by P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius, besides executing many other useful works. These censors established many port duties and customs, caused several chapels, which had been occupied by private persons, to be opened for the public, and changed the mode of voting, by dividing the tribes in the districts or wards by their classes, rank, and occupations (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).—2. A military tribune of the second legion, who, with A. Postumius, had the command of it at Pisa, in 182 B. C. During the months that Fulvius had the command, he disbanded the legion, for which improper conduct the senate banished him to Spain, and in the censorship of his brother he was expelled the senate (Liv. xl. 41 seq.).—3. A tribune of the people, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 32).—4. A Roman of senatorian dignity, who conspired with Cătilina to overturn the government, to murder the wealthy, and to seize on their property (Sal. Cat. 17).

M. Fulvius Patinus, M. Fulvii Patini, m. was elected consul, in 301 B. C., with T. Manlius Torquatus, on whose death M. Valerius Corvus was substituted in his place (Liv. x. 9).

Q. Fulvius, Q. Fulvii, m. was curule edile at Rome, in 204 B. C., with L. Licinius Lăcullus q. r. (Liv. xxx. 39).—2. A plebeian tribune, whom his colleague, L. Opilius, joined in objecting to either of the new consuls taking the command of the army in Măcedonia, in 199 B. C., alleging that the change of commanders prolonged hostilities, as one consul had scarcely begun offensive operations when he was recalled. In the justness of their opinion the senate acquiesced, and Italy was decreed a province for both consuls that year (Liv. xxxii. 28).—3. Sent an ambassador to the Roman senate from Greece, by T. Quinctius Flăminius, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 36).—4. Appointed a triumvir of religious feasts at Rome, in 182

B. C. He was the son of Mărcus, and at that time a mere youth (Liv. xl. 42).

Q. Fulvius Flăccus, Q. Fulvii Flăcci, m. was the colleague of L. Cornélius Lăntulus in the consulship, in 239 B. C. The Romans that year, for the first time, declared war against the Ligurians, over whom the commanders had the honour of a triumph. Hăero visited the Roman capital, probably to procure the favour of the Romans; but, from the loss of that part of Livy's history, we only learn the fact from Eutrôpius (iii. 2).—2. An eminent Roman, who held in succession the offices of pontif, city prator, and master of the horse to C. Claudius Căntho, and then obtained the consulship, which he had previously twice held, in 214 B. C. In his third consulate, Appius Claudius Pulcher was his colleague, and both were appointed to conduct the war against Hannibal. With some difficulty they raised the troops appointed by the senate, and Fulvius, having failed in his canvass for the office of pontifex măximus, received information that Hămo was encamped three miles from Bănăventum, on which he marched against the Carthaginian, attacked and carried his camp, the spoil of which enabled him to reward those who had distinguished themselves in the assault. To this success he probably owed his being continued in command, when he and his former colleague besieged Căpua, but raised it to follow Hannibal, whom they had defeated before that town, as he marched towards Rome, a feint which that crafty commander had made with the view of relieving Căpua. In the engagement which followed, a dreadful shower of rain, mixed with hail, obliged both armies to retire to their camps. Next day exhibited a similar phenomenon, and no sooner were the troops again within their ramparts than the sky became clear and serene. Hannibal seems to have considered these showers as an unlucky omen, for he immediately withdrew his troops, and Fulvius returned to Căpua, which surrendered in consequence of Hannibal's defeat, and the severity of the famine, the result of the close siege. The two commanders differed in opinion respecting the treatment of the surrendered, Claudius wishing to refer the matter to the senate, and Fulvius, who seems to have been of a more bloody disposition, recommended capital punishment, which he carried into execution without the knowledge of his colleague. His excessive cruelty at Căles, Tănum, and Căpua, cannot be held in too great abhorrence. The inhabitants of the last city complained of his harshness to the senate; but without advantage. In adjusting the affairs of that people, he had fresh opportunities of practising his severity, to the disgrace of himself and the Romans, notwithstanding of which he was appointed dictator, elected consul for the fourth time, and the command continued to him during two successive years (Liv. xxiii. 21 seq.).—3. A plebeian edile, in 190 B. C.; next year he was elected prator, and obtained Sărdinia as his province, which is only known by his nomination. After being a lieutenant-general under L. Æmilius Paullus, he obtained the consulship, in 182 B. C., and carried on war with the Apăni Ligures, part of whom he conveyed to Sănnium, and assigned them lands among their countrymen, who had been previously settled in that district (Liv. xxxviii. 35 seq.).—4. Held the office of curule edile, in 186 B. C., and he stood candidate for the praetorship, vacant by the death of C. Decimius Flāvius, the same year; but the tribunes of the people opposed his canvass, on the ground that it was contrary to law to hold two curule offices at the same time, and the senate supported that objection, so that he was not elected praetor till 184 B. C. In the north of Spain, which had fallen to his lot as his province, he was successful against the Celtiberi, and, being continued in command, he gained greater advantages over that nation in the following year. Attacked in the Maurian pass (Maurianus saltus), his army was in danger of being destroyed; for their preservation he vowed a temple to Equestrian Fortune, and games to Jupiter. The bravery of his troops, added to his skill as a commander, prevailed over the enemy, who sustained a prodigious loss in killed and prisoners. This victory procured him a high military character, and the consulship on his return to Rome, which he entered in triumph, and celebrated the games with great magnificence during ten days. Over the Ligures he had likewise the honour of a triumph, but his character appears to greatest advantage in his censorship with A. Postumius Albinus, in 176 B. C. They were strict with regard to morals, deprived a number of knights of their horses, and Fulvius expelled his brother Cn. Fulvius Flaccus from the senate. These censors first paved the streets of Rome with flint stones, made roads with gravel without the city, and raised foot-passes on each side of them. To roof the temple of Fortuna Equæstris, he stripped that of Juno Lacinia of half its marble tiles, which the senate, enraged at this sacrilegious act, ordered to be replaced; but no tradesmen could be found who had skill sufficient for that purpose. The violation of the temple merited censure, and, in the opinion of his countrymen, led to his unhappy end. The death of one of his sons, and an account of another dying, overpowered his reason, and he terminated his life by strangulation (Liv. xxxix. 39 seq.).—5. Son of M. Fulvius Flaccus, of consular and triumphal dignity, whom his father sent to L. Opimius with offers of peace. Opimius caused him to be put to death (Vel. Pat. ii. 7).

Q. Fulvius Gellio, Q. Fulvii Gellonis, m. a lieutenant-general under P. Cornélius Scipio Africānus, who sent him to Rome, in 205 B. C., with ambassadors from Saguntum, carrying along with them some Carthaginians who had come to that town with money to hire troops. On his obtaining the praetorship, three years after, Sicily fell to his lot (Liv. xxx. 21 seq.).

Q. Fulvius Nobilior, Q. Fulvii Nobilioris, m. a triumvir for establishing colonies at Pōtentia in Picēnum, and Pisaurum in the territory of the Gauls, in 186 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 44).

Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, Ser. Fulvii Flacci, m. consul, in 137 B. C., and conquered the Vardaei in Illyricum (Liv. Ep. 56).

Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, Ser. Fulvii Nobilioris, m. whose full name was Ser. Fulvius Petinus Nobilior, was consul, in 257 B. C., with M. Aemilius Paullus q. v., the year in which M. Atilius Regulus was defeated, and taken prisoner in Africa, by Xanthippus. According to Eutropius, Regulus was defeated in the preceding year, and both consuls sailed for Africa, defeated the Carthaginians in a naval engagement, and would have conquered Africa (by which he means the Carthaginians), had not a famine obliged them to quit the country. In a storm near Sicily they lost nearly four hundred ships (Eutrop. ii. 22).

C. Fundanius, C. Fundanii, m. a Roman praised by Horatius, for his talent in describing comic characters. Of his history nothing is known (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 42).

M. Fundanius, M. Fundanii, m. a tribune of the people in 197 B. C., who, with his colleague L. Valerius, proposed to the commons, that the Oppian law should be repealed. See C. Oppius. By the importunities of the women, this law was annulled in despite of the other tribunes, and of the consul M. Porcius Cato (Liv. xxxiv. 1—8).

M. Fundanius Fundulus, M. Fundanii Funduli, m. a plebeian edile in 215 B. C. Supported by his colleague L. Villius Tappulus, he preferred a charge of incontinence against a number of matrons, several of whom were convicted and banished (Liv. xxv. 2).

Fundi, orum, m. Fondi, a town which anciently belonged to the Ausones, and stood on the Appia via. Inh. Fundani, orum (Sing. Fundanus, i), m. received the right of citizenship from the Romans, without the power of voting, in return for their allowing the Roman armies to pass through their lands without molestation, in 337 B. C. (Liv. viii. 14). Adj. Fundanus, a, um. Fundanus oyer, the territory of the Fundani. Fundannus lacus, the Lake of Fondi (Plin. i. 325). Fundannum vinum. As a proof of the excellence of this wine, Martialis mentions that it could be drunk the year in which it was made (xiii. 113).

Funisulanus Vettōnianus, Funisulanū Vettōniani, m. commanded the fourth Roman legion under Cæsonius, v. Cæsenius Petus, in the year 62 (Tac. Ann. xv. 7).

Furiæ, arum, f. the Furies, three in number, Allectō, Megera, and Tisiphonē (Virg. G. iii. 37). See Erinyes.

Furii, orum, m. originally Fūsli, a numerous and illustrious Roman clan (Liv. iii. 4).

Furius, a, um. Furia gens, the Furian clan (Liv. xxxi. 48).

Furius, i, m. a brother of Sp. Furius Fusus, the consul, in whose army he served as a lieutenant-general, and was killed by the Æqui in 464 B. C., who cut off his head, and exultingly exhibited it to the Roman camp (Liv. iii. 5).

Furius Cæmillus, Furiū Cæmilli, m. proconsul of Africa, who conquered Tæfarinas and put an end to the war in that country in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 52).

Furius Lepidus, Furiū Lepidini, m. a man of a praetorian family, who fought as a gladiator at the shows exhibited by Cæsar on his victory over the nobles of Rome, and over the laws of the state (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 39).

Agrippa Furius, Agrippæ Furiū, m. (surnamed in con. cal., Fūsus), was raised to the consulship at Rome, in 446 B. C., with T. Quinctius Bærbatus Cæpitōlinus IV. In his consulship, the dissensions of the citizens broke out with such violence, that the Æqui and Volsi having united their strength, wasted the country of Latiū, and advanced to the very gates of Rome. An army, after much opposition, was at last raised, and the command of it given, with the consent of Fūrius, to Quinctius q. c. (Liv. iii. 66—70).—2. A military tribune with consular power, who with Ser. Sulpicius Cāmērinus marched against the Salpinātes, who did not hazard an engagement, but secured themselves in their towns, and left their lands to be plundered (Liv. v. 32).

C. Fūrius, C. Fūrii, m. one of the two Roman commanders appointed to direct the operations of the fleet against the Illyrians, in 180 B. C. It is probable he had considerable knowledge of naval affairs, as Livius mentions his holding the government of Issa q. r. with only two ships, eight years after (Liv. xli. 1 seq.).

C. Fūrius Acūlēo, C. Fūrii Acūlēōnis, m. quaestor under L. Cornēlius Scipio, arraigned in 189 B. C. for peculation at the same time with his commander, convicted, and condemned to pay one hundred and thirty pounds' weight of gold, and two hundred pounds' weight of silver (Liv. xxxviii. 55).

C. Fūrius Pacillus, C. Fūrii Pacilli, m. elected consul in 441 B. C.; eight years after, he was censor with M. Geganius Macērinus. These censors declared that the builders had completed their contract for finishing the court-house (villa publica), and held a survey of the people in it for the first time. He was afterwards a military tribune with consular authority (Liv. iv. 12—31).—2. Elected consul in 411 B. C., with Q. Fabius Ambustus. Opposing the seditious measures of L. Icilius, a plebeian tribune, was the most important occurrence of that year. A pestilence assisted them in quelling the spirit of rebellion, and the neglect of agriculture produced a famine next year (Liv. iv. 52).—3. Was consul at Rome in 253 B. C., with L. Caecilius Metellus. The principal events in their consulship are related in the life of his colleague L. Caecilius Metellus q. c.

L. Fūrius, L. Fūrii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Mēdullinus Fūsus), was elected consul in 474 B. C., with A. Mānlius Vulsō. In consequence of their opposition to the Agrarian law, they were brought to trial on the expiry of their office, by T. Gēnūcius, a tribune of the commons. The death of that tribune, and the dread which it inspired, from the means by which it was accomplished, alarmed the other plebeian tribunes, and the trial did not proceed (Liv. ii. 54).—2. Chosen a military tribune in 380 B. C., with M. Fūrius Cāmillus, and others. His conduct was marked by rashness rather than prudence, and had it not been for the superior knowledge of Cāmillus, the Roman army had experienced a signal defeat, if not utter destruction. Fūrius acknowledged his error and confessed his obligation to his colleague, who, to lessen the disgrace of Fūrius, afterwards chose him as his assistant in the war against the Tuscūlāni (Liv. vi. 22—25).—3. A plebeian tribune in 308 B. C., who prevented Appius Claudius, censor, from standing candidate for the consulship, until he resigned the office of censor (Liv. ix. 43).

L. Fūrius Bibacūlus, L. Fūrii Bibacūli, m. was quaestor to one of the consuls, and killed in the battle of Cannae, 216 B. C.

(Liv. xxii. 49). Of his father who bore the same name, honourable mention is made by Valērius Māximus (i. 1).

L. Fūrius Cāmillus, L. Fūrii Cāmilli, m. a noble Roman who, in consequence of the one consul being sick, and the other wounded, was appointed to hold the elections. The restoration of the original possession of the consulship to the patricians, was rewarded by his fellow-citizens with the office of consul, in 348 B. C., with power to choose his colleague, when he named Appius Claudius Crāssus. After the death of Claudius, he alone governed the state, conquered the Gauls, marched against the Grecian pirates who infested the coast, and, by preventing their landing, obliged them to quit that sea. In the war with the Aurūnci, he was again created dictator, and, having named Cn. Mānlius Capitolinus, master of the horse, he proclaimed a cessation of all civil business, and then proceeded against the enemy, whom he entirely defeated in the first engagement. To procure the favour of the gods, he vowed, in the heat of battle, a temple to Jūpiter Mōnētā, and the commissioners, appointed to superintend the building, pitched on the spot which had been the site of the house of M. Mānlius Capitolinus. M. Valērius, a tribune of the soldiers under his command, accepted the challenge of a Gaul, who defied the Roman army, and, being assisted by a crow in the engagement, was surnamed Cūrvus (Liv. vii. 24—28. Eutrop. ii. 6).—2. Appointed consul in 337 B. C. He defeated the Tibūrtes, and took Pēdum by scaling the walls. Not satisfied with these successes, he attacked and carried, either by force or capitulation, all the towns in Latiū, and then entered Rome in triumph. His bravery in arms procured him equestrian statues, an honour very unfrequent in that age. The Lānūvini, Aricini, Nōmētāni, and Pēdāni were admitted citizens of Rome, and allowed to retain their ancient manner of worship. Other nations were likewise admitted to Roman privileges, although on different conditions. The ships of the Antiatē were taken from them, some were burnt, and their prows decorated the part of the forum, afterwards called Rōstra, and others were taken into the Roman docks. In his second consulship, Fūrius was prevented by sickness from carrying on the war against the Sāmītes, on which account the senate commanded him to appoint a dictator, and he nominated L. Pāpiculus Cūrsor (Liv. viii. 13—29). From the consular calendar, it appears that he is the same person mentioned by Livius from vii. 24. to viii. 29.

L. Fūrius Mēdullinus, L. Fūrii Mēdullini, m. an eminent Roman who was twice elected consul, and seven times a military tribune with consular authority (Liv. iv. 25 seq.). Some are of opinion, that it was not the same person who was so often re-elected to the military tribuneship, and that there were at least two, if not three, men of this name; to this circumstance the error of the historian may be attributed.

L. Fūrius Philus, L. Fūrii Philii, m. was elected praetor in 173 B. C., and the lots assigned to him as his province, Sardinia. At the time of his death, which happened next year, he was a pontiff (Liv. xlii. 28 seq.).

L. Fūrius Pūrpūreo, L. Fūrii Pūrpū-

rēonis, m. a Roman of some distinction, to whom M. Claudius Murellus, consul, gave the command of the troops left to protect the wounded at Nūmistro, Mura, in 212 B. C. At that time Fūrius held the office of tribune of the soldiers, and did not obtain the praetorship till 202 B. C., when Gallia, i. e. the north of Italy, became his province. By order of the senate, the consul instructed him to suppress the insurrection in that country, which he accomplished by the judiciousness of his arrangements, and the bravery of his troops. In killed and wounded, the enemy lost above thirty-five thousand men, nor did six thousand escape from the field of battle. Immense booty fell into the hands of the Romans. For this signal and decisive engagement, Fūrius had the honour of a triumph, and the consul succeeded him in the command of the troops, after the war was nearly ended. Three years after, he was raised to the consulship with M. Claudius Murellus. Both wished that Mācēdōniā might become their province, and both were disappointed, in consequence of C. Atinius Labēo interposing, and consulting the people, who ordered a peace to be concluded with the Macedonian king. Italy was decreed the province of both consuls; the Boii gained several advantages over Claudius, and would probably have overpowered him, had not Fūrius arrived in time to prevent the destruction of his army. Their combined army desolated the country of the enemy, who then submitted, and yielded up their forts; but they afterwards collected in numbers and hovered near the Romans, watching a favourable opportunity to attack them. In the first engagement, scarcely a single man of the Boii was left to carry the news of their defeat. For these advantages, the senate voted a supplication of three days. Fūrius vowed two temples to Jūpiter in Cāpitōlium, one when praetor in the Gallic war, and another when consul, which Q. Mārcius Rōlla dedicated in 194 B. C., as did likewise C. Sērvilius the one, which he had vowed to Jūpiter on the island in the Gallic war. After opposing the claim of Cn. Mānlius for a triumph, Fūrius made a powerful canvass for the censorship, but without success (Liv. xxvii. 2 seq.).—2. A lieutenant-general whom P. Sūlpicius Gālba, consul, when encamped on Apsus, sent ambassador to the council of the Aetōlii, in 202 B. C., to persuade that nation to join the Romans against Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā, and Liviū has recorded his speech (xxx. 29—31).

M. Fūrius, M. Fūrii, m. a Roman sent from Mācēdōniā, by M. Aurēlius in 203 B. C., to defend him against the accusation preferred by the ambassadors of Philippus, king of Mācēdōniā. Fūrius refuted these deputies, who were dismissed with a severe answer, condemning the conduct of their monarch, and hinting the consequences to which his measures would most probably lead (Liv. xxx. 42).—2. A man whom Cæsar promised to promote in the army on Cicero's recommendation (Cic. Epis. Fam. vii. 5).

M. Fūrius Bibācūlus, M. Fūrii Bibācūli, m. a contemporary of Cicero, who wrote a poem on the wars in Gallia, France, which Hōrātius ridicules, and, from the fragments preserved, not with injustice (Sat. ii. 5. 41). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by Tācitus, as having written some keen lampoons on the family of the Cæsars (Ann. iv. 34).

M. Fūrius Cāmillus, M. Fūrii Cāmilli, m. a noble Roman, who, on being appointed a military tribune for the second time, ravaged the country of the Fālisci, destroyed with fire their houses and fruits, and drove off their cattle. From Cāpēna, Civitate, he carried away a great quantity of spoil, on his being elected a military tribune for the third time; nor did he leave any thing unwasted which fire and sword could destroy. After being nominated interrex, in 395 B. C. Cāmillus obtained the dictatorship, named P. Cōrnēlius Scipio master of the horse, vowed to celebrate the great games on the taking of Vēii, and to repair and dedicate the temple of mother Mātūta, which had been formerly consecrated by Sērvius Tūllius, the sixth king of Rome. The state fulfilled this vow in 357 B. C., after C. Sūlpicius Pētēus had obtained a complete victory over the Gauls. The military talents of Cāmillus were successfully exerted against the Fālisci and Cāpēnātes, who not only yielded to the bravery of his troops, but their camp, with a great quantity of spoil, fell into his hands. Instead of gratifying the rapacity of the soldiers, he recruited the exhausted treasury with the proceeds. Advancing to Vēii, and finding the place impregnable by assault, he drove a mine into the citadel; but, before he sprang the mine, he applied to the senate for advice with respect to the spoil; which, after much discussion and various opinions, it was resolved should be given to the commons. Next day that ancient and wealthy city was taken and plundered. Cāmillus sold the free inhabitants, and applied the money to the use of the public, a measure which displeased the plebeians, and ultimately proved the cause of his banishment. Of the strength of the place, and of the degree of doubt which remained in his mind, with respect to its fall, a pretty accurate opinion may be formed from his vowing the tenth of the spoils to Pythian Apōllo, and a temple to queen Jūno, if success attended his efforts. See Vēii. His return to Rome in a chariot drawn by white horses gave great offence to the citizens, because in his equipage he had emulated Jūpiter and Sol. In fulfilment of his vows, he then contracted for a temple to queen Jūno, on Mōns Avēntīnus, whither her statue was carried safe, the goddess, as fiction reports, having given her consent to the removal from Vēii to Rome. To mother Mātūta, he then dedicated a temple, in which he had the concurrence of the community; but his vow to Apōllo alienated from him the affections of his fellow-citizens, who, at a future period, gratified their resentment against this great man by an act of flagrant injustice, which was punished by the loss of many lives, and the reduction of their city into ashes. In 393 B. C., he was appointed a fourth time to the office of military tribune with consular authority, and had the command of an army against the Fālisci, whom he compelled, by desolating their country, first to quit their city and form a camp, and afterwards to come to an engagement in which they were routed, and fled back within the walls. A plentiful supply of all sorts of necessaries would have enabled this place to hold out as long as Vēii, had not an act of generosity and good faith, on the part of Cămillus, induced the Fălisci voluntarily to surrender. A teacher, who had the instruction of the children of the first rank at Fălărîi, Falari, decoyed them within the Roman camp, and told Cămillus, that he had given the town into the hands of the Romans by putting the children of the leading people under his power. After a severe reproof, Cămillus delivered the traitor stripped naked, and his hands tied behind his back, to the boys, to be conducted back to Fălărîi, and gave them rods with which they scourged their betrayer into the city. Ambassadors were immediately sent by the Fălisci, first to Cămillus, and then by his permission, to Rome, wherethey concluded a peace, on which Cămillus immediately returned home with higher honour, than when he entered the capital in his triumphal car drawn by white horses. The senate then hastened to acquit him of his vow to Apollo. His next appointment was that of interrex, when he nominated P. Cărnăliu Scipio to the same office, and the latter, L. Vălărîu Pătitu. For the plunder of Veii, L. Apălcău, a tribune of the people, brought him to trial, on which he went into banishment at Ardăa, where he learned that his ungrateful fellow-citizens, in his absence, had fined him of fifteen thousand asses. Still his love of country continued, and his military reputation induced the Ardătes readily to take up arms under his command against the Gauls, after that nation had burnt Rome, and were holding the capital in close blockade. An easy victory over a plundering party of these barbarians, encouraged the newly levied troops, which marched with him to Rome, having received a considerable augmentation as they advanced. On his arrival, Cămillus found Brănnus q. v. disputing with the Romans about the weighing of the gold, the price of their deliverance, which he instantly ordered to be taken away, and his countrymen to prepare for ransoming their country, not by gold but by steel. In the first engagement, this great general obtained a victory over the Gauls with as much ease, as they had done over the Romans at Allia. In the next battle, eight miles from the city, on the Gabian road, Cămillus, after an immense havoc, took their camp, and did not leave a single man to report the news of their destruction to their countrymen. The merits of the general in both these battles, seem to have surpassed the bravery of his troops, some of whom were undisciplined, and others had timidly yielded to the same army which they now conquered. In his triumph, the soldiers called their commander Rămăliu, the father of his country, and the second founder of the city. The victorious general next attended to matters of religion, procured a decree of the senate for rebuilding and consecrating the temple, for forming a league of hospitality with the Cărites, for exhibiting the Capitoline games, and for erecting a temple to Alu Lăcătău. In a long and able speech, he prevailed on the people to give up the idea of deserting Rome, and of migrating to Veii, a proposal which he had also successfully resisted soon after he had taken that city. After he had held the dictatorship for a whole year, he was again created interrex, to which office he appointed P. Cărnăliu Scipio, and he elected six military tribunes for 389 B. C. Leading men from the twelve nations of Etruria had formed a conspiracy at the temple of Văltănu, in which they were joined by the Lătini and Hărnici. Rome again intrusted her preservation to Cămillus, who was appointed dictator, and nominated C. Sărvăliu Ahăla master of the horse. As soon as he had raised forces sufficient for the emergency, and had proclaimed a cessation from business, he divided the troops into three parts, one under L. Emiliu was opposed to the Etrusci, the second remained at the city under A. Mănăliu, and he marched the third against the Vălscei, whom he reduced to complete submission in the seventieth year after they had taken up arms against the Romans. He next surprised the Equi at Băla, taking both their camp and town. From the Tărscei he recovered Sătrănu, Sutri, and then returned in triumph to Rome, having been victorious in three wars. Many of the Etrusci adorned his triumph, whom, after that degradation, he sold by auction, and their price not only repaid the gold advanced by the matrons, but out of the remainder three bowls were made, and placed in the sella of Jăpăter at Juno's feet. On his fifth appointment to the office of military tribune with consular authority, his colleagues agreed in case of danger, to resign all their power into his hands; for this mark of respect to superior merit, they received both the thanks of Cămillus and of the senate. The army of the Antătes, strengthened by the youth of the Vălscei, besides immense numbers of the Lătini and Hărnici, only added to his military fame by yielding him an easy victory at Sătrănu, which fell into his hands. The supplication of ambassadors from Antium, prevented his levelling that town with the ground. The inhabitants of Sătrănu and Năpăte, Nepi, atoned with their lives, for a fresh act of rebellion, and he put to the sword all the Etrusci, whom he found in these towns. The proud pre-eminence which Cămillus now enjoyed amongst his fellow-citizens, excited the envy of M. Mănăliu Căpătăliu q. v., yet the declamations of that violent and ambitious man did not diminish the reputation of the pre-eminent statesman, who obtained the military tribuneship for the sixth time, in 383 B. C. A war with the Prănăstăni, induced the Romans to elect him for the seventh time a military tribune with consular authority. Although now advanced in age, his valour and talent for the command of armies supported his former character, and his delicate conduct with respect to his colleague L. Făriu, raised him in the esteem of the good and honourable. Without his knowledge, Făriu had rashly hazarded a battle, which would have terminated in a disgraceful flight, had not Cămillus come up in time to rally the troops which had begun to retreat. By his counsel they returned to the charge, gained a decisive victory, and took the enemy's camp. The Romans immediately declared war against the Tăscălăni, because some of that nation were found among the prisoners, and acknowledged that they served by public authority. To Cămillus was entrusted not only the command of the army, but liberty given him to select his own assistant, when he, with the delicacy of a veteran soldier, chose his own colleague L. Furius, a measure which lessened the disgrace of Furius, and added to his own celebrity. The Tuscūlani with great prudence declined coming to hostilities, and the senate, at their own request, granted them peace. The patricians opposed certain laws which L. Sextius and L. Licinius wished to carry, and this dispute induced the citizens to elect Cāmillus again dictator, on which he named L. Aemilius master of the horse. Years had not diminished either his ardour or resolution, and he keenly opposed the tribunes, but, before any positive advantage resulted from his appointment, he resigned, probably from some informality in the election. When the Gauls, by their inroads, had rendered it necessary to take up arms against them, Cāmillus had the honour of being nominated a fifth time dictator, and he chose T. Quinctius Pēnus master of the horse. Fortune did not then desert her favourite general, who slew an immense number of the enemy, carried their camp, and returned to Rome in triumph, with the concurrence both of the senate and commons. In an obstinate struggle, the people overpowered the dictator and the senate, and appointed L. Sextius, a plebeian, consul, an election from which the senate withheld their approbation. The violence of parties must have been productive of most calamitous consequences, had not Cāmillus interposed, and brought matters to an accommodation. This agreement, grateful to both parties, was followed by the celebration of the great games, which were performed by the patrician youth, on condition that they were elected ediles, because the plebeian ediles had declared their fortunes were unequal to the expenses. This year (365 B. C.) was remarkable both for the institution of the curule edileship, and the praetorship. The dictator's son, Spūrtus, was the first who held the latter office. A pestilence broke out next year, which carried off thousands, among whom was Cāmillus. Although the death of this great man happened in very old age, the community lamented it as premature, in consequence of his being the first character in the commonwealth, in every department, civil or military. On a survey of his long and active life, impartial judgment must place him among the most illustrious citizens that ever adorned the Roman state. By the high character which he uniformly sustained, in war and in peace, at home and in exile, in prosperity and adversity, he deserved to be reckoned, says Livius, next to Rōmulus, a second founder of Rome (Liv. v. 1 seq.). Cāmillus posuit Rōmam servando (Manil. i. 782).—2. A lieutenant-general who had the command in Dalmātia, under the emperor Thērtius, where he attempted a revolt, which was suppressed within the space of five days (Suet. Claud. 13).—3. Surnamed Seribōniānus, was the colleague of C. Dōmitius Ahēnōbārbus in the consulship, during the year 32. For consulting the Chaldeans about the length of the emperor's reign, he was banished, and died in exile. His father had levied war in Dalmātia, and the emperor Claudius having pardoned him, boasted of his moderation to a disaffected family. Tacitus mentions his having been murdered by Vōlāgīnus, a private soldier, in the year 42 (Ann. xii. 52; Hist. ii. 75).

M. Furius Crāssipēs, M. Fūri Crāssipēsdis, m. a Roman, who was appointed a triumvir, for settling a Latin colony in Brūtius ager, and to hold that office for three years. Next year a similar commission was given to him and his two colleagues, to plant a colony at Vibo. In the praetorship, which he obtained in 190 B. C., he deprived the Cēnōmāni, in Gallia, of their arms, without reason. On a complaint from that nation, the senate ordered him to restore their arms, and to retire from the province. This improper conduct did not prevent his being again elected praetor, when he obtained the government of Sicily (Liv. xxxiv. 53 seq.).

M. Furius Lūscus, M. Fūri Lūsci, m. was elected a plebeian edile, in 188 B. C., when, with his colleague, C. Sēmprōnius Blēsus, he repeated the plebeian games for one day, which is all of his history that is known (Liv. xxxix. 7).

P. Furius, P. Fūri, m. a commissioner, appointed, with other two, to distribute lands among the Romans, at Antium, in 467 B. C. (Liv. iii. 1).—2. An associate of Cātīlina, and one of the most active in strengthening and accelerating that plot for the destruction of the Commonwealth (Cic. Or. Cat. iii. 6). He was a native of Fēsūla, Fiezola, hence Sallustius calls him always Fesulanus, without giving him his proper name (Cat. 59 &c.). He fell fighting, in the first ranks in the battle at Pistōria, Pistoja, in which the rebels were totally routed, and the greater part killed. Cicero likewise mentions him as one of the conspirators.

P. Furius Philus, P. Fūri Philī, m. obtained his second praetorship, in 218 B. C., when the administration of justice between Roman citizens and foreigners fell to his lot. From M. Claudius Mārcellus he received the command of the fleet, with which he sailed to Africa, and returned to Lalybēum, severely wounded. Although his life had been despaired of, he recovered, and was elected censor, in 216 B. C., an office which he exercised with great strictness. L. Mētēllus, a tribune of the people, whom Furius and his colleague, M. Atilius, had degraded from equestrian rank, removed from his tribe, and had disfranchised, from his having formed a conspiracy at Cannae to abandon Italy, attempted to bring the censors to trial, but his nine colleagues protested against his conduct, and they were consequently discharged. The death of Furius prevented their closing the lustrum (Liv. xxii. 35 seq.).—2. Son of a man of consular dignity, who gave information of the design which several young noblemen were then adopting, to desert their native country, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 53).—3. Obtained the praetorship, and the government of the north of Spain, in 176 B. C. On a complaint of the Spaniards for heinous crimes, the senate brought him to trial, and his cause having been adjourned, at a second hearing it was pleaded in his behalf, that he was gone into banishment at Prēnēstē (Liv. xli. 21).—4. Consul, in 138 B. C. Spain having, by lot, become his province, he compelled Q. Mētēllus, and Q. Pōmpēius, both of consular rank, but his violent enemies, to accompany him thither, as lieutenant-generals (Val. Max. iii. 7).

Q. Furius, Q. Fūri, m. pontifex māximus, was appointed to hold an election of the tribunes of the people, on Mōns Avēntinus, in 449 B. C., after they had returned from Mōns Sacer (Liv. iii. 54).

Sex. Fūrius Fūsus, Sex. Fūrii Fūsi, m. a Roman consul, in 488 B. C. During that year, Vētūria, the mother, and Volūmna, the wife, of Cōrōlānus, at the head of a large concourse of women, prevailed on that gallant soldier to withdraw his troops from the Roman territory (Liv. ii. 39).

Sp. Fūrius, Sp. Fūrii, m. (surnamed, in consular calendar, Fūsus), obtained the consulship, in 481 B. C., and the command of an army against the Veiēntes, but he performed nothing memorable (Liv. ii. 43).—2. Consul, in 464 B. C. He was sent against the Æqui, who compelled him to retreat to his camp, which they besieged with such vigour, that a messenger could not be despatched to Rome for assistance. After he had endured the siege a considerable time, he put the enemy to flight, by a sudden sally from the Decuman gate. Greater advantages might have been obtained, had he not dreaded an attack on his camp from the opposite side. His brother rashly pursued the Æqui, which cost him his life; and the consul turned back, rushed into the thick of the fight, where he received a severe wound, and was with difficulty carried off by his attendants. The Roman army was in danger of utter destruction, had not T. Quinctius come to their relief. The Æqui were now charged on both sides, and a great number killed (Liv. iii. 4, 5).—3. A tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 377 B. C. He and M. Hōrātius marched against the Volsi, towards Antium, but found no enemy, destroyed every thing in the fields, and drove off the spoil (Liv. vi. 31).

Sp. Fūrius Cāmillus, Sp. Fūrii Cāmilli, m. son of the great Cāmillus, was the first prætor at Rome, an office which he obtained in 365 B. C. (Liv. vii. 1).

Fūrius, i. m. a Roman soldier, under Q. Fabius Māximus, in the war against Hānnibal, in Italy (Sil. Ital. vii. 619).—2. A lieutenant-general of Augustus, in Spain (Flor. iv. 12).—3. A man, condemned for adultery, with Claudia Pulchra q. v. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52).

C. Fūrius, C. Fūrii, m. a friend of the orator Cicero, and probably the person mentioned by Tacitus (Orat. 21. Cic. Ep. ad Fam. x. 1 seq.).

Fūsciūlēnus, i. m. a usurer, to whom, and Fāvētīnus, Saufellus appears to have mortgaged his property (Mart. ii. 74).

Fūscinus, i. m. a man, to whom Jūvénālis addresses his xvth satire. His name does not occur in any other author, of his history consequently nothing is known.

Fūscus, i. m. a præfect of Dōmītiānus, who was killed fighting in Dacia (Mart. vi. 76).

Fūsius, v. Fufius, i. m. a man, who acted the part of Ilionē, in the play of that name, written by Accius, or, Pācūvius. The ghost of Pōlydōrus came to inform Ilionē, when asleep, that Pōlymnēstor, king of Thrācia, had murdered him, and to beg the rites of interment. This rendered it necessary to introduce, on the stage, Ilionē in bed, and Fūsius, having drunk to excess, was so fast asleep, that Cātīnus could not waken him by exclaiming two thousand times, says Hōrātius, māter te appello. Pōlydōrus calls his sister, māter, because she had brought him up with maternal kindness and anxiety, perhaps also to excite deeper sympathy (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 60).

C. Fūsius Cita, C. Fūsi Cita, m. a respectable Roman knight, to whom Cæsar had given the superintendence of provisions at Gēnābum, Orleans. He was massacred by the Cārnutes, headed by Cōtūatus and Cānētōdūnus, q. v. (Cæs. B. G. vii. 3).

Sp. Fūsius, Sp. Fūsi, m. appointed Pāter patratus, to conclude a treaty betwixt the Romans and Albans (Liv. i. 24).

G

Gābāli, orum, m. a people of Gāllia, France, who lived on the S. E. of mount Cēvēnna, Cevennes, near the source of Oltis, the Olt, one of the northern branches of Gārūnna, the Garonne (Cæs. B. G. vii. 64 seq.). Their chief town, Anderitum, afterwards Gābāli, now Jacobs, stood near the springs of Triōbris, the Truneyre, and their country is called Gecaudan.

Gābar, āris, m. a man, in the army of Hānnibal, whom Scēvōla overcame at the battle of Cānna (Sil. Ital. ix. 385).

Gabāza, æ, f. a district of Sōgdiāna (Curt. viii. 4).

Gābūi, orum, m. a town of Lātium, now in ruins. It was about equidistant from Rome and Prænēstē, and so strong that Tārquīnius Sūpērbus was unable to take it by force, and, therefore, had recourse to a most iniquitous stratagem, which his own son, at his command, executed (Liv. i. 53 seq. Flor. i. 7). Inh. Gābīni, orum (Sing. Gābinus, i. m. Adj. Gābinēnsis, is, e, et, Gābinus, a, um. Gābinēnsis ager, the territory of Gābīi, nearly two hundred acres of which,

Plinius says, shook, when horses were ridden over it (i. 241). Gābinus ager (Liv. iii. 8). Gābina via, the road which led from Rome to Gābīi (Liv. ii. 11). Gābina urbs, Gābīi (Ov. Fast. ii. 709). Gābinus cinetus (Liv. v. 46). Gābinus ritus (Gābinus mōs, Claud. viii. 6), the manner of the Gābīni (Luc. Phar. i. 596). According to the Scholiast on Lūcānus, the priests of the Gābīni, naked, were slaying victims for sacrifices, when the sudden arrival of an enemy was announced, on which, unwilling to put on clothes, they tucked their togas round their bodies, charged, and put them to flight. In consequence of this successful resistance, a decree was passed, that they should always offer their sacrifices habited in that particular manner. Gābinum sārūm, the Gabian stone, which resisted fire (Tac. Ann. xv. 43). It was not the hardest, but, except the Alban, the other stones in Italy, on being heated, cracked, and flew off in pieces; or, on being burned a certain time, were reduced to a powder by sprinkling water on them before they became cool (Vitruv.).

Gābīna, æ, f. a rich woman, who presented

Achillas, q. v., with as much money as raised him to the rank of a Roman knight (Mart. vii. 56).

Gābīnīanus, i. m. a very celebrated rhetorician, who taught in Gallia, France. Tacitus mentions him as an orator, and Eusebius, as a rhetorician. His admirers reckoned him another Cicero, and, from him, orators of this description were called Cicērones Gābīnīāni (Tac. Orat. 26).

Gābīnīus, i. m. appointed commander of the garrison of Scōdra, in 160 B. C., by L. Anicius, on the conquest of Gēntius (Liv. xlv. 26).

Gābīnīus Scēcundus, Gābīnī Scēcūdi, m. a Roman commander, who conquered the Chauci, a German nation. For this victory the emperor Claudius allowed him to take the surname of Chaucus (Suet. Claud. 24).

A. Gābīnīus, A. Gābīnī, m. a lieutenant-general, who, after having been successful against the Lūcāni, and, having taken by storm very many of their towns, falls in an attack on their camp, in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 76). Florus mentions his success against the Mārsi, in the Social war (iii. 18).—2. A zealous partizan of Cæsar, whom he succeeded in the consulship, 56 B. C. By him the law (Lex Gābīnīa de Militia) was passed, which conferred on Pōmpēius the power of carrying on the war against the Pirates, who infested the Mediterranean Sea, for three years; and compelled the kings, whose territories bordered on that sea, to supply him with every kind of necessary. He also enacted other laws. In his consulship, he supported Clōdīus in procuring sentence of banishment against Cicero, for which he was rewarded with the province of Syria. In the government of that country, he permitted himself to be bribed, and restored Ptolēmaeus Aulētes to the throne of Egypt. But on his return to Rome, he was brought to trial for his misconduct, and, though defended by the eloquence of Cicero, at the request of Pōmpēius, was banished. Cæsar recalled him, and he held the office of a lieutenant-general in his army during the civil war. Appian states that he died a natural death, whilst besieged by Augustus, in Sālōnæ. Adj. Gābīnīus, et. Gābīnīanus, a. um. Gābīnīa lex. Gābīnīāni milites (Val. Max. iv. 1).

P. Gābīnīus Cāpito, P. Gābīnī Cāpītōnis, m. a Roman, of equestrian rank, whom Cicero calls Cimber, adding, that he was addicted to every species of wickedness (Cic. Or. Cat. iii. 3). He suffered capital punishment for his treasonable conduct (Sal. Cat. 17, 55).

Gāddir, the Phœnician name, according to Sāllūstīus, of Tārtēssus, but of Gādes, Cádiz, according to Plīnius and Sōlinus. In the writings of these authors, Gādir, v. Gāddir, signifies seven, a name which several cities in the land of Canaan likewise bore.

Gādes, ium, sometimes found in the singular, Gādīs, is, f. anciently Gādīra, orum, n. Cádiz, an island and town of Spain, near the mouth of the river Bætis, the Guadalquivir, and about 40 miles from the entrance of Frētum Gādītānum, the Strait of Gibraltar. At one part, this island is only about 700 feet from the continent, over which is the bridge Suaco, strongly fortified at both ends, by redoubts and other works. The town was built by the Phœnicians (Vel. Pat.

i. 2), hence Tyria Gades (Luc. Phœr. vii. 187). Gādibus conditis extra orbem, Cadiz built beyond the globe, i. e. the continent (Plin. i. 573). The ancients seem to have frequently included more islands under this name than one, hence Lūcānus, a primis Gādibus (Phœr. ix. 414). Perhaps Erythræa was comprehended under that name (Plin. i. 497). Inh. Gādītāni, orum (Sing. Gādītānus, i), m. according to Jūstinus were of Phœnician descent (xlv. 5). From Mārtilis, Stātus, and Jūvēnālis, the natives, particularly the girls, appear to have been extremely lewd and lascivious at the time when they wrote; hence Mārtilis, de Gādibus improbis (v. 79), and were, in ancient times, much given to music and dancing; hence Mārtilis has Jocosa Gades (i. 62). C. Jūlius Cæsar granted the privileges of Roman citizens to the Gādītāni, in 51 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 110). Adj. Gādītānus, a. um. Frētum Gādītānum, the Strait of Gibraltar, is about twenty-four miles long, and, where narrowest, eight miles broad. The ancients likewise called this Strait, Frētum Hērēclēum, because it was said, that Hērēclēs, on his expedition against Gērōn, king of Cadiz, opened that communication between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea, which were, before that period, separated by the continents of Europe and Africa, being joined there. The town of Gibraltar contains about 7000 inhabitants, and has been long in possession of the British. The rock on which the famous fortress, perhaps the strongest in the world, stands, is 6000 feet long, and 1400 above the level of the sea. Sinus Gādītānus, the Bay of Cadiz. Gādītānis mōdis, lasciviously (Mart. vi. 71).

Gādītānus, i. m. a man, who had the vanity of claiming the name of a poet, to which he had, in reality, no pretensions. From his love of poetic fame, he assumed, as his own, verses written by another (Mart. x. 102).

Gæsūm, i. n. a kind of dart, used chiefly, at first, by barbarous nations, but afterwards adopted by the Romans. From the expression of Silius Itālicus, Alpina gæsa, some suppose that the shaft was hard wood, like that which grows on the Alps, to which, in some degree, its great weight might, probably, be referred. Perhaps it rather had reference to the Gallic inhabitants of these mountains, for this weapon was much used by the Gauls. We find it also mentioned among the arms of the Spaniards, Germans, Macedonians, and Africans. Fēstus says, it was heavy, and, according to some, all of iron, in which case Alpina can have no reference to wood. Ancient authors do not furnish any certain or precise description of gæsūm (Liv. viii. 8. Cæs. B. G. iii. 4).

Gætūllā, v. Gētūllā, æ, f. an extensive country of Africa, to the south of Maurītāniā, Morocco, and Nūmīdiā, Algiers. It formed part of the kingdom of Māsīnīssa. Inh. Gætūllī, orum (Sing. Gætūllus, i), m. the Gætulians. Sāllūstīus, from books written in the Punic language, which belonged to Hiēmpul, gives the following character of the Gætūllī and Libyēs: "Africa was at first possessed by the Gætulians and Libyans, a savage and untutored people, whose food was the flesh of wild beasts, or grass of the field, like cattle; subject to no established customs, laws, or government, a race of wanderers, who had no settled habitation, and who lay down to rest whenever night overtook them" (Sål. Jug. 18). Like the Numidians, they excelled in horsemanship, and, like them, rode without saddles, hence Gætulus inculto (i. e. non strūto) ēquo (Luc. Phar. iv. 678). Adj. Gætulus, et, Gætüllus, a, um, of Gætulia, African; also tawny. Gætula bellūa, the elephant (Juv. Sat. x. 158). Gætula gētes, the inhabitants of Gætulia (Plin. i. 524). Gætulica pūrpura (Id. 747).

Gætulicus, i, m, an epigrammatist, whose example Märtälis pleads as a justification of his lascivious verses (Epist. ad Lect.).

Gaiso, ōnis, m, a man, by whom Cōstāns was killed, near the town Hēlēna, Elua (Aur. Vic. Ep. 41).

Gālā, m, king of the Mässyli, in Nūmīdia, Algiers. He was the father of Māsīnās; at the entreaty of his son and the Carthaginians, he joined the latter, and made war on Sýphāx (Liv. xxiv. 48 seq.).—2. A Carthaginian, killed in Spain, by C. Lælius, then serving under his friend Scīpiō Africānus (Sil. Ital. xv. 464).

Gālactōphāgi, orum, m, a Scythian nation, who, as the name imports, lived on milk (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Gālæsus, i, m, an aged Latin, who wished to mediate a peace between the Trojans, and Italians who fought under Turnus. He was a man of the strictest justice, and formerly possessed Ausonian fields to the greatest extent, which he cultivated with an hundred ploughs. These lands were pastured by five flocks of sheep, and as many herds of cattle (Virg. Æn. vii. 535).—2. A Roman, whose name was derived from Gālæsus, the Galeas, in Cālābria. At the siege of Sāgūntum, Murriedro, he fell by the hand of Hānnibal (Sil. Ital. i. 438).

Gālæsus, i, m, the Galeas, a river of Cālābria, near Tārēntum, Taranto, the banks of which were celebrated by the Latin poets, both for their pleasantness and fertility. The sheep, which pastured on this river, yielded very fine wool, to preserve which they were covered with skins. This practice is mentioned by Hōrātius (Od. ii. 6. 10). In allusion to the whiteness of the wool, Märtälis writes Albus Gālæsus (xii. 64), and Nivēus Gālæsus (xi. 23). It was also called Eurōtas, from the river of that name, near Lācēdæmon.

Gālānthia, idis, f, the maid servant of Alcēmēnē, who perceived that the protracted pains of her mistress proceeded from the hatred of Jūno, and, by a stratagem, overreached that goddess, on which she was instantly delivered of Hērēclēs. Not satisfied with the success of her expedient, Gālānthia laughed at the deceived, on which Jūno immediately transformed her into a weasel (Ov. Met. ix. 316).

Gālātēa, a, f, a daughter of Nērēus and Dōris, hence called Nērīnē (Virg. Æn. ix. 103).—2. A frolicsome country girl (Virg. B. iii. 64).—3. A woman, to whom Hōrātius addresses one of his odes, and this is all that is known respecting her (Od. iii. 27).

Gālātia, a, f, a fort, in Cāmpānia, which Hānnibal took, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 5).

Gālātia, e, Gallōgræcia, a, f, a country of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded by Phrygia, Cāppādocia, Pōntus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. Inh. Gallōgræci, orum, et, Gālātæ, arum, m, were originally Gālī, who, in a powerful body, under Brēnnus q. v., migrated eastward, and arrived in the territories of the Dārdāni q. v., where a sedition arose, and twenty thousand of them, under the chieftains Lēonōrius and Lutārius, separated from Brēnnus, and went into Thrācia. Fighting all who refused compliance with their demands, they imposed tribute on the nations which wished for peace, advanced to Býzāntium, Constantinople, kept possession of the towns there for some time, and laid under contribution the coast of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora. Afterwards they felt an inclination to cross into Asia, and, having taken Lysimachia by stratagem, added, by force of arms, the survivors to their number. Lutārius seized on two decked ships, and three open barques, from Maccēdōnia, sent by Antipāter as spies, under pretext of an embassy, and by these carried over his army, by divisions, in a few days. Whilst adjusting matters with Antipāter, who commanded on the opposite coast, Lēonōrius returned to Býzāntium, whence, by the assistance of Nicōmēdes, he crossed, with the Gauls under him, into Asia, where he and Lutārius, having joined, defeated Zibeta, who possessed part of Bithynia, and reduced the whole of that country under Nicōmēdes. As there were three tribes or clans, the Tōlistōboi, Trēcēmi, and Tectōsāgi, they divided Asia into three parts, according to which they were to impose contributions to be paid to each, and they levied tribute from every part of that country; even the kings of Syria did not refuse to pay them a certain sum annually. Attālus, king of Asia, first opposed them, and, contrary to general expectation, obtained a decided victory in a pitched battle. The Roman consul, Cn. Mānlius Vīlso, compelled these barbarous, but valiant tribes, to sue for peace, in 191 B. C., prescribed the terms on which they should live with their neighbours, forbade their wandering about in arms, or going beyond their own territories, and threatened the vengeance of the senate in the event of disobedience. For the conquest of this nation he had the honour of a triumph, in 188 B. C. From this period it is probable they occupied only the country known in history by the name of Gallōgræcia, or, Gālātia. Livius, who calls them often Gālī, mentions that they fought for hire, and part were in the army of Antiochus, in the battle at Thýatira (Liv. xxxvii. 8 seq.). Adj. Gālāticus, a, um. Gālāticus limes (Solin. xlv. 1).

Gālba, a, m, the name of a branch of Sūlpiciū, v. Sūlpiciū, or, according to others, the surname of the founder of that tribe.

Gālba, a, m, the king of the Succsiōnes, at the time Cæsar invaded Gālīa, France. On account of his knowledge, and love of justice, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces raised by the Belgian states, against the power of Rome, in the second year of the Gallic war (Ces. B. G. ii. 4 seq.).—2. A Roman, killed by Amōrgus, in the battle at Cānnæ (Sil. Ital. x. 194 seq.).

A. Gālba, A. Gālba, m, a buffoon or parasite (Juv. Sat. v. 4), whom some have supposed to be the person mentioned by Quintiliānus (vi. 3. 27), and also by Märtialis (i. 42: x. 101). Commentators, in general, do not agree in considering these three writers as referring to the same character, and for this difference of opinion there appear to be solid grounds; the Gálba in Juvénalis is a parasite; in Quintiliānus a libertine; and in Mártialis a buffoon. Now, although it is not impossible for these unmanly and reprehensible practices to appear in the same character, yet it is perhaps more probable to suppose, that each author had a different individual in view.

Gálbanus, et, Gálbūlus, a, um, according to some a pale colour, others suppose it to have been yellow, whilst others maintain that it was sky blue. Juvénalis seems to distinguish between the last and that denoted by Gálbanus (Sat. ii. 9). Gálbanūlus, a, um, denoted the wearer of this colour. Gálbula ales (Mart. xiii. 68), otherwise called avis Ictērus (Plin. iv. 754).

Gálbus. See Chálbus.

Gálēa, a, f, a helmet. Both helmets and shields were used by the Egyptians, and from them were adopted by the Greeks (Herod. iv. 180).

Gálēpsus, i, f, a town of Thrācia (Liv. xlv. 45).

Gálēria, a, f, the second wife of the emperor Vitēllius, a woman of mild character (Tac. Hist. ii. 60—64), who had to him several children, both sons and daughters (Suet. Vit. 6).

C. Gálērius Vālērius Māximīānus, C. Gálērii Vālērii Māximīāni, m, whose original name was Gálērius; that of Vālērius he had from Dioclētianus who adopted him, and Māximīānus from the same emperor, as a warning to him to imitate the fidelity of Māximīānus Hērclēus towards his benefactor. The emperors Dioclētianus and Māximīānus invested him and Cōnstāntius with the title of Caesar, on which the latter received the surname of Chlōrus, on account of the *pale*ness of his complexion, and Gálērius that of Armēntārius, from his having been once a herdsman. Dioclētianus gave him the surname of Jōvius, obliged him to repudiate his wife, and gave him his daughter Vālēria in marriage. Gálērius was born in Dācia, of the lowest parentage, and spent his early years in tending cattle. At what period he entered the army history gives no certain information, but there is no doubt that his military qualifications, which had raised him from a common soldier to the highest station in the army, proved the cause of his adoption. His temper was morose, his manners rude, and he set no value on human life. Dioclētianus assigned for his department Illyriūm, Thrācia, Mācedōnia, and Græcia. His first military expedition of any note was against Nārses, king of Persia, over whom, experiencing several disasters, he gained a most splendid victory, on which Nārses sued for peace. His conduct towards the female prisoners merits commendation, and the Persians acknowledged their inferiority to the Romans in that respect, as much as in arms. This victory transported with pride the valiant conqueror, who, in consequence of it, assumed the titles of Adiabēnīcus, Armēnīcus, Mēdicus, and Persicus. The success of his arms against the Persians gained him a complete ascendancy over Dioclētianus, on whom he prevailed first to persecute the Christians, and then to resign the purple. The consequence of this measure was a division of the empire between Cōnstāntius Chlōrus and Gálērius. Cōnstāntius, eldest son of Cōnstāntius, escaped from the restraint under which he wished to confine him, and on obtaining the sovereign power Gálērius made Sēverus, Augustus, obliging Cōnstāntius to remain satisfied with the title of Caesar, although the army had proclaimed him Augustus. Māxēntius, son of Māximīānus Hērclēus, and son-in-law of Gálērius, assumed the imperial purple, and Gálērius marched to Italy, with the view of compelling him to resign his usurped authority; but Māxēntius bribed his soldiers, and Gálērius was obliged to return to his province with diminution both of reputation and forces. On this defeat he made Licinius Augustus; and, soon after, necessity compelled him to acknowledge Māximīānus and Cōnstāntius as Augusti. His violence and oppression became so great against all his subjects, particularly the Christians, that the latter attributed the dreadful disease under which he suffered for a whole year, and which at last terminated his life in excessive agony, to the immediate vengeance of the Almighty. Amongst his last days he recalled his persecution of the Christians. He published an edict granting peace and protection to them, in April, 311, and expired next month, as has been supposed, at Sārdica, Sophia, the capital of Dācia (Eutrop. x. 4).

M. Gálērius Trāchālus, M. Gálērii Trāchāli, m, was consul with C. Silius Itālicus, in the year 68. In the civil administration Otho relied on the advice of Gálērius, who had obtained considerable reputation by frequent practice at the bar. After Vitēllius had succeeded to the imperial government, Gálērius owed his safety to the protection of the empress Gálēria (Tac. Hist. i. 90 seq.).

Gālēsus. See Gālāsus.

Gālīlæa, a, f, a district of Phenicia, to the south of the Leitan, and west of Jōrdānes, the Jordan. The Mediterranean forms its western boundary. Inh. Gālīlæi, orum, m, the Galileans. In the year 32, Cūmānus had the government of Gālīlæa, when the Gālīlæi waged a predatory war with their neighbours, the Samaritans, under Antōnius Félix, and they gave up the spoil to their rapacious governors, who connived at their violence and injustice, probably fomenting the feuds between these neighbouring nations with the view of gratifying their own avarice (Tac. Ann. xii. 54).

Gālīa, a, f, a woman to whom Mártialis addresses a number of his epigrams. The poet may have had different persons in view, but it is not necessary to say any thing respecting their characters, as they are not of that description which can be held up either to respect or imitation (ii. 25 seq.).

Gālīlæa, v, Gālīlæia, a, f, Galicia, the northwest province of Spain. Gālīlæa visit flōribus (Claud. xxix. 71). Inh. Gālīlæci, orum, m, claimed to be of Grecian descent (Just. xlv. 3). Dēcius Jūnius Brūtus, consul, carried on war successfully against them, whence he was surnamed Gālīlæcus, or Gālīlæus (Livy. Ep. 56).

Gālīia, a, f, France, an extensive and populous country of Europe, bounded on the E. by Rhēnus, the Rhine, which separates it from Germany, and mount Jura, the boundary of Helvétia, Switzerland, on the W.; but from Jura to the Mediterranean, the limits of Gallia, France, are not exactly ascertained, nor were they always the same. In general, Rhódanus, the Rhone, has been erroneously considered the line of separation between it and Italy, although all agree that Prövincia, Langue doc, Provence, and Dauphiné, lay on both sides of that river. On the N., it had Insula Bätävörum, the United Provinces, or, Holland; on the S., that part of the Mediterranean called Gallicus Sinus, the Gulf of Lyons, and Möntes Pyrænæi, the Pyrenees, which divided Gallia, France, from Hispania, Spain; and on the W., Océanus Cantabricus, the Bay of Biscay, and Frëtum Britanniæ, v. Gallicum, the British Channel. To this country the Romans gave the name of Gallia Transalpina, to distinguish it from the northern part of Italy, Gallia Cisalpina, so called from its lying between Rome and the Alps, and being long in possession of the Gauls, Gallia Comata, from the natives wearing long hair, and Gallia Braccata, from their wearing a kind of trowsers, or breeches. The last appellation seems to have been confined to the inhabitants of the southern district of that country. The population of France is estimated at upwards of 30,000,000. Ancient authors appear frequently to have included part, if not the whole, of Germany in Gallia. Thus "omni Gallia eis Rhenum perdomita" (Sal. Frag. 1). In the history of Livius, it denotes the northern part of Italy: Gallia interior, France (Cæs. B. G. ii. 2). Inh. Galli, orum (Sing. Gallus, i), m. In the early ages of Rome, and perhaps even before that city was built, different tribes of the Gauls crossed the Alps, on purpose to acquire new settlements; but Justinus says, that these migrations were a consequence of an overgrown population, intestine feuds, and continual dissensions at home. They gradually extended their encroachments southward until the north of Italy was wholly in their possession. This historian mentions, that they expelled the Tusci, built Mediolanum, Comum, Brixia, Vercina, Bergomum, Tridentum, and Vicentia (xx. 5). This nation excelled in augury (Just. xxiv. 4). It does not appear at what period the nobility of Gallia obtained the privileges of Roman citizens, but it was some time before the year 48, when they claimed a right to the civil honours of the city. The emperor Claudius supported their claim, which was subsequently granted (Tac. Ann. xi. 23). Grates Gallus agit (Claud. xxii. 186). By Galli are denoted also the priests of Cybele (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 121), and sometimes the inhabitants of Gallia. Adj. Gallienus, Gallienus, et, Gallus, a, um. Gallienus Océanus (Pliny), the Bay of Biscay, and part of the English Channel, i. e. from the mouth of the Seine to the Pyrenees. Gallienus catulus (Catull. xlii. 9). Gallica ora, Gallie mouths, i. e. mouths of Gallie horses (Hor. Od. i. 8. 6). Gallieus axis, the country of France (Juv. viii. 116). Gallieus ager, a district in the north of Italy, which belonged chiefly to the Galli Senones (Liv. xxxix. 44). Gallieum mare (Amm. Mar. xv. 11 seq.). Adj. Gallieus, after the manner of the Gauls, or French.

Gallie, arum, f. This word occurs several times in the Commentaries of Cæsar, and seems intended to denote the whole country.

Cæsar probably used the term in this number, when his object was both to suggest and include the three great divisions of Gallia. But, both with respect to the true reading, B. C. i. 35, and the import of the word Gallias which occurs there, critics have advanced very different conjectures and opinions. Some contend that it is the name of a town; but this is not supported by good authority. Others have, with more probability, supposed that the true reading is Victos Salpes, which they support by Strabo, Florus, and Plinius. The later Roman writers used Gallia perhaps more frequently than Gallia.

Galliagra, n, f. a town in Syracuse, near Portus Trogiliorum (Liv. xxv. 23).

Gallienus, i, m. whose full name was P. Licinius Gallienus, the eldest son of the Roman emperor Valerianus, received from his maternal grandfather the surname Gallienus, and by it he is generally known in history. At the time Valerianus came to the imperial title, Gallienus was declared Cæsar by the senate, and married Salonia, by whom he had two sons, Salonus and Valerianus. Beset by enemies on all hands, Valerianus concerted measures for his own security, with that view sent Gallienus, when only twenty-one years of age, into France, to keep in check the Germans, and appointed Póstumus, a skilful general, his counsellor. Success attended their arms in that country, the merit of which can scarcely be attributed to Gallienus, on account of his youth; besides, at no period of his life, did he acquire great reputation by his martial exploits. His cold-hearted indifference to his father's fate sinks him to a very low degree of human character, and must have embittered the degrading captivity of the unfortunate emperor. Excessive licentiousness destroyed in him every honourable sentiment, and every natural feeling. To considerable strength of understanding, he added liveliness of imagination, and he wrote well, both in prose and verse. His indolence and love of unrestrained indulgence yielded, when necessity required, to active exertion, and military enterprise; but, danger being over, he sunk back into his natural supineness. A character, so lost in effeminacy and vice, gave encouragement to rivals within the state, and to enemies without. Odénathus, king of Palmira, exerted himself in defence of the eastern boundary of the empire, and the fidelity which he manifested to Valerianus he continued to his son. One of the wisest and most popular acts of Gallienus was associating Odénathus with him in the government, when numbers were declaring themselves emperors in different provinces. Over Ingenius, who commanded in Pannonia, and who had assumed the purple, Gallienus obtained a decisive victory, after which he issued an order for the extirpation of all the males. His officers generally defeated his enemies, whether domestic or foreign. Near Milan he fell by a wound from an arrow, in March, 268, as he went only half-armed, to oppose a sally of the troops from that town under Aurélius, who had declared himself emperor in the north of Italy, the province which Gallienus had appointed him to defend. His death has been attributed to Claudius and Marcianus, two of his own officers, who entered into a conspiracy against him. His brother Vale- riānus, and his son Sālōninus, were cut off by those who wished to extirpate the imperial family. Eutrōpius mentions only the death of Vālērīanus, not that of Sālōninus (ix. 11). Every order of the state despised or detested Gālhiēnus on account of his prodigious vices and barbarity, except the Christians, whom he protected, and, at the beginning of his reign, stopped the persecutions raised against them by his father. During the reign of Gālhiēnus, from the number of those who assumed the purple, the state was said to be governed by thirty tyrants, probably in allusion to the conduct of the Lacedæmonians with respect to the Athenians, since the whole usurpers did not exceed twenty.

Gālho. See M. Annæus Nōvātus.

Gālita, m. a rich, old, childless man, or, perhaps a man labouring under a lingering disease, whose favour the legacy-hunters endeavoured to obtain by prayers for his recovery or longevity (Juv. Sat. xii. 99 seq.).

M. Gāllus, M. Gālīi, m. a senator by whom the emperor Tiberius was in early life adopted. As Gāllius was of the party opposed to Augustus, Tiberius soon discontinued the use of his name, but retained possession of the estates (Suet. Tib. 6).

Q. Gāllus, Q. Gālīi, m. a prætor who waited on Augustus with a double tablet under his clothes, which Augustus supposed to be a sword. Without making any search to ascertain the fact, the emperor ordered him to be put to the torture, and afterwards, as he made no confession, to be killed; not, however, before he had, with his own hands, plucked out both his eyes. Of that cruel transaction Augustus gave a different account, one more favourable to his own character (Suet. Aug. 27). Applianus says, that Augustus ordered him to go to his brother, then governor of Africa, that he went on board a ship, and was never afterwards seen (Bel. Civ. 537).—2. Another of this name, whom Cicero defended, when arraigned for bribery (Cic. Brut. 80).

Gāllogræcia. See Gālātia.

Gālloñātis, is, f. a fort in Mauritania.

C. Gālloñius, C. Gālloñi, m. a Roman knight, the friend of Dōmitiānus, to whom M. Varro gave the command of a garrison of six cohorts at Cāles, v. Gādes, Cádiz. After Cæsar had called a meeting of the states at Cōrdūba, Cordoba, the inhabitants of Gādes, Cádiz, embraced the interests of that general, and drove Gālloñius out of the town (Cæs. B. C. ii. 18).

P. Gālloñius, P. Gālloñi, m. a man so immoderately addicted to gluttony that his name became proverbial for a glutton (Hor. Sat. ii. 2. 47). Lucilius lashes him with great severity in his satires, calling him gurgus (Sat. iv.). Cicero quotes the lines, upon which he makes several remarks, and describes Gālloñius as a notorious guzzler (Fin. ii. 8).

Gāllus, i, m. a friend of Prōpērtius, to whom he addresses one of his elegies (i. 5). Many consider this a fictitious name.—2. A man whom Cātullus holds up to ridicule for his stupidity, and to detestation for his vices (lxxviii).—3. A friend of Juvēnalis, to whom he addresses Satire 16th.—4. A Roman to whom Martiālis writes an epigram as an apology for not saluting him in the morning (l. 109). Perhaps he is the same person to whom the poet writes another epigram, accusing his wife of avarice and adultery. Other epigrams are addressed to Gāllus, which ought never to have been written.—5. See C. Vibius Trēbōntianus Gāllus.—6. Received from his cousin, the emperor Cōstantius, the title of Cæsar, and, after many acts of tyranny, was put to death. From Eutrōpius it may be inferred, that his heart was a stranger to tenderness, and that, if he had been invested with the full power of government, his natural disposition would have appeared in deeds of horrible atrocity (x. 13).

Gāllus, i, m. the Gatipo, a western branch of Sāngārius, the Sakaria. This river has its source in Lycāōnā; from it the priests of Cýbèle were called Gālīi. Whoever drank of this stream became mad, and immediately mutilated themselves (Ov. Fast. iv. 364 seq.).

Gāllus Asīnius, Gālī Asīni, m. was the son of Asīnius Pōllio, whom Virgilius and Hōrātius have immortalized. His descent gave him a high rank among his fellow-citizens, and he took an active part in the public transactions of his time. An intrepid freedom, both of speech and conduct, distinguished him from the timorous and couching flatterers of the emperor Tiberius, whom he offended by the openness of his manner, and, perhaps also, by his attachment to the republican form of government. To blacken his character, and to tarnish the memory of Agrippina, the emperor Tiberius maintained that he had criminal intercourse with her, a slander which Tacitus has refuted (Ann. vi. 25).—2. Grandson of the orator Pōllio. By seducing a number of freedmen and slaves of the emperor Claudius, he and Stātilius Cōrvinus formed a conspiracy against the life of their sovereign (Suet. Claud. 13).

Gāllus Terrīnus, Gālī Terrīni, m. a senator who, on the loss of sight, resolved to starve himself to death. Augustus, to whom he was scarcely known, paid him a visit, and by his counsel prevailed on him to desist from so immoral a purpose (Suet. Aug. 53).

P. Gāllus, P. Gālī, m. a Roman knight banished from Italy in the year 65, for no other offence than his intimacy with Fēnius Rūfus, and connexion with L. Antistius Vētus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 12).

Gāmāla, w, f. Bautzah, or, Szammagh, a town of Arābia Petrea (of Judæa, Suet.), of difficult access; standing on a rock bounded by precipices. Here Ptolēmaus, king of Egypt, defeated Dēmētrius, son of Antigōnus. Gāmāla was taken by Titus, who afterwards succeeded his father Vespāsianus as emperor of Rome (Just. xv. 1. Suet. Tit. 4).

Gāmāxus, i, m. a king of a small part of India. To Alexander the Great he was delivered up in chains, in 327 B. C. (Curt. viii. 13).

Gāmbrīvīi, orum, m. the Gambrivians, a German nation mentioned by Tacitus along with the Marsians, Suevians, and Vandals (Mor. Ger. 2).

Gānga, w, m. a small stream in Thracia (Ap. Bel. Civ. 650).

Gāngārīda, arum, m. a Scythian nation, which, in the war against the Argonauts, fought under the standard of Dāthis sent by Dārāps. Their country is unknown, unless Vālērīus Flāccus has fallen into a geographical error; and supposed them to be inhabitants of the Gānges, of which the name of their prince Dārāps affords some ground of belief; Dārāps, probably from the city Dārāpas, and epic poets frequently give the name of the city, country, or river to the commander of the forces.—2. An Indian nation conquered by Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 8).

Gānges, i. m. the Ganges, a very large river of India, the sources of which remain to be explored. According to the opinion most generally received, it takes its rise in the mountains of Thibet, at the distance of about 1400 miles from the Indian Ocean. The number of noble tributary streams which fall into this river, increases its magnitude greatly beyond what could be supposed from the length of its course. After traversing a great extent of rich country, the Ganges pours its waters into the Bay of Bengal, by eight mouths. Of its large and numerous branches, the Burampooter, or Burampoot is the greatest. This grand river rises not far from the source of the Ganges; its course is nearly of equal length, and at their junction it is upwards of 4 miles broad. The delta formed by the Ganges, beginning about 220 miles from the coast, and its extreme mouths being nearly 200 miles distant where they are lost in the sea, contains more than twice the area of that of the Nile. The Ganges is thirty feet deep when low, at 600 miles from the sea; its current between 2½ and 3 miles an hour, when not affected by tides or floods. This seems to be the common run of rivers in level tracts. Gāngētis, i. f. of the Ganges, with relation to a female, or a noun feminine. Gāngārīda, arum, v. Gāngārīdes, dum, m. a people living on or near the east bank of that river (Plin. i. 685), conquered by Alexander the Great, according to Justinus (xii. 8). This seems doubtful. Adj. Gāngēticus, a, um. Gāngētica tigris (Ov. Met. vi. 636).

Gānnāscus, i. m. a commander of the Chalcians, who made an inroad into the Roman provinces in the year 47, and, having come by stratagem into the hands of Cōrbūlo, he put him to death. He was by birth a Caprician, and his character was that of a roving freebooter, who disregarded the obligation of treaties and of good faith. At a former period, he had served in the Roman army (Tac. Ann. xi. 18 seq.).

Gānos, i. f. a town on the western shore of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and in the vicinity of Hiēron ōros, the Holy Mountain.

Gānūmēdes, i. m. the governor of Arsinoë, the younger daughter of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, by whose agency she put Achillas to death. In return for this service, she appointed him commander of the Egyptian army (Hirt. B. Al. 4 seq.). Auspiciis Gānūmēdis, under the auspices of Gānūmēdes (Luc. Phar. x. 531).—2. The youngest son of Tros, king of Troy, and Cāllirhōē, consequently grandson of Ilus, hence Ovidius calls him Ilīades. Jūpiter, induced by his uncommon beauty, assumed the form of an eagle, and carried him off when hunting on mount Ida, on purpose to appoint him cupbearer in place of Hēbē, the goddess of youth, who was the daughter of Jūno. This was one of the causes of that goddess' hatred of the Trojans (Ov. Met. x. 155). It has been stated that horses were given to his father, as a compensation for the bereavement of his son (Paus. v. 24). Apollōdōrus states, that Ilus died, leaving no children, but this does not appear to have been the opinion of Ovidius, and most probably did not agree with the tradition received by his countrymen (Apol. iii. 12). The ancient Phliasians built a temple to a goddess whom they called Gānūmēda, but their descendants changed her name to Hēbē (Paus. ii. 13). The poets frequently use Gānūmēdes to signify a cupbearer. Valērius Flaccus calls him Phrygius minister (v. 695). Gatūlus Gānūmēdes, a tawny cupbearer (Juv. Sat. v. 59). Adj. Gānūmēdus, a, um. Gānūmēda mānus (Mart. viii. 39).—3. Whom Ptolēmeus, king of Egypt, appointed governor of Ænus, and who betrayed it to Philippus, king of Macedōnia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).

Garabactra, Curt. ix. 7. Here the reading unquestionably ought to be "circa Bactra."

Gārādus, i. m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Q. Fābius Māximus, dictator, when Hānnibal had surrounded the troops of his colleague, M. Minūcius Rūfus (Sil. Ital. vii. 601).

Gārāmāntes, um (Sing. Gārāmas, āntis), m. a people in the north of Africa towards the sources of Bāgrāda, the Mejorda (Plin. i. 536). Gārāmāntē detecto (Luc. Phar. ix. 460). Gārāmāntis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine. Gārāmāntides unda (Luc. Phar. ix. 369). Adj. Gārāmānticus, a, um, of the Gārāmāntes, Libyan, or Carthaginian. Gārāmāntica signa, African or Carthaginian standards (Sil. Ital. i. 142).

Gārāmus, i. m. a soldier in the army of Hānnibal, killed by Mōpsus (Sil. Ital. ii. 110).

Gārgānus, i. m. Monte di S. Angelo, a mountain of Apūlia, which projects into the Gulf of Venice, hence sometimes called a promontory. Virgilius includes it in Iapygia; hence, Apūlus Gārgānus (Luc. Phar. v. 380), and Gārgānus Iāpyx (Virg. Æn. xi. 247. Plin. i. 355). The wood which grew upon this mountain seems to have been chiefly oak (Hor. Od. ii. 9. 7).

Gārgānus, i. m. a horse of the Roman consul Scipio, which he rode at the first engagement with Hānnibal on his invading Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 266).

Gārgāphīē, es, f. a valley in which was a copious fountain of the same name, near Plātea, a town of Bēcōtia, on the confines of Attica (Ov. Met. iii. 156).

Gārgārus, i. m. (Plur. Gārgāra, orum, n.) Kozdaghy, the highest range of mount Ida, in which a late traveller supposes Scāmānder, the Mender, takes its rise. The top of it was sacred to Jūpiter, on which he sat to view the Greeks and Trojans contend in battle (Hom. Il. viii. 48 seq.). At the bottom, this mountain is cultivated and fertile, the middle part is covered with wood, and the region towards the summit with perpetual snow. There appears to have been also a town of the same name on this part of Ida. To its lofty woods Ovidius refers (Ep. Her. xvi. 107), and to its fertility (Art. Am. i. 57). Stēphānus derives the name from Gārgārus, a son of Jūpiter. Virgilius considers it as belonging to Mýsia. Inh. Gārgārē, orum, m. (Stēph.). Adj. Gārgārus, a, um.

Gārgēus, i. m. a man born perhaps at Gārgēus upon Ligēris, the Loire (Sil. Ital. v. 137). Here the readings vary greatly, and the meaning of necessity remains doubtful.

Gärgëttus, i, m. a village in Attica, at which Epicurus, founder of the Epicurean sect, was born. Luh. Gärgëtti, orum, m. Senior Gärgëttius, Epicurus (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 94).

Gärgillanus, i, m. a poor man, on whom Martialis writes an epigram (iii. 30). The poet addresses other epigrams to Gärgillanus, if the same person, gives a different view of his character in each, but all calculated to depress him in the estimation of the reader.

Gärgilius, i, m. a man ambitious, when of an advanced age, of being considered an excellent hunter, on that account used to go out with a great retinue in the morning, and returned in the evening with a boar which he had bought. By this deception he expected to make the people believe the animal had been killed by himself (Hor. Epis. i. 6. 58).—2. An infamous character (Mart. iii. 96).

Gärgoris, is, m. the most ancient king of the Cünetes, who was the first that taught the art of collecting honey (Just. xlv. 4).

Gariënes, is, m. a guest of Philippus, king of Mäcedonia, whom that monarch killed in the midst of a feast at Cyparissia, in violation of all laws, civil and divine (Liv. xxxii. 21).

Gärltes, um, m. a people of Aquitania, to the north of the Ausci (Caes. B. G. iii. 27).

Gärricus, i, m. a man to whom Martialis addresses an epigram, complaining that he had not received from him the usual gifts (xi. 106).

Gärlü, orum, m. a people of Liguria, who lived on this side of the Apennines (Liv. xli. 19).

Gärümna, e, m. the Garonne, a river of France, which rises in the valley of Arran, to the south of Bertrand, runs with rapidity N. N. E. to Tölösa, Toulouse, afterwards N. N. W. to Guienne, and falls into Océanus Cantabricus, v. Märë Aquitanicum, the Bay of Biscay. The general course of this river, which extends to about 250 miles, is N. W. It receives a number of tributary streams both on the right and left bank, some of which are considerable. After its junction with Düränus, the Dordogne, below Bürdigala, Bordeaux, it assumes the name of Gironde. According to C. Julius Caesar's division of Gallia, France, the Garonne was the boundary of Aquitania on the N., and separated that district from Gallia Celtica. It is navigable to Cözres, 60 leagues from its mouth, and communicates with the Mediterranean by means of the Royal Canal, about 180 miles long, made through Languedoc by Louis XIV. This great work was begun in 1666, and completed in 1680. At the one extremity it joins the Garonne, about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile below Tölösa, Toulouse, and the other is lost in the lake Tun. At some places it passes over bridges of a great height, and, at others, is cut through solid rock for 1000 paces together. It has no less than 64 locks of 8 feet each, and is, for a considerable space (720 feet), carried through a mountain near Besiers. The breadth, including the towing paths, is 144 feet, the depth 6, and the length 180 miles. Magnus Gärümna (Tib. i. 7. 11). Gärünni, orum, m. people who lived on the banks of the Garonne.

Gauda, e, m. a noble Numidian, son of Mästänabal, and grandson of Mäcinissa, whom Micäpsa had nominated heir to the crown of Nümidia, falling his immediate successors. Disease had reduced not only his bodily frame, but his mental powers; and his petition to the commander-in-chief, Q. Cæcilius Mätillus, to be allowed to sit next him, and to have a troop of Roman cavalry as his body guard being refused, C. Märius availed himself of that opportunity to inspire this weak-minded prince with revenge against the consul. Nor did the malice and ambition of this inferior officer stop here. On the Numidian nobleman he easily prevailed to write to Rome against Cæcilius, and to request the appointment of Märius to command the forces. In this application he had the address to obtain the concurrence of the merchants resident there on account of trade, and also of some of the military. This is one of the many instances which prove that great events often result from trivial causes. The disaffection of Gauda, in intellect nearly an idiot, contributed to elevate C. Märius to the consulship, and ultimately to place him at the head of the army in Nümidia, which raised his name as a soldier, and gave him an influence in the state, which he afterwards perverted to the very worst of purposes (Sal. Jug. 65).

Gaugämäla, orum (i. e. the Camel's house), n. Canalis, a small town on the east of the Tigris near Arbëla, at which Alexander the Great gained a complete victory over Därius, king of Persia, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 9. Strab. 1047).

Cn. Gävillius, Cn. Gävillü, m. had enlisted recruits at Aquileia, of which he was a native, and, coming with provisions, had nearly entered the Roman camp after it had been taken by the Istrians, in 180 B. C. L. Gävillius appears to have been joined with him in that command. Both escaped to Aquileia, with the loss only of the baggage, where their return excited great alarm, as it did also at Rome a few days after (Liv. xli. 5).

L. Gävillius, L. Gävillü, m. See former article.

Gaulötus, i, m. a chieftain of the Tectösagel Gälli (Liv. xxxviii. 19).

Gaulum, i, n. v. Gaulos, i, f. Gozzo, an island near Melitë, Malta. From Sillus Italicus the sea around it appears to have been remarkably calm and tranquil (xiv. 274). It is thought by some, but inaccurately, to be the island of Cälypsö.

Gaurelëos, i, m. a harbour in the island Andros. The town and citadel fell into the hands of the Romans, in 202 B. C., on which the whole island seems to have submitted (Liv. xxxi. 45).

Gaurus, i, m. a man whom Martialis satirizes for drunkenness, vanity, and impurity (ii. 89).—2. Another whom the same poet accuses of avarice and meanness (v. 83). This name occurs frequently in the writings of Martialis.

Gaurus, i, m. Monte Barbaro, a mountain of Italy, half-way between Pätëöli, Pizzuolo, and Läcus Läcrinus, which Jüvënälis calls inänis, meaning probably uninhabited; but some understand the adjective there to mean hollow (Sat. ix. 37). Adj. Gauräus, a, um. Gauräna ostrëa, oysters taken near Monte Barbaro, which were esteemed excellent, as was also the wine of this mountain (Juv. Sat. viii. 86). Gauräni sältüs (Flor. ii. 6).

Gāza, æ, f. Gaza, or, Razza, a large and well fortified city of antiquity, called by this name, which, in the Persian language, signifies treasure, from Cāmbyēs, king of Persia, making it the deposit of his military chest, and all the things requisite for his expedition against Egypt (Pom. Mel. i. 11). In comparison of its former greatness, the modern town bears only a slight resemblance. Amidst the ruins of ancient grandeur, the traveller finds a number of marble columns, and other proofs of splendid magnificence. It stood six miles to the south of Ascalon, and from its strength held out against severe blockades in ancient times. Alexander carried it after a siege of two months, during which he was twice wounded; in revenge for the valour displayed by the inhabitants, he put to the sword a number of them, and sold the rest. The bravery, which should have commanded the esteem of this conqueror, only provoked his indignation, and he dragged Bētis, tied to his chariot by thongs thrust through his ancles, round the town, and boasted that in this punishment he imitated Achilles, from whom he traced his descent (Curt. iv. 5 seq.). Stēphānus says, the town was also called Aza, from Azon, a son of Hērēcles, Iōnē, from Io, who landed and continued there, and Minōa, from Minos, brother of Æacus and Rhādāmānthus. Inh. Gāzei, orum (Sing. Gazeus, i), m. called by Pausānias, Gāzēni, orum.—2. Or, Gāzaca, Tebris, or, Tauris, the capital of Atrōpātēnē (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Gēpōlis, is, f. a city of Arābia Fēlix (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Gēbādēi, orum, m. See Arābia.

Gēdrōsia, æ, f. a country of Asia, to the west of Indus, the Sind, adjoining to Arāchōsia. Inh. Gēdrōsi, orum, m. (Just. xiii. 4).

Gēgānū, orum, m. an Alban clan of considerable distinction, whom Tullus Hōstilius, the third king of Rome, enrolled among the senators, after the destruction of Alba, about 665 B. C. (Liv. i. 30).

L. Gēgānūs, L. Gēgānū, m. elected a military tribune with consular authority, in 577 B. C. which is all that is known of his history (Liv. vi. 31).

M. Gēgānūs, M. Gēgānū, m. elected a military tribune with consular authority, in 366 B. C., but he and his colleagues were, soon after their appointment, superseded by M. Fūrtus Cāmillus being nominated dictator, in consequence of a report, that the Gauls were advancing in arms against Rome (Liv. vi. 42).

M. Gēgānūs Mācērinus, M. Gēgānū Mācērinū, m. was first elected consul in 446 B. C., when he and his colleague C. Jūlius quelled the disturbances between the tribunes and the young nobles. In his second consulate, he gained a decisive victory over the Volsci besieging Ardēa, sent them under the yoke, arranged the affairs of that city, and returned in triumph to Rome. After he had been consul for the third time, he obtained the censorship; in that year the survey of the people was first performed in the court-house (villa publica). See C. Fūrtus Pācillus. These censors degraded Māmērcus Æmillius, for limiting the censorship to one year and a half, formerly it was of five years' continuance (Liv. iii. 65 seq.).

Prōcūlus Gēgānūs Mācērinus, Prōcūli Gēgānū Mācērinū, m. was consul at Rome in 439 B. C., or 440 B. C., a year of great disasters and agitation from famine, seditions, and various dangers. Livius says, that had foreign war been added to domestic distress, the aid of all the gods could scarcely have preserved the Romans (iv. 12).

T. Gēgānūs Mācērinus, T. Gēgānū Mācērinū, m. was consul in 492 B. C., the year, according to the consular calendar, in which Darius was defeated at Mārathon, Marathona (Liv. ii. 34).

Gēla, æ, f. Terra nova, a town of Sicily, on a cognominal river, from which the town had its name, now the Salso. Plinius calls the river Gēlas (i. 345). It was built by Antiphēmus from Rhōdus, and Entimus from Crēta, forty-five years after Syracūsē. The site of it was formerly called Lindū, from a people of that name, who emigrated from Rhōdus (Thuc. vi. 4), whom Hērōdōtus calls its founders (vii. 153). The appellation has been derived from the ice, gelu, which it produced in great quantities, or from Antiphēmus laughing at a response of the oracle of Dēlphi, Custri, to his brother Laclius, when they were consulting the priestess of that temple, and by whom they were ordered to call the city Gēla. Inh. Gēlenses, iuni, m. (Cic. Ver. iii. 43). Adj. Gēlōus, a, um. Gēlōi cāmpi (Virg. Æn. iii. 701).

Gēlānī, orum, m. an Indian nation (Amm. Mar. xvii. 5).

Gēlas, æ, m. a Scythian commander in the war against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 208).

Gēldūba, æ, m. Gelb, a place on the west side of the Rhine near Nōvēsum, Nugs, on which was a camp taken by Civīlis (Tac. Hist. iv. 26 seq.). Nēro Claudius Drusus connected Gēldūba and Bonna by bridges (Flor. iv. 12). Some editions read Gēsōnia.

Gēlēsta, æ, m. a Moor, one of the commanders under Hannibal at the battle of Cānna, whose form and appearance Juno assumed, and prevented that noble Carthaginian from engaging L. Æmilius Paulus (Sil. Ital. x. 85).

Gēllia, æ, f. a woman to whom Mārtiālis addresses several of his epigrams (i. 34 &c.).

Gēllianus, i, m. an auctioneer satirized by Mārtiālis (vi. 66).

Gēllius, i, m. a Roman who refused money to his friends, pretending that he spent all he had upon building (Mart. ix. 47).—2. A man of infamous character, against whom Cātillus has written several poems (lxxiv. 1 &c.).

Gēllius Egnātius, Gēllii Egnātii, m. the most illustrious general of the Sānnites. After P. Dēcius Mūs had driven his army out of Sānnium, he prevailed on the Etruscū, Umbri and Gālli to join his countrymen against the Romans, who killed and took prisoners thirty-three thousand of the combined army at the first engagement, in 297 B. C. Egnātius himself fell in that battle (Liv. x. 18—29).

Gēllius Pōplicōla, Gēllii Pōplicōla, m. a quaestor under C. Silānus, and appeared as a prosecutor in the trial against him for rapine and extortion (Tac. Ann. iii. 67).—2. Brother of M. Valērius Mēssāla Cōrvīnus, conquered by Brūtus and Cāssius in 44 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 122).

L. Gēllius Pōplicōla, L. Gēllii Pōplicōla, m. was consul in 74 B. C., and was defeated with Q. Arrius, praetor, by Spūrtēsus, commander of the fugitive gladiators, who also overpowered the other consul Cn. Cornélius Lentulus Clodianus. These consuls were censors two years after, and exercised their office with great severity, expelling sixty-four senators (Liv. Ep. 96 seq.). Gellius is probably the person mentioned by Florus (iii. 6). Valerius Maximus records an instance of his prudence and caution (v. 9).

Gelo, ōnis, m. an ancient tyrant of Sicily, from whom Hierocles was descended. He died in 479 B. C., having reigned six years (Just. xliii. 4).—2. Eldest son of Hiero, king of Syracuse, opposed his father, and would have raised an insurrection in Sicily, had not his death fortunately prevented it. He was married to Neris, a daughter of Pirrhous, by whom he had two children, Hieronymus, and Hieronina, the wife of Themistocles (Liv. xliii. 30 seq.).

Geloni, orum (Sing. Gelonus, i), m. a people of Scythia, but of Grecian origin, who lived on Borysthenes, the Dnieper (Plin. i. 471). They painted their bodies, a common practice among savage nations (membraque qui ferro gaudet pinxisse Gelonus, Claud. iii. 313), wore long hair (Orph. 1050), excelled in horsemanship, and used arrows in fighting, to which Virgil alludes (G. ii. 115: Aen. viii. 725). That poet states, that they drank milk thickened, or coagulated with the blood of horses (G. iii. 463). They had a number of wives, as stated by Valerius Flaccus (vii. 236). Their town Gelonus was built entirely of wood (Herod. iv. 108 seq.).

Gemella, æ, f. a name given by Pompeius, in the civil war, to a legion, which he had formed out of two (Cæs. B. C. iii. 4).

Geminus, i, m. a Roman knight, whose extravagance and luxury recommended him to Scjanus. He was condemned and executed on charge of a conspiracy, in the end of the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 14).

Geminus Metius, Geminii Metii, m. a prefect of the Tusculan horse, who, in the Latin war, challenged T. Manlius, son of T. Manlius Torquatus q. v., the Roman consul, to single combat. Impelled either by anger, or shame of declining the contest, Manlius accepted the challenge, and, though he killed Geminus Metius, yet he suffered the punishment of death by his father's orders, because he had disregarded parental authority, and the consular edict (Liv. viii. 7).

Gemonie scilæ, a flight of steps at the bottom of Capitoline mons, where the bodies of malefactors were exposed, and thence having been dragged by a hook fixed in the throat to the banks of the Tevere, were thrown into that river (Tac. Ann. iii. 14 seq.).

Génabum, i, n. v. Génabos, i, f. a town of the Aurelian on Ligëris, the Loire, which ran through it, from whom it was afterwards called Aurélianum, now Orleans (Cæs. B. G. vii. 3 seq.). It appears, at one period, to have been a city of some consequence, and Orleans is one of the largest in France, being four miles in circumference, and contains thirty-six thousand inhabitants. It has a bridge of sixteen arches over the Loire, adorned with a number of statues, and among others, are those of Charles VII. on the right, and Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans, on the left. Her story is finely told by Hume, in his history of England. Inh. Génabenses, ium, m. Adj. Génabensis, is, e.

Gênêtes, is, m. Janik, a promontory, harbour, and river, the exact situations of which were unknown to the ancients, but seem by Apollonius, to have been near the Tibarëni, consequently in Pöntus. The modern name, if accurate, fixes their position. Some suppose them to have been in the country of the Chalybes, which could only be true of the river, as their situation, although in Pöntus, was inland. Inh. Gênêta, arum, m. (Plin. i. 654). Adj. Gênêteus, n, um. Gênêteus Jüpiter (Val. Flacc. v. 148).

Gênêva, æ, f. Geneva, a town at the western extremity of Lacus Lemānus, the Lake of Geneva, on the south bank of Rhodanus, the Rhone. In modern times, Geneva is a considerable city, nearly two miles in circumference, and contains thirty thousand inhabitants. Besides being neatly built, it is strongly fortified, and remarkable for its beautiful situation, fine walks, and delightful prospects.

Gennēsara, æ, f. called in Scripture the lake of Gennesareth, the sea of Tiberias, and the sea of Galilee, is a beautiful expanse of water, according to Plinius sixteen miles long and six broad, through which the river Jordan flows (i. 569).

Genonîa, æ, f. a city of Pärthia, near the Caspian Sea (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Gëntius, i, m. a king of the Illýrii, son of Pleuratus and his queen Eurýdicë, whom L. Dürönus, prætor, accused of all the piracies committed in the Gulf of Venice, in 182 B. C. Before that time, he had sent ambassadors to Rome, on purpose to excuse himself to the senate, for not giving an audience to their deputies, and from Issa in 174 B. C. accredited agents arrived, who informed the senate, that the ambassadors of Gëntius were spies, that he was desolating their lands for a second time, and that he had entered into a treaty with the Macedonian king to make war on the Romans. On inquiry it appeared that the account respecting the ambassadors of Gëntius was true; for they had remained privately at Rome, without presenting themselves to the senate, nor could they give any satisfactory reason for such conduct; on that account they were ordered out of the senate-house. Either to obtain information respecting his plans, or to secure his alliance, Roman ambassadors set out immediately for Illyricum; but whatever the object of their mission might be, it failed; for Gëntius, before their arrival, had joined Persëus, king of Macëdônia, and had attempted to persuade the Rhodians to declare war against Rome. This monarch appears to have been both jealous and cruel. To secure the crown, he put to death his own brother, Plator, and two of his most active friends Ettritus and Epicadus. Of his maternal brother Cäravantius he had little suspicion, on account of the meanness of his father. No sooner did he find himself confirmed in the government, than he began to treat his subjects with great violence, and increased the natural severity of his temper by immoderate drinking. To the bravery and talents of a great soldier he had no claim, for his spirits sunk on the victory which L. Amicius Gallus, prætor, gained over him at Scodra, so that, instead of raising new forces, he tamely put himself into the hands of the prætor, who sent him to Rome, with his mother, wife, children, brother, and other Illýri of distinction. After adorning the procession of the conqueror, these noble prisoners were sent to Igiturium in 169 B. C. Pērsēus defrauded him of the money which he had promised; he only received ten pounds for declaring war against the Romans, and, for this inconsiderable sum, which Līvius says would scarcely pay a party of gladiators, did he forfeit both his kingdom and his life (Liv. xl. 42 seq.).

Gēnā, æ, f. Genoa (in the middle ages sometimes written Jānā), a town of Ligūria, at the top of the gulf to which it now gives name. When Strābo wrote, it was the emporium of trade. In 207 B. C., Māgo, son of Hāmīlcar, took and demolished it; but the Romans rebuilt it two years after (Liv. xxviii. 46 seq.). In modern times, it has become a place of great celebrity from the activity of the inhabitants, both in war and trade. Latterly, it sunk in importance, but has again become a place of some distinction.

C. Gēnūcius, C. Gēnūci, m. a plebeian, and among the first of that order who was appointed augur (Liv. x. 9).

Cn. Gēnūcius, Cn. Gēnūci, m. a plebeian tribune who summoned the consuls of the preceding year before the people, for their opposition to the Agrarian law, but was found dead in his bed on the morning of the day on which the trial was to proceed, nor can there be any doubt, that he lost his life by assassination, in 473 B. C. (Liv. ii. 54).

—2. Was elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 398 B. C., and three years after, having been appointed to the same office, he marched against the Fālsai and Cāpēnātes, but, displaying more resolution than prudence, he fell into an ambush and atoned for his rashness by an honourable death (Liv. v. 13 seq.).—3. (Surnamed Avēntinēnsis, in consular calendar), was elected consul in 362 B. C., with L. Æmilius Māmērcinus (2), but in consequence of a pestilence, they were superseded by a dictator, who was nominated to drive a nail into the right side of the temple of Jūpiter (Liv. vii. 3).

E. Gēnūcius, L. Gēnūci, m. (surnamed Avēntinēnsis, in con. cal.), the second plebeian raised to the consulship at Rome, had for his colleague Q. Sērvilius Ahālā. Three years afterwards, these two were re-elected to the same office, when L. Gēnūcius, who had marched against the Hērūci, fell into an ambush and lost his life in 361 B. C. (Liv. vii. 1–6).

—2. A tribune of the people in 341 B. C., who carried a law, that no one should lend money at interest. Other concessions to the commons were made this year, that both consuls might be plebeians, that no one should hold two offices in the same year, nor be elected to the same office a second time within ten years (Liv. vii. 42).—3. (Surnamed in con. cal. Avēntinēnsis), elected consul in 304 B. C., when war was carried on against the Umbri, two thousand of whom the Romans put to death by suffocation in a cave (Liv. x. 1).—4. One of the three ambassadors sent by the Romans with presents to Sēphāx, and other African chieftains in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 4).

M. Gēnūcius, M. Gēnūci, m. (surnamed Augūrinus, in con. cal.), was elected consul in 444 B. C., or 445 B. C., in which year the law was carried for allowing the intermarriages of patricians and plebeians (Liv. iv. 1).—2. A tribune of the soldiers in the second legion, who was killed in an engagement with the Boii, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 5).

M. Gēnūcius Cīpi, M. Gēnūci Cīpi, m. a Roman praetor, from whose forehead suddenly sprang what resembled horns. Alarmed at this prodigy, he consulted the oracle, and was informed that if ever he returned to Rome, he would be king. To prevent this change in the constitution, he pronounced on himself sentence of voluntary and perpetual banishment, an act which, in solid glory, says Vālērīus Māxīmus, should place him before the seven Roman kings. His countrymen, in remembrance of his patriotism, placed a brazen bust of him on the gate through which he quitted the city (Val. Max. v. 4).

T. Gēnūcius, T. Gēnūci, m. a tribune of the people, who supported an Agrarian law, and brought an accusation against T. Mēnēnus for the loss of the fort Crēmēra (Liv. ii. 52).—2. Appointed one of the dēcēmviri in 451 B. C. (Liv. iii. 33).

Gēnūsus, v. Gēnūsīus, i, m. the Semno, a river of Mācēdōniā, which falls into the Ionian Sea, between Apōllōniā, Pollinā, and Dýrrāchlum, Durazzo. Vālērīus Gēnūsīus (Luc. Phar. v. 462).

Gēnūsus, i, m. a native of Cýzīcus, Chisīco, whose wife had hidden his arms to prevent his going against the Argonauts; but he recovered them not to his advantage (Val. Flacc. iii. 114). See Mēdon.

Gēōmētrīa, æ, f. geometry, seems to have originated among the Egyptians, to whom the Greeks were indebted for their knowledge of this science (Herod. ii. 109).

Gēraestīus, i, m. (pōrtus), a harbour of the Tēi, at which L. Æmilius Régillus, commander of the Roman fleet in the Archipelago, moored his ships in 192 B. C., when he went to plunder the country of the Tēi; because they had furnished supplies to the fleet of Antiōchus, king of Sýriā (Liv. xxxvii. 27, 28).

Gēraestus, i, f. a town of Eubœa, which stood on a cognominal promontory now called Jastura. It had a famous harbour, of which the combined fleet under Attālus, king of Asia, and L. Apūstius, a lieutenant-general of P. Sūlpīcius Gālba, kept possession, in 202 B. C., while the Issæi plundered the lands of the Cārýstii (Liv. xxxi. 45). From Vālērīus Flāccus it appears to have abounded with oysters (i. 456).

Gērānē, es, f. the queen of the Pýgmæi, whom her people worshipped as a goddess, and, being transported with pride, by this adoration, she preferred herself in beauty to all the goddesses. Jūno punished her presumption by transforming her into a crane, the inveterate enemy of the Pýgmies. Her name, geranē, probably gave rise to the fable; yet we find it related by Strābo. Antōnīnus Libērālis says, that Jūno turned Gērānē, one of the Pýgmies, into a crane, because she despised the worship of that goddess. Pýgmaea mātēr, Gērānē (Ov. Met. vi. 90).

Gērāsā, æ, f. a city in Arābiā, which appears to have been of considerable note. There was another of this name in Cōelēsýria, now Djerash, mentioned by Stēphānus, and Amm. Mar. xiv. 8.

Gērāsus, i, m. the Pruth, a river, which takes its rise in Poland, runs in a southern direction through Moldavia, and falls into the Danube (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 3).

Gērēlānus, i, m. a tribune, whom Nēro sent to inform the consul, M. Vēstinus Atticus, that he must put himself to death (Tac. Ann. xv. 69).

Gērēnla, æ, f. v. Gērēnium, i, n. Kitriēs, a city of Mēssēnia, in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea, whence, according to some, Hōmērus calls Nestor Gērēnius (Il. ii. 336).

Gērēthūs, i, f. v. Gērēthum, i, et, Gērēthia, orum, n. a town of Mýsia, near the sources of Cāicus, which the Romans, from respect to their Trojan descent, gave to the Ilīēnses, after the defeat of the Gāllogræci, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39).

Gērēvōia, æ, f. Gergoie, a strong town and fortress of Gāllia, France, said to belong to the Boii (Cæs. B. G. vii. 9), to the Arvēni (Cæs. B. G. vii. 34); situated on a very high mountain, and of difficult access on all sides, stood on the west of Elāver, the Allier, one of the southern branches of Ligēris, the Loire. It was taken by C. Jūlius Cæsar, in 54 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 107).

Gērmanīa, æ, f. Germany, a large country of Europe, bounded on the S. by Dānūbius, the Danube; on the E. by Vistūla, the Vistula; on the N. by Sinus Cōdānus, v. Mārē Sūēvicum, the Baltic Sea; and on the W. by Rhēnus, the Rhine, and Ocēānus Gērmanicus, the German Sea. Inh. Gērmanī, orum (Sing. Gērmanus, i), m. the Germans, who, according to Tācītus, had fierce blue eyes, and red hair, characteristics from which the description of Jūvēnālis does not materially differ (Sat. xiii. 165). Appiānus mentions that they were addicted to drunkenness (Bel. Civ. 468). In Pērsia there was a people of this name, from whom some have absurdly derived the European Germans (Herod. i. 125). Gērmanicus, i, m. a gold coin, bearing the image of Dōmitiānus, surnamed Gērmanicus, from his conquest of Germany (Juv. Sat. vi. 205). Drusus, the nephew of the emperor Tiberius, on account of his victories in Germany, had the surname of Gērmanicus, a title which was also assumed by several of the emperors. From this, seems derived the epithet Gērmanicānus, applied to the army, and also to the soldiers who had served in Germany; as Exercitus Gērmanicānus, and, Militēs Gērmanicāni. Adj. Gērmanus, et, Gērmanicus, a, um. Gērmanica fœdēra (Claud. viii. 454).

Gērmanicōpōlis, is, f. (anciently Helgas, also Bōoscetē, i. e. the bed of the ox), a town of Pāphlāgōnia (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 9). Inh. Gērmanicōpōlitāni, orum, m. Adj. Gērmanicōpōlitānus, a, um. Gērmanicōpōlitāni aucēres (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 9).

Gērmanicus, i, m. son of Nēro Claudius Drusus Gērmanicus, by Antōnia, second daughter of M. Antōnius and Octāvia, sister of Augustus. That emperor gave him the command of the Roman army stationed on the banks of the Rhine; although very young, his affability, benevolence, prudence, and military talents, rendered him a very great favourite, not only with the troops under his command, but with the inhabitants of the provinces, and with his countrymen, the Romans. Had Augustus lived, or rather, had not his death been prematurely hastened, he had most probably succeeded his grand-uncle in the imperial government. The numerous battles which he fought, and the many victories which he gained in Germany, procured him the surname of Gērmanicus, which had been first bestowed on his father; and by which he is chiefly known in history. The army mutinied on the death of Augustus, and offered him the empire, which he deemed an affront to his integrity and fidelity, consequently he refused it with determined obstinacy. The success of his operations and popularity with the troops, excited the jealousy of the heartless tyrant Tiberius, who recalled him from Germany, and granted him a triumph on his arrival at Rome. Here his countrymen paid him every honour, which increased the suspicion and provoked the hatred of the emperor, who gave him the command, in the east, of the army in Sýria, under pretext of honour and confidence; but, in reality, to remove from the view of the people their principal favourite, whom they considered, as in truth he was, the legal heir of Augustus. In this commission, Gērmanicus displayed the same amiable qualities of heart, and the same vigorous powers of mind, which adorned his conduct in Germany, and which procured him the esteem and affection of all wherever he went. Prudent and beneficial as his measures were, they did not command the approbation of Tiberius, because they added to the fame of a man whose merits he dreaded, and whose destruction he meditated. With this view, he sent Cn. Piso to Sýria, secretly to obstruct the plans, and to accomplish the ruin, of Gērmanicus. After considerable opposition from Piso, Gērmanicus drove him from his presence. When taken ill at Antiōchia, Antakia, he supposed himself poisoned by Piso, and his wife Plāncina (according to Suetonius, at the suggestion of the emperor Tiberius), and the general belief coincided with his own sentiments. His death occasioned universal regret, both amongst the Romans and the nations, either under the government, or connected with them by alliance. He married Agrippina, daughter of Agrippa and Jūlia, daughter of Augustus, by whom he had Cālgūla, and other children.

Gērōnium, i, n. a city of Apūlia, to which Hānnibal came, after having extricated himself from Fālcrnus ager. The inhabitants had previously abandoned it from fear, some part of its walls having fallen (Liv. xxii. 18).

Gērhus, i, v. Gērys, ŷos, m. the Mdoznejacodī, a river of Albānia, which, running eastward, falls into the Caspian Sea (Val. Flacc. vi. 67).

Gērhus, i, m. a country and river of Scythia (Herod. iv. 56).

Gērūnium, i, n. a fort in Macedonian Illyricum, taken at the first assault, by L. Apūstius, a lieutenant-general, in 202 B. C.; at the same time with Corrāgon and Orgēsum (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Gērŷon, ŷnis, v. Gērŷōnes, æ, v. is, m. son of Chrŷsæor and Cālirhōē, a daughter of Ocēānus, a monster, who had three heads (Hes. Th. 287); Apollōdōrus says, three bodies, which united into one belly, and, from that part, separated both downwards and upwards (ib. 5). He was king of Erythia, which some consider as a name of Gades, Cádiz, but others think, which seems also to be the opinion of Strābo, that it was different from Cadiz. Mariāna asserts, that it has sunk in the sea; and Salazar, a native of Cadiz, maintains, that it is now the island, León. The excellence of the pastures rendered the cattle of Gērŷon so famous, that Eurŷtheus imposed it as one of the labours on Hērŷcles to bring them away. That hero killed Gērŷon and drove off his cattle (Liv. i. 7). This tyrant extended his cruelties over part, if not the whole, of Spain, and probably assumed the sovereignty of that country (Amm. Mar. xv. 9). There was, at Pātāvium, an oracle of Gērŷon, which Tiberius, the emperor, in early life, consulted (Suet. Tib. 14). Triplēx Gērŷōnes (Claud. iii. 294). Adj. Gērŷōnēus, et, Gērŷōnāceus, a, um.

Gērŷs. See Gērhus.

Gēsānder, dri, m. king of the Iāzŷges, a Scythian nation, son of Vōrāptus, who was a brave warrior, and killed Aquites, priest of the river Phāsis, the Faoz, and Cānthus, one of the Argonauts. He was himself killed by Eurŷālē, one of the Amazons (Val. Flacc. vi. 280 seq.).

Gēsāthōus, i, m. a Colchian nobleman, of great courage, who fell by the hand of Cōlāxes, in the war between the Scythians and Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 637).

Gēsāriācum, i, n. afterwards Bōnōniā q. v., now Boulogne, a seaport town of France (Flor. ii. 11).

Gēsŷus Flōrus, Gēsŷi Flōri, m. a Roman procurator in Jūdea, who, by his oppression and cruelty, forced the Jews to revolt (Tac. Hist. v. 10). Jōsēphus has given a horrid character of this man (Antiq. Jud. xviii. 1 ŷc.).

Gēsŷar, āris, m. a Carthaginian, of the Barcine faction, whom Silius Itālicus represents meeting the arguments, and opposing the sentiments of Hānno (ii. 327 seq.).—2. A native of the same city, who lost his life by the sword of the Roman consul, Scīpio (Sil. Ital. iv. 627).

Gēsŷāni, orum, m. an Indian nation, conquered by Alexander the Great (Just. xii. 8).

Gēta, w. m. younger son of the Roman emperor, Sēvērus, and the empress Jūlia. From their earliest years, his elder brother and he showed a mutual aversion to each other, which acquired strength as they advanced in life, and baffled the most judicious expedients of their father to lessen or remove. In disposition, Cārācilla was fierce and tyrannical, Gēta mild and peaceful. The latter gained the affections of the people and the soldiery, by the agreeableness of his deportment, which formed a direct contrast to that of his brother. Sēvērus predicted the consequences of their animosity, which, a short time after his death, were fulfilled. Cārācilla killed Gēta in the arms of his mother, and, not contented with that murder, he put, likewise, his friends to the sword. Eutrōpius says, Gēta was declared a public enemy, and almost immediately lost his life (viii. 19). See M. Aurēlius Antoninus Bassianus Cārācilla.—2. A slave, who pretended that he was Scribōnīanus Cāmērīnus q. v. On being brought before Vitēllius, a slight investigation discovered the whole fraud, and, being recognised by his master, he suffered the death of a slave (Tac. Hist. ii. 72).

Adj. Gēta. See Lāsus Gēta.

Gētes, arum (Sing. Gētes, w.), m. a barbarous and warlike nation of Scythiā, who lived to the north of Ister, the Danube; but, according to Strābo, on both sides of that river. This author makes them Thracians (427). On the authority of Hērōdōtus, it may be stated, that they believed in the immortality of the soul. He adds, of all the Thracians they are the bravest and most upright (iv. 93 seq.). They are frequently mentioned by Ovidius, as his unjust banishment doomed him to a residence among savages, at no great distance from the Gēte. Adj. Gētēus, a, um. Gētice prūna, Getic hoar frosts (Juv. Sat. v. 50). Adj. Gētēd. Gētēd loqui, to speak in the language of the Gēte (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 2. 40).

Gigas, āntis, m. a giant. The giants, according to some writers of antiquity, were the sons of Tārtārus and Tērra, and, according to others, of Coelus and Tērra; hence Silius Itālicus calls them Terrigēna (ix. 306), and Hōrātius, Juvenēs tellūris (Od. ii. 12. 7); whilst several authors maintain that they sprang from the blood of Coelus, when mutilated by his son Sātūrnus. They were said to be of frightful appearance, of prodigious stature, and of inconceivable strength. Provoked at the defeat of their relations by Jūpiter, they made war on him, and attempted to scale heaven by piling lofty mountains on the top of each other. The gods, frightened at the approach of so terrible an enemy, fled to Egypt, and concealed themselves from the vengeance of the giants, by assuming the form of animals. Jūpiter, at last, by the assistance of Hērŷcles, put them all to death. Ovidius, in reference to them, has fera stirpis, of the brutal race (Met. i. 159). The poet probably meant fera to apply both to their disposition, which was savage, and to their form, which was in part that of a serpent. Gigantōmāchia, w. f. the battle between the gods and giants, on which Claudīānus writes a poem (xxxvii). Adj. Gīgāntēus, et, Gīgāntinus, a, um, of the giants; gigantic, terrific. Gīgāntēus triūmphus, the triumph over the giants (Hor. Od. iii. 1. 7). Gīgāntēa trōpaea, trophies or victories, obtained by more than human bravery or strength, such as the giants would have accomplished (Ov. Fast. v. 555). The same expression occurs in Virgil, which denotes Minerva's victory over the giants, Pallas, Echion, and Encēlādus (Cir. 30).

Gildon, v. Gildo, ōnis, m. a native of mount Atlas, who probably was governor of Africa, at least of Nūmīdiā, and a considerable extent of country on each side of that kingdom, at the death of Thēōdōsius. Profitting by the distractions of the state, and thinking himself secure, from the succeeding prince being young, he raised the standard of rebellion, withheld from Rome the supplies of corn from that country, and endeavoured to make himself an independent and powerful sovereign. Stilicho, under Hōnōrius, conquered him, and restored Africa to the Roman empire, after it had been twelve years under his dominion. Claudīānus writes a beautiful and spirited poem on this war, into which he introduces many of the principal occurrences in Roman history (xv). It should be added, that the poet has described Gildon as a monster of cruelty and wickedness.

Giligāmma, arum, m. an African nation, next to the Adŷrmāchiāe (Herod. iv. 189).

Gillo, ōnis, m. a man of infamous character (Juv. Sat. i. 40).

Gindānes, um, m. an African nation, mentioned by Herodotus, supposed, by some, to have been the same as that of the Gādānes, not far from Tanis. Their name occurs in no other author, nor can some of their customs be even alluded to without disgust (Herod. iv. 176 seq.).

Gir, ris, m. a river, in the interior of Africa (of Æthiopia, Claud.), of which nothing certain is known. The readings in Claudianus are various (xxi. 252). Ptolemaeus mentions this river, and Plinius, who calls it Gēr (i. 526). Some suppose it to be the Niger; its resemblance to the Nile, by ancient authors, goes far to support that conjecture. Girschel, orum (Sing. Girschus, i), m. a people who lived on its banks, and who probably subsisted by hunting, hence Claudianus, Girschus dōmitor fērārūm (xlviii. 21).

Gisgo, v. Gisco, ōnis, m. son of Hāmlecar, and brother of Himilco and Hānno. His father died in 480 B. C. (Just. xix. 2).—2. A noble Carthaginian, whom his countrymen unjustly condemned to banishment. The period in which he lived is not certainly known, but it must have preceded 308 B. C. (Just. xxii. 7).—3. The father of Hāmlecar, who returned from Sicily, in 311 B. C. (Just. xxii. 3).—4. The father of that Hāmlecar, who commanded a Carthaginian garrison in Mellitē, Malta, and was obliged to surrender to Tib. Sēmprōnīus Lōngus, the Roman consul, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 51).—5. A soldier, in the army of Hānnibal, who fell by the hand of Mōpsus, at the siege of Sāguntum (Sil. Ital. ii. 111).—6. An ambassador, sent by Hānnibal, together with Bōstar and Māgo, to ratify a treaty with Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in 217 B. C. The whole were taken at sea, and sent prisoners to Rome (Liv. xxiii. 34).—7. A Carthaginian senator, who dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms of peace offered by Scīpiō Africānus, after the battle of Zāma, in 204 B. C. The populace listened to him with satisfaction, at which Hānnibal, filled with indignation, laid hold of Gisgo, and pulled him down from the place in which he stood. From this expression, it appears probable, that, when a senator spoke, he ascended some elevated or conspicuous place, and did not stand up where he had been sitting, as is the practice in the British senate (Liv. xxx. 37).

—8. A noble Carthaginian, whose father's name was Hāmlecar. Of a turbulent disposition, he, in 154 B. C., urged war against the Romans with such keenness, that, to escape personal violence, the ambassadors from Italy had to save themselves by flight. At that time he was chief magistrate, which gave additional weight to his harangue, of itself abundantly foolish, since the state was utterly incapable of carrying on war, and, aggravated by its being in opposition to the will of the senate, who wished to abide by the decision of the ambassadors between them and Māsīnissa (Liv. Ep. 48).

Gitāne, arum, f. a town of Thēsprōtia in Epirus, about ten miles from the sea (Liv. xlii. 38).

Glāella, ae, f. a Roman woman, who carried dragons round her neck or in her bosom, during the summer months, in order to cool herself (Mart. vii. 86).

Glādiātor, oris, m. a swordplayer, a man who fought at Rome, for the entertainment of the community. At first, gladiators were either slaves, or prisoners taken in war. To gratify the Roman people, these unhappy beings were regularly trained to the art, by Lānistæ, and the number under one instructor was called Famīlia. From their different armour and appearance they had different names. The Rētiārī, besides a three-pointed lance, had a net (rētē), from which their name is a derivative. With the net they endeavoured to catch or entangle their opponent; but, when it was thrown too great or too short a distance, the Rētiārīus was obliged to fly, until he collected and prepared it for another cast; during that time his antagonist pursued him closely, and, for that reason, was called Sēcūtor. On coming up with the Rētiārīus, the Sēcūtor killed him with his sword, the only offensive weapon which this description of gladiators had. A helmet protected their head, and a shield their body. The Mirmillōnes had, on their helmet, the form of a fish (uagrus), to which their name may be referred. Their armour was a buckler, and a scymitar or cutlass. From the particular manner in which other classes of gladiators were equipped, they were called Sānnitēs, Dimācheri, Hōplōmāchi, and Lāquēārī. The last had a rope, at the end of it was a noose, with which they endeavoured to entrap their antagonists. The Essēdārī, as their name imports, fought from chariots.

Private individuals at Rome first exhibited shows of gladiators, of course the number was small, and the loss of life comparatively little. Brothers, named Brūti, at their father's funeral, in 264 B. C., had the demerit of setting the first example; afterwards the magistrates gratified the people with these horrible spectacles. So fond did the Romans become of this amusement, and so regardless of human life, that the victims, on some occasions, amounted to eight or ten thousand. On a gladiator confessing the superiority of his antagonist, the spectators might save his life, which they did by pressing down their thumbs; if they turned them up, the gladiator was instantly put to death. Much of the ferocity of the Roman character may be referred to this horrible amusement. Even women, at last, were allowed to witness these gross and shocking exhibitions, and it is to their disgrace that they greedily availed themselves of the privilege. From avarice, or a desire to show their dexterity in the use of arms, Roman citizens sometimes exhibited as gladiators. After the introduction of Christianity into the Roman empire, these bloody spectacles became less frequent, and were entirely suppressed under the emperor Hōnōrius. Glādiātūra, ae, f. the trade of a gladiator (Tac. Ann. iii. 48). Adj. Glādiātōrius, ae, um. Glādiātōriūm spectaculū, an exhibition of gladiators (Liv. xxviii. 21). Glādiātōriūm mīnus (Liv. xxxi. 50).

Glāsūm, v. Glēsūm, i, n. Amber, in the language of the ancient Germans, derived, most probably, from the Saxon word Glas, on account of its semi-transparency. From Tacitus, we learn, that the Æstyans, by whom it was gathered, found it generally in shallows, sometimes on the shore. Knowing nothing of its value, or of the purposes to which it might be applied, they sold it in its natural state, and wondered at the folly of the Romans, who purchased it at so high a price (Mor. Ger. 45).

Glāgus, i. m. a competitor for the prize given by Scipio Africanus at the conclusion of the Spanish war, for dexterity in throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. xvi. 561).

Glānūs, i. m. a man, who excelled in the working of silver. The Romans held his cups in high estimation. Adj. Glānānus, a. um. Glānāna (pocula, c. vasa) (Mart. iv. 39). Grātiana is a better reading, and supported by Plinius (v. 67).

Glāphūra, ae. f. mother of Sisēna whom Antōnūs preferred to the throne of Cāppadōcia, on account of his mother's beauty (Ap. Bel. Civ. 675).

Glāphūra, arum, f. a city of Thēssālīa, built by Glāphūras, whence its name (Hom. Il. ii. 712).

Glāphūrē, es, f. a woman of immoral conduct, a favourite with M. Antōnūs (Mart. xi. 21). It seems probable that this abandoned character was the mother of Sisēna. The greater part of the epigram in which this name is found, appears to have been written by Augustus, nor could more obscene lines be imagined.

Glāphūras, i. m. a celebrated player on the harp, to whose character Juvēnālīs makes a discreditable allusion (Sat. vi. 77). Mārtiālīs mentions him as a celebrated performer (iv. 5).

Glaucē, es, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 39).—2. Threw herself into a spring in Sicily, from her believing that this water would be an antidote against the poisons of Mēdea (Paus. ii. 3).

Glaucias, ae. m. a king of Illyricum, who preserved the life of Pýrrhus, king of Epirus, when his father's subjects wished to put him to death. Pýrrhus was only two years old when Glaucias and his queen Bérōē took him under their protection (Just. xvii. 3).—2. One of the body guards of Pērsēus, king of Mācedōnia, sent by his master along with other ambassadors to Gēntius, king of Illyricum, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 20).—3. A freedman of Atēdūs Mēlor, whose epitaph Mārtiālīs wrote, and on whom he also wrote an epigram (vi. 28, 29).

Glaucus, i. m. a man of rank, a native of Cýzicus, Chizico, killed by Iāson, on the Argonauts being driven back to that town by a storm (Val. Flacc. iii. 154).—2. A fisherman of Anthēdon, Anthedonia, a city of Euboea, who observed that his fish by touching a certain herb recovered their strength, and leaped again into the water. Curiosity prompted him to taste it, which he had no sooner done than he plunged into the water, and became a sea god (Ov. Met. vii. 233 seq. Virg. G. i. 437 seq.). In some particulars the account given by Pausānias differs considerably from this statement, approaching to the truth of history, on which poets probably founded the fiction respecting Glaucus (Paus. ix. 22).—3. A Trojan, or rather an auxiliary of the Trojans, was the son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bēllērōphon. He and Sīrpēdon commanded the Lyci in the Trojan war (Hom. Il. vi. 119 seq.). He gave to Diōmēdes his golden armour in exchange for one of iron, Mārtiālīs, from Hōmērus, says of brass (ix. 96).—4. A son of Imbrāsus, and brother of Lādes, killed by Tūrnus. They were natives of Lycia, and trained by their father either to engage in close combat, or to outstrip the winds on horseback. From his father he is called Imbrāsides, as also his brother Lādes (Virg. Aen. xii. 343).—5. A son of Sisyphus, was a native of Pōtnia, a village of Bēōtia, who was torn in pieces by the mares which drew his own chariot, rendered furious by Vēnus, because he had prevented them from having young (Virg. G. iii. 267).—6. The father of Dēlphōbē, the priestess of Apōllo and Dīana at Cūmē (Virg. Aen. vi. 36).—7. A Trojan, son of Antēnor, who was killed during the siege of his native city (Hom. Il. xvii. 216; Virg. Aen. vi. 483).—8. A native of Chios, an ingenious artist, was the first who discovered the art of soldering (Paus. x. 16). Adj. Glaucus, et, Glaucinus, a. um, blue, sky-blue, seagreen. Glauci oculi (Plin. ii. 169). Glaucina pallia (Mart. ix. 27). The better reading here is Glaucia.

Glicia, ae. m. the pursuivant of P. Claudius Pulcher, whom he named dictator after his defeat, in contempt of the senate, who ordered him to appoint some one to that high office, in consequence of the public danger (Suet. Tib. 2).

Glissas, antis, et, Glissa, ae. v. Glissae, arum, f. a small town of Bēōtia, hence Stātiūs, exilis Glissas (Th. vii. 307). The name may be referred to its founder Glissas, v. Glisson. The ground adjoining produced excellent vines, and its inhabitants joined their countrymen against the Argives in the Theban war (Hom. Il. ii. 504).—2. Glītus Gallus, Glītī Gallī, m. an intimate friend of Afrānūs Quīnctiānus, whom the latter gave up as one of the conspirators against the Roman emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xv. 56).

Glōta. See Clōta.

Glycēra, ae. v. Glycērē, es, f. a woman whose praises Hōrātius sings in one of his odes (i. 19).—2. A Roman lady of extraordinary accomplishments, mentioned by Mārtiālīs (vi. 40). If to her the same poet alludes in a subsequent epigram, moral purity formed none of her excellences (xi. 41 seq.).

Glyco, v. Glycon, ōnis, m. a philosopher who, by frequent combat with wrestlers, acquired an invincible force, besides the very appearance of that class of men. To this practice, from which he had different names mentioned by Diōgēnes Laērtius, Hōrātius alludes (Epis. i. 1. 30). His original name was Lycōn, but Diōgēnes states, a g was prefixed to mark the sweetness of his language.—2. A tragedian, a great favourite with the people, on which account, according to the Schollasts, the emperor Nēro gave him his liberty. Pērsius calls him foolish, which proves that, in his opinion, the merits of Glycōn were of the lowest kind (Sat. v. 9).—3. A medical man, suspected of poisoning the wound of which the consul C. Vibius Pānsa died (Suet. Aug. 11).

Glyptus, i. m. a slave, who had sustained personal injury of that kind which makes Mārtiālīs call him Gallus, or a priest of Cýbēlē (Mart. ii. 45).

Gnōdos. See Cnidos.

Gnōmon, ōnis, m. a gnomon, which, as well as the pole, and division of the day into twelve parts, the Greeks borrowed from the Babylonians (Herod. ii. 119).

Gnōssus, v. Cnōssus (Flor. iii. 7); i. f. one of the three principal cities of Crēta, Candia, an island in the Mediterranean, to the S. of Mārē Egeūm, the Archipelago, about 180 miles long, and 40 at its greatest breadth. Of all the Greek islands, Crēta was the most celebrated. Though mountainous and woody, it has many beautiful and fertile valleys. In ancient times, the cities of Candia are said by Plinius, Virgilius, Hōrātius, &c., to have been 100, of which 99 were built before, and 10 after, the Trojan war. The population at that time, according to the historians of antiquity, exceeded one million; but of the present number of its inhabitants no certain estimate can be formed. Some consider the Candians as not exceeding 360,000, and others rate them above a million. Of the strength and resources of the Cretans, some idea may be formed from the number of ships (80), which they sent to the Trojan shores. Ptolēmaeus says the number of cities, in the year 160, was not more than 40, which was probably true at that time, long after the consul Mētēllus had added Candia to the Roman empire. From 1204 to 1670, it was subject to the Venetians, who, after a long and bloody war, were compelled to submit to the Turks, in whose possession it has continued ever since. This siege of Candia, the principal city, which began in 1646, and continued to 1670, is one of the most remarkable in modern times. The island has, for some centuries, been known by the name of its capital, Candia. Gnōssus dōcta agītāre phāretas (Luc. Phar. iii. 185). Gnōssis, Idis, f. of Gnōssus, of Crēta, with relation to a female or noun feminine; Pāsiplhāē (Ov. Rem. Am. 745); Evādne (Stat. Th. xii. 676). Inh. Gnōssii, orum, m. (Liv. xxxvii. 60). Adj. Gnōssilus, et, Gnōssilacus, a, um, of Gnōssus, Gnossian; of Crēta, Cretan. Gnōssia stella ardentis cōrōnæ, the Gnossian or Cretan star of the blazing crown. Into this constellation the crown presented by Vēnus to Ariādne, on her marriage with Bāechus, was changed by that god. One of the stars is much brighter than the rest, and rises before the whole constellation appears. To it Virgilius alludes (G. i. 222). Gnōssilacus rex, Mīnos (Ov. Met. viii. 52).

Gōbānīto, ōnis, m. a leading man among the Arvēni, who, with the other principal men of the state, banished his nephew Vēringētōrix from Gērgōvia, for exciting his dependants and followers to rebel against the Romans (Cæs. B. G. vii. 4).

Gobāres, is, m. the governor of Pērsāgādus, who surrendered it to Alexander the Great, in 330 B. C. (Curt. v. 6).

Gōbrās, ae, m. a Persian nobleman, who conspired against the usurper Oropāsta, whom, whilst he held him by the middle, he wished one of his companions to transfix through his own body. The death of the usurper was effected without the loss of this brave man's life (Just. i. 9). Valērius Māximus gives nearly the same account (iii. 2).

Gōlgus, i, v. Gōlgi, orum, f. a city of Cēprus, whence Vēnus was called Gōlgia (Cātul. xxxvi. 14. Theoc. xv. 100).

Gōmphi, orum, m. Gonfi, a town on the frontiers of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, towards Epirus, Lower Albania. It stood near mount Pīndus, Metropo, and was carried by storm, during the afternoon of one day, by Cæsar, who gave it to be plundered by his soldiers (Cæs. B. C. iii. 80). Inh. Gōmphienses, ium, m. Adj. Gōmphiensis, is, e. Gōmphiensis civitas (Cæs. B. C. iii. 81).

Gōnni, orum, v. Gōnnus, i, f. a town of Thessaly, at the entrance of Tēmpē, Tembē, distant about twenty miles from Lārisa. It was a place of great strength. Here Phīlippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, halted a day after his defeat at Cynōcēphālæ, on purpose to see what of his troops had survived that disaster. In 173 B. C., Gōnnus submitted to Persēs, then on the throne of Mācēdōnīa (Liv. xxxiii. 10 seq.). Some consider this town, and that of next article, the same, which does not appear to have been the opinion of Livy.

Gōnnōcōndylum, i, n. Anbelahia, a town of Pērrhæbiā, which Phīlippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, called Olympos, after he had taken it from the Pērrhæbi, who afterwards claimed it through the Romans, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 25).

Gōnōessa, v. Dōnōessa, v. Dōnūssa, æ, f. Koryfi (Leake), a town of the Argives, the situation of which is one of the many proofs of Homer's accuracy in the application of epithets, as it is higher than the acropolis of Corinth (Il. ii. 573).

Gōrdēnē, v. Gōrdyēnē, es, f. a province of Armēnia Mājor (Ap. Bel. Mith. 243).

Gōrdiēi, orum, m. the inhabitants of Cerdistan, who inhabited the mountains by which their country was covered on the side of Armēnia and Atropatēnē. The mountains were known by the same name. In ancient history they are also called Cārdūchi (Curt. iv. 10 seq.).

Gōrdiānus, i, m. an illustrious Roman, who traced his descent by the father's side from the Grācehi, and on his mother's from the emperor Trājānus. For several generations the house of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus had been in the possession of his family. The prodigious wealth which he inherited, put it in his power to exhibit shows of great magnificence, and to support the dignity transmitted by his ancestors. The danger attendant upon places of power and influence under government, and his love of letters, induced him to live in retirement, and to restrict his ambition to civil honours at Rome. The uniform propriety of his conduct, added to the character of his associates, procured for him the esteem of virtuous princes, and did not excite the jealousy of the tyrannical emperors. Cārācalla and Alexander appointed him consul, and the latter, at the suggestion of the senate, appointed him proconsul of Africa, and that province enjoyed every comfort during his administration. Oppressed by the rapacity of their governors, and trusting to the hatred of the state against Māximīānus, the Africans raised Gōrdiānus to the imperial purple, in direct opposition to his will, and to his earnest remonstrances. He begged them, with tears, to permit him to terminate in peace a long and harmless life, and not to embitter his remaining days by staining his latter years with civil blood.

2. Son of the former, was a man of an amiable character, although his life did not equal that of his father in point of moral purity. His library consisted of sixty-two thousand volumes, and his literary productions showed a cultivated, well-informed mind. After he had been declared emperor along with his father, they fixed their court at Carthage, and their mild administration justified the citizens in expecting the return of legal government, and the impartial decisions of justice. The senate approved of the election, declared Māximīānus a public enemy, and set a price on his head. The intrepidity with which they acted, and the spirit which they assumed, opened a prospect of the re-establishment of the republic. These flattering views the undisciplined and luxurious Carthaginians soon changed to terror and alarm. Cāpēliānus, governor of Mauritānia, made an inroad with a powerful host of barbarians. On that attack, the younger Gōrdiānus rashly advanced to oppose his enemy, without regular troops, accompanied only by an untrained multitude, and the result corresponded with his inconsideration. The personal valour of this young prince availed only to procure him an honourable death in the field of battle. His aged father, on receiving intelligence of his death, put an end to his life, after a short reign of thirty-six days. The account of Eutrōpius differs from that above given. He makes the younger Gōrdiānus emperor with Pūpiēnus and Bālbīnus, which appears improbable, since, according to his own account, Gōrdiānus was then a very young boy, who afterwards carried on a successful war against the Parthians, and was killed by the treachery of Philippus, who succeeded him. He was buried at Circēstūm, Kirkesia (Eutrōp. ix. 2). This Gōrdiānus must have been a son of the younger Gōrdiānus, and grandson of the proconsul of Africa.

Gōrdium, i. n. Savilar, a town of Phrygia on Sūgārīus, the Saharia, on the borders between Phrygia Major and Minor, not of great extent, but celebrated as a well-frequented mart, being nearly equidistant from Hēllēspōntus, Sinōpē, on the Black Sea, and coast of Cilicia. Besides, near it are many great nations, whose commerce, from mutual convenience, chiefly centres there. It was deserted in 191 B. C., when Cn. Mānlius Vūlso marched against the Gāllogræci (Liv. xxxviii. 18). Adj. Gōrdius, a. um. Gōrdius nōdus (Amm. Mar. xiv. 11).

Gōrdius, i. m. a Phrygian who, when ploughing, having observed birds of every kind flying about him, went to a neighbouring city on purpose to consult the augurs for an explanation of that omen. Near the gate he met a virgin of extraordinary beauty, at whom he inquired for the most expert augur, and told her the cause of his consultation. The parents of this virgin, having been skilled in that art, had communicated the knowledge of it to their daughter, who informed Gōrdius that the flight of the birds portended he would one day be king, and offered herself the partner both of his hope and crown. Transported with the prospect which she opened to his view, he considered her proposal the greatest happiness of his kingdom, married the virgin, and the event soon realized her prediction. Gōrdius consecrated the waggon which he then drove, in the temple of Jūpiter. The yoke of it contained a knot which an oracular response declared, that whosoever should untie, would be king of all Asia. See Alexander the Great. His son Mīdas succeeded him in the throne (Just. xi.

7). From him the city had its name (Steph.). —2. A Cappadocian, whom Mithridātes appointed counsellor to his son Ariārāthes q. v., after he had with his own hand killed his nephew Ariārāthes, king of Cappadocia, whose father, of the same name, Gōrdius had murdered by order of Mithridātes (Just. xxxviii. 1).

Gōrdiūtichos, n. a town of Bithynia (Liv. xxxviii. 13).

Gōrdūni, orum, m. a people of the northern part of Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii, whose territories lay along the seacoast, to the north of the Mōrini. Some editions of Caesar read Gōrdūnos (B. G. v. 39).

Gōrgātas, m. a Macedonian, appeared as an evidence in the trial of Amynus and Simmas, accused of treason against Alexander the Great (Curt. vii. 1).

Gōrgē, es, f. a daughter of Cēneus, king of Cālcydon, and Althea daughter of Thiestus. According to Apollōdorus, she married Andromon, and was killed by her father, probably in a fit of drunkenness (i. 8); but Antōninus states, that, after the death of Mēlēāger, Gōrgē and her sister Dēliānira, continued to enjoy the human form, when Dīana changed all the daughters of Cēneus into birds.—2. A daughter of Dānāus, and wife of her cousin Hippōthōus (Apol. ii. 1).—3. A Lemnian woman who killed her husband Hēlimus (Stat. Th. v. 207).

Gōrgēas, e, m. a Grecian philosopher, who studied under Empēdōcles, and was the teacher of Isōcrātes and other illustrious men. He lived a hundred and seven years (Val. Max. viii. 13).

Gōrgias, e, m. a general of Alexander the Great, whom he dismissed in his old age, in 328 B. C. (Just. xii. 12).

Gōrgo, v. Gōrgon, ōnis, Plur. Gōrgōnes, um, f. the Gorgons, who were three in number, Sthēnō, Eurālē, and Mēdūsa, daughters of Phōrcus, v. Phōreys, and Cētō, who was his sister. The last only is said to have been mortal. They dwelt, says Hēsiodus, at the extremity of the world, near the abode of night. According to ancient fable, these imaginary beings had but one eye and one tooth, which they used alternately, and wings of gold with which they flew (Apol. ii. 4); their hands were of brass, and, in place of hair, serpents hissed around their heads. Authors are divided with regard to the origin and form of the Gorgons; but all unite in maintaining, that they possessed the power of turning into stone whoever looked at them.

From Ovidius it appears, that there were only two, and that Minērvā, to punish the violation of her temple by Mēdūsa, encircled her head with serpents, in place of the beautiful locks which had attracted the attention of Neptūnus. Gōrgon, in the singular, refers to her. She was the most distinguished of the daughters of Phōrcus. Pērsēus severed Medusa's head from her body when asleep, and bore it off in triumph. The blood which fell from it, in Pērsēus' flight over Africa, on his return to Scīrīphus, is said to have engendered the numberless serpents and poisonous animals, with which that country is infested. Apollōdorus states, that the blood which flowed from the Gorgon's left arm was highly poisonous; but that the blood of her right arm was of use in curing diseases, and that Asclepius employed ed it in raising the dead to life. The opinion of the ancients respecting the Gorgons, is very different: some suppose them warlike women; others, savages; and Athēnaeus maintains they were beasts, whose pernicious breath occasioned instant death to all who approached them. See Mēdūsa. Maura Gōrgo, the Mauritanian Gorgon, from her residence near mount Atlas (Juv. Sat. xii. 4). Aspēra Gōrgo (Stat. Th. viii. 782). Adj. Gōrgōneus, a, um. Gōrgōnēa cēnēna, poison from the serpents which encircled the heads of the Gorgons (Virg. Æn. vii. 641). Gōrgōnēus equus, Pegasus (Ov. Fast. iii. 456). Gōrgōnēus cābūllus (Juv. Sat. iii. 118). Gōrgōnēum mōnētrum, i. e. Mēdūsa (Manil. v. 567). Gōrgōnia, æ, f. coral, from its changing into the hardness of stone, on being exposed to the air. See Cūrālūm. Pliny, Pōmpōnius Mēla, and some other ancient authors, mention islands called Gorgades, which were said to be inhabited by the Gorgons, distant about two days' sailing from the western coast of Africa.

Gōrgōnīus, i, m. a man whom Hōrātius ridicules for the negligence of his person (Sat. i. 2. 27). It is probable he was a person of some note, as well as Rūfillus, since that line excited much ill-will against the poet, which he himself mentions (Sat. i. 4. 92).

Gōrgōpas, æ, m. had the joint command with Dexagōridas, of Gythium, in 197 B. C. The latter intimated to the Roman consul T. Quīntius Flāminius, that he would surrender the town to him, on which Gōrgōpas put him to death as a traitor. The defence of the city then became more keen and resolute; but, being assailed both by the consul and his brother Lūcius, he was obliged to adopt the very measure for which he had deprived his colleague of life (Liv. xxxiv. 29).

Gōrgus, i, m. king of Cyprian Sālāmīs, Constantia, which was taken from him by his brother, and afterwards restored to him by the Persians (Herod. v. 104 seq.).—2. Son of Hērēs, and a commander in the fleet of Xērxes (Herod. vii. 98).

Gōrgythion, ōnis, m. a son of Prīlāmus by Cāstānira, killed by Tēucer, who aimed at Hēctor (Hom. II. viii. 302).

Gōrnēn, arum, f. Khorien, or, Gerni, a castle in Armēnia. Tacitus describes it as a place strong by nature (Ann. xii. 45).

Gōrtiæ, arum, m. a people of Asia according to Cūrtius (iv. 12), but their name does not elsewhere occur. They had been originally taken from Eubœa, Negropont, by Datis and Artāphērnēs.

Gōrtys, f. Gōrtyn, ūnis, et, Gōrtyna, æ, f. Aticolo (Leake), a city of Arcādia, in Pelopōnēsus, the Morea, now in ruins. It was once a considerable city, but at the time when Pausānias wrote, it was only a village. After passing Gōrtys, the river Lūsus assumed the name of Gōrtynius, the waters of which were distinguished for their coldness (Paus. viii. 23).—2. Gortina, or, Metropoli, a city of Crēta, Candia, on Lithēus, the Messara, built by Gōrtys. It had also the names of Crēmnia, Lārissa and Amyna (Steph.). Gōrtys, idis, f. of Gōrtys, or, Crēta, applied to females or nouns feminine. Gōrtynis arundo, a Crētan reed (Luc. Phar. vi. 214). Inh. Gōrtynii, orum (Sing. Gōrtynius, i), m. Adj. Gōrtynius, et, Gōrtyniacus, a, um, of Gōrtys, of Crēta, Crētan. Gōrtynium telum (Sil. Ital. ii. 90). Gōrtyniacus arcus, a Crētan bow (Ov. Met. vii. 778).

Gōtārzes, is, m. brother of Artābānus, whom he had murdered with his wife and children, and had seized on the throne of Pārthia. His cruelties induced the people to plan a revolution in favour of his surviving brother Bārdānes q. v. The Parthians requested the Roman senate to send them Mēhērdātes for their king. With this request, the emperor Claudius complied, and in coming to a decisive engagement with Gōtārzes, the latter gained the victory, cut off the ears of Mēhērdātes and left him in that condition, a disgrace to the Romans, and a proof of the Parthian clemency. Soon after that, Gōtārzes died (Tac. Ann. xi. 8 seq.).

Gōthi, orum (Sing. Gōthus, i), m. a people who originally inhabited part of Scādināvia, and crossed Sinus Cōdanus, the Baltic Sea, about the beginning of the Christian era, some say three hundred years sooner. They appear to have settled about the mouth of the Vistula, and had for their neighbours on the west, the Vandals, who resembled them in complexion, manners, language, and religion. From these striking peculiarities, a general idea prevails that they were originally one people. In the age of the Antōnini, they possessed what is now called Prussia, and, marching in a southern direction along the banks of the Pripiet, a western branch of Bōrysthēnes, the Dnieper, after sometime reached the mouth of that river. A powerful and fierce people were in possession of the country which lay to the east of them, against whom they had no inducement to march, as migrations towards the eastern extremity of the Black Sea, presented no prospect of future advantage, while Dācia yielded abundant crops, the reward of its industrious inhabitants. These advantages gratified, for the present, the northern barbarians, who derived no permanent benefit, either from the fertility of the soil on which they trod, or from the improvements of agriculture which they witnessed, but, like other savages, indulged their natural idleness at the expense of a life of penury, wretchedness, and plunder. In pillaging parties, and sometimes in greater force, the Goths made occasional inroads on the Roman provinces, and in the year 281, Gāllus prevailed on them to quit Illýrium, and to retreat, and promised to pay them a large annual sum, on condition that they should not in future molest the Roman provinces. Restless and addicted to emigration, these wanderers probably passed into Chērsonēsus Taurica, the Crimea, and afterwards they obtained a footing in Bōsphōrus, where they built a fleet with which they navigated the Black Sea, besieged and took Trāpēzus, Trebizonde. The ruthless ferocity of the Goths impelled to a general massacre of the inhabitants, and the rich spoil which they obtained, loaded a large fleet, then lying in the harbour, with which they returned to Bōsphōrus. In subsequent expeditions, they obtained possession of Greece, which they ravaged, and threatened a descent on Italy, which roused the inactivity of Gāllienus. His appearance alarmed the Goths, and divided their strength, Naulōbātus, a chief of the Herūli, with a number of his countrymen, joining the Romans, and the greater part of the rest returning to their ships, sailed back to Bosphorus. Had the Roman generals acted with unanimity, the destruction of the Goths had been the inevitable result; but their contention allowed an easy escape for them, who marched northward, crossed the Danube, and returned to their settlements in Ukraine. In the reign of the emperor Aurelianus, they again quitted that district, strengthened by fresh arrivals from the north, and ventured to meet the forces of the emperor in a regular engagement, to which the approach of night put an end, without victory declaring decisively for either party. Exhausted by a state of warfare for nearly twenty years, they solicited a peace, which Aurelianus granted, on terms beneficial to both nations. Their love of plunder exposed them to merited chastisement from Constantine the Great, in the year 322, and a Gothic war again broke out under the emperors Valentinianus and Valens. Even their wars with the Romans, as well as their vicinity to civilized nations gradually softened their ferocity, and rendered them less insensible to the comforts and advantages of refined life. From several Roman emperors they had received many favours, and they showed their gratitude by attachment to their descendants. On being defeated by the Huns, whose numbers astonished, and whose cruelties terrified them, they applied to Valens for protection, after a defeat from that savage nation, and he received them into his dominions in the year 376. Oppression on the part of the Roman governors of Thracia provoked them to hostilities, and, being recruited by fresh numbers of their countrymen, they ravaged that province, and a battle at Adrianópolis, two years after, put them in possession of the country between that city and Constantinople. Under Honorius they plundered Greece, and afterwards invaded Italy, which they overran, and, in the year 409, they obtained possession of Rome, which they sacked and plundered, with the permission of their chief Alaric. See Oströgöthi and Visigöthi.

Göthini, orum, m. the Gothinians, are supposed to have inhabited part of Silesia and Hungary. Tacitus infers from their use of the Galtic language, that they were not of German origin. Besides, they submitted to the drudgery of working in the iron mines, which may be considered a proof, that they did not know the use of that valuable metal, otherwise they would have employed it to assert their own liberty (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Götönes, um, m. a German nation who lived near the mouth of the Vistula. Some consider them the same as the Goths, and others doubt their identity; but think it probable they were in alliance with that people (Tac. Ger. 43).

Græchuris, is, f. a town of Celtiberia, built by Tib. Sémpronius Græchus, to commemorate his victories in that country (Liv. Ep. 41).

Græchus, i, m. anciently Græcus, a surname of a family or branch of the Sémpronian clan. Adj. Græchānus, a, um. See Sémpronius.

Græchus, i, m. a noble Roman, who laid aside his own dress, and assumed the garb and weapons of a gladiator, and fought in the public amphitheatre. Jövenalis reproaches him for his baseness, impudence, and cowardice

(Sat. ii. 143 seq.). That poet uses Græchus to denote a nobleman, or, perhaps, under it included a general character of the depraved nobility, whose scandalous lives disgraced their ancestors (Sat. ii. 117).—2. A Roman prætor, who declined the power belonging to him, by virtue of his office, to determine in cases of usury; because the practice had become general in the year 33 (Tac. Ann. vi. 16).

Græchus Clælius, Græchi Clæli, m. an Æquan, whom his countrymen appointed commander-in-chief, in 458 B. C., probably on account of his being a man by far of the greatest consequence in the state, when he made inroads on the country of the Lævian and Tuscūlani. The Roman senate sent three ambassadors to him, remonstrating against his violation of the treaty, when he refused to hear their message, desired them to tell it to the oak which overhung his tent, and, in the meantime, he would attend to more important business. This insolent speech excited the indignation of the Romans, who sent against him, L. Quinctius Cincinnātus, dictator, who soon obliged the Æqui to surrender at discretion. Græchus and the other commanders were brought to him in chains, and he compelled them to pass under the yoke, as a confession that their nation was subdued (Liv. iii. 25—28).

Grādīvus, i, m. a surname of Mars, from going (gradiendo), to war, or, from brandishing a spear (agadivus), or, from his having sprung from grass, which is explained by recollecting, that a chaplet of grass was, at one period, the highest military honour (Fest.). Other derivations have been given, but likewise uncertain, and therefore omitted. Hömēricus Grādīveus, Mars, as described by Hömērus (Juv. Sat. xiii. 113). Grādīvicōla, æ, m. a worshipper of Mars; a soldier (Sil. Ital. iv. 222).

Græa, æ, f. (i. e. an old woman), a surname of Tānāgra, from Tānāgra, daughter of Æolus, living to a great age, on which account, both she and the city were known by that appellation. It went into disuse, and the town received its original name (Stat. Th. vii. 332. Hom. Il. ii. 498).

Græcia, æ, f. Greece, a celebrated country of Europe, which had, on the E., Mæcæ Ægæum, the Archipelago; on the S. the Mediterranean; and on the W. that part of the Mediterranean called the Ionian sea, and Mæcæ Hædrīaticum, v. Adriaticum, quod et Sūpërum, the Gulf of Venice. The boundary on the N. is uncertain. This country was mostly peopled by colonies from Egypt, who introduced a knowledge of the arts and sciences, which were afterwards improved, and many of them carried to the highest degree of perfection, by the Greeks. To the inhabitants of Greece, the civilization and refinement of the ancient world seem to have been almost wholly confined. The Romans were indebted to them for all which they knew of philosophy, and the comforts of refined life. But the fine arts were not likely to be much cultivated or esteemed by a race of ferocious soldiers. In justice to the nation of Mars, however, it cannot be denied, that, in history, and in several species of poetry, if they did not equal, they did not fall much short of their instructors. The liberties of Greece, which Philippus, king of Mæcædonia, first injured, were almost wholly destroyed by his son, Alexander the Great. The country continued to be oppressed by his successors, until it was conquered by the Roman consul, L. Mummius, in 148 B. C. From this period, the Greeks made no united effort to regain their independence, but continued in subjection, until the beginning of the fifteenth century, when they fell under the tyranny of the Turks. Since that fatal conquest, the descendants of a refined, intelligent, and ingenious people, have been sunk in ignorance and oppressed by slavery.

Ultior Græcia, Græce. Græcia major, oftener Magna Græcia, the south of Italy (Liv. xxxi. 7). Lat. Græci, Graii (2 syl.), v. Graji, orum, et, Grājūgēne, ārum, m. The Greeks established no permanent government out of Greece, either in Europe or Asia. Græciulus, i, m. dim. generally used in contempt (Juv. Sat. iii. 78). Græcismus, i, m. a Grecism, the Greek style, or manner of speaking. Adj. Græcus, Graius (2 syl.), v. Grājus (Mānilius writes Grāius, iv. 687), Græculus, Græcūculus, a, um, et, Græcūensis, is, e (not much used), of Greece, Greek, Grecian. Græius sālūs, i. e. Graia Alps, St. Bernard (Cor. Nep. Han. 3). Græcula civitas (Flor. iv. 2). Adv. Græcē, v. Græcūlicē, after the manner of the Greeks.

Græcinus, i, m. a noble Roman, whose interest with Augustus, Ovidius, in an epistle from Pōntus, requests him to exert, in order to procure a repeal of his sentence, or a more comfortable place of residence (Ep. Pont. iv. 9). Græcinus was the brother of Flaccus, to whom Ovidius wrote an epistle from the same place, requesting the same favour (Ep. Pont. i. 10).

Graiocēli (4 syl.), orum, m. an ancient nation of Gāllia, France, whose territories seem to have been adjacent to those of the Cēntrōnes and Catūriges, Gauls who lived among the Alps. But the exact situation of the Graiocēli is unknown (Cæs. B. G. i. 10).

Grāmpius mons, the Grampian hills, form the most considerable range in Scotland, extending from Loch-Lomond to Stonehaven. To this chain belong Benlomond, 3262 feet in height, Bealeady, 3009, Benmore, 3903, Benlawers, 4015, Shehallion, 3564, Benverlich, 3300, and others of less elevation on the east (Tac. Ag. 29).

Grānē, es, f. the ancient name of Cārna, the goddess of hinges, q. v. (Ov. Fast. vi. 107).

Grāncus, i, m. the Oostrola, or Ouscola, a river of Mýsia, which has its sources in mount Ida, and, running in a northerly direction, falls into Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora (Plin. i. 610). On the banks of this river Alexander the Great first came to an engagement with the Parthians, whom he completely defeated, and there, at a later period, L. Licinius Lūcillus vanquished the army of Mithridātes, king of Pōntus. According to Ovidius, it divided into two streams, for which reason he calls it bicōrnis (Met. xi. 763).

Grānius Mārcellus, Grānī Mārcellī, m. prætor of Bithýnia, whom his own questor, Cæpio Crispinus, accused of treason, which Rōmānus Hispo, a mercenary advocate, supported, and the impeachment would most probably have been followed by a sentence of condemnation, had it not been for the fortitude of Cn. Cālpurnius Piso. Tiberius said he would give his vote openly, on which Cālpurnius asked him "in what rank he chose to give his vote?" This question checked his ardour, and he agreed that Mārcellus should be acquitted of treason; and the other charge, peculation, referred to the proper tribunal (Tac. Ann. i. 74).

Grānius Mārtilianus, Grānī Mārtiliāni, m. a man of senatorian rank, whom C. Grāchus arraigned for treason, in the year 35 (Tac. Ann. vi. 38).

Grānius Silvānus, Grānī Silvāni, m. a tribune of the prætorian guards, whom the emperor Nēro sent to Sēneca, to inquire whether he admitted the conversation stated by Nātālis, with the answers given by himself. The philosopher returned an answer becoming his character, acknowledging the whole truth, disdaining both prevarication and flattery. Nēro asked the messenger, "Does Sēneca prepare for a voluntary death?" Grānius replied, "He showed no symptom of fear, no sorrow appeared either in his words or looks." "Then," said Nēro, "return and tell him that he must die." See L. Annaeus Sēneca. Grānius afterwards entered into a conspiracy against the emperor, received a free pardon, but, despising life on such terms, he died by his own hand (Tac. Ann. xv. 50—71).

A. Grānius, A. Grānī, m. a native of Pūtēoli, Pizzuolo, who embraced the interest of Cæsar, and fell at Dyrrāchium, Durazzo (Cæs. B. C. iii. 71).

Q. Grānius, Q. Grānī, m. the accuser of L. Cālpurnius Piso q. v. (Tac. Ann. iv. 21).

Grāptus, i, m. an enfranchised slave, who gratified his natural malignity by inventing stories, which called into action both the cruelty and injustice of his former master, the emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xlii. 47).

Grātia, æ, Plur. Grātīe, ārum, f. the Graces, three sisters, called Aglāia, Thālia, and Euphrōsýnē. They went also under the appellation of Chārites. The Graces were said to be the daughters of Bāchus and Vēnus, or of Jūpiter and Eurýnōmē. They are represented naked, and linked in each other's arms; hence Hōrātius, sequeque nodum solvere Gratia (Od. iii. 21. 22). Etēscles was the first who sacrificed to the Graces, in the opinion of his countrymen, who made their number three; but the Lacedæmonians reckoned only two, Clita and Phæna. In the remote periods of antiquity they were represented clothed. Pausānias could not discover who first exhibited them naked.

Grātīdīus, i, m. a lieutenant-general, whom C. Mārīus sent to receive the command of the legions to carry on the war against Mithridātes. The soldiers butchered him (Val. Max. ix. 7).

Grātius, v. Glānius q. v., i, m. an eminent jeweller, whose silver cups the Romans held in great estimation. Adj. Grātīānus, a, um. Grātīāna (pōcula, v. vasa) (Mart. iv. 39).

Grāvī, orum, m. a people of Spain, mentioned by Silius Itālicus (i. 225). That poet informs his readers that Grāvī was a corruption of Graii (2 syl.) (iii. 366).

Grāvīscæ, ārum, f. Ereno di Sangustianò, a town of Etrūria, Tuscany, which is said to have had its name from the unhealthiness of its climate (gravis ær). It stood on a low and marshy plain, which, in warm weather, emitted fetid and unwholesome air; hence intempesta Gravisca (Virg. Æn. x. 184). Here a Roman colony was planted in 183 B. C., and five acres of land given to each. It had formerly been taken from the Taurinenses (Liv. xl. 29). Adj. Graviscanus, a, um.

Grinnes, ium, f. Boerhuyzen, a town of the Batavians, on the right side of Vähäls, the Waal (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Grinus, i, m. son of Æsanius, king of Thera, Santorin, and father of Battus, according to Hērōdōtus and Justinus (Herod. iv. 50. Just. xlii. 7).

Grōsphus, i, m. commanded the Agrigēnēs in the Sicilian war. On his shield was engraved a representation of the brazen bull, that horrible instrument of torture invented by Pērilus q. v. (Sil. Ital. xiv. 211).

Grūdli, orum, m. a neighbouring nation to the Gōrdūni. Their country was bounded on the N. by the mouths of Scāldis, the Scheld (Cæs. B. G. v. 39).

Grūmbates, is, m. king of the Chlōnītæ, whose son fell at the siege of Amida (Amm. Mar. xviii. 6 seq.).

Grūmētum, i, n. Agromento (Clarimonte, Clav.), a town of Lūcānia, on the right bank of Acris, the Agri, at which Tib. Sēmprōnūs Lōngus slew above two thousand of the Carthaginians under Hānno, took forty-one military standards, and only lost two hundred and eighty of his own men, 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 37 seq. Flor. iii. 18).

Grūnium, i, n. a fort in Phrygia, given by Phārnābāzus of Alcibiādes, from which he drew a revenue of fifty talents yearly (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 9).

Grūthūngi, orum (Sing. Grūthūngus, i), m. a warlike nation of the Ostrōgōthi. Amianus Mārcellinus writes Crēuthūngi, and describes them as possessing the country adjoining to the Alāni Tānūtæ (xxvii. 5 seq.).

Grūlus, i, m. a son of the celebrated Xēnōphon and Philētia, who fell at Māntinēa. Such was the beauty of his form, and that of his only brother Diōdōrus, that they were called Diōscōri (Val. Max. v. 10).

Grūnēus, ēos, m. a Centaur who fought at the battle with the Lāpithæ, in which he killed Brōtēas and Orion. Exādus, with the horns of a stag, deprived him of both his eyes (Ov. Met. xii. 260—270).

Grūnia, æ, f. et, Grūnia, orum, n. a small town of Æōlia, which Stēphānus says belonged to the Cyrenæi, of whom nothing is known. From græus, Adams forms Grūnium, a word which does not occur in Latin writings. Near Grūnia was a grove in which Apōllō had a temple, and his oracle there had once some celebrity. Pārmēniōn took this little town in the second year of the 111th Olympiad, 330 B. C. Adj. Grūnæus, e, Grynæus, a, um. Grūnæum nēmus, the grove of Grūnia (Virg. B. vi. 72). Grūnæus Apōllō, from his temple and oracle there (Virg. Æn. iv. 345).

Gulussa, æ, m. second son of Māsinissa, king of Nūmidia, was a skilful general and inveterate enemy of the Carthaginians. In the year 174 B. C., he and the ambassadors from that state had a keen dispute before the senate, after which that venerable body ordered him to return to his father, and desire him to send ambassadors to answer the complaints advanced against him by the Carthaginians. After receiving the customary presents, both parties were dismissed (Liv. xlii. 23, 24). Next year he returned to Rome, mentioned in the senate the aid given by his father during the Macedonian war, promised to execute whatever further demands they should make, and warned them of the treachery of the Carthaginians. The greater part of his speech is lost (Liv. xliii. 3). The senate had sent ambassadors to Carthage with whom he had returned, and both he and they reported that the Carthaginians had an army, and likewise a fleet, ready for service (Liv. Ep. 48). On the death of his father, 150 B. C., he received a third of the kingdom (Id. 50). The account of Livius differs from that of Sāllustius, who states, that both Gulussa and Māstanābal having died a natural death, Micipsa, on the demise of his father, succeeded to the whole kingdom (Sal. Jug. 5). In the third Punic war, Gulussa contributed to the conquest of the Carthaginians and the destruction of their state. Māssiva was the son of Gulussa, and had fled from Africa on the murder of Adhērbal by Jūgūrtha (Sal. Jug. 35). See Māssiva.

Gumathēna, æ, f. rectius, Commagēnē q. v. (Amm. Mar. xviii. 9).

Gūnēus, ēos, m. a Grecian commander (Hom. Il. ii. 748).

Gyāra, Gyāra, et, Gyāra, æ, e, Gyārus, i (Virg. Æn. iii. 76), f. (often used in the plural), Joura, by some called Calaira, by the Greeks, the Gyarean rock; a small barren rocky island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, only twelve miles in circumference, now almost uninhabited. The poverty and wretchedness of this island have been proverbial for many ages. Plinius states that the inhabitants were once forced to quit it, from an immense number of rats or field mice of uncommon size infesting it, and a late traveller mentions, that he saw some of the same breed, when he visited that poor sterile island. Ajax, son of Oilēus, perished on this rock (Hom. Od. iv. 507). During the reign of the Roman emperors, criminals were frequently banished to Gyārus, Joura; hence Juvēnalis, Aude aliquid dignum brevibus Gyāris (Sat. i. 73). Gyāreus, ēos, m. an inhabitant or native of Joura (Luc. Phar. iii. 600).

Gyās, æ, m. a companion of Ænēas, one of the Trojan commanders who contended for the naval prize (Virg. Æn. i. 222 seq.). He killed Ufēus, commander of the Æqui (Virg. Æn. xii. 460).—2. A son of Mēlampus, and brother of Cisseus, a man of great size and strength, whom Ænēas killed (Virg. Æn. x. 318 seq.).—3. A Boeotian killed by Tydeus in the Theban war. Statius calls him Dircæus Gyās, from Dircē, a fountain in Boeotia (Th. ii. 610).—4. A Lemnian, to whom Hypsipylē had been betrothed, who fell in the general massacre of the men in Lēmnos, by the hand of Mirmydōnis (Stat. Th. v. 224).—5. A youth of Thēbæ, killed by Amphiarāus in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 715).—6. A Boeotian husbandman killed in the Theban war by Hippomēdon (Stat. Th. ix. 305).—7. A man killed by Hannibal at the siege of Saguntum. He was the twin-brother of Chrōmis (Sil. Ital. i. 439).

Gygæa, æ, f. a wife of Amōntas Il., by whom she had Archēlius, Arīdeus, and Mēnēlius (Just. vii. 4).

Gýgas, æ, m. a son of Mēlampus, of prodigious strength. Both he and his brother Cisseus fell by the hand of Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 318).

Gýges, is, m. (Gyes, Gyas, et, Gigas), a Trojan, killed by Turnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 762).—2. A son of Cœlus and Terra, who had an hundred hands (centimānus) and fifty heads. He and his brothers, Briāreus and Cœus, surpassed all other mortals both in size and strength of body. Hēsiodus places these brothers at the entrance of Tārtārus (Th. 732), an idea which Virgilius has adopted (Æn. vi. 287). Hōrātius seems to have been of the same opinion (Od. ii. 17. 14).—3. A youth of Cnīdus, of so very fine a complexion, and delicacy of countenance, that, in a company of young women, he might have passed for a girl (Hor. Od. ii. 5. 20).—4. The husband of Astēriē. He appears to have traded to Bithŷnia (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 5).—5. A native of Lŷdia, whom the queen of that country ordered either to kill himself, or to put her husband to death, for which his reward would be herself and the kingdom, that she might be avenged on the king, because he had exposed her naked to Gýges, or that there might be no man alive except her husband, before whom she had suffered that indignity. Preferring life and a crown to a violent death, he agreed, since it was matter of necessity to accomplish the destruction of the king, and she informed him by what means he might effect it. Guided by her counsel, he murdered the king in his bed, married the queen, and mounted the throne.

According to some authors, Gýges obtained a ring, which, being put on his finger, rendered him invisible; and, availing himself of this advantage, he came unperceived into the presence of the queen, murdered her husband Cāndaulis, and, having married her, succeeded to the kingdom (Just. i. 7). Adj. Gýgaeus, a, um. Gýgaeus lūcus, et, Gýgaeus stāgnum, a lake forty stadia distant from Sardes (Prop. iii. 11. 18. Plin. i. 600).

Gýlippus, i, m. an Arcadian, whose nine sons joined Ænēas against Turnus. His wife was a native of Tuscany (Virg. Æn. xii. 272).—2. A Lacedæmonian commander, of great merit, sent by his countrymen to aid the Syracusans against the Athenians. He gained a decisive victory over the Athenian commanders, Dēmōsthēnes and Nicias (Just. iv. 4 seq.).

Gýmnæi, orum, m. a people adjoining to the Gēte (Orph. 1051).

Gýmnāsium, i, n. the place at Rome where feats of agility and strength, and exercises of different kinds, chiefly wrestling, boxing, running, leaping, and throwing the coat, were performed. The name does not express the kind of contests, but the appearance of the combatants who were naked, except round the middle and upper part of the thighs, on which they wore thin trowsers.

Gýmnias, æ, m. Comasour, or, Kumakie, a town on Arāxes, the Arash, near its sources. Gýnaecon limen, a town of Gēdrōsla (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Gýndes, is, m. the Zeindeh (the Mendeli, Buckingham), a river of Bābŷlōnia, which takes its rise in the mountains of Mātīcē, and flows through the country of the Dār-dānī, into the Tigris, on the eastern bank. Cýrus, king of Pērsia, unable to cross it without shipping, felt indignant at the disappointment, and, in consequence of one of the sacred horses having been drowned in it, threatened to render it so small, that even women could cross without being knee deep. He verified this menace, by letting its water into three hundred and sixty trenches, which he had dug for that purpose, which Tibullus calls dēmētta Cýri (iv. 1. 141).

Gýptis, is, f. daughter of Nānnus, king of the Sēgōbrīgī, and wife of Prōtis q. v. (Just. xliii. 3).

Gýracē, es, f. an island in the Archipelago (Hom. Od. iv. 500). It is commonly written Gýra, arum, f.

Gýrtha, e. Círtha, æ, m. a gallant of the wife of Cīna. Mārtiālis calls Gýrtha a fool (vi. 39).

Gýrtius, i, m. a Mysian, father of Hýrtius. Gýrtiades, æ, m. Hýrtius (Hom. Il. xiv. 512).

Gýrton, ōnis, e. Gýrtōnē, es, f. a town of Thessaly, so called from its founder, Gýrton, the brother of Phlégus. Gýrton and Atrix were the only two towns in that district which were not in the power of Antiōchus, king of Sýria, 193 B. C. By some it is supposed to be now called Konitza (Liv. xxxvi. 10. Apol. Rhod. i. 57).

Gýthlum, i, n. Colo-Kythia, a strong seaport town of Lācōnia, taken by T. Quīncius Flāminius, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 29). According to Leake, its ruins are called Palæopoli.

Gýzantes, ium, m. an African nation, eminent for the great quantity of honey produced by their bees and by other means. To the ridiculous custom of staining their bodies with vermilion, they added the filthy practice of eating monkeys, with which their mountains abounded (Herod. iv. 194).

H

Habis, ldis, m. son and successor of Gār-gōris, king of the Cūnētes, in the S. W. of Spain, whose impure descent is as offensive as his preservation was marvellous. He is said to have united his barbarous subjects by laws, to have first taught to yoke oxen to the plough, and to seek their food from the furrow. Justinus has given the fabulous account of his early years (xliv. 4).

Hādrānum. See Adranum.

Hādrīa, e. Adrīa, æ, f. Atri, or, Adria, a town, in the southern extremity of Picēnum, watered by Vōmānus, the Vomano (Sil. Ital. viii. 438). Some derive the ancient name of the Gulf of Venice, from this town; but it is more generally referred to Hādrīa, a town of the Vēnēti. Inh. Hādrīāni, orum, m. Adj. Hādrīānus, a, um. Hādrīānus ager, the territory of the Hādrīāni, which Hān-nibal desolated, in 219 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 9).

—2. A town of the Vēnēti, now called Adria, built, according to Livius, by the Etrurians (v. 38); Justinus says, by Greeks (xx. 1). According to Plinius, it had an excellent harbour, and produced very good wine (iii. 133). From it the adjoining sea or gulf had its name. Adj. Hadrīanus, et, Hadrīaticus, a, um. Hadrīanus ager (Plin. i. 363). Hadrīaticum, v. Adriaticum, et, Adriānum Mārē, quod et Sūpērum, seldom Adria, a, m. the Gulf of Venice, a part of the Mediterranean, which separated Itālia, Italy, from Illyricum (hence sometimes called Mārē Illyricum); or Lābūria and Dālmātia, and Græcia, Greece, corresponding to part of Hungary, and of Turkey in Europe. The epithet Sūpērum, was used from its being situated to the east of Italy, in consequence of the Romans, as well as the Greeks and other nations, erroneously supposing that countries and seas to the east were higher than those to the west, or that the earth gradually inclined from the east to the west. Hence the natives of Rome denominated that part of the Mediterranean, which washes the western coast of Italy, Mārē Infērum, called also Tyrrhēnum, Etrūscum, v. Tūscum. Venice, for some centuries, a place of great trade, and, until lately, the capital of a small cognominal republic, gives name to the gulf in modern times. This city stands on sixty, or, according to others, on seventy-two little rocky islands, connected by wooden bridges, at the distance of about five miles from the continent. It is nearly six miles in circumference, and contains 180,000 inhabitants. Venice is evidently derived from Vēnētia, a town of Italy, to the north of Adria, v. Hadrīa, built by the Hēnēti, a people of Pāphlāgōnia, who, according to Livy, and other ancient historians, settled in that part of the country, about 1180 years B. C. This celebrated city owed its foundation to the inroads of the Huns, under Attila, in 452. The wealthy inhabitants of the adjacent country, who escaped the general massacre, fled to these islands as a place of security, against the cruelties of these barbarians, and began to build the city. The Gulf of Venice is upwards of 460 miles long, and 130 at its greatest breadth. It contains a number of islands, but none which merits particular description. The current, which sets in from the Gulf of Venice and the Archipelago, is so strongly felt between Candia and the coast of Egypt, as to carry a vessel, sailing with a moderate breeze, twenty miles south of her course during the twenty-four hours. Sinus Hadrīaticus, v. Sinus Hadrīaticus mārē (Liv. x. 2. Plin. iii. 130). Mīnax Adriaticum, the threatening, i. e. tempestuous Gulf of Venice (Cat. iv. 6). Adriacus rhombus, a turbot of the Gulf of Venice (Juv. Sat. iv. 39).

Hadrīanópolis, is, f. Boli, a town of Bithynia.—2. Adrianople, a town of Thracia, of which the ancient name was Uscudama, or, Uscudama (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 6).

Hædi, orum, m. the kids, two stars in the shoulder of Auriga. Amālthæa, the goat which suckled Jupiter, reared two kids, which, on account of the kindness of the mother, were placed among the stars under this name. Others say, that Jupiter was nursed by the nymphs Themis and Amālthæa, to whom his mother, Ops, committed him. Hence the two accounts, either that Amālthæa nursed him, or that he was nursed by a goat belonging to her. The rising of this star was, in Italy, attended with rain; hence pluviæ hædi (Virg. Æn. ix. 668).

Hæmon. See Thēmon.

Hæmon, ōnis, m. son of Crēon, king of Thēbæ, Thēba, and brother of Mēnœceus. He was one of the allies of Etœcles, in the Theban war, performed acts of great bravery, and was wounded severely by Tydæus (Stat. Th. viii. 457—473). Hēracles fired his breast with a love of martial fame, hence Stālius calls him Hercūlæus Hæmon (viii. 480). He fled from the attack of Thēseus (Stat. Th. xii. 747), and killed himself on the tomb of Antigōnē, with whom he was violently in love (Ov. Ibis 561).—2. A Pylian chief, who fought under Nēstor, at Troy (Hom. II. iv. 296).—3. Father of Mæon. Hæmōnides, a, m. Mæon (Hom. II. iv. 394).

Hæmōnia. See Æmōnia.

Hæmōnides, a, m. the priest of Apōllō and Dīana, whom Eucās killed (Virg. Æn. x. 537).

Hæmus, i, m. Argentaro (Valp.), or, Ralkan, i. e. a difficult defile among rocks; a high mountain, or rather a range of mountains, which bounded Thrācia, Rōmania, on the N., separating that country from Mœsia. From the summits of Hæmus rise three great rivers, Atlas, Auras, and Tibisis, which are emptied into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49). Hæmus, the son of Bōrēas and Orithyia, for having assumed the honour of being a celestial deity, was changed into this mountain, to which his name was given, and his wife, Rhōdōpē, into another, which also bears her name (Ov. Met. vi. 87). This range is nowhere remarkable for grandeur of scenery, or great elevation. Livius writes, it was a generally received opinion, that from the summit of this mountain could be seen the Black Sea, the Danube, the Alps, and the Gulf of Venice. Philippus, king of Mæcōdōnia, ascended Hæmus, of which he did not reach the summit till the third day, and, on returning, said nothing to contradict the received opinion (Liv. xli. 21 seq.). Æmōmōus, tis (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 7). Inh. Æmōmōntāni, orum, m. (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4). Adj. Æmōmōntānus, a, um. Æmōmōntānus celsitudines (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Hæges, is, m. a native of Cylæus, Chizico, killed by Pōllux (Val. Flacc. iii. 191).—2. Brother of Pōrus, commanded the chariots in the engagement of that king with Alexander the Great (Curt. viii. 14).

Hægnus, i, m. father of Tiphys, according to Valerius Flaccus. Hægnades, a, m. Tiphys (Val. Flacc. li. 48).

Hælcōnē, es, f. the daughter of Æolus, god of the winds, whose husband Cēyx, king of Trāchis, a city of Thēssālia, Thessaly, was drowned in attempting to cross Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, to Clāros, to consult the Oracle. Disconsolate, in consequence of his departure, she incessantly implored the gods for his safe return. Jūno, moved by her constant prayers for her husband after his death, and, compassionating the violence of her sorrow, intreated Sōmnus to inform her of his death. The god of sleep instantly despatched Mōrphēus, who, assuming the form and voice of Cēyx, appeared to her in a dream, and stated the particulars of the shipwreck, and his own fate. Frantic with grief, Hämmon, ōnis, m. a Sicilian, or Carthaginian ship, which the Roman consul Mārcellus burned in a naval engagement with Himilco, off Sicily, during the second Punic war. Pŷthon and Elissa were consumed at the same time (Sul. Ital. xiv. 572).

Hämōpōn, ōnis, m. son of Pōlyæmon, hence called Pōlyæmōnides, a warrior in the Trojan army, killed by Teucer. At the same time with Hämōpōn, Orsilōchus, Ormēnus, Ophēlestes, Dætor, Chrōmiūs, Lŷcōphōn, and Mēlānippus, fell by the bravery of that hero (Hom. Il. viii. 276 seq.).

Hämpsigōras, v, m. a commander in the Carthaginian army during the second Punic war (Sul. Ital. xii. 345—419). In Lŷvius, his character is more fully given, and his name called Hämpsicōra q. v.

Hämpsicōra, æ, m. a chief in Sārdiōia, who possessed by far the greatest interest and influence in the island. From friendship to the Carthaginians, he sent a secret embassy to their capital, informing them how easy it would be to recover possession of the island, at the same time giving his reasons for that opinion. This intelligence raised their spirits, sunk by unfavourable accounts from Spain, and they appointed Hännibal, the Bath, to command in Sārdiōia, placing under him half the forces which Māgo was to carry over to his brother Hännibal in Italy. After an unsuccessful engagement, into which Hīōstus, son of Hämpsicōra, had rashly entered with the Romans, Häsdrūbal arrived with his fleet, and, having joined Hämpsicōra, the combined army gave battle to the Romans, and was defeated with the loss of more than fifteen thousand in killed and taken. Amongst the prisoners was the Carthaginian general Häsdrūbal, and amongst the killed was Hīōstus, on hearing of whose death, Hämpsicōra laid violent hands on himself, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 32—41).

Hämpsius, i, m. a soldier in Hannibal's army, who, from terror of Cārmēlus, climbed up an oak-tree, but his enemies transixed him in the act of leaping from bough to bough (Sul. Ital. vii. 671 seq.).

Hännibal, ālis (anciently ālis, Gel. iv. 7), m. a son of Hämīlear, a Carthaginian. The family of Hännibal appears to have been one of the most noble, and to have possessed the greatest influence in the Carthaginian state.

His father, an inveterate enemy of the Romans, compelled him, at nine years of age, to take a solemn oath that he would, as soon as possible, wage war against that people, and that he would never be at peace with them. This enmity against their formidable rivals instilled into the boy, increased with his growth, and in very early life he bent the whole energy of his powerful mind to concerting measures, or undertaking enterprises, for the destruction of the Romans. He joined the Carthaginians in Spain, and at his very arrival, attracted the gaze of the whole army. The veteran soldiers imagined their former commander was restored to them in his son, in whose face they observed the same animation, the same keen and piercing eye, the same expression of countenance, and the same features. His conciliatory and captivating manner in a short time so endeared him to the soldiers, that the remembrance of his father formed the weakest of their inducements to esteem him. No man ever possessed a genius more fitted for the most opposite duties, command and obedience; so that it was almost impossible to discern whether he was more loved by the commanders or by the soldiers. Whatever service required courage and activity, Häsdrūbal, then at the head of the Carthaginian army, intrusted to him in preference to every other officer, nor did the soldiers feel greater confidence or intrepidity under any other commander. To fearless courage in braving danger, he added perfect composure of mind in the most perilous situations. His body was a stranger to fatigue, and his mind to depression. Heat and cold he bore with equal indifference, and he restricted the quantity of his meat and drink to the demand of natural appetite, despising the gratification of the palate. Business demanded his first attention, and, that being accomplished, he laid himself down for repose, without the least regard to its being day or night. He had no fixed time of rest, and accustomed himself to sleep, when duty did not require his being awake. Amidst the soldiers on guard, or on the advanced posts, he was often seen stretched on the ground, and covered with a soldier's cloak. His dress differed in nothing from that of his equals, but he bestowed great pains on his horses and armour. In advancing to battle he uniformly appeared among the first, and in retiring he was the last who quitted the field. These virtues, says Lŷvius, vices of equal magnitude counterbalanced: inhuman cruelty, perfidy beyond that of a Carthaginian, no regard for truth, no sense of religious obligations, no fear of the gods, and no respect for an oath. During the three years which he served under Häsdrūbal, he availed himself of every opportunity, either in theory or practice, which could contribute to the forming of a great general. On receiving the command of the army, he made every effort to carry the war immediately into Italy, and with that view commenced hostilities on the Olcādes, and plundered their capital. This induced the smaller states to submit, and he then laid siege to Sāguntum, Murriedro, which was a virtual declaration of hostilities against Rome, since the Saguntines were the allies of that state. To the Roman ambassadors who came to complain of the violation of the treaty, he refused an audience; and, knowing that they would sail directly for Carthage, he sent previous notice to his countrymen to refuse the Roman demands, in which he succeeded. His movements were then directed northward, and his address secured him an unmolested passage through the Gallic states on his way to cross the Alps. Fertile in expedients, he passed the Rhone with little loss, and declined engaging the Romans under P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, who wished to detain him on the banks of that river, and to weaken his forces either in skirmishing parties, or in a general engagement. Hännibal, aware of his intention, and solicitous to enter Italy with as large an army as possible, defeated the scheme of the Roman general, and prepared for making that descent which has been so much celebrated in history. Gauls from the north of Italy, who hated the Romans, and would have rejoiced in their destruction, met him before he quitted the Rhone, and offered to act as guides over the Alps. With this advantage, it rather appears wonderful that his march across these mountains should have excited so much astonishment and admiration. The Gauls had, for centuries before, often passed from France into Italy, and an intercourse must have subsisted between the parent country and the colonies. Ancient authors differ greatly respecting the strength of his forces, some making the number a hundred thousand foot and twenty thousand horse, and others twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse; Apollonius says ninety thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and thirty-seven elephants (Bel. Han. 315). An uncertainty likewise prevails with regard to his route over the Alps. The general opinion, according to Livius, was that he passed over Alpes Pœninae, r. Pœnina, whence the name. Others maintain that he passed over Crema. The opinion of Livius appears to be, that he passed through the country of the Taurini; and he maintains, that the Alps did not receive their name from the Carthaginians, but from a person named Pœninus, worshipped on the top of that ridge as a divinity; Apollonius says that the passage over the Alps was called by his name (Bel. Han. 315). In nine days he gained the summit of the Alpine range, according to general report, and in six more he found himself in Cisalpine Gaul. On the top of the highest eminence he pitched his camp, and continued for two days to recruit the exhausted strength both of men and beasts. To make a way down the rock through which it was necessary to effect a passage, he felled a number of trees which stood near, raised a vast pile of timber, which he set on fire as soon as a strong wind arose, and, when the stone was violently heated, he poured vinegar upon it, which made it either crumble to pieces, or rend. Through the rock, disjoined by the power of heat, he opened a way with iron instruments, and made the descent so gentle that both the beasts of burden and the elephants could be brought down. In forming the road, and in descending, only four days were spent. According to Livius, from whom this account is taken, Hannibal, in the fifth month after he left Carthago Novæ, Carthago, transported his troops, and was in readiness to fight the Romans in their native country. If confidence may be placed in Apollonius, he did not reach Italy till the sixth month after he had left Spain (Bel. Han. 316). From the time he passed the Rhone, L. Cneius Alfenus states, that Hannibal declared in his hearing that he had lost thirty-six thousand men before he entered Italy, in 220 B. C. Over the Roman forces under P. Cornelius Scipio, the consul, who had endeavoured to provoke him to battle on the Rhone, he gained a victory at the foot of the Alps, and the consul would have lost his life had it not been for the bravery of his son Scipio, afterwards called *Africæ*us. At Trebia, the Trebia, he again defeated the Romans, and was himself wounded at Emporium, near Placentia, Placenza. In crossing the marches overflowed by Arno, the Arno, want of sleep, the damps of night, and the unwholesome air, brought on a disorder in his head, by which he lost the sight of one of his eyes, on which account Juvenal sneeringly calls him the blinkard general (Sat. x. 158). The rashness and ignorance of C. Flaminius Nèpus, the consul, brought on the disastrous engagement at Lacus Traz- mœnus, the Lake of Perugia, in which fifteen thousand of the Romans fell. The battle lasted for three hours. With such fury did both parties maintain the contest, that not one of the combatants observed an earthquake which overthrew large portions of many of the Italian cities, forced the sea up into the rivers, and levelled mountains by its dreadful convulsions. The Romans redoubled their efforts after this dreadful overthrow, and showed, in many instances, more fortitude than prudence. The commanders, too often impelled by their warlike ardour, rushed into engagements with their formidable enemy, when there was no probability of success, or even of a temporary advantage. Many of their allies deserted the Romans and joined Hannibal, who took their towns, and desolated their lands almost wherever he went. Q. Fabius Maximus, by his caution and military skill, showed his countrymen that the way to conquer Hannibal was to watch his movements, cut off stragglers, and prevent foraging, but to avoid regular engagements. In the battle at Cannæ, brought on by the inconsiderate rashness of C. Terentius Varro, a man grossly ignorant of military tactics, the Romans lost, in killed and prisoners, about forty-five thousand men. Had Hannibal marched directly against Rome, the victory at Cannæ would have been completed by the capture of the city, and the wishes of that great general would have been consummated by placing Rome in subjection to Carthage. Hannibal allowed that opportunity to escape, and fortune did not put another in his power. About this period, Livius ascribes to him actions which the reader is unwilling to believe of so great a man, such as making bridges and ramparts of the bodies of the dead, and even teaching his men to feed on human flesh. The longer he continued in the country, the less formidable did he appear, and the Romans learned not only to keep him in check, but frequently to gain considerable advantages over him; still he kept possession of many towns, and retained a considerable army, with which he overran different districts or made head against the Roman consuls, as opportunities occurred, or advantages offered. In a few months after the battle of Cannæ, it does not appear from Roman history that he could entertain the slightest hope of subjugating the state. That he showed, on almost every occasion, the talents of a consummate general, and the knowledge of a crafty politician, all must allow; yet, after losing the advantages which the victory at Cannæ had put in his power, his best efforts only went to harass, without the least tendency to conquer, the Romans. Even the transferring of the seat of war from Italy to Africa, bears honourable testimony to the transcendent merits of this great man, whom P. Cornelius Scipio must have despaired of soon conquering in his native country, before he thought of transporting troops beyond seas; especially when we consider that he did not accomplish this measure without powerful opposition from some of the first men in the state. After being sixteen years in Italy, the Carthaginians recalled Hannibal to protect their own country, and he obeyed their orders with the bitterest regrets. During that time he had destroyed four hundred towns, and killed three hundred thousand men in battle

(Ap. Bel. Pun. 34). The Roman commander indulged him with an interview which produced no beneficial effects, and the battle of Zama, Zamora, followed, which rendered Carthage tributary to Rome. At the earnest recommendation of Hannibal, the Carthaginians concluded a peace on such terms as the conquerors chose to dictate. Knowing the undiminished enmity of Hannibal to their state, the Romans continued to persecute that illustrious Carthaginian with a meanness and rancour most disgraceful to their national character. To escape from their hands, Hannibal found himself obliged to withdraw secretly from his native city, and, for some time, he found protection in the court of Antiochus, king of Syria. Adversity seldom finds security in friendship, and necessity again compelled Hannibal to make a hasty and concealed retreat from this monarch. Wandering about, destitute and forlorn, he next applied to Prusias, king of Bithynia, who would probably have afforded him a comfortable residence during the remainder of his life, had the persecuting hatred of the Romans not obliged him to surrender the aged and exiled Hannibal a sacrifice to their vengeance. As soon as he found that the outlets from the fort in which he resided were beset by armed men, and that his life was in danger, having imprecated the vengeance of the gods on the Romans, and the monarch who had violated the laws of hospitality, he swallowed a quantity of poison and expired, in 185 B. C. Appianus states that Flaminius, unauthorized by the senate, of his own accord, caused Prusias to take off Hannibal by poison (Bel. Syr. 92). In Pausanias a different account of his death is given (viii. 11). He was buried at Libyssa, in a stone coffin, which had this inscription, Hannibal hic situs est (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 42).—2. Son of Hasdrubal and brother of Hasdrubal and Psapho (Just. xix. 2).—3. The commander of a Carthaginian fleet which had been defeated, was put to death by crucifixion by his own soldiers (Liv. Ep. 17).—4. Surnamed Passer, a Carthaginian, who headed one of the three factions after the conclusion of the second Punic war (Ap. Bel. Pun. 36).

Hanno, onis, m. a Carthaginian, son of Hamilcar, and brother of Himilco and Gisgo, commanded in the Sicilian war against Dionysius. On his return to Carthage, he aspired at the sovereignty by the most cruel and flagitious means, for which he afterwards atoned by an excruciating death, about 346 B. C.; not one of his family was allowed to survive, either to imitate his villainies, or perpetrate his crimes (Just. xix. 2 seq.).—2. Commanded the Carthaginians against Agathocles in his descent on the African coast, and fell in the first engagement, about 310 B. C. (Just. xxii. 6).—3. A Carthaginian general whom the Roman consul L. Cornélius Scipio defeated, both in Sardinia and Corsica, in 261 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 17).—4. A noble Carthaginian at the head of the faction which opposed the Barcine party. About 320 B. C., he exerted himself to prevent Hannibal being sent to Hasdrubal then in Spain; but the friends of that noble youth outvoted him. Whether the conduct of Hanno proceeded from a just estimate of the Roman strength and character, or from a desire to thwart the measures of the rival faction, it cannot be doubted, that refraining from war with the Romans would have been the preservation of the Carthaginian state. When siege was laid to Saguntum, he moved in the senate of Carthage, that Hannibal should be commanded to desist, that ambassadors should be sent to Rome, to satisfy the senate, that restitution should be made to the Saguntini, and that Hannibal, according to the treaty, should be given up to the Romans. Nobody considered it necessary to answer this speech, because almost the whole senate was in the interest of Hannibal. After the battle of Cannæ, and the account of it given by Hannibal's ambassadors, Hanno, in a very able speech, recommended peace with the Romans, and the delivering up of Hannibal to that people to which Silius Italicus alludes (il. 277 seq.). The motion to this effect was not even seconded, in consequence of the great superiority of the other faction (Liv. xxi. 3 seq.).—5. A Carthaginian whom Hannibal made prefect of Spain, to the north of the Ebro, in 220 B. C., with a view to his securing the passes of the Pyrenees. In the course of that year, Cn. Cornélius Scipio took his camp, and made himself prisoner, with several other noble Carthaginians (Liv. xxi. 23 seq.).—6. Son of Bomilcar, sent by Hannibal with a considerable force, chiefly Spaniards, up the Rhine, about twenty-five miles, on purpose to cross that river, and come down on the rear of the Volcae, who attempted to prevent his passing to the eastern bank. Hanno executed that order with bravery and success (Liv. xxi. 27, 28).—7. A Carthaginian of high distinction, who instigated the Sardinians to revolt in 217 B. C. T. Mānlius defeated the Carthaginian troops, and took their general Hasdrubal prisoner. Hanno and Mago shared the same fate (Liv. xxiii. 41).—8. An officer in the Carthaginian army under Hannibal in Italy, whom Tib. Sēmprōnius Lōngus defeated at Gruncentum, Saponara, in Lucania, with considerable loss, in 217 B. C., on which he fell back into the territory of the Bruttii. After various measures, in which his activity and his zeal were more conspicuous than his success, he came to an engagement with Tib. Sēmprōnius Gracchus at Benevntum. Of his army, consisting of seven thousand men, who fought with great fortitude, scarcely two thousand escaped. Nor was he more successful in his attempt to relieve Capua; for Q. Fulvius Flaccus, consul, attacked his camp when he had gone out to forage, and when all was confusion in consequence of a great number of Cāmpāni having arrived with waggons to carry away grain, seized on the whole baggage, killed a great number, and took the camp, on which he fled to Bruttius ager. Here, whilst he commanded the garrison at Metapontum, Torre di Mare, Hannibal instructed him to raise fresh forces in 209 B. C. Of his history nothing further is known (Liv. xxiii. 37 seq.).—9. The commander of a Carthaginian garrison at Capua, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 5, 12).—10. Commanded the Carthaginians at Agrigentum, Girgenti, in 212 B. C. After the taking of Syracuse, he became jealous of the military fame of Mātinēs who commanded the Numidian cavalry, and deposed him, on which the latter entered into a treaty with M. Vā-lærius Lævinus, consul, and delivered the city into his hand. Hānno and Epicýdes, with a very small party, escaped at the opposite gate, and, finding a little barque, sailed for Africa (Liv. xxvi. 40).—11. Sent from Carthage in 209 B. C., to take the command of the forces in Spain, in room of Hāsdrūbal, who had gone into Italy, to aid his brother Hānibal. M. Silānus not only defeated the united forces of Hānno and Māgo, but took himself prisoner. Scipio Africānus, the commander-in-chief, sent him and other noble prisoners to Rome, under his brother L. Cornēlius Scipio (Liv. xxviii. 1—4).—12. A lieutenant-general of Māgo, who raised troops in Spain, in 208 B. C. Scipio Africānus having defeated Hāsdrūbal and Māgo, Hānno advanced to their relief with four thousand Spaniards, of whom he lost the greater part, from L. Mārcius having driven him out of his camp, and he himself escaped only with a few (Liv. xxviii. 23 seq.).—13. A noble Carthaginian youth, son of Hāmīlcar, who commanded the cavalry in Africa. Māsīnisa, by a manœuvre, withdrew this officer and his troops to some distance, wheeled suddenly round upon them, and left Hānno among the slain, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 29 seq.).—14. Another of this name, the son of Hāmīlcar, who lost his life in the same manner (Liv. xxix. 35). Livius mentions another of this name, son of Hāmīlcar, of whom nothing else is known (Liv. xlv. 14).

Hārāx, ācis, m. a town at the junction of the Eulæus with the Tigris. Ammīanus Mārcellinus mistakingly calls Hārāx a river (xxiii. 6).

Hārma, ātis, n. a town of Bœōtia (Hom. II. ii. 499). There was another town of this name in Attica.

Hārmoñē, es. f. Ab-Leman, a seaport on the Black Sea, to the west of Sinōpē, Sinub.

Hārmodius, i. m. an Athenian youth who, with Aristōgiton, attempted to kill the tyrant Hippas (Gel. ix. 2).

Hārmoniā, ae. v. Hārmoniē, es. et. Hērmoniōs, es. f. daughter of Mārs and Vēnus, whom Cādms q. v. married, and who afterwards underwent the same transformation with her husband. On her account, Vēnus wished Mārs not to take part against the Thebans in the war of Pōlyñices and Etēocles (Stat. Th. ii. 290—ix. 824).—2. A daughter of Gēlo, only son of Hērō, king of Sýracūse, and Nērcis a daughter of Pýrrhus, was the wife of Thēmīstus whom the senate killed with Andranōdōrus, who had entered into a design of forming a counter-revolution, after the murder of Hērōnōymus, the young king of Sýracūsa. On these noblemen being slain in the senatehouse, a decree was passed, that all the royal family should be put to death, a sentence which was immediately executed on Hārmoniā and her aunt Dāmārāta, the wife of Andranōdōrus (Liv. xxiv. 24, 25). According to Vālērīus Māxīmus, the nurse of Hārmoniā presented her own daughter, who was of the same age, to the assassins, by whom she was instantly killed; but Hārmoniā no sooner knew of that astonishing instance of affection which she disdained to survive, than she called back the ruffians, informed them of the deception, and immediately fell by their hands (iii. 2).

Hārmoniōides, a. m. the father of Phērcēlus. He excelled as an artist, and built the fleet in which Pāris sailed to Greece (Hom. II. v. 60 seq.).

Hārpagus, i. m. an intimate friend of Astýāges, whom he intrusted with his secrets, and ordered to kill his grandson Cýrus. Influenced either by the principles of humanity, or by dread of Māndāna, if she succeeded to the throne on her father's death, Hārpagus gave the child to Mithridātes, the king's herdsman, by whose wife, Spāco, the infant was suckled. The preservation of Cýrus, after some time, became known to Astýāges, who, in revenge, killed the only son of Hārpagus and served him up to his father. Prudence suggested the propriety of dissembling his grief, but from that day he meditated the destruction of the king, and Cýrus had no sooner reached manhood, than he informed him of his birth, the intention of his grandfather, and the means by which he might obtain the crown, of which he was the lawful heir. The ambitious youth instantly raised an army, invaded the territories of Astýāges, and Hārpagus, who had been appointed commander-in-chief, gratified his resentment by surrendering to Cýrus. Soon after, Astýāges fell into the hands of Cýrus, who deprived him only of his kingdom, not of his life, and set him over the Hýrcāni (Just. i. 4—6. Herod. i. 108 seq.).—2. A Persian who took Histieus alive and crucified him (Herod. vi. 28).

Hārpalion, ōnis, m. son of Pýlemēnes, king of Pāphlāgōniā, killed by Mēriōnes (Hom. II. xiii. 644).

Hārpalos, i. m. (Snatch), one of Acteon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 222).

Hārpalus, i. m. a man, whom Alexander the Great intrusted with his treasures, which he applied to improper purposes, probably in expectation of that conqueror's falling in the Indian expedition. To escape the punishment merited by such conduct, he no sooner heard of Alexander's returning to Bābylon, than he fled to Athens, where he bribed Dēmosthēnes. According to Plūtārchus, he afterwards fled to Crēta, Candia, where he was assassinated by Thimbros (Just. xiii. 5).—2. A nobleman, the chief of an embassy, sent by Pērseus, king of Mācēdōniā, to Rome, in 174 B. C. The presumption of Hārpalus enraged the senate, a declaration of war soon followed, and Pērseus was brought captive to Rome (Liv. xlii. 14).—3. A prefect of Cýrus, who appears to have exercised his authority with great severity. The inhabitants of Phōcæa, to avoid the rigour of his command, migrated to Italy and France. See Vella and Māsilia.

Hārpalycē, es. f. a daughter of Hārpalycus, a Thracian, king of the Amýnnēi, who, having lost her mother, was brought up on the milk of cows and mares. Her father intended that she should succeed him in the kingdom. She, having become a brave warrior, preserved his life by putting Nēoptōlēmus to flight, who had previously wounded him. After the death of her father, who was killed by his seditious subjects, she retired to the woods, and was at last killed by the herds, for the injury which she had done to their cattle (Hyg. 193). Her dexterity in horsemanship is mentioned by Virgil (Æn. i. 917).—2. The daughter of Cýsmēnus, the son of Tēlēs and Epicāstē. She had two brothers, Idas and Thērāgeos, and she xxxpassed, in beauty, all the girls of her own age. Having received injury from her father, she, in revenge, killed her younger brother, and served him up to Clymēnus. After this horrid act, she begged, from the gods, to be removed from men, and was changed into the bird Chalcis (Hyg. 255).

Harpālycus, i. m. a Trojan, slain by Cāmillus (Virg. Æn. xi. 675).

Harpāsus, i. m. a river of Cāria, one of the branches of Mæander, the Meander (Liv. xxxviii. 13). There appears to have been a cognominal town on this river.—2. The Harpasou, a northern branch of Arāxes, the Arash.

Harpē, es, f. an Amazon, who joined the Argonauts against the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 375).—2. A Nasamonian, who fought in the army of Hannibal, at the siege of Sāguntum. She was killed by Mōpsus (Sil. Ital. ii. 117 seq.).

Harpē, es, f. the dam of the horse Pēlōrus, by Zēphyrus (Sil. Ital. xvi. 365).

Harpē, es, f. a sword of a particular kind, worn by Mērcūrius, hence Lūcānus, Cygnis Harpē (Phar. ix. 676).

Harpēssus, i. m. a branch of Hēbrus, the Maritza (Ap. Bel. Civ. 649).

Harpōcras, æ, m. a freedman, and favourite of the Emperor Claudius (Suet. Claud. 28).

Harpōcrates, is, m. the god of silence, to whom Cupid dedicated the rose, which was sacred to his mother Vēnus; hence the rose became the symbol of silence, as is beautifully expressed in the following epigram of an unknown author:

"Est rosa flos Venēris, cujus quo furta late-rent,

"Harpōcrati matris dona dicavit Amor.

"Inde rosam mensis hospes suspendit amicis,
"Convivæ ut sub eâ dicta tacenda sciant."

Harpŷia, v. Harpŷia, æ, f. a Harpy. The Harpies were monsters, the upper part of their body being that of a woman, with the exception of their ears, which resembled those of a bear, and the under part that of a vulture. They possessed the gift of prophecy, were exceedingly voracious, emitted an infectious smell, and polluted every thing which they touched by their filth. Their residence was the Strōphādes, Strivali, islands off the coast of Ellis, south of Zācynthus, Zante, to which Zēthes and Cālās drove them, when sent by Jūno to plunder the tables of Phīneus, king of Thrācia, Romania. Hŷgīnus says, that they were covered with feathers, had the head and feet of a hen, wings, human arms, great claws, a white breast, and the thighs of a woman (14). Hēsīōdus calls them Aēllo and Oēypētē, and says, they had beautiful hair, flew high and swiftly (Th. 267). They were the children of Thaumās and Elēctra, according to Apōllōdōrus, who gives them the same names, but says, some call Aēllo, Aēllōpus, or Nicōthōē, and the others Oēythus (i. 2 seq.). Valērius Flāccus makes them the daughters of Tŷphon, hence he calls them Tŷphōnides (iv. 428 seq.). Aēllo is said, in her flight, to have fallen into the river Tigris, in the Morea, which, from her, is now called Harpys. Oēypētē, having flown over Prōpōntis, came to the islands Echīnādes, called, from her, Strōphādes, because, being wearied out by fatigue, she turned to the shore, and dropped down. Apōllōnīus Rhōdīus relates, that both reached the Strōphādes, and received no injury, because they promised, on oath, to their pursuers, that they would not further molest Phīneus.

Harpŷia, v. Harpŷia, æ, f. (Ravener), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 215).

Hārūdes, um, m. a people of Gērmānia, Germany, on the north bank of Dānūbius, the Danube, towards the source of that river (Cæs. B. G. i. 31 seq.).

Hāsdrūbal, ālis (anciently ālis, Gel. iv. 7), m. son of Māgo, killed in Sārdīnia, and succeeded, in the command of the army, by his brother Hāmīlcar. He left three sons, Hāsdrūbal, Hānnībal, and Psāpho (Just. xix. 1 seq.).—2. The son of the former, and brother of Hānnībal and Psāpho (Just. xix. 2).

3. A native of Carthage, who succeeded to the command of the army in Spain, on the death of Hāmīlcar, with whom he first became a favourite, on account of his great abilities, and afterwards his son-in-law. This connexion procured him the interest of the Barcine faction, which appointed him commander-in-chief, in opposition to the nobles. For his success he was more indebted to policy than force, for he procured the friendship of the petty princes and new nations in Spain, by conciliatory measures in preference to war and bloodshed. One of the barbarians openly assassinated him, about 221 B. C., because he had put his master to death. On being seized by those who surrounded him, the intrepid Spaniard showed the utmost cheerfulness of countenance. Joy, at the accomplishment of his purpose, overpowered the agony of pain, and torture was unable to banish the smile from his face. Hasdrubal's success in negotiation induced the Romans to renew their treaty, on condition that the Ebro should be the boundary, and that the Sāguntīni should retain their liberty. Like some other Carthaginians, he meditated a war in Italy; but it was reserved for his nephew, Hānnībal, to carry the design into execution (Liv. xxi. 2—5. Just. xiv. 5).

4. A brother of Hānnībal, a man of activity, to whom the latter gave the command of Spain, when he set out for Italy. Hāsdrūbal prevailed on the Ilērgētes, who had given hostages to Cn. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, to break the treaty, and he plundered the states which remained faithful to the Romans. The powerful fleet which he collected, the enemy soon, in a great measure, destroyed; besides, the Cātībēri killed and took prisoners nearly twenty thousand of his men. The bravery of the Romans rendered it difficult to prevent the Spanish allies from revolting to them, to which the inadequacy of his forces must have contributed powerfully. The senate of Carthage, in spite of his remonstrances, commanded him to quit Spain, to march into Italy, and join his brother. Knowing that he must purchase a passage through some of the Gallic states, he raised contributions in Spain for that purpose, and marched to Ibērus, the Ebro, where the Roman commanders, Cn. and P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, who knew his plans, lay to obstruct his march, and compelled him to risk a battle, which terminated in a total defeat and the loss of his camp. This victory determined the Spaniards in the Roman interest, prevented Hasdrubal's marching to Italy, and made his residence in Spain hazardous. The great numbers of the Carthaginians killed at Illiturgi and Intibili, increased the strength of the Romans in that country, by almost all the states in Spain entering into alliance with the conquerors; but, soon after, he and Mago routed a numerous army of the Spaniards, 216 B. C., when all the natives of the south of Spain would have revolted, had not the seasonable arrival of P. Cœnilius Scipio confirmed the wavering allies. After a bloody battle of four hours, in which the advantage appeared to be on the side of the Romans, Cn. Cœnilius Scipio received a wound in the thigh, which his troops considered mortal, otherwise they might have taken the Carthaginian camp. Hædrübal, observing that the dependence of the Roman general must be upon his auxiliaries, bribed the Celtibæri to desert him, on which he began to retreat; but the enemy pursued, and brought on a general engagement, in which Cœnilius was killed. His brother Pöblius had expired about a month before. Soon after, a powerful force of confederate Latins seized on the passes of the valley in which Hædrübal was encamped, from which he could not escape, therefore he preferred, to being taken prisoner, a voluntary surrender, which he managed so dexterously, that he eluded the Romans. In P. Cœnilius Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africæus, Hædrübal found a commander, in every respect his superior, who, by his humanity, withdrew the states of Spain from the Carthaginians to the Romans, and, by his bravery and military skill, completely defeated him, at Bæcûla, when his camp was taken, with ten thousand foot and two thousand horse. On consulting with Mago, and Hædrübal, son of Gisgo, it was resolved that he should go into Italy to support his brother. This march he accomplished with greater ease and expedition than he or any one else expected. The Arvernî, and afterwards the other Gallic and Alpine tribes, by whom he was kindly received, accompanied him to the war. After spending some time to no purpose, in besieging Placëntia, he sent a letter to his brother, but the messenger was taken, and the letter carried to the senate. The consuls, M. Livius Sallinator, and C. Claudius Nêro, having joined their forces, compelled him to fight on the banks of Mëtaurus, the Metro; where he displayed both bravery and military skill, rallied the troops when flying, led them on again like a veteran commander, and, at last, perceiving that the enemy was completely victorious, rushed into the midst of a Roman cohort, by which he was killed. When the elephants became unruly, to prevent their injuring his own troops, he caused the drivers to put them to death, by cutting the spinal marrow behind the ears, a mode of destruction of which he was the inventor. Claudius caused his head to be cut off, and thrown down before the advanced guards of Hännibal, who, deeply struck by that disaster, so fatal to his family and to his own success, said, that "he then knew the fortune of Carthage" (Liv. xxi. 22 seq.). Ovidius says, Hædrübal fell by his own weapons (suis tellis), by which he means his own stratagem (Fast. vi. 770).—6. Surnamed the Bald, was sent, by the Carthaginians, to Sardinia, with nearly half of the forces which Mago, brother of Hännibal, was to have carried into Italy, in consequence of their having received information that the island might be easily recovered from the Romans. A storm drove his fleet out of its course to the Bâlæares, and it sustained so much injury, that it required a considerable time to refit. T. Mænius Törquatus both defeated this Carthaginian and took him prisoner (Liv. xxiii. 32—41).—6. Son of Gisgo, was a general of great abilities and distinction. In 216 B. C., he joined Mago and Hædrübal, son of Hämilear, in Spain, carrying with him a complete army. The success of the Romans in the eastern parts of that country, induced Hædrübal to retire towards the Atlantic Ocean and Cadiz, where he renewed the war, with the assistance of Mago, son of Hämilear, having raised and armed fifty thousand foot and four thousand four hundred horse, in Spain. Being joined by Mäsinissa with the whole cavalry, these Carthaginian generals engaged in battle with Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africæus, who out-generalled them, and overpowered their forces by the bravery of his troops. Hædrübal endeavoured, without success, to stop his men, who entered their camp in a panic. Dreading a general revolt, Hædrübal decamped in the night. Scipio pursued closely, and the cavalry, with the light-armed infantry, attacking the flying army, sometimes in the flank and sometimes in the rear, necessity compelled Hædrübal frequently to stop, on purpose to repel these charges, by which means the legions came up, when the consequence was not a battle, but a slaughter as of cattle. Hædrübal, at last, fled with about six thousand half-armed men, to the neighbouring hills; in a few days he went on board a ship, and sailed for Cadiz, whence he sent ships for his brother Mago, who joined him in that island. At this time Mäsinissa deserted the Carthaginians, and entered into an alliance with Scipio. Some time after, Hædrübal and Scipio Africæus, met in the house of Sýphæx, king of the Mäsesýli, each soliciting the interest of that prince for his own state. These two officers lodged under the same roof, ate at the same table, and, to please Sýphæx, reclined on the same couch. Hædrübal considered Scipio's powers of conversation more admirable than his military exploits, foresaw the schemes of the Roman general, and dreaded their effects on the Carthaginian empire. His countrymen rated his military talents greatly below those of Scipio, who had driven him out of Spain, yet he had the address to withdraw Sýphæx from the alliance of the Romans, and to attach him to the Carthaginians. On the ratification of this treaty, he gave his daughter Sôphônissa in marriage to Sýphæx, who assisted him in raising a powerful armament, with which, at a future period, he compelled Scipio to raise the siege of Utica. The joy of this victory was of short continuance, for in one night Scipio destroyed by fire both their camps, a work of no great difficulty, in consequence of their tents being covered with straw. Forty thousand men were destroyed by fire and sword, besides many Carthaginian noblemen, eleven senators, a hundred and twenty-four military standards, with six elephants, and a great number of arms, which, on coming into the possession of the Romans, Scipio committed to the flames as a sacrifice to Vülcanus. On his returning to Carthage, he convoked the senate, recommended to fight it to the last, an opinion adopted by all the Barcine faction, and in a short time with the aid of Syphax, he had an army of about thirty thousand fighting men. C. Laelius and Māsīnissa defeated him and Syphax in battle, when the latter was made prisoner, but Hāsdrūbal having escaped, afterwards commanded a fleet, in which his enmity to the Romans was more conspicuous than either his prudence or his humanity (Liv. xxiv. 41—xxx. 25).—7. Surnamed by his countrymen Hædus, was at the head of the embassy which the Carthaginians sent to Rome after the battle at Zāma, Zāma, in 203 B. C. He had always opposed the Barcine faction, and recommended peace. His oration in the senate hinges upon this topic, and upon the good sense of the Roman people. The speeches of the other ambassadors were calculated to excite compassion. Notwithstanding the perfidy of the Carthaginians, the senate agreed to a peace. When the senatehouse of Carthage was filled with grief, Hānībal laughed, and was rebuked by Hāsdrūbal Hædus for his unseasonable mirth, to which Hānībal replied with great spirit, manly thought, and just sentiment, that must have convinced Hāsdrūbal Hædus both of his own error, and of the justness of Hānībal's opinion (Liv. xxx. 42—44).—8. Grandson of Māsīnissa, whom the Carthaginians put to death in the senatehouse, 150 B. C., on suspicion of treason; merely because Gūlūssa, his relation, was then aiding the Romans (Liv. Ep. 50).—9. Commanded the Carthaginians, and surrendered himself with the capital to P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Æmīliānus, 148 B. C. His wife, who a few days before could not prevail on him to go over to Scīpio, threw herself, with her two children, from a tower into the flames of the burning city and expired (Liv. Ep. 51).—10. A great-grandson of Māsīnissa (Ap. Bel. Pun. 68).

Hāsta, æ, f. a spear. In the early ages of the Roman state, kings had spears in place of crowns; the Greeks called them sceptres. Jūstinus adds, that spears were objects of adoration; but ancient authors do not support that assertion (xliii. 3).

Hätērius Antōnīnus, Hätērii Antōnīni, m. a Roman, whose extravagance and dissipation reduced him to extreme poverty; on this account, he obtained an annual pension from the emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34).

Dēcīmus Hätērius Agrīppa, Dēcīmi Hätērii Agrīppæ, m. a Roman, who first held the office of tribune of the people, afterwards obtained the pretorship, and, at last, the consulship with C. Sūlpicius Gālba in the year 22. From Tācītus it appears, that he was nearly related to Gērmānicus and Drūsus, who embraced his interest, when a candidate for the pretorship (Ann. i. 77 seq.).

Q. Hätērius, Q. Hätērii, m. a man of consular rank, who provoked the wrath of the emperor, Tībērius, by asking him "how long will you suffer, Cæsar, the state to be without a head?" Two years after, he made a speech against the luxury of the times, the substance of which Tācītus has recorded. This historian has likewise narrated an instance of the lowest flattery to the same emperor, which even the senate of that degenerate age treated with contempt, and despised the man who, on the verge of life, had incurred such disgrace, without even a prospect of future advantage. He died in the year 26 (Tac. Ann. i. 13 seq.).—2. Surnamed Antōnīnus, the colleague of Dēcīlus Jūnius Silānus in the consulship in the year 54 (Tac. Ann. xii. 58).

T. Hätērius, T. Hätērii, m. a Roman knight of immoral habits, who expired in an act of impurity, as did also Cōrnēlius Gāllus (Val. Max. ix. 12).

Hēbē, es, f. a daughter of Jūpiter and Jūno, or of Jūno only. She was the goddess of youth, and was said to possess the power of restoring to the period of life, over which she presided, whomsoever she pleased. Jūpiter appointed her his cupbearer on account of her beauty, but he afterwards deprived her of that office, in consequence of her having fallen unfortunately, and appointed Gānīmēdes in her place. When Hērēclēs, after his death, obtained the honours of a divinity, the hatred of Jūno towards him entirely ceased, and she gave him in marriage Hēbē, by whom he had two sons, Alexiāres and Anicētus. The Latins called her Jūvēntas, or, Jūvēnta. Jūnōtia Hēbē, from her being considered by some the daughter of Jūno, without a father (Val. Flacc. viii. 231).

Hēbraei, orum, m. the Jews. Adj. Hēbraeus, a, um. Hēbraei liquōres, balsam (Stat. Syl. v. 1. 213). Hēbrae tērræ (Tac. Hist. v. 2).

Hēbrus, i, m. a son of Dōñehāon, killed by Mēzēntius (Virg. Æn. x. 696).—2. A native of Lipāra, Lipari, an island between Sicily and Italy, whose beauty, horsemanship, boxing, running, and skill both in shooting and hunting, Hōrātius celebrates (Od. iii. 12. 6 seq.).—3. A man in the Theban army, killed by Dānāus (Stat. Th. x. 309).—4. A native of Cyzicus, Chizico (Val. Flacc. iii. 149).—5. A Scythian killed by Iāson (Val. Flacc. vi. 618).

Hēbrus, i, m. the Maritza, the largest river of Thrācia, Romania, part of Turkey in Europe. It takes its rise in mount Hæmus, passes Adrianople, and then running nearly south, falls into Mārē Ægæum, the Archipelago, after a course of 250 miles, nearly opposite to the island Sāmōthracē, Samothraki. When the Bacchanals had torn Orphēus in pieces, they threw into this river his head, which, although separated from his body, repeated the name of Eurȳdicē as it was carried down by the current (Virg. G. iv. 523 seq.). Ægærius Hēbrus, from its being in Thrācia (Virg. G. iv. 524).

Hēcūgē, es, f. a Scythian nymph, and sister of Opis. Both excelled in hunting. Claudīanus seems to consider them to have been first deified by the inhabitants of Dēlos. Perhaps they only formed part of Diana's attendants (Claud. xxiv. 253).

Hēcūmēdē, es, f. daughter of Arsīnōus, a native of Tēnēdos, and concubine of Mīchāon (Hom. Il. xi. 623). The poet commends the beauty of her locks, as well as her personal accomplishments.

Hēcātēus, e. Hēcātēus, i, m. a native of Mīlētus, Palatschia, whose geographical opinion is mentioned by Ammīanus Marcellīnus (xxii. 8). Some of his writings have been transmitted.—2. A Macedonian in the army of Alexander, produced to bear evidence in the trial of Amȳntas and Simmas (Curt. vii. 1).

Hécátē, es, f. the daughter of Pērsēs, king of Taurica, the brother of Æetes, and Astéria, a goddess of the Infernal Regions, supposed to be the same with Diāna, who was also denominated Proserpina. She was represented with three heads; hence Hécātē triceps (Orph. Arg. 974); Tergemina (Virg. Æn. iv. 511). From her father she was called Pērsēs (Ov. Met. vii. 74). Hécātēs, idos, f. of Hécātē, applied to a noun feminine. Hécātēs herba, a magical herb (Ov. Met. vi. 139). Adj. Hécātēus, et, Hécātēus, a, um, of Hécātē, of Diāna; magical. Hécātēia cārmina, magical charms or incantations (Ov. Met. xiv. 44). Hécātēia Gārgaphē, Gārgaphē, sacred to Diāna, or, Hécātē (Stat. Th. vii. 273).

Hécātēmpylos, i, f. Demegon, a town of Pārthia, which, under the Arsacidae, was the royal residence. It had this name (the hundred gates) from the great number of roads which met there (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Hēctor, ōris, acc. a, m. a son of Priāmus, king of Trōja, and Hécūba, married Andrōmāchē, by whom he had one son, named Astyanāx. He was the bravest of all the warriors who fought in defence of Troy. When Achilles, provoked at Agāmēmnōn, the commander-in-chief of the Grecian forces, for depriving him of Brīsēis, who had fallen to his share in the division of the plunder of Lyrnēssus, the site of which is now unknown, in proud disdain quitted the field and withdrew to his ships, the valour of Hēctor rendered the Trojans victorious. He killed Pātrocclus, the intimate friend of that hero, in whose armour he was clad. To revenge this prince's death, Achilles returned to the war, and, at last, prevailed over Hēctor, whose dead body the enraged Grecian dragged in barbarous triumph thrice round the walls of Troy and the tomb of Pātrocclus, and then sold it to Priāmus for a great sum. Adj. Hēctōrēus, a, um. Hēctōrēia flamma, Hector's flames; flames or fires with which Hēctor attempted to burn the Grecian fleet (Ov. Met. xiii. 7). Hēctōrēo marti, in battle with Hēctor (Ov. Met. xiii. 275). Hēctōrēa conjux, Andrōmāchē (Virg. Æn. iii. 488). Hēctōrēa gens, the Trojan nation (Virg. Æn. i. 273); the Romans (Sil. Ital. ii. 343). Hēctōrēi amnes, Trojan rivers (Virg. Æn. v. 634).—2. Son of Parmēnio, and a favourite of Alexander the Great, was drowned in the Nile, in 331 B. C. (Curt. iv. 8 seq.).

Hécūba, æ, v. Hēcūbē, es, f. daughter of Cissēus, and, according to others, of Dymas, the second wife of Priāmus, king of Troy. Hēctor was her first-born; but, during her second pregnancy, she dreamed that she brought forth a burning torch, which reduced Troy to ashes. On consulting the augur, Æscāus, whom his maternal grandfather Mērōps taught the method of explaining dreams, Priāmus was informed, that the boy, then unborn, would be the destruction of the city, on which account he caused him to be exposed on mount Ida soon after his birth. See Pāris. Hécūba was the mother of fourteen children, according to Apollōdōrus, who adds, that Priāmus, besides the family of Hécūba, had forty, of whom he gives the names. Virgilius delineates her character by some masterly touches, which present the aged queen before the mind of the reader in circumstances which cannot fail to interest the heart, and command the deepest sympathy. She outlived Hēctor, whose valour was the defence of Troy, witnessed the slaughter of her aged husband, and was carried off a prisoner by the Greeks, after Troy was both sacked and burned (Virg. Æn. ii. 501). According to Ovidius, Ulysses dragged her away into captivity, and the Grecian fleet having landed on the Thracian coast, her daughter Pōlyxēna was torn from her embrace, and sacrificed to appease the mânes of Achilles. On going to the shore to wash the remains of her murdered daughter, she found the mangled body of her son Pōlydōrus thrown out upon the beach. Transported with maternal grief, and boiling for revenge, she went to Pōlymēstor, and, by pretending that she wished to show him some hidden gold which he should give to her son, obtained an interview. Unable to endure his solemn but false declarations, she thrust her fingers into the perfidious wretch's eyes, and tore them out of their sockets. The Thracians, to punish the death of their king, attacked the Trojan queen with stones and darts, but she immediately passed from the human form into that of a dog, and the place retains the name expressive of that transformation (Cynossēma) (Ov. Met. xiii. 423 seq.).

Hēdylus, i, m. a man of whom too little cannot be known, or said (Mart. ix. 58).

Hēdymēles, is, m. a famous harper, probably of Greek extraction, which his name (hēdymēles) seems to indicate (Juv. Sat. vi. 382).

Hēgēas, æ, m. a general of the Neapolitan cavalry, killed in pursuit of Hannibal's men, who were advanced against the city, and, retreating purposely, drew him into an ambuscade (Liv. xxiii. 1).

Hēgēlōchus, i, m. an officer to whom Alexander the Great gave the command of the land forces which were to clear Lēsbos, Chios, and Co of the guards of the enemy, a service which he appears to have accomplished in conjunction with Amphōtērus (Curt. iii. 1 seq.).—2. An intimate friend of Parmēnio (Curt. vi. 11).

Hēgēsānder, dri, m. the father of Hēcātēus, the historian (Herod. v. 125).

Hēgēsianāx, āctis, m. a nobleman of distinction, who, with Menippus, was at the head of an embassy sent by Antiochus, king of Sýria, to the Roman senate, in 195 B. C. From his conduct he appears to have been unwilling to come to hostilities with the Romans (Liv. xxxiv. 57—59).

Hēgēsias, æ, m. a philosopher of Cýrēnē, some of whose opinions are mentioned by Diōgēnes and Valērius Māximus (viii. 9).

Hēgēsilōchus, i, m. chief magistrate of the Rhōdii, which they call Prýtānis, in 173 B. C. He was friendly to the Romans, and had prevailed on the Rhōdii to banish all idea of forming alliances with kings, who had so often deceived them (Liv. xlii. 45).

Hēgēsipyla, æ, f. daughter of Olōrus, king of Thrācia, married to Mīlōides (Herod. vi. 39).

Hēliārius, i, m. a person who hauls with ropes. People of this description were employed in launching ships, drawing them ashore, and in similar labour (Mart. iv. 64).

Hēlēna, æ, v. Hēlēnē, es, f. a daughter of Jūpiter and Lēda, the wife of Tündārus, king of Spārta, Mistra. Jūpiter, at the time of his intercourse with Leda, is said to have assumed the shape of a swan. She produced two eggs, from one of which sprang Pöllum and Hēlēna, and from the other Cāstor and Clýtēnnēstra. The beauty of Hēlēna, even in her infancy, was so remarkable, that before she reached her twelfth year she was carried away by Thēseüs, assisted by his friend Pirithōus, from the temple of Diāna, where she was sacrificing, and conveyed to Athens, but brought back by her brothers Cāstor and Pöllum. In several authors it is stated she had a daughter to Thēseüs (Paus. ii. 22). As she was courted by all the young princes of Greece, Týndārus, at the suggestion of Ulysses, bound them by oath, administered over the carcase of a horse which he had sacrificed, to protect her. She then married Mēnēläus, and was soon after again carried off by Pāris, a son of Priāmus, king of Trōja, which occasioned the most memorable war recorded by antiquity. Her conduct during the siege is very differently represented by ancient writers. Some maintain that she warmly embraced the Trojan interest, while Virgīlius and others assert that she betrayed the plans and measures of the Trojans, in order most probably to regain the favour of Mēnēläus and the Grecians. That poet must have had a very strong conviction of her iniquitous conduct, otherwise he would not have called her nefas (Æn. ii. 585). Soon after Pāris was killed by Philōctētes, she married, according to some, Dēiphōbus, another son of Priāmus, and, according to others, she returned to Greece with her husband. The last is supported by Hómērus, who represents Mēnēläus and her living together at Sparta in the greatest happiness, after that destructive war which was the consequence of her imprudence and criminality (Od. iv. 2 seq.). It must be confessed that the history of this celebrated woman is somewhat obscure and contradictory after the sack of Trōja, and that nothing certain respecting the time and manner of her death is known. The bath of Hēlēna is a mile west of the port of Cēnchrēas, Kekreh, formed by a stream that issues from a rock several yards above the level of the sea, of waters beautifully clear, a little saline and tepid. From her mother's husband she was called Týndāris; from the place of her birth Argiva (Virg. Æn. i. 650); and from her mother, Lēdaea (Virg. Æn. vii. 364). After the destruction of Troy she landed, on reaching the coast of Attica, on a small island, which afterwards bore her name (Paus. i. 35). Lēdaea Týndāris, Hēlēna, daughter of the wife of Týndārus, and a native of Lēdēdāmon (Virg. Æn. ii. 601).

Hēlēna, w. f. Elua, a town of Spain, near the Pyrenes (Eutrop. x. 9).

Hēlēnōpōlis, is. f. See Drēpānum.

Hēlēnor, ōris, m. son of the king of Mæōnia by Licynia, a slave, whom she sent to the assistance of Troy, in forbidden arms, i. e. from his extreme youth, not from the Roman custom of forbidding or prohibiting slaves to serve as soldiers. For the same reason most probably he was inglorious with a blank shield, for he discovers great resolution and bravery, when surrounded by Túrnus and his men, by whom he was killed (Virg. Æn. ix. 544 seq.).

Hēlēnus, i. m. a son of Priāmus and Hēcūha. On account of his skill in prophecy, from which he is called Dārdānius vates (Ov. Met. xiii. 835), the Greeks, after the destruction of his native city, and the kingdom of his father, did not put him to death. Pýrrhus, the son of Achilles, to whose share of the captives he had fallen, carried him to Epirus, Lower Albania, gave him in marriage Andrōmāchē, Hector's widow, and part of his own kingdom, which, from his brother Chāon, whom he had accidentally killed, he called Chāōnia (Just. xvii. 3). Būthrōtum, Butrinto, was the capital of this district, which Ænēas visited, on his way to Italia, Italy, and surveyed with pleasure and minuteness the town to which Hēlēnus had given the name of his native city. Even its gates and the rivers in its vicinity he distinguished by Trojan appellations. Here Ænēas spent some time, and to the prophetic gift of Hēlēnus was greatly indebted for important information respecting his future voyage (Virg. Æn. iii. 344 seq.). At this city Hēlēnus passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, affluence, and splendour.—2. A son of Pýrrhus, king of Epirus, by a daughter of Agāthōcles. When his father quitted Italy, he left him to guard Tārēntum, afterwards sent for him, and, on his father being killed, Antigōnus Gonātas, to whom he had surrendered, sent him back to his own kingdom (Just. xviii. 1—xxv. 5).—3. Son of Cēnōps, hence called Cēnōpides. Hēctor killed him (Hom. Il. v. 707).

Hēlēpōlis, v. Hēlēptōlis, is. f. (i. e. the taker of cities), a warlike engine, said to have been invented by Dēmētrius, or much used by him, and from his success in storming of towns he obtained the surname of Pōlēōrētes (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Hēliādes, um (Sing. Hēliās, ādis, f.) the daughters of Sol and Clýmēnē, who were changed into poplar-trees, in consequence of their immoderate grief for the death of Phāethon, their brother. Ovidius mentions only three, Hýginus makes the number four, and Hēsiōdus seven. They had this name from their father Hēlios, the sun, i. e. Apōllo; from which also is derived the Adj. Hēliācus, a, um, of the sun, Solar. Nēnus Hēliādum, a grove of poplar-trees. The ancients supposed this kind of tree to exude amber (Diod. Sic. v. 23); hence crusta Hēliādum, amber cups (Juv. Sat. v. 38).

Hēliānus, i. m. a man noticed by Mārciālis. The poet only mentions his eloquence without making us further acquainted with his character (xli. 24).

Hēlicāon, ōnis, m. son of Antenor, who built Pātāvium, Padua. He married Lāōdicē, a daughter of Priāmus, king of Troy, and would have lost his life in an engagement with the Greeks during the night; but Ulysses spared him, from the respect which he had for his father, and in gratitude for the kindness which he had received from him. Adj. Hēlicāōnius, a, um. Hēlicāōnia rēgio, the territory of Pātāvium (Mart. xiv. 152).

Hēlicāōnes, um, m. two sons of Mōera, a priestess of Ægēa Vēnus, killed by Týdēus, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 476).

Hēlicē, es, f. a name of Ursa mājor among the Greeks, who regulated their navigation by this cluster of stars, as the Phœnicians steered their ships by Cýnōsūra, Ursa Minor, v. Arctos minor, which they likewise called Phœnicē (Ov. Met. viii. 207). Pār-rhāsīs Hēlicē (Luc. Phar. ii. 237). Tōrea Hēlicē (Claud. xvii. 299).—2. A city in the bay of Corinth, swallowed up by an earthquake in 373 B.C. (Amm. Mar. xvii. 7. Ov. Met. xv. 293).

Hēlicon, ōnis, m. Zagara, or, Zagara-couni, a mountain of Bœotia, on the confines of Phœcis, sacred to Apōllo and the Muses. The fountains Agānippē and Hippocrēnē were at the foot of Hēlicon, which the river Pērmēssus nearly encompassed. Cithæron, Elatias (Hobhouse), Elatea (Clarke), Hēlicon, Zagara, or, Zagara-couni, Pār-nāsus, Lia-kūra, Ōeta, Banina, and Pindus, Mezzoro, form part of the chain of mountains which, from the plains of Attica, extend in a N. W. direction for nearly 200 miles. Hēlicon is divided into two summits towards the west, as Cithæron is towards the north. Near Thīsbē, Kakosia, it is called Palais Bouna, i. e. the old mountain, but its general name is Zagara. Virgīneus Hēlicon, virgin Hēlicon; from the Muses being all unmarried, and Hēlicon, their favourite haunt (Ov. Met. ii. 219). Hēlicōnis alūmnas, the Muses. Tōtus Hēlicon (Mart. xii. 6). Hēlicōnis, idis, et, Hēlicō-nias, ādis, f. of Hēlicon; applied to females or nouns feminine. Hēlicōnis nympha (Stat. Th. vii. 756). Hēlicōnides, um, f. the Muses. Adj. Hēlicōneus, et, Hēlicōnūs, a, um. Hēlicōneus collis (Cat. lxi. 1). Hēlicōnia mella, exquisite poetry (Claud. xxix. 10). Hēlicō-nius rex, Neptūnus (Hom. Il. xx. 404).—2. A river of Mācēdōnia, which Pausānias describes as running twenty-two stadia under ground, and, rising again, is called Bāphyrē, becomes navigable, and at last pours its waters into the sea (ix. 30).

Hēlinus, i, m. a centaur, slain at the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the marriage of Pirithōus, by Cēneus (Ov. Met. xii. 460).—2. A Lemnian, killed by his wife Gōrgē, at the time the women of that island massacred the men (Stat. Th. v. 207).

Hēliōdōrus, i, m. one of the blood royal of Sýria, more ambitious than successful (Ap. Bel. Syr. 116).—2. A rhetorician, who formed one of the party with which Hōrātius travelled from Rome to Brindisi, and called by the poet by far the most learned of the Greeks. Nothing more respecting him is known, than what Hōrātius mentions (Sat. i. 5. 2).

Hēliōgabalus. See M. Aurēlius Antōnī-nus Bāsiliānus.

Hēliōpōlis, is, f. called by the Arabs Ain-shems (i. e. the fountain of the sun), and now Ma-tarea (i. e. cool water), was one of the chief cities of Egypt, of which the Scripture name is On, from its being sacred to the Sun. Thelctus says, that a phoenix directed its flight towards Hēliōpōlis in the reign of Ptolē-mæus, the third of the Macedonian race (Ann. vi. 28). Ma-tarea can scarcely now be called even a village. Inh. Hēliōpōlitæ, arum (Sing. Hēliōpōlitæ, æ), m. Adj. Hēliōpōlitānus, a, um. Hēliōpōlitāna civitas (Amm. Mar. xvii. 4).

Hēlis, idis, f. a lewd woman (Mart. i. 35). Hēlius, i, m. a bawling plender (Mart. i. 96).—2. A freedman who assisted P. Cēler in the murder of M. Jūnius Silānus in the year 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1).

Hēlix, icis, m. a young Scythian commander, who fought against Iāson and the Argonauts, and was killed by Nēstor (Val. Flacc. vi. 570).

Hēllānicē, es, f. sister of Clitus, the woman by whom Alexander the Great was brought up, whose two sons fell at Mīlētus in the army of that general (Curt. viii. 1 seq.).

Hēllānicus, i, m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who distinguished himself in the battle at Hēllācarnāssus in 331 B.C. (Curt. v. 2).—2. One of the Epēi, who, in advanced age, despising danger, formed a stratagem by which the tyrant Aristōtīmus lost his life (Just. xxvi. 1).—3. A Greek historian who flourished about the same time with Hērōdōtus and Thūcýdides. He was a native of Lēsbos, Mityleni, and appears to have written with less elegance than his contemporaries (Cic. de Orat. ii. 13).

Hēllas, ādis, f. a woman beloved by a man named Mārius, who, in the rage of jealousy, killed her, and then, in despair, threw himself headlong from a rock. The event was probably recent when Hōrātius wrote (Sat. ii. 3. 277).

Hēllas, ādis, f. the name given by the natives to Græcia q. v. Inh. Hēllēnes, um, m. Adj. Hēllādicus, et, Hēllēnicus, a, um. Hēllādicum (genus picturæ) (Plin. v. 205).

Hēllē, es, f. daughter of Athāmas and Nēphēlē, and sister of Phryxus q. v. When their father was about to put both to death, Jūpiter gave them a ram with a golden fleece on which they attempted to escape to Cōlchis. According to some authors, Hēllē became giddy in consequence of the great height to which the ram rose from the earth, and fell into the strait between Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and Mārē Ēgēum, the Archipelago, which was afterwards known by her name Hēllēspōntus, i. e. the sea of Hēllē, now the Dardanelles. Ovidius calls it mārē Ēōliæ Hēllæ, sea of Æolian Hēllē, from her paternal grandfather Æōlus (Trist. i. 9. 15). Qua pelāgo nōmen Nēphēlētias abutūit Hēllē (Luc. Phar. ix. 956). The story of Hēllē and her brother is differently related by different authors.

Hēllēspōntus, i, m. the Dardanelles, the strait between Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and Mārē Ēgēum, the Archipelago, about thirty-three miles in length, and where it is narrowest the breadth does not exceed three quarters of a mile. It had its name from Hēllē q. v. The appellation was at first restricted to the entrance into Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, hence the two names mentioned by Stēphānus Pārōcēnītis and Pārāpōtāmios. Rāpidus Hēllēspōntus (Luc. Phar. ii. 675). The district adjoining on the E. which was of considerable extent, had the same name. Inh. Hēllēspōntii, orum, m. who were also called Olymphi. Hēllēspōntias, æ, m. an easterly wind, perhaps E. N. E. (Herod. vii. 188). Adj. Hēllēspōntiācus, et, Hēllēspōntius, a, um. Hēllēspōntiācus Priāpus, from his being the chief deity of Hēllēspōntus, on which account Ovidius calls him Hēllēspōntiācus deus (Fast. i. 440). Hēllēspōntiāca aqua, the water of the Dardanelles (Ov. Trist. i. 9. 24). Hēllēspōntiāca signa, the standards of Priāpus, i. e. excessive lewdness (Claud. xviii. 256). Hēllēspōntia crā-shores of the Dardanelles (Catul. xviii. 4).

Hēllūsi, orum, m. a German nation, reported to have had the human face, with the legs and bodies of wild beasts (Tac. Mer. Ger. 46).

Hēlōps, ōpis, m. a centaur, whom Pri-thōus transfixed with a javelin, in the battle with the Lāpithae at the celebration of his nuptials (Ov. Met. xii. 335).—2. A man killed by Thēseus at the siege of Thēbæ, Thēra (Stat. Th. xii. 746).

Hēlōrus, i., m. the Atellaro, towards the coast, the Abijo, a river of Sicily, which falls into the sea a little to the north of Pā-chŷnus, Cape Passaro. On it was a town of the same name, which surrendered to M. Claudius Mārcellus in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 35). The river flows in a slow and noiseless current from the flatness of the country, particularly towards the sea, in consequence of which its mouth is in some measure shut up by the waves, and its waters spread over the adjoining country to a considerable extent, which adds greatly to their fertility; hence stagnans Hēlōrus (Virg. En. iii. 698). Clāmōsus Hēlōrus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 269). Adj. Hēlōrius, a., um. Hēlōria Tēmpē, the vale of the Atellaro (Ov. Past. iv. 477).

Hēlos, i., f. a maritime town of Achāia, destroyed by the Lacedemonians (Paus. iii. 2).—2. A city of Lāconiā, mentioned by Hōmērus (Il. ii. 594), to which Hēlius, the youngest son of Pērsēus led a colony. It was in ruins when Pausānias wrote (iii. 20 seq.). The Spartans, in war, destroyed this town, and reduced the inhabitants, Hēlōtæ, to slavery, in which degraded state their posterity continued as long as the country remained under the government of the Greeks. They were the public slaves of Sparta, and cultivated the lands of the Lacedemonians (Liv. xxxiv. 27).—3. A town of Egypt. Inh. Hēlōtæ, et, Hēlōtæ, arum, v. Hēlli, orum, m. Hēlōtis, idis, f. a woman of Hēlos. Adj. Hēlōtiens, a., um.

Hēlvēcōnæ, arum, v. Hēlvēcōnēs, ium, m. a people of Germany, whose situation cannot be stated with certainty. In general, critics place them between Viādrus, the Oder, and Viātila, the Vistula (Tac. Mer. Ger. 43).

Hēlvētia, æ, f. Switzerland, a country of triangular form, bounded on the north by Rhēnus, the Rhine, and Lācus Brigāntinus, the Lake of Constance, which separated it from Vindēlicia and Gērmānia, Germany; on the south by Rhōdānus, the Rhone, and Lācus Lemānus, the Lake of Geneva, which divided it from Prōvincia, Dauphiné, Provence, and Languedoc, and on the west by mont Jura, which protected it from the Gauls. Hence it is manifest that Hēlvētia was of less extent than Switzerland. Inh. Hēlvēti, orum (Sing. Hēlvētius, i., m. the Helvetians, a people of the same origin as the Gauls. Helvetii—phalange facta (Cæs. B. G. i. 24), by which is to be understood simply, that they fought in close order, not that they drew up their troops precisely in the form of the Macedonian Phalanx, so celebrated in ancient history. When Eutrōpius wrote they were called Sēquāni (vi. 17). Adj. Hēlvētius, et, Hēlvēticus, a., um. Hēlvētius ager, the territory, or country of the Helvetians (Cæs. B. G. i. 2).

Hēlvīdus Priscus, Hēlvīdii Prisci, m. son of Clōvius, was a native of Tarrācina. In early life he applied his powerful mind to literature in order to benefit the state, not to conceal an indolent retirement under a specious name. When questor he married a daughter of Pietus Thrāsca, from whom he imbibed a more ardent love of liberty. Taci-tus has commended him as a senator, a husband, a son-in-law, and a friend, equal to every duty and office in life, despising riches, a stranger to fear, and of inflexible rectitude. The death of his father-in-law, under Nēro, drove him to banishment; but he returned in the reign of Gālba. When invested with the office of legātus he was elected prætor. His dauntless intrepidity met his enemies or opposers with vehemence and a contempt of consequences, which prudence might not in every instance approve. He paid little regard to rank or distinction, and his condemning, in abusive language, what he disapproved, excited against him the anger of the emperor Vespāsianus, who first banished and then ordered him to be put to death. The mild disposition of the emperor recalled this order, and would have saved his life, had the prince not been imposed upon by a false account, that Hēlvīdus had already been executed (Suet. Vesp. 15). Juvēnalis describes both Hēlvīdus and Thrāsca as keeping the birthdays of Brūtus and Cassius, a natural consequence of their love of liberty (Sat. v. 36).—2. Son of the former, whom the emperor Dōmītiānus put to death for censuring, in a play, the divorce of his wife (Suet. Dom. 10).

Hēlvii, orum (Sing. Hēlvius, i., m. the Helvians, a people of Prōvincia, Provence, Languedoc, and Dauphiné, on the W. bank of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, to the N. of the Arēcōmici, and the river Ardeche. The mountain Cēvenna, Cevennes, separated them from the Arvernii. Their country is now called Vivarez, and their capital Alba Augusta, Viviers (Cæs. B. G. vii. 8 seq.).

Hēlvīnus, v. Elvīnus, i., m. Elvino, a fountain in the vicinity of Aquīnum, Aquino, near which Ceres had a temple, hence Hēlvīna Ceres (Juv. Sat. iii. 320). Some derive this word from Hēlvii, a people of Gallia, France, from the Gallic worship being observed by the natives of Aquīnum; others, ab eluendo, or hold the word to be an adjective, denoting a pale red, or yellowish, colour, such as that of ripe corn. The first is most probably the true account.

Hēlvius. See Cinna.

Hēlvius Mānciā, Hēlvii Mānciæ, m. the son of a freedman, was a native of Fōrmis. At a very advanced age, he accused L. Scribōnius Libo before the censors, on which account Pōmpēius Māgnus upbraided him with meanness of birth. In reply to that low conduct of Pōmpēius, Hēlvius made a speech of which Vālerius Māximus has recorded the substance. If Pōmpēius had feeling, he must have smarted severely under the facts and observations then brought forward against him (vi. 2).

C. Hēlvius, C. Hēlvii, m. first held the office of edile, afterwards that of prætor, when he obtained the government of Gallia q. v., the north of Italy (Liv. xxxii. 7—26).—2. A lieutenant-general under Cn. Māntius, consul, in 191 B. C. He fought against the Galatians, whom Roman bravery soon compelled to submission (Liv. xxxviii. 20—23).

Cn. Hēlvius, Cn. Hēlvii, m. a tribune of the soldiers, who fell in battle with the Cartha- ginians under Mago, in the country of the Insubrian Gauls, 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 18).

M. Hēlvius, M. Hēlvii, m. a military tribune in the Roman army, who was killed in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 12).—2. Was one of the plebeian ediles in 200 B. C. Next year, being elected praetor, the lots assigned him the south of Spain for his province. His victory over the Celtiberians procured him the honour of an ovation. When a colony of Roman citizens was settled at Sipōntum, St. Maria di Siponto, Hēlvius was one of the three commissioners appointed for that purpose (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).

Hēlvius, v. Elvius, i. m. a Sicilian youth, one of the companions of the aged Acestes in hunting, who engaged in the foot race (Virg. Æn. v. 300).

Hēmērodrōmī, orum (Sing. Hēmērodrōmus, i.), m. daily runners, or couriers, who carried despatches, and travelled with astonishing rapidity (Cor. Nep. Mil. 4). Livius mentions that they accomplished prodigious journeys in a single day (Liv. xxxi. 24).

Hēmōn, ōnis, m. the father of Meon. Hēmōnides, v. m. Meon, son of Hēmōn (Stat. Th. ii. 692).

Hēnētum, i. n. a town of Pāphlāgōnia. Inh. Hēnēti, orum, m. a colony of whom settled near the top of Mārē Hādriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, and were afterwards called by the Romans Vēnēti. See Vēnētia. It has been maintained that the Hēnēti were Gauls, that their original name was Vēnēti, and that they were a tribe of the Vēnēti who occupied part of France in the time of C. Julius Caesar, and were conquered by that warrior (Cass. B. G. ii. 34).

Hēnōchē, es, f. the nurse of Mēdēa (Val. Flacc. v. 358). Her name is little more than mentioned by the poet, she neither says nor does any thing to interest the reader.

Hēnōchī, orum (Sing. Hēnōchus, i.), m. the Heniochians, a people on the northeast, and also on the southeast of Euxinus pōntus, the Black Sea. Cōchis separated these two states, of which the one was probably an emigration from the other. The Hēnōchī appear to have been very numerous, and, like other maritime states in ancient times, to have subsisted chiefly by piracy. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, they derived their descent from the Spartans, Amphitrus and Cereus, charioteers of Cāstor and Pollux, hence their name, ἠνιοχοί (xxii. 8). Lacædæmoniōi Hēnōchī (Luc. Phar. iii. 270). Hēnōcha rātes (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 26).

Hēnōchus, i. m. the constellation Auriga, or the charioteer (Manil. i. 694).

Hēnippē, es, f. one of the Amāzōnes, who fought with the Argonauts against the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 377).

Hēnna, v. Enna, v. f. Castro Janni, or Giovanni, a town near the middle of Sicily, Sicily (umbilicus Siciliæ, Cic.), on an eminence of considerable height, which rendered it almost impregnable, and surrounded by a beautiful adjoining plain, of the same name, on which Ceres first discovered grain, and from which her daughter Proserpina was carried away by Plūtō. Hence she is sometimes called Hennæa Diva. Inh. Hēnnēnses, v. Ennēnses, ium, m. Adj. Hēnnæus, v. Ennæus, a. um. Hēnnæi locus (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 10. 25).

Hēphæstia, es, f. a town of Lēmnus, sacred to Vūlcānus, whence the name (Liv. xxxiii. 35). Inh. Hēphæstiēnses, ium, m. (Herod. vi. 140).

Hēphæstio, v. Hēphæstion, ōnis, m. the most intimate friend of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in all his expeditions in Asia. Q. Curtius describes him as a man of great personal beauty and elegance, whom his martial courage, added to the steadfastness of his friendship, set above all the other generals of that conqueror. In an engagement with the Persians, he received a wound in the arm. According to this historian, he married a daughter of Dārius, and died at Ecbātāna, greatly lamented by his sovereign, who honoured his memory by the most magnificent funeral rites (iii. 12 seq.). Jūstinus informs us, he erected a tomb to his memory, which cost twelve thousand talents; and commanded him to be worshipped as a god, in 326 B. C. (xii. 12).

Hēphæstus, i. m. a Greek name of Vūlcānus. He was lame of both feet, which Jūno wished to conceal, on which account she appears to have thrown him from heaven, and he was saved by Thētis and Eurynōmē. With these goddesses he lived nine years, and made trinkets for them. He had twenty bellows blowing his furnaces. Hōmērus describes his residence as among those of the other gods (Il. xviii. 369 seq.).

Hēptāgōnia, arum, f. a place near Spārtā, on which side the Romans attacked that town. It was open without a wall (Liv. xxxiv. 38).

Hēptāpōrus, i. m. one of the eight rivers mentioned by Hōmērus, as descending from mount Ida (Hom. Il. xii. 20).

Hērāclēa, es, f. a daughter of Hērō, king of Sýracūsæ, and wife of Zoippus, who, with her two sisters, were put to death by order of the senate, in consequence of the counter-revolution attempted by her sister's husband, Andranōdōrus, and by Thēmistis, who was married to her niece Hārmōnia, daughter of her only brother Gēla. The senate repented of this barbarous order, when it was too late (Liv. xxiv. 26).

Hērāclēa, es, f. a city of Lūcānia, anciently called Siris, at the mouth of a river of the same name, built by a colony of the Tārentini, now in ruins. Alexander, king of Epirus, took it in 325 B. C., and, at a future period, there was a battle fought near it by Pýrrhus, king of the same country, and P. Valērius Lævinus, consul (Liv. viii. 24 seq.). Adj. Hērāclēensis, is, e. Hērāclēensis ager (Liv. xxiv. 20).—2. A maritime town of Sicily, near Agrigēntum, Girgenti, said to have been built by Mīnos, king of Crēta, Candia, when he was in pursuit of Dædalus, hence called Mīnōa (Liv. xxiv. 35 seq.).—3. (Trāchīnia), Zeiton, a town of Phthiōtis, in Thessaly, on Sinus Māliacus, the Gulf of Zeilon, taken by M. Acilius Glābrius, consul, in 193 B. C. Livius gives a minute description of the site of this town. The territory of Hērāclēa (Hērāclēensis ager) was marshy, yet abounded with tall trees (Liv. xxxvi. 22—24). Cēyx, whose fate and that of his wife, Ovidius has pathetically sung, was king of this city (Met. xi. 410—748).—4. A town of Acīrānia, which appears to have been of some note, since the friends of Amynānder went to it in order to procure his restoration to the throne (Liv. xxxviii.

1).—5. A town of Mæcēdōnīa, remarkable for the death of Dēmētrius, a son of Philippus q. v. who was murdered there by order of his father, in 183 B. C. (Liv. xl. 24).—6. (Sintica, v. ex Sintlis), a town of Mæcēdōnīa, on the W. of the Marmora, at a considerable distance to the N. of the place where this large river joins Strýmon, the Strumona. The latter falls into Sinus Strýmōnīcus, the Gulf of Contessa. Some editors of Caesar consider the word Sēntica as spurious (B. C. iii. 79). Inh. Hērāclēēsēs, ium, m. (Just. xvi. 5).—7. (Pōntica), Erekli, or, Pendaractus, a town of Pōntus, at the head of a gulf, covered by a point of land in the form of a peninsula, called Achērūsia. Hērclēs, it was pretended, dragged Cērbērus from the Infernal Regions through a cave in this promontory. The town was built by the Boeotians in consequence of an oracular response (Just. xvi. 3). Stēphānus mentions twenty-three cities of this name.—8. A town of Mēdia, to the northeast of Arsācia (Amm. Mar. xxlii. 6).

Hērāclēum, i, n. a town in the confines of Mæcēdōnīa, which stood on a steep rock hanging over Enīpēus. It was taken by the Romans in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 2—35).

Hērāclides, v. m. a son of Agāthōcles, tyrant of Sicily, who accompanied his father in the war against the Carthaginians, in Africa, in 310 B. C., where he was killed (Just. xxii. 5—8).—Hērāclides, is, m. an officer in the army of Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnīa, to whom he gave the command of the fleet, in 202 B. C., to act against the combined fleet of the Romans and Attālus, king of Asia. This monarch afterwards charged Hērāclides with a number of crimes, for which he threw him into prison, in this manner gratified his subjects, and conciliated the affections of the Macedonians (Liv. xxxi. 16 seq.).—2. A native of Býzāntium, Constantinople, sent in 192 B. C., by Antiochus, king of Syria, to the Roman consul L. Cornēllus Scipio, then at Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, to treat of peace. According to his instructions, he made his first proposals to Africānus, from whose greatness of mind and placable temper he had the highest hopes, and also because his son was a prisoner in the hands of the Syrian monarch. His terms being unsatisfactory, consequently refused, he privately applied to Africānus, offering him a bribe, at which the noble Roman spurned, and sent him back, advising the king to refuse no terms of peace (Liv. xxxvii. 34—36).

Hērāclitus, i, m. son of Blýson, or, according to others, of Hērāclon, was born at Ephēsus, Aiosolue, and flourished about 500 B. C. In haughtiness of mind, and contempt of others, he surpassed all the philosophers of that age. His opinion of the ancient poets appears strange, to many absurd; since he prized the writings of Hēsiodus, Pýthāgoras, Xēnōphānes, and Hēcāteus, but treated with the utmost indignity the poems of Hōmērus and Archilochus. The Ephesians incurred his displeasure by expelling his friend Hērmodōrus. For this act, he maintained that all the full-grown ought to die, and all the youth to quit the city, because their treatment of Hērmodōrus their benefactor, must have the effect of depressing merit, and if any one should rise to distinction by his virtues, he must of necessity quit his native country. Conscious of his great knowledge and superior abilities, the Ephesians applied to him for a code of laws, a request which, from their vicious practices, he indignantly refused, and, to show his contempt, went immediately to the temple of Diāna, and mingled with boys in their play. At last, from hatred of mankind, he withdrew from society, and lived in the mountains, where herbs and roots constituted his whole food. To this diet has been ascribed a general dropsy over the body, which rendered it necessary for him to come to the town, where he enigmatically asked the physicians "if they could produce dryness from rain." They did not understand his question, and therefore shutting himself up in a cow-house he covered himself over with the dung, expecting by the heat thus excited, that the moisture might be extracted, but it did not produce that effect, and he died in his sixtieth year. Hērmiippus gives an account somewhat different from the preceding, as does also Nēānthes, who states that he was torn in pieces by dogs. Hērāclitus studied under no master, so that his opinions are wholly his own, or obtained from others by perusing their writings. His peculiar dogma was, that "all things were produced from fire, and were resolvable into it." He likewise maintained, that all was the result of fate, and that spirits and demons pervaded all. Many of his ideas of natural things have been confirmed by the observations and experiments of the moderns. A studied obscurity rendered it difficult in many instances to discover his meaning precisely, a defect of which Cicēro complains in different passages of his writings, and this obscurity gave rise to a variety of conjectures respecting his tenets, and different systems have been established upon them. Dārius, son of Hystāspes, wrote him, requesting him to quit Ephēsus, and to reside in his palace, that under him he might acquire a knowledge of the true origin and formation of things, which the philosopher refused in terms sufficiently cynical. Both letters may be seen in his life, written by Diōgēnes Lāērtius. This application of the Persian monarch proves the celebrity of Hērāclitus, notwithstanding his dislike of mankind, and it reflects credit on Dārius, that he was anxious to obtain information on the solar system and nature of things, sinking the sovereign in the scholar.—2. A lyric poet.—3. A native of Hālīcār-nāssus, Búdrin, who excelled in writing elegy, whom Cāllimāchus commends.—4. A native of Lēsbos, Mityleni, who wrote a history of the Lacedæmonians.—5. A harper, who afterwards applied himself to study.—6. Surnamed Scotinus, was one of the three ambassadors sent, in 217 B. C., by Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnīa, to Hannibal, in Italy, in consequence of the Romans capturing the vessel which contained his former deputies. This embassy effected the business with which they were intrusted, without meeting with any hinderance, either in going or returning (Liv. xxiii. 39).

Hēraea, v. f. Aianni, a town of Arcādia, built, according to Pausānias, by Hēræus, a son of Lycāon, the wine of which rendered men mad, and women productive; the same quality was ascribed to the wines of Trœzen and Cērynēia in Achāia. It stood on the right bank of Alphēus, the Roufia. This town is frequently mentioned by Livius in the Macedonian war. Inh. Hērēi, orum, m. Adj. Hērēus, a, um.

Hērēum, i, n. a place in Lēucādia (Liv. xxxiii. 17).—2. A town in the Isthmus of Corinth, at which was a temple of Jūno. Of this name many places occur in Pēlōpōnēsus, and in other parts of Greece.

Hērēsus, i, m. a Rutulian of mean birth, who was killed by Eurýklus, at the time that youth deprived of life Fādus, Rhētus, and Abāris (Virg. Æn. ix. 344).

Hērēssus, e. Hērēssus, i, m. a town of Sicily, at the source of Anāpus, the Alfeo, which falls into the great port of Sýracūse. It surrendered voluntarily to M. Claudius Mārcellus, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 30, 35). Inh. Hērēssini, orum (Sing. Hērēssinus, i), m.—2. Another town of Sicily, between the rivers Acrāgus, the Girgenti, and Hālycus, the Platani, or, the Sororo. Inh. Hērēssēnes, ium, m. (Plin. i. 247). Clāvērius considers the towns above-mentioned as separate and distinct, in which he is opposed by Celsus, who supposes there was only one town, and that the different ways of spelling the name gave rise to the notion of there being twocognominal towns. This opinion, founded on conjecture, seems entitled to little credit.

Hērētes, ium, m. a people who lived on the west side of the Apennines (Liv. xli. 19). Their exact situation is not known, but seems to have been in Ligūria.

Hērēus, a, um, enclosed, surrounded, an adjective, chiefly if not wholly applied to Jūpiter, derived from icēus, an enclosed space. When used with reference to a building, it denotes the open or uncovered court, in which stood the images or statues of that god. This practice at first originated in Jupiter's being considered the atmosphere, and, on that account, deeming it improper to place his altars or images in houses, or under cover. When society became more refined, and temples more common, this custom was discontinued, and the king of the gods had his splendid edifices adorned with costly statues, as well as the other celestial deities (Ov. Ib. 284). Hērēus ōra (Luc. Phar. ix. 979).

Hērēulādum, i, n. a town taken from the Sāmnites by the Roman consul Sp. Cārvinus in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 45). Adj. Hērēulādēnsis, is, e. Hērēulādēnsis oppidi pars (Senec. N. Q. vi. 1).

L. Hērēulēus, L. Hērēulēi, m. a quæstor under Q. Sērtōrius, who defeated L. Mānlius, præconsul, in 79 B. C. Next year, Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Pius cut off Hērēulēus with his whole army (Liv. Ep. 90 seq.).

Hērēules, is, m. the son of Jūpiter and Alēmnā, the daughter of Elēctryōn, king of Argos, or, Argo, or according to some, of Anāxō, but, according to others, of Eurýmēdē, Eurýdicē, e. Lysidicē. During the time of her pregnancy, Alēmnā married Amphitrýon, who was the brother of Anāxō, and, from his mother's husband, Hērēules received the patronymic Amphitrýoniādes. Of this name, ancient authors have enumerated upwards of forty, the most distinguished of whom was the son of Alēmnā, called from the place of his birth, Theba, Thea, in Boeōtia, the Theban Hērēules. Both Greek and Roman authors have extolled the strength, courage, and activity, of this renowned hero to a height surpassing belief. The greatest difficulties and dangers seemed to vanish before him, nor did he shrink from any enterprise, however perilous or impracticable it might appear. The cruelty of Jūno, who plotted his destruction even before his birth, rendered him subject to the will of Eurýstheus, king of Argos, or, Argo, and cousin of Hērēcles. This monarch imposed on him the twelve labours so celebrated in fabulous history. 1st. To kill the famous lion of Nē-mēa, St. George's. 2d. To destroy the serpent of Lērna, the Lake of Molini. 3d. To bring alive to Eurýstheus the stag of Cēnōē, remarkable for its golden horns, brazen feet, and astonishing swiftness. 4th. To bring likewise alive to Eurýstheus, a wild bear of prodigious strength and ferocity, which desolated the country round Erýmanthus. 5th. To clear the stables of Augēas, e. Augās, king of Elis, which had contained 300 cattle for many years. 6th. To kill the carnivorous birds which had ravaged the country near Stýmphālus, the Lake of Vouli, in Arcādia. 7th. To bring alive to Argos, or, Argo, a terrible wild bull, which had laid waste the island Crēta, Candia. 8th. To catch the mares of Diōmēdes, king of Thrācia, Romania, which fed on human flesh. 9th. To obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. 10th. To kill the monster Gērýon, king of Gades, Cádiz, and to bring to Eurýstheus his numerous flocks, which were likewise said to feed on human flesh. 11th. To carry off the golden apples from the garden of the Hēsperides. 12th. To bring from the Infernal Regions the three-headed dog Cērberus. For these labours, which he achieved in little more than eight years, he received a complete suit of armour from the gods. Jūpiter gave him a shield, Apōllo a bow and arrows, Mēr-cūrius a sword, Nēptūnus a horse, Vulkānus a golden cuirass, a brazen buskin, and a club of brass, and Minērvā a coat of armour and a helmet. The other exploits of Hērēcles, from the greatness of their number, exceed our limits, and it would require more space than we can afford to enumerate the one half of his children. The greater part of the labours of this hero Claudianus has sung (xxxiv. 9—48). For attempting to rob the temple of Dēlphi, Caspi, because the priestess had treated an inquiry of his with indifference, the oracle doomed him to be sold for a slave, and to remain in servitude for three years. Omphālē, queen of Lȳdia, bought him, and soon after, from admiration of his astonishing actions, married him. On completing the period of his slavery, he returned to Pēlōpōnēsus, the Morea, and married Dēiānira, daughter of Cēnēus, king of Cālȳdon, in Etōlia. After living many years in happiness together, she, from jealousy, sent him a poisoned tunic by his servant Līchas, which caused such terrible pain, that he erected a funeral pile on Cēta, Danina, stretched himself upon it, and expired (Ov. Met. ix. 134 seq.). The immortal part of Hērēcles, by order of Jūpiter, ascended to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horses, and Jūno, changing her hatred into esteem, gave him her daughter Hēbē, the goddess of youth, in marriage. In the opinion of the Africans, Hērēcles died in Spain, and his army consisting of various nations, of whom the Medes, Persians, Armenians, &c., crossed the Mediterranean Sea and settled in Africa.

(Sal. Jug. 18). After his death he received divine honours. To Hércules the poplar was sacred, which he is said to have brought from the banks of Achéron. He was one of the Argonauts. Alcides, n. m. a patronymic of Hércules, from Alceus, the father of Amphitryon. He was the god of faith; hence Hércule, v. Hércle (Adv.), by Hércules, or, upon my honour; Deus fidius, sc. juvet, may the god of faith assist me; Mehercule, v. Mehercule, sc. juvet, of the same import. Hercule dextro, by the favour of Hércules (Pers. ii. 12). The Roman women neither swore by Hércules, nor attended his sacrifices (Gel. xi. 6). He was supposed to preside over hidden treasures. Herculis columna, the pillars of Hércules, i. e. Cálpe, a mountain in Híspaña, Spain, near Gibraltar, and Abýla, a mountain in Mauritania, Morocco and Fez. In his expedition against Geryon, king of Gades, Cadiz, Hércules was said to have raised these mountains, and afterwards to have separated Spain from Africa, that a communication might be opened between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean. The ancients were not agreed on this point, some thinking them statues, others towns, others islands, others mountains. Adj. Herculaneus, Herculaneus, Herculæus, Herculæus, a, um. Herculæum sacrificium (Gel. xi. 6). Herculæa pars, i. e. decima pars (Aur. Vic. Or. 6). Herculæus pes (Gel. i. 1). Frænum Herculæum, the Strait of Gibraltar (Sil. Ital. i. 199). Herculæa (fabula), the fabulous labours of Hércules (Juv. i. 52). Herculæus gurgis, the part of the Mediterranean immediately to the west of the Strait of Gibraltar (Juv. xiv. 290). Herculæum astrum, the constellation Leo (Mart. viii. 55). Herculæi colles, the hills about Tibur, Tivoli (Mart. iv. 57). Herculæa arbor corôna, the tree of the crown of Hércules, i. e. the poplar (Virg. G. ii. 66).—2. The son of Alexander the Great and Bársinê, killed in infancy along with his mother by Cassander (Just. xi. 10 seq.).—3. Son of Júpiter and Astéria, the favourite deity of the Tyrians, called by Cicero the fourth Hércules (Nat. Deor. iii. 16). His priest held the second rank in the kingdom, and to him the Carthaginians sent the tenth of the spoils (Just. xi. 10 seq.).

Herculæus, i. m. the commander of a ship of three banks of oars, in the Roman navy, in the year 59. He gave the first blow to Júlia Agrippina, who expired under a number of wounds. See Anticetus and Obaritus.

Hercyna, æ, m. the Liadna, a river of which the sources are in Hélicon, Zagara, and its stream is increased by the tributary fountains of Léthê and Mnêmôsynê, now united into one by an earthquake.

Hercynia, æ, f. a very extensive forest of Germany, the breadth of which, according to Cæsar, was nine days' journey, and its length exceeded sixty (B. G. vi. 24 seq.). It extended from the territories of the Hêlvétii, Nêmetes, and Rauraci, along Dânuûbius, the Danube, to the country of the Dâci, and Anârtes; then turning to the north, it spread over many large tracts of land, and is said to have contained many different animals, unknown in other countries, of which Cæsar describes two or three kinds. Since the other forests of Germany were only branches of the Hercynian, some writers have considered it as covering nearly the whole of that extensive territory. The reverse, however, is probably the truth, that the different woods of Germany were included under this name, derived from Hartzen, i. e. forests, in the ancient language of the natives. On the country becoming more inhabited, the grounds were gradually cleared, and few vestiges of the ancient forests remain in modern times. In the writings of Eritosthènes and several other Greek authors, it is called Orcynia. All ancient authors mention its great extent, and parts of it for miles together, would be without an inhabitant. This seems to have been the opinion of Claudianus, Hercynia per vasta silentia silva (xxi. 228). Adj. Hercynius, a, um. Hercynius saltus (Strab. 423).

Hercynio, ônis, m. a king of Egypt, who sent reinforcements to the Lacedæmonians, in the war against the Persians, in 399 B. C., under Artaxerxes Mnémon (Just. vi. 2).

Herdônia, æ, f. Ardona, a town of Apúlia, a southern district of Itália, Italy (Sil. Ital. viii. 567), which Hannibal burned to the ground and removed its inhabitants to Mêtápôntum and Thûrlum, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 21 seq.). Inh. Herdonienses, iam, m. (Plin. i. 386).

Appius Herdonius, Appii Herdonii, m. a Sabine who in 460 B. C., at the head of four thousand five hundred exiles and slaves, seized on the capitol and citadel by night, and put to death all who refused to join in the conspiracy. From the capitol he invited all the slaves to join him. In place of taking up arms to defend Rome against Herdonius, the tribunes endeavoured to persuade the commons, that the whole was a patrician stratagem to prevent the law of Têrentillus from passing. The consul P. Valérius Publicola raised a body of men, made a successful attack on the capitol, and left Herdonius among the slain (Liv. iii. 15–18).

Hêrê, es, f. the name given to Júnô, by Hómêrus.

Hêrênûs, i, m. a soothsayer who, on seeing Q. Fúlvius Flaccus thrown into prison by L. Opimius, moved with sympathy for the young man, for whom he had a strong affection, said to him, "why don't you rather do this?" and he instantly dashed out his own brains against the prison wall. Vêllêus Pâtêrcûlus calls him Tuscus, but Valérius Máximus makes him a Sicilian (Vel. Pat. ii. 7. Val. Max. ix. 12).

Hêrênûs Bâssus, Hêrênûi Bâssi, m. an inhabitant of Nôla, who, with Hêrius Pêtrius, was invited to a conference by Hânno a Carthaginian general, who wished them to deliver up their city to Hannibal. Hêrênûs Bâssus, in reply, stated, that the alliance between the states of Rome and Nôla had been satisfactory to both, and that the Nôlani would adhere to it to the last (Liv. xxiii. 43 seq.).

Hêrênûs Cêrrinûs, Hêrênûi Cêrrinûi, m. son of Pacúlla Annia, a Campanian, priestess of Bâchus, who first initiated men into the rites of that impure deity, and they too were her own sons (Liv. xxxix. 13).

Hêrênûs Gállus, Hêrênûi Gállî, m. the lieutenant-general of a legion, afterwards associated with Vócûla, who incurred the displeasure of the soldiers, by the unsteadiness of his resolutions, which ought to have been charged against his superior officers, not himself. Either through his misconduct, or their turbulence, he at last lost his life (Tac. Hist. iv. 19-70).

Hērēnus Pōntius, Hērēnii Pōntii, m. one of the Sāmītes, remarkable for his wisdom, was the father of C. Pōntius, who, by a successful stratagem, induced the Roman army to enter the Caudine forks. As soon as these troops were completely at the mercy of C. Pōntius, hesant to his father, asking his advice how he should act. His answer was "dismiss them all unhurt." Disapproving of this counsel, he consulted him again. His answer then was, "put them all to the sword." Surprised at the direct contradiction of these two advices, he sent for his father to the camp, who adhered to his advices, and justified the grounds on which he had given them. Neither of these was adopted, and the Sāmītes experienced the fatal effects of their having been disregarded (Liv. ix. 1 seq.).

Hērēnius Sēnclo, Hērēnii Sēnclois, m. a native of Spain, born in Bætica, who held the office of quaestor in the reign of Dōmītiānus, and never stood candidate for the magistracy. For his panegyric of Hēlvīdus Priscus, he lost his life. The inhuman Nēro ordered his death, to which the senate submitted in timidity and silence, and therefore, Tācītus says, they imbrued their hands in the blood of Sēnclo (Tac. Agric. ii. 45).

C. Hērēnīus, C. Hērēnii, m. one of the three commissioners appointed to settle colonies in the north of Italy, in 220 B. C. A rising among the Gauls in that quarter, induced these commissioners to flee for safety to Mūtina, Modena (Liv. xxi. 25).—2. A tribune of the people, who opposed Sulla's passing a law respecting his return (Sal. Frag. 2).

T. Hērēnīus, T. Hērēnii, m. one of the four commanders of the Picēntes and Mārsi, who took up arms against the Romans, in 91 B. C., and were conquered by C. Mārius, Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, and L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla (Eutrop. v. 3).

Hērīlus, i. m. son of Fērōnīa, was king of Prēnēstē. Virgilius describes him as having three bodies, three lives, and wielding three sets of arms. Evānder deprived him of all his lives and arms, of which the aged monarch boasted to Ēnēas, at the time he parted with his son Pallas (Virg. Ēn. viii. 563).

Hērīus, i. m. a man, in the Roman army, whom, with his brother Plēmīnus, Hānnībal killed, in the battle at Zāma (Sil. Ital. xvii. 452).

Hērīus Asīnīus, Hērīi Asīnii, m. a praetor of the Mārīnīni, killed by C. Mārius, in 92 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 73). See Hērīus Asīnīus.

Hērīus Pētrīus, Hērīi Pētrii, m. an inhabitant of Nōla (Liv. xxiii. 43, 44). See Hērēnīus Bāssus.

Hērmeum, i. n. a place in Bēōtiā, near Salganēa q. v.

Hērīgōras, q. v. a rhetorician and disciple of Thēōdōrus, who appears to have divided his discourses in a very formal and logical manner, which Tācītus censures (Orat. 19).

Hērīāndīca, q. v. perhaps Salamanca, a city of the Cārtēni, in Spain, taken by Hānnībal (Liv. xxi. 5). The inhabitants of this town did not make a vigorous defence, yet they retained their aversion to the Carthaginians, and joined their neighbours in annoying them.

Hērīāphrōdītus, i. m. son of Mērcūrius and Vēnus, whose person, united with that of the nymph Sālmācis, thus formed their two bodies into one (Ov. Met. iv. 983).

Hērīārcus, i. m. a notorious informer, mentioned by Jūvēnālīs. The readings differ much (Sat. iii. 120).

Hērīas, q. v. the Hualī, a river of Mēsōpōtāmiā, which joins the Khabour.

Hērīes, ētis, m. a name of Mērcūrius, either from his being the messenger of the gods, or from his being supposed the inventor of speech, by which men interpret, or, communicate their thoughts to each other. Hērīma, q. v. a statue of Mērcūrius, which frequently had only the head, and almost never more than the head and breast resting on a pole. The Romans placed these images of Mērcūrius at the junction of two or more roads, to point out the way, like our road posts, as landmarks both in fields and gardens, in the porches of temples, &c. To the form of this kind of statue, Jūvēnālīs alludes (Sat. viii. 53).—2. An excellent gladiator, whose merits Mārīālīs celebrates (v. 25).—3. Surnamed Trēmēgīstus, i. e. Tērmāxīmus, an eminent Egyptian philosopher, who was said to have been the first who taught his countrymen to measure the lands, to cultivate the olive, and to understand hieroglyphics. On theology, geography, and medicine, he wrote forty books, all of which are lost (Amm. Mar. xxi. 14).

Hērīnīus, i. m. a Trojan, of prodigious courage and size, whom Cātīllus killed (Virg. Ēn. xi. 642).—2. A man, in the Roman army, who fell by the arm of Hānnībal, in the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 580).

Lar. Hērīnīus Aquīllīus, Lartīs Hērīnīi Aquīllīi, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship with T. Virgīnius Tricōstus Caelīmōntānus, in 448 B. C. (Liv. iii. 65).

T. Hērīnīus, T. Hērīnii, m. a Roman, illustrious both by birth and bravery, who supported Hōrātius Cōcēs in defending Pōns Sūbīclīus against the whole army of Pōrsēna, in 508 B. C. In the victory which P. Vālērīus, consul, gained over the Etrūsci, he had the powerful assistance of Hērīnīus, who fell nine years after, in an engagement at the lake Rēgīllus (Liv. ii. 10-20).

Hērīōnē, es, f. daughter of Mēnēlāus and Hēlēna. She was betrothed to Orēstes, and carried off by Pērīrhūs, surnamed Nēōpōtōlēmus, which Orēstes revenged by putting Pērīrhūs to death, and thus recovered his bride. Virgilius calls her Lēdāe Hērīōnē, from her grandmother Lēda (Ēn. iii. 328 seq.). Her letter to Orēstes is affectionate and plaintive, containing several of those delicate and feeling touches in which Ovidius excels, when he applies his vigorous mind and lively fancy to his subject (Epis. viii).

Hērīōnē, es, f. Castrī, a town of Argōlīs, near Trēzēnē, Dalmā, of which Hērīōn, the son of Eurōpa, was the founder. The ancients considered this town so near the infernal regions, that they did not, according to common custom, give the dead any money to pay for their passage over the Styx. Inh. Hērīōnēnsēs, ium, m. Adj. Hērīōnēus, Hērīōnēus, et Hērīōnīus, a, um. Hērīōnēa stātio (Virg. Cix. 472). Hērīōnēus ager (Liv. xxxi. 44).

Hērīōnēs, um, m. a German nation, who, according to Tācītus, inhabited the Waldau part of the country, and derived their name from a son of Mānus (Tac. Mor. Ger. 2).

Hērmodōrus, is, m. a philosopher, who advised Pausānias, who asked him how he could become immediately eminent, to murder some great man, and he murdered Philippus, father of Alexander the Great (Val. Max. viii. 14). In this account Valērius Māximus differs from other historians.—2. A physician, to whom Mārtiālis attributes the death of Andrāgōras (vi. 53).

Hērmodōrus, i, m. a noble Greek, born at Ephēsus, Aiosoluc, who, being compelled to quit his native city, settled at Rome, and explained the Grecian laws to the dēcēvīri, when engaged in forming the Roman code, generally known by the name of the Laws of the twelve tables. The Roman orator has mentioned the cause of his banishment—pre-eminence among his fellow-citizens. Of crimes of this kind against virtue, how numerous the examples furnished by Grecian history! (Cic. Tusc. v. 36).—2. A distinguished architect, born in Sālāmis, Colouri, who planned the temple of Mārs, in the Flaminian Circus (Cor. Nep. Frag. xi. 1). From Cicēro, he appears to have excelled in a knowledge of ship-building (de Orat. i. 14).

Hērmodōgēs, is, m. a thief, probably a fictitious name, invented by Mārtiālis, considering him as a descendant of Hērmes or Mērcūrius, the god of thieves (Mart. xii. 29).—2. Master of the horse, killed in a commotion of the common people (Amm. Mar. xiv. 10).—3. A native of Pōntus, and prefect of the praetorium, who died in the year 361, and Hēlpīdīus succeeded to the praefecture (Amm. Mar. xix. 12 seq.).—4. A native of Tārsus, Tersous, whom the Roman emperor Dōmītiānus put to death for some indirect reflections upon him in his History, besides he crucified the scribes, who had copied that work (Suet. Dom. 10).

Hērmodōgēs, is, m. an excellent singer and musician at the court of Augustus, who appears to have been no admirer of the writings of Hōrātius (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 129 seq.). He must not be confounded with Tigēllius of Sārdīnia, mentioned in Sat. i. 2. 3.

Hērmodōlus, i, m. a noble youth in the royal cohort, which served under Alexander the Great, and was severely beaten by his orders, because he had transixed a boar at which Alexander had wished to throw his javelin (Curt. viii. 6). See Sōstrātus.

Hērmodōssa, is, f. Cape Haronesa, on Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. Ammīānus Mārcellīnus makes it an island, although a promontory; the Greeks built on it a town of the same name (xxii. 8).

Hērmodōpolis, is, f. Aschmunlin, a city of Thēbāis in Egypt (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Hērmodūri, orum, m. the Hermundurians, a German nation who, headed by Vībīlius, their chief, expelled Catūlāda from the throne in the year 19. They occur frequently in the writings of Tacitus, and appear to have inhabited part of what is now called Upper Saxony (Ann. ii. 63). Vēllēus Pātērcūlus places them on the banks of the Elbe (ii. 106).

Hērmodūpolis, is, f. a town of Cārmānia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Hērmos, i, m. a mean fellow (Mart. ii. 15).

Hērmos, i, m. the Sarabat, a river of Natolia, which has its rise in Phrygia, receives Pāctōlus and other rivers, runs through Līdia, after which it empties itself into the Archipelago. Virgīlius says its waters are turbid with gold (G. ii. 157), in reference to which Lūcānus has non cillor Hērmos (Pāctōlo) (Phar. iii. 210). Mārtiālis gives a similar description of this river (vi. 86 seq.); and Silius Itālicus says, the adjoining plain is overspread with gold, and yellow with the sands of Hērmos (l. 158, 159).

Hērniei, orum (Sing. Hērnicus, i, Jar. Sat. xiv. 180), m. a people of Lātium, who, like the other neighbouring nations, were at first opposed to the power of Rome, which they frequently resisted, but were generally defeated, and finally subdued in 307 B. C. The Romans restored to them their laws, which they preferred to being made citizens of Rome (Liv. ii. 22 seq.). Adj. Hērnicus, a, um. Hērnicā terra, the territory of the Hērniei (Ov. Fast. iii. 90).

Hērō, us, v. Hērōn, ōnis, f. a young woman of Sēstos, to whom her lover, Lēānder of Abūdōs, swam across Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, every night, according to Gōsellin, a distance of two miles and a half, and returned to his native city before daylight. She directed his course by a burning torch from the top of a tower, but at last he perished in a stormy night, and she, from grief, precipitated herself headlong from the tower into the sea, and was drowned. Adj. Hērōus, a, um. Hērōa tūrces (Luc. Phar. ix. 955).

Hērōdes, is, m. appointed king of Jūdāa by Antōnius, and afterwards obtained additional territory from Augustus, according to the statement of Tacitus, who adds that his children succeeded him, that the country enjoyed peace under Thērīus, and that it was reduced to a province under the emperor Claudius (Tac. Hist. v. 9). See Agrippa.—2. A native of Mārāthōn, whose full name was Thērīus Claudius Hērōdes. At Rome, in the reign of Adriānus, he rose to the highest dignities, in consequence of the great celebrity which he obtained as a rhetorician. In advanced life, he quitted the imperial city, and retired to Mārāthōn, where he died in the seventy-sixth year of his age.—3. A physician mentioned by Mārtiālis who brands him with theft (ix. 98).—4. A freedman of Atticus (Cic. Att. xv. 27).—5. An Athenian who attempted to write history, but without success. He lived at the same time with Cicēro, and seems to have made his consularship the theme of one of his pieces, which the orator treats with great contempt (Cic. Att. ii. 2).

Hērōdianus, i, m. a Greek historian, born at Alēxandria, and flourished during the third century. He composed a Roman history in Greek, from the death of M. Aurēlius till the younger Grātianus. His style has more elegance than precision, and the facts are recorded with greater neatness than accuracy, although he informs us that he witnessed all he wrote. His work includes a period of nearly seventy years. Ammīānus Mārcellīnus commends him for his minuteness (xxii. 16).

Hērōdēus, i, m. a prince of the Thessalians, put to death by Philippus, king of Mācedōnia (Liv. xl. 4).

Hērōdōrus, i, m. of Cios (Cānus), a mēchant of great influence at Chalcis on account of his riches. He and Euthymidas endeavoured to put that city into the hands of the Ætolians in 194 B. C., but without success. Understanding that the attempt of the Ætolians had failed, he returned to Thronium, whence he had come (Liv. xxxv. 37, 38).—2. The principal friend of Demetrius, younger son of Philippos, king of Mæcedonia, who, on account of his intimacy with that youth, was thrown into prison, put to the rack, and died under the torture, in 183 B. C., without making any disclosure. It was expected that he would reveal the plans of Demetrius, which were supposed to be injurious to the kingdom of Mæcedonia, and to the life of his brother; but, as Demetrius had formed no such plans, discovery was impossible (Liv. xl. 23).

Hērōdōtus, i. m. the author of the most ancient history which has been transmitted to modern times, was born at Haliæarnassus, Budrūn, about 484 B. C. Of the manner in which he passed his early days, the pages of antiquity give no account; nor is this wonderful, since even the names of his parents are not certainly known. From aversion to the form of government, he quitted his native city, probably upon reaching manhood, and fixed his residence in the island Sámos. Here he studied the Ionic dialect, as the Dæric was that of his native city. For historical composition, the unpolished rusticity of the latter is wholly unfitted. It has never been denied that the elegant and instructive history of Hērōdōtus is a perfect model of the Ionic, and has not been rivalled by any subsequent publication. After forming his design of writing history, to obtain authentic and abundant materials, he set out on his travels, visited different parts of Asia, spent some time in Egypt, crossed to Greece, and afterwards to Italy. In this manner he acquired much valuable information respecting nations previously unknown, as well as of manners, customs, and habits, which have imparted great value to his pages. To the Egyptian priests he probably owed the greatest obligations. It required the exercise of a discriminating judgment, to separate between the true and the fabulous. Much which he has recorded appeared, no doubt, to his countrymen, devoid of truth, yet later discoveries have proved the accuracy of the historian. Still, it is not to be denied, that in several of his descriptions, fiction prevails over truth. Nor can blame be always imputed to the author, since the terms which he uses often show his own doubts, or disbelief. The severity with which Jāvēnalis alludes to his History, must be referred to the contempt in which the Romans held the Greeks, and not wholly to the fault of the immortal author. The very fact which the Satirist mentions as a falsehood, has been proved true beyond the possibility of doubt. The reader would be gratified to know the time which Hērōdōtus spent in writing the nine books, and the revision which they underwent, before he read parts of them to his countrymen assembled at the Olympic games. There is reason to believe that he composed part, if not the whole, of them in Sámos, and that he carried them with him to Thūrium in Italy, where he laboured the whole into greater accuracy and elegance. Such high commendation has been bestowed on his style and manner of writing, by adequate judges, that it were vain to attempt adding to their praises. In this number, it is sufficient to mention the names of Quintilianus and Cicero. By the latter he is called the Father of history. Critics are divided in opinion with respect to the title of his books, some maintaining that the author gave them the names of the nine muses, others that they were given them by the audience at Olympiā. If confidence may be reposed in Lūciānus, he resolved upon reciting his works at the games, as the speediest and easiest mode of making his merits known, and it must be allowed that no expedient was ever more successful. From that period he was respected as the greatest genius of his age. The learned have rejected the life of Homer imputed to Hērōdōtus, and with good reason, since it is not written in the style of that unrivalled historian. The age at which he died, and the place where he breathed his last, have been much disputed, and are consequently undetermined.

Hērōphīlē, es. f. a sibyl, daughter of Jūpiter and Lāmīa, the first woman endowed with the gift of prophecy. Pausanias asserts that Hērōphīlē flourished before the Trojan war, predicted that Hēlēna would be the destruction of Troy, and that the city would be taken by the Greeks. He further adds, that she died at Troy, was buried in the grove Sminthēus, where a tomb was erected to her memory, inscribed with an epitaph in elegiac verse, of which he has given a copy (x. 12).

Hērē, es. f. daughter of Cærops, king of Athens, beloved by Mæcūrius, whom her sister Aglauros opposed, unless he gave her as a bribe a large sum of money. For this resistance and demand, the god turned Aglauros into stone (Ov. Met. ii. 559 seq.).

Hērēs, æ. m. the charioteer of Amphārāus, deprived of life by Hýpsēus (Stat. Th. vii. 737).—2. A youth undistinguished in the Theban war by martial bravery, killed by Hýpsēus (Stat. Th. ix. 306).

Hērēilla, æ. f. a Sabine, the wife of Rēmūlus, the founder of Rome. All the ravished were virgins, except Hērēilla, who, according to Mæcrobīus (Sat. i. 6), was carried off when clinging to her daughter. After death she was numbered among the goddesses, under the name of Orn, or, Hōrn (Liv. i. 11. Ov. Met. xiv. 839—851).

Hērtha, æ. f. the goddess worshipped by the Germans who considered her the common mother of all. According to their opinion, she interferes in human affairs, and occasionally visits all the nations of the globe. In the northern ocean is an island on which she has a sacred grove, where stands her chariot covered with a vestment which can be lawfully touched only by her priest. Whenever she takes her seat in that sacred vehicle, he becomes conscious of her presence, and follows her progress in a chariot drawn by cows. Wars terminate, universal peace prevails, and a general festival commences. He reconducts her to her sacred place, whenever he declares her satisfied with her visitation, and the chariot, mantle, and goddess herself are purified in a secret lake by servants whom the lake instantly swallows. Thus the terrors of superstition increase their religious reverence of a divinity, which men can only see when perishing. Hērtha is the Gothic or Anglo-Saxon word with a Latin termination, from which the English word earth is derived (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

Hēsīōdus, i. m. son of Dīnus and Pycimēnē, was born at Ascrā, a town in Bæōtia, to which his father had removed from Cymē, Pota Nuova, one of the Æolian islands, to the north of Smýrna; but, at what period, no writer, ancient or modern, has determined. A very considerable difference of opinion on this matter prevails; some authors reckon his birth to have preceded that of Hōmērus thirty or forty years, others make them contemporaries, and several ascribe the priority to the author of the Iliad. Pātērcūlus states, that he was a hundred and twenty years later than Homer. From his own writings, we learn, that misfortunes had driven his father from his own native island, and his poverty may be inferred from Hēsīōdus having herded his sheep on mount Hēlicon, where the muses met him, he informs us, and this poetical vanity has been ridiculed by more poets than one. From the commencement of his poetical labours, he seems to have set little value on wealth or worldly possessions; since, in place of anger or resentment at the judges who defrauded him of his property, bestowing it on his brother Pērsēs, he pities deluded mortals, who placed happiness in riches, endeavouring to obtain them at the expense of virtue and moral principle. His circumstances, though probably far from affluent, not only supported himself in comfort, but enabled him to assist his brother in distress, forgetting or forgiving the unjust treatment which he had received at his hand.

That he gained the prize in a poetical contest, at the funeral games instituted in honour of Amphidāmas, king of Eubœa, Negropont, we have his own authority for stating; we have not, however, equal certainty that his opponent was Hōmērus, which Plūtārchus has recorded. This author has related the story of our poet's tragical death. He had removed from Ascrā to Lōcris, where he lived with a man, who, having violated a young woman, without the knowledge of Hēsīōdus, and the brother of the girl having been falsely assured that he was an accomplice, murdered him and his companion, and threw their bodies into the sea. The Locrians, who respected and honoured the poet, soon found the wretches who had perpetrated the murder, threw them alive into the sea, and destroyed their houses. They deposited the remains of Hēsīōdus at Nēmēa, from which it has been alleged, that the Orchomenians afterwards removed his bones, and interred them in their own country. The only authentic works of Hēsīōdus now extant, are the Thēōgōnia, or, Generation of the gods, and the "Works and days." The "Shield of Hērclēs," generally printed with these poems, many suppose spurious; and it has even been doubted, whether any of his pieces have been transmitted entire. The perspicuity of his style and harmony of his numbers, added to the purity of his precepts, and love of virtue, give an interest to his writings, and place him high amongst Grecian poets. That Virgilius has surpassed him in the Georgics does not greatly detract from his merits, since almost all allow that the Georgics are the most finished didactic poem which the world has ever seen. To Hēsīōdus the moderns owe considerable obligations for that knowledge of heathen mythology, conveyed in the Generation of the gods. Indeed, on this subject, Ovidius is the only ancient poet who can be compared with him. It will be readily allowed, that in the writings of Hōmērus, and in those of the other bards of Greece, many particulars, interesting to the modern inquirer, lie scattered. Still, when the subject is to be studied by itself, where can it be found more ably or more pleasantly recorded, than in the Thēōgōnia of Hēsīōdus, and Metamorphoses of Ovidius? Mānilius has, in elegant verse, brought before his readers the principal topics discussed by Hēsīōdus (ii. 12-24).

Hēsīōnē, es, f. a daughter of Lāōmēdon, by Strýmō, daughter of the river Scāmānder. Nēptūnus, enraged that Lāōmēdon had defrauded him of the stipulated sum for building the Trojan walls, sent a huge fish, which devoured all upon the shore, a plague among the people, and he blasted the produce of their fields. On consulting the oracle of Apōllo, it was answered, that one of the king's children must be given up to be devoured by the monster, before the wrath of Nēptūnus could be appeased. The lot fell on Hēsīōnē, who was immediately bound to the shore, when Hērclēs, with the Argonauts, having landed there, and learned from herself the cause of her exposure, went to the town, and promised to kill the monster. Rejoiced at this offer, Lāōmēdon promised him horses as a reward, which he gave as soon as Hērclēs had destroyed the fish, and Hēsīōnē preferred going with this foreigner to remaining at home, afraid lest, when another calamity befel the state, she might be subjected to a similar exposure. He committed both Hēsīōnē and the horses to the care of Lāōmēdon, until he should return from Cōlchis. See Lāōmēdon. Hērclēs bestowed Hēsīōnē on Tēlāmon, for his great bravery. According to Apōllōdōrus, she bore to this hero only one son, Tēucer. Sēpili Hēsīōnes, the rocks to which she was bound (Luc. Phar. ix. 970).

Hēsperīē, es, f. daughter of Cēbrēnus, who, flying from Esācus, received a sting from a serpent, which almost instantaneously caused her death (Ov. Met. xi. 769 seq.).

Hēsperūs, a, um, western, either from Hēsperūs, the evening star, i. e. the planet Vēnus, which has this name when she is visible after the setting of the sun, as she has that of Lūclifer when she is seen before the rising of the sun; or from Hēsperūs, the son of Iapētus, who was the king of Italia, and from whom it is supposed to have been called Hēsperia. Hēsperīs, idis, Plur. Hēsperīdes, dum, f. the daughters of Hēsperūs. Diōdōrus considers them as daughters of Atlas, king of Mauritānia, Morocco and Fex, and of his wife Hēsperīs, the daughter of his brother Hēsperūs. From their father, the same historian says, they were called Atlāntīdes, and, from their mother, Hēsperīdes. Hēsīōdus makes these the daughters of Nox, i. e. Night, and Cherecrātes, of Phōrcus and Cētō, sea deities. Apōllōdōrus only reckons their number at four, Æglē, Erēthia, Vēsta, and Arēthūsa; but Diōdōrus at seven, Mala (2 syl.), Electra, Tūgētē, Asterōpē, Mērōpē, Halcōnē, and Cēlenō. Apōllōdōrus makes these seven daughters of Atlas, the children of that monarch by Pē-

Iōnē, a daughter of Océānus. In fabulous history, diversity of opinion and statement must often occur. Where authors are guided solely by imperfect tradition, or vague conjecture, uniformity cannot be expected. The Hesperides kept the famous gardens abounding with all kinds of delicious fruit, and the golden apples which Jūno presented to them on the day of her marriage with Jūpiter. To render the precious fruit perfectly secure, it was guarded by a terrible dragon, which never slept, and which Hērēcles slew; in consequence of its being one of the twelve labours imposed on that hero, by Eurys-theus, to bring the golden apples to Argos, Argo. Diōdorus seems to think that the adjective golden, was applied, not to the fruit, but to the flocks and herds of Atlas, in the same sense as it was applied to Vēnus, expressive of unequalled beauty. But this conjecture cannot be admitted. The site of these gardens, and kind of fruit which the ancients called Aurea mala, are points on which the moderns have already displayed much learning and ingenuity; but still afford subject for future inquiry and discussion. The opinion now most generally received is, that these gardens were one of the Canary Isles, and the golden fruit, oranges. The Hesperides seem, by the ancients, to have been reckoned nearly at the extremity of the west, and, therefore, their position varies as their knowledge of countries extended in that direction. Hesperia celtica, the pillars of Hērēcles (Luc. Phar. ix. 654). Hesperus axis, the western world (Claud. v. 265). Hesperium pœcus, Spanish sheep. Martialis states, that the fleeces were yellow with gold (ix. 62).

Hesperus, i. m. a Spanish youth, who competed for the prize in the foot-race given by Scipio Africanus, at the end of the Spanish war (Sil. Ital. xvi. 465).

Hestia, v. Hestia, s. f. the ancient name of Orēus. Inh. Histiæ, orum, m. (Liv. xxxi. 46). Histiæotis, idis, f. the district.—2. A district of Thessaly.

Hesus. See Esus.

Heterioes, es, f. an appellation of part of the Macedonian cavalry, as a mark of honourable distinction, arising from the royal favour and confidence (Cor. Nep. Eum. 1).

Hetriculum, i. n. a town of the Bruttii, the situation of which is uncertain. It revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 19).

Hiacensæ, arum, m. an Indian nation, who referred their origin to Hērēcles (Just. xii. 9).

Hiarbas, v. Iarbas, s. m. king of Nūmīdia, slain by Cn. Pōmpēius Magnus, because he was making preparations for war, in 83 B. C. On this account, and having defeated and killed Cn. Dōmitius Abēnōbārus, in Africa, Pōmpēius triumphed over that country, when only twenty years old, and of equestrian rank (Liv. Ep. 89).

Hiāspis, idis, f. a town on Tigris, the De-filāh (Amm. Mar. xviii. 5).

Hiber, eri, m. a river of Hibēria, v. Ibēria, a country near the Caspian Sea (Val. Flacc. v. 167 seq.).

Hibēria, Ivērnia, Jūvērna, s. et, Iērnē, es, v. Iris, is, f. Ireland, a considerable island in Mārē Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean. It is washed on the east by Océānus Vērginūs, St. George's Channel, which separates it from England, on the north by Mārē Hibēri-cum, the Irish Sea, which divides it from Scotland; and on all other parts by Mārē Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean, of which St. George's Channel, and the Irish Sea, form but very small parts. Ireland is situated between 5 and 10 degrees of west longitude, and between 51 and 56 degrees north latitude, extending in length about 300 miles, and in breadth about 150. Its surface contains 24,300 square miles, and the modern population is computed at seven millions. To Hērōdōtus both Britain and Ireland were unknown. Erātōsthēnes gives a general and very rude idea of the outline of the former, but was ignorant of the latter. Strābo had some knowledge, though most imperfect, of both. According to this geographer, the position of Ireland would nearly coincide with that of the island Faro. Pliny's information with respect to Britain and Ireland greatly surpasses that of his predecessors. Pōmpē-nius Mela calls Ireland Jūvērna, and Diōdorus, Iris, v. Irin. The latter says, that the natives of Ireland, like the Gauls and their northern neighbours, were cannibals. Inh. Hibēri, orum, m. Adj. Hibēricus, v. Hibēricus, a, um.

Hibērus, i. m. a Spaniard, of great wealth, killed by Murrus (Sil. Ital. i. 387).

Hibla, s. f. a village of Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xxv. 9).

Hicētān, ōnis, m. was the father of Thy-metes. Adj. Hicētānūs, a, um. Hicētā-ōnūs Thy-metes (Virg. Æn. x. 123).—2. Brother of Prīamus, an eminent commander, was the father of Mēlanippus. Hicētānō-des, s. m. Mēlanippus (Hom. Il. xv. 546).

Hicētas, s. m. one of the Lēōntīni, a man of great ambition, who took part with the Syracusans, and afterwards joined with the Carthaginians, in order to overpower Dionysius, and make himself absolute. In his first engagement, supported by the Carthaginians, he compelled the tyrant to take refuge in the citadel, and made himself master of part of the city. Timōlēon defeated him at Adranum, and he afterwards sent two assassins to murder that noble Corinthian. This iniquitous design having failed, he admitted the Carthaginians into the town of Syracuse. On the arrival of Timōlēon before the town, the commander of the Carthaginians slipped away, and the Corinthians carried the town by storm. After Timōlēon had re-peopled Syracuse, he compelled Hicētas to withdraw from the Carthaginians, to destroy his forts, and to live as a private person among the Lēōntīni. Afterwards, in league with the Carthaginians, he made war on the Syracusan territories, and fell in the way of Timōlēon, who took him and his son prisoners, and punished them capitally as traitors to their country. His wife and daughter were condemned to death by the Syracusans, and the sentence was executed upon them accordingly (Cor. Nep. Timol. 2).

Hidāsmēnus, i. m. a Scythian commander, who fought against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 196).

Hiēmpsal, ālis, m. a son of Micipsa, and brother of Adhērbal. On his father's death, 120 B. C., he succeeded to a third part of the kingdom, his brother Adhērbal to another third, and Jūgūrtha, the illegitimate son of Mastanābal, to the remaining third.

In talents, courage, and activity, Jögürtha far surpassed the other two, and, being a man of inordinate ambition, he resolved to obtain possession of the whole kingdom of Numidia, Algers. A stranger to gratitude and the tenderer feelings of humanity, he proceeded to the accomplishment of his nefarious design by assassination, and Hiempsal fell the first victim to his cruelty. He employed people to murder him, who severed his head from his body, and brought it to Jögürtha, as an indubitable proof that they had executed his commission (Sal. Jug. 5—12).—2. A king of Numidia, Algers, son of Jüba, whom Pompeius restored to the throne, after the Numidians had expelled him by order of Silla (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 71).—3. A Nasamonian, killed by Murrus (Sil. Ital. i. 408).

Hiëra, æ, f. Volcano, one of the Liparean islands (Plin. i. 236). The name of this island occurs in Ammianus Marcellinus, where the text seems to require Thëra (xvii. 7).

Hiëra Cômë, Hiëræ Cômës, f. a city of Lydia, on the confines of Mysia. Here was a magnificent temple and oracle of Apollo, from which the priests were said to give their answers in not inelegant verse (Liv. xxxviii. 12, 13).

Hiëräpölis, is, f. Menbigz, a city of Commagene (Amm. Mar. xiv. 7 seq.).—2. A city of Phrygia, on the Meander, near which pestilential vapours issued (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).—3. A town of Crëta, Candia (Plin. i. 451). Inh. Hiëräpölitæ, arum, m. (Plin. i. 595). Adj. Hiëräpölitæus, a, um.—4. Bambouch, a town of Syria, to the north of Dardax, the Fay.

Hiërüchius, i, m. a district of Judea, according to Justinus, supposed to be a mistake for Jericho, which was the name of a town (xxxvi. 3).

Hiërius Asiñius, Hiëri Asiñi, m. one of the four commanders, on the part of the Picentes and Marsi, against the Romans, in 91 B. C. (Eutrop. v. 3). The statement in the epitome of Livius differs in the account above given, first in calling him Hiërius Asiñius, secondly, prætor of the Marrucini, and adding, that he was killed by C. Marius (Ep. 73).

Hiëro, v. Hiëron, önis, m. a king of the Syracusani, son of Hiërocles, by a servant-maid. Justinus mentions, that his father exposed him when an infant, as the disgrace of his family, on account of the mean birth of his mother, and that bees miraculously supported him for a number of days. The soothsayers interpreted his uncommon preservation as a presage of his future greatness, which induced his father to take him home, where he was brought up in a manner suited to the nobility of his family, and to the expectation of his future eminence. On reaching manhood, he, assisted by the Carthaginians, made war against the Mamertini, the allies of Rome. After being frequently defeated, he solicited and obtained peace, in 266 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 16, 24).—2. Another king of the Syracusani, and a faithful ally of the Romans. Having taken three ships of five banks of oars near Messina, Messina, belonging to the Carthaginians, which had been driven down the strait by the current, he learned from the prisoners, that part of the Carthaginian fleet was to attack Lilybæum, Mazalla: this intelligence saved that city.

Besides promising grain and clothing to the Roman legions after the battle at Trásimënus, the Lake of Perugia, he sent to Ostia a fleet with a large supply of provisions, a golden statue of Victory, which weighed three hundred and twenty pounds, and a thousand archers and slingers to oppose the Balaëres in Hannibal's army. The Romans accepted the whole, placed the statue in the temple of Jupiter in the capitol, and thanked him for his presents. In further proof of his fidelity, he gave it as his advice, that the prætor of Sicily should cross into Africa, to harass the Carthaginians in their own country, and to prevent their sending reinforcements to Hannibal (Liv. xxi. 49 seq.). This prince lived to a great age, beloved by his subjects, and respected by the virtuous. He encouraged literature, patronised the learned, and adopted every prudent measure for the improvement of agriculture and the arts. The Sicilians lamented his death. His reign, which formed a contrast with that of his successor Hiëronymus, appears to have been one of the happiest periods of Sicilian history.—3. A Parthian nobleman (Tac. Ann. vi. 43).

Hiëro-Casärëa, æ, f. a city of Lydia, which had a famous temple of Persian Diana, consecrated by Caesar. Inh. Hiërocasäriënses, ium, m. (Tac. Ann. iii. 62).

Hiërocles, is, m. a Sicilian nobleman, a descendant from Gëlo, and father of Hiëro g. v. (Just. xxiii. 4).—2. A native of Agrigentum, who delivered up Zäcynthus to the Achæans, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 32).

Hiëron öros (the holy mount), now Jorus, or, Yorus, the extremity of the range on which Teke stands.

Hiëronymus, i, m. a Sicilian, only son of Gëlo, who himself was the only son of Hiëro, king of Syracusæ, and Nerëis, daughter of Pyrrhus. On the death of his grandfather, Hiëronymus succeeded to the throne. His dispositions were of that kind which rendered him susceptible of being hurried into every kind of vice; on that account Hiëro intended to leave Syracusæ free. In this design, his daughters saw themselves and husbands excluded from all authority, and, therefore, prevailed on him to leave the crown to his grandson, expecting that, in his minority, the administration of the state would be vested in them. During a period of fifty years, Hiëro had been the faithful ally of the Romans, and his earnest advice to the tutors of the youth, of whom there were fifteen, was, to teach him to tread in his steps. Soon after the funeral of the king, Andranödorus displaced the other guardians, on pretence that Hiëronymus was fit for government, and thus concentrated in himself the power of the fifteen. Instead of adopting the plans of his grandfather, Hiëronymus imitated Diönysius, indulged in excessive vice and horrid cruelty, which gave rise to a conspiracy against his life. A faithful servant discovered to him the plot; but Thëodötus, who was seized, could not be forced, by the greatest torture, to discover his accomplices, and saved their lives, while he caused the death of the most worthless of the king's favourites, though guiltless of the crime, by naming them as conspirators. After concluding a treaty with the ambassadors of Hannibal, in which it was agreed that Himëra, the Termini, should be the boundary between the Syracusans and Carthaginians; afterwards he proposed that he should have the whole of Sicily, and that Italy should be conquered for the Carthaginians. The latter did not blame his fickleness, since they considered him detached from the Romans. He marched to Lēontini, Lentini, to recover the town then held by a Roman garrison, where a conspiracy against his life was carried into execution, in 217 B. C. At first, his soldiers threatened to put all the conspirators to death; but the promise of liberty, and hope of obtaining part of the royal treasury, produced such a change on their minds, that they allowed his body to remain unburied (Liv. xxiv. 4-7).

Hierophantes, ae, m. a priest of Cyres (Cor. Nep. Pelop. 3).

Hierosolyma, orum, n. e. Hierosolyma, ae, f. Jerusalem, the capital of Judea, taken in 67 B. C., by Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who conquered the Jews, for which he was surnamed Hierosolymarius (Liv. Ep. 102). The siege of this city lasted for three months, during which twelve thousand of the inhabitants were killed, and the rest allowed to surrender (Eutrop. vi. 14. Flor. iii. 5). Inh. Hierosolymus, orum, m.

Hierosolymus, i, m. a man of eminence among the Jews, under whose conduct and that of Judas they, according to some, quitted Egypt, and took possession of the land of Canaan. He built the city which, after his own name, he called Hierosolyma q. v. Every reader of the Sacred Scripture knows, that this tradition has no foundation in truth (Tac. Hist. v. 1 seq.).

Hierus, i, m. twin-brother of Asillus. Martialis gives him the face of Pollux, and his brother that of Castor, adding that each had the beauty of Helena (ix. 104).

Higinus, i, m. an oculist of some celebrity (Mart. x. 56).

Hilära, e, f. Hilära, ae, f. daughter of Lēucippus and Philodice, and sister of Phoebe. When these two sisters were betrothed to Lyncæus and Idas, sons of Aphareus, Castor and Pollux carried off both, and were pursued by the husbands. On overtaking them, Lyncæus killed Castor, which gave rise to the fiction, that they died alternately for each other (Ov. Fast. v. 699 seq. Prop. i. 2. 16).

Hilärio, onis, m. a freedman of the emperor Augustus, who wrote part of his Will, as did also another freedman Polybius (Suet. Aug. 101).

Hilärtus, i, m. a freedman of Vitellius, who preferred an accusation against M. Clävus Rufus, whose interest overpowered that of Hilärtus, and condemned him to punishment (Tac. Hist. ii. 65).

Hilärus, i, m. a distinguished cultivator of Cereätanus ager (Mart. vi. 73).

Hilēm, ae, f. a town near Singara, Sinjar, at which the Persians defeated the Romans. Adj. Hilēnsis; is, e. Hilēnsis pugna, at which Constantinus was present (Amm. Mar. xviii. 5).

Hilermus, i, m. a Spanish king, whose army, consisting of Vaccæi, Vettones, and Celtibæri, was defeated near Tölētum, Toledo, and himself taken prisoner, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 7).

Himella, ae, f. the Aia, one of the branches of Tiber, the Tevere, which falls into that river below Cüres (Virg. Æn. vii. 714).

Himëra, e, f. Himëras, ae, m. the Termini, a large river of Sicily, of remarkably sweet water, which, running northward, falls into the Mediterranean.—2. Another river of that island, now called the Salsi, to distinguish it from the stream just mentioned, and to express the quality of the water. The Salsi is the largest river of that island, has its source about twenty miles from the Tuscan sea, and running southward falls into the Libyan sea, after a course of eighty miles. It divides the island nearly into two equal parts, and, according to the treaty of Hieronymus, formed the boundary between the Syracusans and Carthaginians (Liv. xxiv. 6).

Himëra, ae, f. Termini, a town in Sicily, at the mouth of the Termini. At this town were hot baths (thërmae), from which the modern name seems to be derived (Ov. Fast. iv. 475). Inh. Himërēnses, ium (Sing. Himërēnsis; is, m. Adj. Himërēnsis; is, e. Himërēnses aquæ, v. thërma, the hot baths at Termini.

Himërus, i, m. a man whom Phraates attached to himself in early youth, and whom he left to defend the kingdom when he marched against the Scythians. Forgetting his past life, and that he was the mere substitute of another, he distressed the Babylonians and the inhabitants of many other cities, by his tyrannical cruelty (Just. xlii. 1).

Himilco, onis, m. a Carthaginian, who succeeded his father Hamilcar in the command of the army in Sicily. After gaining great victories, he lost almost the whole of his forces, says Justinus, by the influence of a pestilential star, and killed himself as soon as he entered his own house, without even allowing his children first to see him (xix. 2 seq.).—2. The father of Mahārbal (Liv. xxi. 12).—3. A Carthaginian nobleman of the Barcine faction, who threw out some sarcastic reflections on Hanno q. v., in the senatehouse, when the joyful intelligence of Hannibal's victory at Cannæ was communicated by his brother Mago, in 218 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 12).—4. A noble Carthaginian, who, in the second Punic war, commanded the fleet which had long been kept at Pachynus, Cape Passaro, landed at Hērāclēa, called also Minōa, twenty-five thousand infantry, three thousand horse, and twelve elephants. On Hippocrates taking possession of Syracuse, he went to Carthage, and, through ambassadors from Hippocrates, and letters from Hannibal, asserting that the whole of Sicily might be easily taken from the Romans, he readily procured an order, that the greatest possible force of infantry and cavalry should be transported to that island. Soon after his arrival, he reduced Hērāclēa, and, within a few days after, Agri-gentum, Girgenti. Hither M. Claudius Marc'ellus had hastened to prevent its falling into the hands of the Carthaginians; but too late. Himilco and Hippocrates were jointly to conduct the war against the Roman consul, and Epicydes to command the troops which guarded Syracuse. Marc'ellus afterwards attacked the Carthaginians when engaged in forming their camp, cut off the whole of the infantry, and Hippocrates with the cavalry fled to Acra. The latter, having been joined by Himilco, encamped on Anāpus, the Alfeo. Having been disappointed in his expectation that the Roman legions, landed at Pānōrmus, Palermo, would fall into his hands, Hīmīleo followed Mārcellus, in hope of overtaking him before he joined the larger division of his forces at Syracūsae. In this, also, his expectations were unrealized. Adding stratagem to bravery, he had bargained with the leading men of Hēnna, Castro Janni, to betray the garrison into his hands; but the vigilance of L. Pinārius, the Roman commander, prevented the execution of that design. He retired from Castro Janni, on the massacre of the inhabitants by Pinārius, to Mūrgāntia. Both he and Hippōcrātes marched to the aid of the Syracūsāni, after part of their city had been taken by M. Claudius Mārcellus, without being of any material advantage to the inhabitants; and both died in the great mortality which soon after prevailed among the Carthaginian troops (Liv. xxiv. 35 seq.). To him probably Silius Itālicus alludes (xiv. 394).—3. Commanded the Carthaginian auxiliaries at Castīlo in Spain, in 203 B. C., when the city and Carthaginian garrison were delivered up to the Romans by Cērdūbellus (Liv. xxviii. 20).

Hīōstus, i, m. the son of Hāmpsicōra, a Sardinian chief, who commanded in the absence of his father, engaged the Romans under T. Mānlius Tōrquātus, and was defeated with considerable loss. Soon after, the Sardinians and Carthaginians had another engagement with the Romans, in which they were defeated with great slaughter, and Hīōstus was killed (Liv. xxiii. 40 seq.).

Hiphinōus, i, m. a centaur killed by Pēlēus, in the battle with the Lāpithae, at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 379).

Hippagōgos, v. Hippāgos, i, f. a kind of ship originally used in transporting horses, hence the name. Eumēnes, king of Asia, sent thirty-five of them to his brother Attālus, in 170 B. C., when he was with the Roman army in Greece. The Macedonian fleet destroyed the greater part of them (Liv. xlv. 23).

Hippalcēmus, i, m. reckoned one of the Argonauts by Apollōdōrus and Hyginus. The latter says he was a native of Pise.

Hipparchus, i, m. a philosopher of Alēxandria, who surpassed all the ancients in the knowledge of astronomy. To him has been ascribed the discovery of the interval between the vernal and autumnal equinox being about seven days longer than between the autumnal and the vernal, arising from the eccentricity of the earth's orbit; of the inequality of the sun's motion, on which he formed tables of the equation of time, and of the construction of a celestial globe, on which he marked all the stars visible at Alēxandria. His attempt to explain the motion and phases of the moon, although it failed of complete success, yet discovers much ingenuity, and aided the labours of future philosophers. He may be reckoned the father of geography, by connecting it with astronomy, and fixing the science on certain principles. Besides, his numerous calculations may be considered the foundation both of plane and spherical trigonometry. All the writings of Hipparchus are lost, except his criticism on Arātus and Euxidas (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 1).

Hipparchus. See Diocles.

Hippārius, i, m. a Syracusan nobleman, father of Dion q. v. Of his history nothing further is known.

Hippāris, is, m. the Cumerina, a river of Sicilia, Sicily, which takes its rise in the marketplace of the town Yhomisus, in a copious spring, which, almost at its source, is sufficient for turning a mill, and five miles from the sea falls into Cāmārinus lācus, Lago di Cumerina (Sil. Ital. xiv. 230).

Hippāsus, i, m. a centaur, who lost his life by the hand of Thēsūs in the battle with the Lāpithae, at the nuptials of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 352). Valērius Flācus mentions one of this name, supposed by some to have been one of the Lāpithae (i. 145).—2. One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 313).—3. The father of Naubōlus. Hippāsides, v, m. a patronymic of Naubōlus (Stat. Th. vii. 355).—4. The father of Chārōps and Socus. Hippāsides, v, m. a patronymic, perhaps of Socus (Ov. Met. xiii. 258). Hōmērus uses it as a patronymic of Chārōps (Il. xi. 426 seq.); but Ovidius could not understand the word in that sense, because Chārōps occurs in the third line after, and the analogy of the Latin language does not admit of the patronymic being separated so far from the proper name, and that too by other proper names. Some consider Hippāsides to be a proper name, not a patronymic, in which case the text of Ovidius should read thus Corānos, Hippāsides; but, if considered a patronymic, the comma should be out, and the meaning will then be Corānos, son of Hippāsus.—5. The father of Apīsiōn hence called Hippāsides (Hom. Il. xvii. 348).

Hippia, v, f. wife of A. Fabricius Vēnto, a senator, who eloped from her husband with Sērgius, a gladiator, and went to Egypt (Juv. Sat. vi. 82).

Hippias, v, m. a son of Pisistrātus, who, on his brother Hippārchus, whom Justinus calls Diōcles, being killed, for some time usurped the throne of Athens, and, after his expulsion, fled to Dārius, accompanied the Persians in their expedition against Greece, and fell in the battle at Mārāthōn, Marathona (Just. ii. 9).—2. A native of Bēroa, an intimate friend of Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlii. 39 seq.).—3. A praetor of the Thesalians, who was with T. Minūcius Rūfus, when he entered the town Gyrton, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 54).—4. A sophist, born at Elis, who boasted, that he knew all the arts, and in proof, his shoes, ring, cloak, and other parts of his dress, were his own workmanship. Hence he maintained that virtue consisted in a man's being able to supply his own wants, and in requiring no assistance from others (Cic. de Orat. iii. 32. Amm. Mar. xvi. 5).—5. A son of Philōxēnus (Cic. Fam. xii. 37).—6. A prince whose name occurs in the writings both of Cicero and Plūtārchus.

Hippo, ōnis, m. Bona, a town of Nūmidia, Algiers, formerly the capital of that country, hence Silius Itālicus, antiquis dilectus regibus Hippo (iii. 259), which accounts for its being frequently called Hippo regius. C. Laelius ravaged the country in the vicinity of this town (207 B. C.), immediately before P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Africānus invaded Africa (Liv. xxix. 3).—2. A town near the western coast of Brūtius ager, the most southerly district of Italy. It was afterwards called Vibo Valēntia, now Biconu (Plin. i. 335).

—3. Hippo nōva, a town in the south of Spain (Plin. i. 292). It does not appear to be the town of this name mentioned by Livius on Tāgus, the Tajo, towards the sources of that river, near Tōletum, Toledo (xxxix. 30).—4. Hippo Zārētus, c. Diārrhētus, Benzert, near Utica. These adjectives not only distinguished it from other towns of this name, but indicated that it was well supplied with water. It stands at the bottom of a large gulf between an extensive lake and the sea. The situation is pleasant, and, if the indolence of the Turks would permit them to clear out and repair the harbour, the safest and most beautiful in this part of Africa, the advantage to the place would be inestimable. Adj. Hippōnēnsis, is, e. Hippōnēnsis alius (Plin. i. 533).

Hippōcēphālus, i, m. the suburbs of Antiochia, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, who yet places it at the distance of three miles from the town (xxi. 15).

Hippocles, is, m. one of the leaders of the colony from Chalcis, Egripo, who built Cūme (Vel. Pat. i. 4).

Hippocōon, ōntis, m. a Thracian, the son of Hērtaeus, who was one of the companions of Aeneas. Hyrtilides, is, m. a patronymic of Hippocōon (Virg. Aen. v. 492).—2. The father of Enesimius, Alcon, and Dexippus, who joined in hunting the Calydonian boar, at which Enesimius lost his life (Ov. Met. viii. 314—363).

Hippocrates, is, m. a native of Carthage, whose mother was a Carthaginian, but his paternal grandfather a Syracusan, who had been banished from Sicily. Hannibal sent Hippocrates, his brother Epicydes, and Hannibal to negotiate a peace with Hērōnymus, king of Syracuse, in 217 B. C., with whom the two brothers remained. In the great mortality which prevailed among the Sicilian and Carthaginian troops in 214 B. C. Hippocrates died (Liv. xxiv. 6 seq.).—2. A man whom Martialis ridicules (ix. 96).

Hippocrēnē, es, f. (from icrenē, a horse, and crenē, a fountain), a spring at the foot of Hēlicon, Zagara, a mountain in Boeōtia, sacred to the muses. It first appeared on the ground being struck by the foot of the horse Pegasus (Ov. Met. v. 262 seq.). Hence Pegasus calls it contemptuously fons Caballinus, caballus signifying a pack-horse, a hack. (Prol. i. 1 seq.). Humor Bellerophontēi equi, waters of the fountain Hippocrēnē (Prop. iii. 3. 2). Hippocrēnides, um, f. the muses. Adj. Hippocrēneus, a, um. Hippocrēneus fons (Claud. i. 5).—2. Another spring at Troezen, near which was a wild olive reported to have been a regeneration of the club of Hēracles, which he dedicated here on the completion of his labours (Paus. ii. 31).

Hippodāmas, antis, m. the father of Pērimēlo, whom he tumbled headlong from a rock into the sea, because she had lost her innocence with Achēlōus, the Aspro-potamo (Ov. Met. viii. 592).—2. Son of Achēlōus and Pērimēlo, and brother of Orēstes (Apol. i. 7).—3. A Trojan, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 401). The poet represents him as cowardly and timid.

Hippodāmē, es, f. Hippodāmia, is, f. according to some, daughter of Atrāclius, and according to others, of Adrāstus, king of Argos, at whose marriage with Pirithōus, king of the Lāpithae, a dreadful battle ensued with the centaurs, in consequence of Eurētus, whose natural ferocity was heightened by drink, having attempted to violate her (Ov. Met. xii. 210). From this contest she received the name of Ischōmāchē q. v.—2. The daughter of Enōmāus, king of Elis, who was informed by an oracle, that he would be killed by his own son-in-law, for which reason he made it a condition, that the man who married his daughter must first surpass him in the chariot-race, and failure was immediate death. His own horses were uncommonly fleet, and thirteen had lost their lives, when Pēlōps, son of Tāntālus, who offered himself, by bribing Mērtilus, the charioteer of Enōmāus, excelled him, and obtained Hippodāmia for his wife, by whom he had three sons (Hyg. 84).—3. Eldest daughter of Anchises, and wife of Alcathōus. She was superior to all of her own age in beauty, knowledge of work, and prudence. She was sister of Augēas (Hom. Il. xiii. 429 seq.).—4. An attendant of Pēnelōpē (Hom. Od. xviii. 181).

Hippodāmus, i, m. son of Enōmāus, one of the warriors against Thēba, Theba, and one of the competitors in the chariot-race, whose chariot Chroēmis broke in pieces, and his horses would have eaten him when they saw him on the ground, had not that hero prevented them (Stat. Th. vi. 346—490).—2. A man to whom Martialis addresses an epigram (iv. 31).—3. Another, in the Trojan army, who lost his life by the bravery of Ulysses (Hom. Il. xi. 335).

Hippodromon, i, n. ground kept as a course for horse-races. Palaestra Hippodromon (Mart. xii. 50).

Hippolochus, i, m. one of the thirty tyrants of Athens, who was killed in battle in 404 B. C. (Just. v. 9).—2. A son of Antimachus, whom, with his brother Pisander, Agamemnon took, but afterwards killed on their father's account (Hom. Il. xi. 122).—3. Son of Bellerophon and Philonoe, and father of Glaucus (Hom. Il. vi. 197).—4. Commanded a garrison of the Larissaei at Scōtussa, at the time it surrendered to Antiochus in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 9).

Hippolyte, es, f. sister of Antiope, queen of the Amazons. It was the ninth labour of Hēracles to bring the girdle of Hippolyte to Eurystheus (Apol. ii. 5). She was taken prisoner by Thēseus, under Hēracles, who afterwards married her, and by whom she had Hippolytus. Some call her Antiope, but Stāsius gives her name Hippolyte (Th. xii. 534).—2. v. Astidamia, is, f. wife of Acāstus, king of Māgnesia, who fell in love with Pēleus, who rejected her passion, and she, in revenge, stated to her husband that Pēleus had offered her violence, on which account he did not choose to put him to death, because he was his guest, but plotted his destruction (Apol. iii. 12). To this Hōrātius alludes, where he calls her Magnēsa (Od. iii. 7. 18). See Pēleus.

Hippolytus, i, m. son of Thēseus, and Hippolyte. Having refused compliance with the unlawful desire of Phaedra, his father's wife, she complained to her husband that he had offered her violence, which he readily believed. Enraged at the immorality of his son, he earnestly entreated Nēptūnus to punish him. The god of the sea granted the request of Thēseus, and sent a bull suddenly from the ocean, which terrified the horses of Hippolytus, as he drove along the shore, on which his chariot was broken to pieces, and he lost his life. Pausanias adds, his spirit again re-animated his body by the agency of Æschlapius, that he refused reconciliation with his father, and therefore went to Italy, where he built Aricia, Nemi, in which was a temple to Aricina Diana. From this temple, and the adjoining grove of that goddess, horses were excluded, in consequence of their having occasioned the death of Hippolytus (Virg. Æn. vii. 773—780). Here he was known by the name of Virbius (cir his). After death he received divine honours, and was by the gods changed into a star or constellation under the name of Auriga. Diomedes Siculus states, that his father was unwilling to believe the report of his wife, Phædra, that she, having failed to substantiate her charge, hanged herself, that his horses took fright, for which he assigns no reason, broke the chariot, and Hippolytus, entangled in the reins, was dragged along and killed. From his father he was called Thēstides (Ov. Ep. Her. iv. 65), and Thēstius hēros (Ov. Met. xv. 492).

Hippomachus, i. m. son of Antimachus, a brave warrior killed by Læonæus (Hom. Il. xii. 189).

Hippomēdon, ōtis, m. a native of Argolis, son of Aristomachus, or, according to Sophocles and Hyginus, of Talaus, by a sister of Adrastus; was one of the seven commanders, who fought against Thēba, Theba. He fell by the hand of Ismārus (Stat. Th. i. 44 seq.). The foundations of his house were visible when Pausanias wrote (Paus. ii. 36).

Hippomēnes, is, m. son of Mēgareus and Mēropē, was one of the lovers of Atalanta, who was distinguished both for her beauty and swiftness. Wishing to remain unmarried, she proposed to her numerous admirers that the matter should be determined by a race. The lover was to start first, and she afterwards to pursue with a dart. If she overtook him before he reached the goal, she was to put him to death, and to fix up his head in the Stadium. In this manner several lost their lives. Hippomēnes, having obtained from Vēnus three golden apples, which she brought either from the gardens of the Hesperides or from a grove in Cyprus, entered the list. He threw them down, one after another, at certain distances, and, whilst Atalanta picked them up, he arrived at the goal. By Atalanta, Hippomēnes had a son, Pārthenopæus. Unmindful of his obligation to Vēnus, that goddess induced him, when sacrificing to Jupiter on mount Parnāsus, to profane the temple, on which Jupiter turned him into a lion, and Atalanta into a lioness (Hyg. 185). Ovidius ascribes the transformation to Cypēlē for profanation of her temple (Met. x. 639 seq.). That poet represents Atalanta as having conceived a violent passion for Hippomēnes, both from his youth and beauty, before he mentions the golden apples, the gift of Vēnus, who also informed him how he should use them (Met. x. 690 seq.). Mēgareus hēros, Hippomēnes (Ov. Met. x. 659).—2. An Athenian prince of great cruelty, who detected his daughter Lāmōnē in adultery, and gave her to be devoured by his horses, which Ovidius calls a new kind of punishment. Hippomēnēis, Idis, f. a patronymic of Lāmōnē; but some editions of Ovidius read here Hippomēnēia, the feminine gender of the adjective Hippomēnēus, a, um, the word filia being understood (Ibis 335).

Hippomōlgi, orum, m. a Scythian nation, who had this name from subsisting chiefly on the milk of mares. Hōmērus describes them as very just, and long-lived (Il. xiii. 5). Here the word is generally printed Hippomōlgi.

Hippōna, æ, f. (from ierre, a horse), the goddess of horses, whose statues were placed in stables. Some editions of Jāvēnālīs read Epōna, and the critics by whom the latter is preferred consider her the goddess of muleteers, or drivers of asses, deriving the word from er and læ, an ass (Sat. viii. 157).

Hippōnēus, i, m. the father-in-law of Alcibiades, the richest of all the Greeks. The readings in Cōrnēlius Nēpos vary greatly, some having disertissimum, others Græcæ lingua eloquentia ditissimum (Alcib. 2). The concurrent testimony of history affirms, that he was a man of prodigious wealth, but so far from excelling in eloquence, that he was a bad speaker. Inattention to the style of Cōrnēlius Nēpos, who, in place of saying simply the Greeks, has Græcæ linguæ loquentes (Milt. 3), Græcæ linguæ loquentes (Dion. 1), and here omnium Græcæ linguæ loquentium, has led to these groundless variations.

Hippōnēus, i, m. the father of Pēribœa, second wife of Cēnēus and Cāpānēus, one of the commanders at Thēba, Theba. Sātus Hippōnēus, Cāpānēus (Ov. Ibis 470).—2. A Grecian chief of great valour, killed by Hēctor (Hom. Il. xi. 303).

Hippōtades, æ, m. a man in the army of Etēocles, whom Tēdēus wounded in the Theban war. He forms no character in the Thebaid, for his name only occurs once, at the time he received the wound (Stat. Th. viii. 698).

Hippōtas, æ, m. the father of Sēgēsta, who was the mother of Æōlus, the god of the winds; but Apollōnius says, he was the father of Æōlus (iv. 778). Hippōtades, æ, m. a patronymic of Æōlus. Rēgnum Hippōtādæ, the kingdom of Æōlus, i. e. the Æolian, or, Liparean, islands (Ov. Met. xiv. 86).

Hippōtes, is, m. a descendant of Hērēclēs, and father of Alētes, founder of Corinth (Velut. Pat. i. 3).

Hippōthōus, v. Hippōtōus, i, m. one of the hunters at Cālēdon (Ov. Met. viii. 307).—2. A Trojan commander, son of Lēthus, a Pelasgian, whom Ajax Tēlāmōnēs killed, as he dragged off the body of Pātrocclus. He was a native of Lārissa (Hom. Il. xvii. 217 seq.).

Hippōtōn, ōtis, m. a man in the Trojan army, father of Ascānūs and Mōrys. He was killed with his son Mōrys by Mēriōnēs (Hom. Il. xiv. 514).

Hipsērātēa, æ, f. wife of Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, distinguished for her uncommon affection to her husband. In order that she might always be along with him, she cut out her hair, learned the use of arms, and followed her husband, enduring all the severities of banishment, after his defeat by Cn. Pōmpēius (Val. Max. iv. 6).

Hirpini, orum, m. a people of Italy, whose country was bounded by the territories of the Apuli, Lucani, Picentini, Campani, and Samnites. They revolted from the Romans to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, and promised to deliver Cōmpsa into his hands. M. Valerius, prætor, recovered three of their towns by force of arms, beheaded the authors of the revolt, sold upwards of a thousand of the prisoners, and gave the rest of the spoil to the soldiers (Liv. xxiii. 37). In conjunction with the Samnites, from whom they were originally descended, they maintained war against the Romans nearly a hundred years. After numerous defeats, they, at last, surrendered themselves to the conquerors, in 211 B. C., but their submission seems to have been the result of necessity, for they afterwards joined in the Social war, and were crushed by L. Cornélius Sūlla, in 91 B. C. Fēstus and Strābo derive their name from Irpus, a wolf, in the language of the Sabines, from a wolf having led the colony to their place of settlement. Adj. Hirpinus, a, um. Hirpina pūbes (Sil. Ital. viii. 569).

Hirpinus, i, m. a horse of remarkable swiftness, which gained many prizes. His merits have been alluded to both by Mārtiālis and Juvēnālis (Mart. iii. 63. Juv. viii. 63).

Hirrus, i, m. a fraudulent guardian, whom Juvēnālis has exposed for cheating the youth intrusted to his care (Sat. x. 222). Of his character and history nothing more is known.

A. Hirtius, A. Hirtii, m. was consul at Rome with C. Vibius Pansa, in 45 B. C. These consuls led the forces of the republic against M. Antonius, whom the senate declared an enemy on account of his enormities, whom they defeated and afterwards besieged in Mutina, Modena. Hirtius, after their victory, was killed in the camp of the enemy, and, Vibius having died of a wound received in the battle, both were buried in Campus Mārtius (Liv. Ep. 119). To this event Eutrōpius alludes (vii. 1). Tacitus seems to consider the manner of their death doubtful (Ann. i. 10).

Hirtulēus, i, m. a general under Q. Sertorius in Spain, who defeated and killed L. Dōmītiū, whom Eutrōpius calls prætor; Sallustius, proconsul (Eutrop. vi. 1).

Hisbo, v. Hisbon, ōnis, m. a man slain by Pallas (Virg. Æn. x. 384).

Hispāla Fēcēnia, Hispālie Fēcēnie, f. a noted courtesan at Rome, in very early life initiated into the rites of Bāchus. Although she continued to support herself by personal infamy, yet she appears to have been more respectable than the greater part of that wretched class of women. To save from ruin P. Æbūtiū, a youth whom she loved, Hispāla disclosed to him, in 188 B. C., the crimes committed in the Bāchānalia, which he communicated to the consul P. Pōstūmius Albūius, who then examined herself. From a dread of the vengeance of the gods, and still more of the initiated, it was long before he could prevail on her to reveal the whole truth. On being assured of protection, she made a full disclosure, and the senate afterwards voted her, out of the public treasury, one hundred thousand asses, besides conferring certain privileges highly to her honour, and adopting means which ensured her personal safety (Liv. xxxix. 4-19).

Hispālis, is, f. (Hispal, ālis, n. Sil. Ital. iii. 392), Seville, a celebrated town of Hispā-nia, Spain, on Bætis, the Guadalquivir, above the place where that river is divided into two streams, which formed the island Tartēssus (Cæs. B. C. ii. 18 seq.). The Gothic kings had long their residence in Seville, which the Phenicians are said to have built. Nēbriſsa, Lebriza, a town of great antiquity, stood between Seville and the sea. Inh. Hispālenſes, ium, m. Adj. Hispālenſis, is, e.

Hispānia, æ, f. Spain, a large country of Europe, bounded on the S. by Frētum Gādītānu, i. e. Herculēum, the Strait of Gibraltar; on the E. by the Mediterranean, which was known among the Romans by the appellation of Nōstrum Mārē, and, among the Greeks, of Mārē Intērnum, which may likewise be found in Roman authors, but not of frequent occurrence; on the N. by Pyrēnæi Mōntes, the Pyrenees, which separate it from Gāllia, France, and Océānus Cantābricus, the Bay of Biscay; on the W. by Lūsitānia, Portugal (included in Hispānia Ulteriōr), and Mārē Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean, which the Greeks call Mārē Exteriōrum. It extends from 35°, 50', to 44°, 40', N. lat., and from 9°, 30' W., to 3°, 15' E. long. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 660 miles, and its greatest breadth 550. The superficial contents of this country are about 148,000 square miles. Spain, including Portugal, was by the Romans divided into two parts, Hispānia Citiōr, the north of Spain, and Hispānia Ulteriōr, the south of Spain; hence duæ Hispāniæ, the two Spains, or, Hispāniæ, the Spains. The former, or northern, comprehending an extent of country equal to three-fourths of Modern Spain; the latter, or southern, the rest of the country. These two divisions were sometimes governed by proconsuls, but more commonly by prætors. In ancient times, when a king in this country died, his brother, if he had one, succeeded, to the prejudice of his son (Liv. xxviii. 21). This was likewise the custom in Nūmidia, Algiers (Liv. xxix. 29). Augustus having completed the subjugation of the whole country by the conquest of the Cantabrians, and neighbouring tribes (19 B. C.), divided the whole peninsula into three parts. Hispānia Citiōr, from Tarrāco, its principal city, he called Tarrāconēnsis, and Hispānia Ulteriōr he formed into Lūsitānia, and Bætica. The former appellation was derived from the Lūsitāni, the most powerful of the nations who inhabited that country, and the latter, from Bætis, the Guadalquivir, a very large river, which watered that province. Claudianus gives a correct and just description of this country in a single line—"Dives æquis, frugum facilis, præciosa metallis" (xxix. 54). Inh. Hispāni, orum (Sing. Hispānus, i), m. the Spaniards. Hispānus denotes a Spaniard by birth. Hispāniēnsis one living in Spain, though not by birth a Spaniard (Vel. Pat. ii. 51). Adj. Hispānus, Hispānicus, a, um, et, Hispāniēnsis, is, e. Hispāna hūmus (Ov. Fast. vi. 462). Hispāna Tēthys, the Spanish Sea, or Western Ocean (Claud. xvii. 50). Gladius Hispānicus (Gel. ix. 13). Hispāniēnsis or Rhōdāni (Plin. i. 310). Hispāniēnsis trīumphus (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 37).

Hispellum, i, n. Ispello, a town of Umbria, on the western side of Apenninus, the Apennines. Adj. Hispellas, as, as; ātis. Hispellās Mētāurus (Sil. Ital. iv. 187).

Hispo, ōnis, m. a man guilty of unnatural practices (Juv. Sat. ii. 50).

Hispilla, æ, f. the name of a Roman matron, whose niece was married to the younger Plinius. Juvénalis mentions her name twice, but in neither instance with respect (Sat. vi. 74 seq.).

Histāpes, is, m. the husband of a noble Persian, grand-daughter of Ochus, once king of Persia (Curt. vi. 2).

Hister Pācūvius, Histri Pācūvii, m. a legacy-hunter, of vicious practices. Juvénalis sometimes calls him simply Hister, and sometimes Hister Pācūvius (Sat. ii. 58: xii. 112).

Histērius, v. Histēius, i, m. a centurion sent by Quādrātus to receive the hostages of Vologēsēs, in the year 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 9).

Histia, æ, f. queen of Scythia, the same with Vēsta (Herod. iv. 127).

Histiæa. See Histiæa.

Histiæus, i, m. a Milesian, son of Lysāgōras, a man of great shrewdness and industry, whose interference prevented the bridge over the Danube from being broken down, and thus conferred a favour upon Darius, on which account he was invited, by that monarch, to Sardes, and afterwards conducted to Sūsa, as one of the king's counsellors. From the insincerity with which he acted, he secured the favour of none, was expelled by his countrymen, fled to Byzantium, where he became a pirate, and was afterwards made prisoner, and crucified at Sardes by Artāphērnēs, in opposition, however, to the will of Darius (Herod. iv. 138 seq.).—2. One of the three commanders sent to garrison the towns, Pythum and Petra, by Pērsēus, king of Mācedōnia, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 32).

Histrus. See Istrus.

Hilca, æ, f. a lake near Cibāle, v. Cibālis, Palancha, on Sāvus, the Save (Aur. Viç. Ep. 41).

Hōdius, i, m. leader of the Hālizzōnes, killed by Agāmēmnon (Hom. Il. v. 59).—2. A Grecian herald (Hom. Il. ix. 170).

Hōmērus, i, m. a Grecian, the most ancient of all the profane authors whose works are now extant. The unrivalled excellence of his writings have procured him the honourable appellations of "Prince of poets," and "the Father of Epic poetry." Yet of this celebrated character, there is scarcely a single circumstance of the personal history known. Authors of genius have written his life without being able to ascertain the place of his birth, the names of his parents, or the state to which he belonged. It has been maintained that he was born on the western coast of Asia Minor, Natolia, and on an island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago. The very fact that seven cities contended for the honour of giving him birth, proves that his native place is unknown. Nor is the period in which he lived involved in less uncertainty. The Arundelian marbles fix it in the tenth century, B. C., whilst other accounts make him contemporary with Rōmulus, or his successor Numa Pompilius. The compositions attributed to Hōmērus, are wrapt in equally deep obscurity. That they were long known to the inhabitants of the eastern shore of the Archipelago, is universally admitted, but that they were the production of the same poet has been denied. On the contrary, it has been maintained that they are the compositions of different individuals, and are connected by means of an assumed subject, which never entered the minds of the original writers. It is not easy to conceive how works extended to so great a length, could be correctly transmitted, by memory, through so many ages, before the art of writing was invented. Lycopurgus, it may be stated on the authority of Plutarchus, brought them from Asia to Greece, and the merit of their present arrangement has been ascribed to Pisistratus. It may be further added, that the very existence of the poet has been questioned, and the name said to be characteristic of a class (imagines), not the appellation of an individual. In opposition to these conjectures, or averments, may be placed the universal conviction of the Greeks, who never doubted the authenticity of the Iliad and Odyssey, but frequently referred to them in disputes connected with geography, or topography. The uniformity of style and manner which pervades these admirable poems, is a strong argument against their being the compositions of different authors. Besides, it cannot be denied that all the parts evidently conspire to form a perfect whole, consequently can only be considered the natural result of one fixed and uniform design. The beauties of style, the grandeur of imagery, the sublimity of thought, the extensive knowledge of human nature, and diversity of character, which appear in the writings of Hōmērus, have been so minutely detailed by various authors, that recapitulation here is not required. The only authentic poems of Hōmērus are the Iliad and Odyssey. Critics have rejected as spurious, the smaller poems, usually published in complete editions of this author. Adj. Hōmēricus, a, um. To guard the young scholar against supposing, from what is stated at the beginning of this article, that Hōmērus was the most ancient poet, it is only necessary to observe, that there were many who preceded him in the order of time, and a few of their names have been transmitted by Greek writers.

Hōmōlē, es, f. a very fertile mountain of Thessaly, the residence of the centaurs (Virg. En. vii. 675). The gates of Thēbæ next to this mountain were called Hōmōlōides v. Inh. Hōmōlēi, orum, m. Adj. Hōmōlōius, a, um.

Hōmōlūm, i, n. a town of Thēssalia (Liv. xlii. 38).

Hōmōlōides, um, f. one of the seven gates of Thēbæ, Thēba, of which Hemon had the command in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 252: viii. 354).

Hōmōnāda, æ, f. Homona, a town of Cilicia. Hōmōnādēnsēs, ium, m. the Homonadēnsians, a people of Cilicia, whose forts Sulpicius Quirinus took, and thus obtained triumphal honours (Tac. Ann. iii. 48).

Hōnōrius, i, m. brother of Thēodōsius the Great, after whom he named his eldest son Hōnōrius (Claud. xxix. 96).—2. A son of Thēodōsius, or, Thēodōsius the Great, and brother of Arcadius. At his death, Thēodōsius left the empire to his two sons. Hōnōrius and his successors made Rome the capital of their empire, whilst Arcadius and his successors fixed their residence at Constantinople. This division proved ultimately the destruction of the empire, by weakening its strength, setting one part against another, and rendering it an easier prey to the barbarians. Hönörus possessed none of those qualities which form an illustrious emperor. His mind could not plan, nor his courage execute, any thing great. His dispositions were mild but timid, and the bent of his inclination carried him to nothing flagrant or vicious. The able generals under this prince, repulsed the inroads of the barbarians, and subdued his enemies. Some of them took advantage of his inactivity, as might have been expected, and thus rendered his reign a scene of almost continued warfare. Claudianus has sung his praises in different parts of his works, and he, in conjunction with his brother and the senate, erected a statue of brass in Trajan's forum in honour of the poet. He died dropsical in the 39th year of his age, and 423d of the Christian era. Hönöriades, æ, m. a son of Hönörus, who must have predeceased his father, since Hönörus, though twice married, left no children (Claud. x. 341). Hönöras, adis, f. a sister of Hönörus. Hönöriades söröres (Claud. xxx. 131).

Hönöscn, æ, f. a city in Spain, between Carthagen and the Ebro, mentioned by Livius (xxii. 20).

Hönöinus, i, m. a nobleman of the Därdäni. His daughter, Etüta, was married to Gönütus, king of the Illýrii, after he had put to death his brother, Plätör, to whom Etüta had formerly been betrothed (Liv. xlv. 30).

Höplöus, éös, m. a native of Cälýdon (Cälýdönus Höplöus), and squire of Týdeus, in the Argive army, who gave the weapon to him, with which he transfixed his enemy, Ménéllippus, from whom he himself had received a deadly wound, of which he was then dying. In attempting to recover the body of Týdeus, Höplöus lost his life (Stat. Th. viii. 726—x. 398).

Höplömächus, i, m. a Glädiätör, who fights with arms, for the amusement of the populace, either from compulsion or for hire. See Glädiätör. Märtiälis ridicules an unskilful physician by calling him Höplömächus, adding, that he had formerly been an oculist (Ophthalmicus), and that he acted the same part when a physician, that he did after he became a gladiator, i. e. deprived men of life (Mart. viii. 74).

Höra, v. Ora, æ, f. the name which Rönöinus gave to his wife Hércülia, after her death, when she received divine honours (Ov. Met. xiv. 851).—2. A nymph, who had, by Jüpiter, Cöläxes, one of the Scythian commanders against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 58).

Höra (from Hörus, i. e. Apöllo, or, the Sun), æ, f. an hour. Among the Romans it was the twelfth part of a day. The first hour commenced with the rising of the sun, and the twelfth ended with his setting. It is manifest that the portion of time, denominated an hour by them, was constantly changing, and was only of equal length to our hour at the equinoxes. At these two periods of the year, and at them only, their first hour corresponded to seven o'clock in the morning; the second to eight; third to nine; fourth to ten; and fifth to eleven; but their sixth hour, or noon (meridies), coincided exactly with our twelve o'clock noon, or mid-day, throughout the whole year. Their seventh then answered to our one in the afternoon, eighth to two, ninth to three, tenth to four, eleventh to five, and twelfth to six. At the summer solstice, or longest day, the sun rises at Rome a few minutes past four o'clock, and sets the same number of minutes before eight, consequently their hour is, at that time, nearly $\frac{1}{4}$ longer than ours, and, at the winter solstice, it will be as much shorter. In the twelve tables, mention is only made of sunrise and sunset, afterwards noon was added, and proclaimed by an attendant (accensus) of the consuls, and this seems to have been the only division of the day known to the Romans, until about ten years after Pýrrhus had been driven from Italy, when, according to some, a dial was set up by L. Pápírüs Cürsor, at the temple of Quírünus, which Plínüs seems to think very doubtful, and, therefore, gives the credit of that introduction to M. Vülérüs Corvínus Mëssäla, consul, 263 B. C., who brought the dial from Cätüna, Catania, in Sicily (Plin. ii. 108). The division of the day into twelve parts, the Greeks learned from the Babylonians, to whom the merit of the invention is most probably due. The Romans were indebted, in this particular, as well as in very many other instances, to the Greeks.

Hörätüa, æ, f. sister of the three Hörätüi q. v., and betrothed to one of the Cüriätüi. When she saw the robe, which she had made and presented to her lover, carried as a part of the spoils by her victorious brother, she gave way to excessive grief, on which the ferocious Hörätüus plunged his sword into her heart. For this murder he was brought to trial, and condemned to death; but, by the advice of the king, he appealed to the people, who reversed the sentence of the judges, but as a mark of dishonour obliged him to pass under the yoke, which was allowed to remain as a monument of his disgrace, and called Sörörüum tigillum (Liv. i. 26), and by Pröpértüs Hörätüa pila (iii. 2, 7).

Hörätüi, orum (Sing. Hörätüus, i), m. three sons of P. Hörätüus q. v. who appear from Märtiälis to have been born at one birth (ix. 42). They engaged in combat with three Cüriätüi, whom Pröpértüs calls Cürüi (iii. 3, 7), to decide whether Röma, or Alba Lōnga was in future to govern the other. Two of the Hörätüi fell, on which the surviving brother betook himself to flight, in order to divide the Cüriätüi, who were all wounded. Following with a rapidity in proportion to their strength, they were soon at a considerable distance from each other, which the Roman had anticipated. He then turned and slew them, one after another, and thus obtained for his native city the sovereignty of Alba. Returning home in triumph, he was met by his sister, Hörätüa q. v., who was betrothed to one of the Cüriätüi, and who, in violent sorrow, bewailed the loss of her lover. Provoked at this ill-timed grief, Hörätüus plunged his sword into her bosom, on which she fell lifeless at his feet. Livius does not determine which of the combatants were Romans, although he seems to think the Hörätüi were, and in that he coincided with the general opinion. Märtiälis expresses no doubt in the matter, making the Hörätüi Romans (ix. 42). Cämpus Hörätüorum, the plain of the Hörätüi, on which they fought with the Curiatii (Mart. iii. 47). Adj. Hörätius, a. um. Hörätia pries (Mannil. i. 776).

Hörätii, orum (Sing. Hörätius, i), m. a Roman clan which had various surnames, Hörätus, Cöles, Flaccus, Pulvillus, &c. Adj. Hörätius, a. um. Hörätia gens, the clan of the Hörätii, which does not appear to have been very numerous, although it produced several illustrious characters. Hörätia virtus, the bravery of the Hörätii q. r.

Hörätius, i, m. one of the three brothers who fought for the sovereignty of Rome, and by whose hands the three Curiatii fell. For the murder of his sister he was brought to trial, condemned, but his life spared at the intercession of his father. Valerius Maximus calls him M. Hörätius. See Hörätia and Hörätii. To him Manilius alludes (iv. 36).—2. A man at whom Martialis laughs for being improperly dressed at the public exhibitions (iv. 2).

Hörätus Cöles, Hörätii Cöclitii, m. had the surname of Cöles (unöclius), from his having lost an eye in battle, was accidentally placed guard on Süblicius pons when Porsena took Janculum by assault in 508 B. C. His countrymen fled in great trepidation, casting down their arms, and running over that bridge to Rome. It was to no purpose that he assured them, they would find no safety in the city, if the bridge were allowed to remain. Equally fruitless was his attempt to prevail on them to face about, and to defend it. He then advised them to break down the bridge by whatever means they could, and he would sustain the attack of the enemy as long as possible. Having immediately advanced to the first entrance of the bridge, by the help of Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, whom shame prevented from flying, he sustained the first onset of the enemy. When a small part only of the bridge was left, he compelled his companions to retire to a place of safety. With eyes darting contempt on the leaders of the Tuscan army, he at one time challenged them to single combat, at other times upbraided them collectively as the slaves of kings, and as the enemies of liberty. His intrepidity astonished the enemy who hesitated to attack him alone. Shame at last put the whole troops in motion, and they at once discharged their javelins, which he received on his shield. They next advanced to push him from the bridge, but were discouraged from the attempt, by the crash of its fall, and the shout of the Roman army. He then leaped with his arms into the Tevere, and amidst showers of darts swam across to his friends, who, in return for his bravery, erected a statue of him in the Comitium, and gave him as much land as he could plough in one day (Liv. ii. 10). Semita Cöclitii, the narrow path of Süblicius pons, which Hörätus Cöles defended (Prop. iii. 11. 63). To him Manilius alludes (iv. 32); and Silius Italicus (x. 484).

C. Hörätius, C. Hörätii, m. surnamed Pulvillus, was consul in 477 B. C., when he fought a doubtful battle with the Tuscans in the vicinity of Rome (Liv. ii. 51).—2. Obtained the consulship in 457 B. C. He routed the Æqui in the district of Algidum. A pestilence, which prevailed five years after, carried off Hörätius, then an augur (Liv. iii. 30 seq.).

L. Hörätius Bärbätus, L. Hörätii Bärbätii, m. elected a military tribune, with consular authority, in 424 B. C. (Liv. iv. 35).

L. Hörätius Pulvillus, L. Hörätii Pulvilli, m. elected a military tribune, with consular authority, in 385 B. C., when he and the other four determined to consign their authority into the hands of their colleague, M. Furius Camillus, who considered that honour as nearly the same with creating him dictator for the fourth time (Liv. vi. 6).

M. Hörätius, M. Hörätii, m. one of the six military tribunes, with consular authority, who were elected in 377 B. C. He and Sp. Furius commanded the division of the Roman army against the Völsci; but the enemy declined to meet them (Liv. vi. 31).

M. Hörätius Bärbätus, M. Hörätii Bärbätii, m. a Roman, of some distinction, who delivered a speech of great, but merited, severity against the decemviri, at the time these tyrants convened the senate, in consequence of war with the Æqui and Sabinii. With the aid of L. Valerius Potitus, he drove Applus Claudius from the Forum. These two were sent to the commons during the secession occasioned by the death of Virginia, for to them only would the multitude give any answer. Next year (448 B. C.), the popularity of Hörätius and Valerius procured them the consulship, during which several laws favourable to the commons were passed. For a victory over the Sabinii he triumphed by order of the people, and was the first instance of one enjoying that honour without the approbation of the senate. The desire of popularity was certainly strong in Hörätius, yet it does not appear that, in any instance, he sacrificed the good of his country to the applause of the multitude (Liv. iii. 39—64).

M. Hörätius Pulvillus, M. Hörätii Pulvilli, m. was substituted consul in room of Sp. Lucrätius Tricipitinus, the father of Lucrätia, in 507 B. C. (Eutrop. i. 10). Livius says, that in some old authors the name of Lucrätius does not occur among the consuls. They place M. Hörätius Pulvillus as immediate successor to L. Junius Brutus. Hörätius dedicated the temple of Jupiter in the capitol, which excited the displeasure of his colleague's friends, who endeavoured, by every possible means, but without success, to prevent him. When engaged in the service, they stated to him, that his son was dead, and the family being thereby defiled, he could not dedicate the temple. Either from firmness of mind, or disbelief of the intelligence, he remained unagitated, calmly gave orders for the interment of the body, finished his prayers, and completed the dedication. Two years after, he was re-elected to the same office, according to the consular calendar, which differs from the best editions of Livius, in which the reading is P. Lucrätius, not M. Hörätius Pulvillus. There can be little doubt that an error exists, and that, into the text of Livius, M. Hörätius Pulvillus interum et P. Valerius Publicola tertium, ought to be admitted (Liv. ii. 8—15). To him Tacitus refers, suppressing the prenomen (Hist. iii. 72).

P. Hörätius, P. Hörätii, m. the father of the three champions, whose bravery brought the sovereignty of Alba to Rome (Liv. i. 26). See Hörätii.

Q. Hōrātius Flāccus, Q. Hōrātii Flāci, m. a poet of pre-eminent excellence, was born at Vēnūdia, Venosa, a town on the confines of Apūlia and Lūcānia, on 8th December, 64 B. C. He did not owe his distinction either to hereditary wealth, or dignity of ancestors. His grandfather was a slave, and his father a freedman. The poet does not conceal the meanness of his birth; but, from the few traits of his father's character, which he has recorded, it is manifest, that he possessed a sound judgment, tender affection, and just principles. A limited income, derived from a small farm, and the unpopular employment of a tax-gatherer, did not prevent him from sending his son, in early life, to Rome, where he obtained a liberal education, and an extensive knowledge of mankind, many proofs of which occur in his poetical compositions. It does not, however, appear that the pure moral principles early instilled into his mind, in a striking and impressive manner, had their full effect, either in regulating the conduct, or guiding the pen of the poet. In his writings too many passages occur, which could only have proceeded from an impure mind, and a vicious taste. On completing his education at Rome, Hōrātius went to prosecute his studies at Athens, where all the philosophy which men then knew was taught and studied. Here he contracted friendships with many of the young nobility of Rome, and, with them, he joined the republican army under Brūtus, who appointed our author a military tribune. We know not how to account for that amiable patriot and able commander conferring such a commission on a youth, without influence, and without the least experience of military affairs. May we not from this infer, that Brūtus considered his cause more hopeless than it appears from the writings of the Roman or Greek historians? Either the friends of Hōrātius, at Athens, had, through their interest with Brūtus, obtained a rank for which he possessed no qualification whatever, or that mild and determined republican had found a difficulty in obtaining proper officers. The event showed the absurdity of the appointment, and the poet has not concealed his unmanly terror and flight. How Hōrātius passed his time, until his friends obtained permission for his returning in safety to Italy, history does not inform us; but he lost his whole property by confiscation, and necessity compelled him to exercise his talents for poetry. The excellence of his first attempts gained him the friendship of Virgilius and Varius, who introduced him to Mæcenas, whose liberality not only relieved him from the distresses of poverty, but enriched him beyond his expectation, and even above what he had formerly possessed. From this period he lived in affluence, enjoying the society of the learned, and the patronage of the great. Augustus honoured him with his friendship, and he formed one of the party who went from Rome, to negotiate a peace between the emperor and M. Antōnius, at Brindisi, of which journey he has given a humorous and lively, but not an unexceptionable, account. Gratitude bound him both to Augustus and his ministers, and, although there is much deserving of censure and reprobation in the character of the emperor, yet it was more respectable than that of his rival, Antōnius, or that of his paramour, the beautiful but lascivious Clēōpātra, on which account impartiality cannot blame the poet for the manner in which he has spoken of these two. To defend him against the charge of extreme flattery towards the reigning prince, would, perhaps, be a fruitless attempt; yet much might be said in extenuation. Flattery generally keeps pace with liberality, and men of genius seldom show a want of adulation, when favours have either been received or are expected from the rich or noble. Besides, the prophecies which Hōrātius and other writers of that period ventured to utter, the event completely justified; and the latter years of the reign of Augustus form one of the happiest periods of the Roman state. A stronger objection, and one which admits of no palliation, may be brought against several passages of the Venusian bard. It is grieving to meet with loathsome effusions of imagination, conveyed in the grossest language, amidst the finest turns of thought, delicacy of feeling, justness of sentiment, and unrivalled felicity of expression. The moral truths which Hōrātius has mixed with high poetic sentiment and description, would almost form a system of ethics, but these very truths are debased by the intermixture of obscenity and moral pollution. These passages, though considerable in number, form but a small proportion of his works, and it would be difficult to name a lyric poet, who could, with advantage, be set in opposition to Hōrātius. His satires are more pleasing than those either of Pērsius or Juvēnalis, but they do not display the earnestness or virtuous indignation of either. Pērsius has given the character of Hōrātius, as a satirist, in lines not less distinguished for truth of sentiment than elegance of diction (Sat. i. 116 seq.). His Art of Poetry, considered as a didactic poem, cannot be allowed to rank very high. Modern ingenuity has been fruitlessly exerted to find a systematic and regular connexion between its different parts, an idea which most probably never entered into the head of the author, since the paragraphs, in many instances, might be changed without the slightest injury to the sense. Might the same not be said of that beautiful poem The Grace, by Blair? It would be difficult to add to the praises which every judge of Latin poetry has bestowed on the writings of Hōrātius. There is an indescribable charm in them which gives fresh pleasure to the classical scholar at every new perusal. This is the indubitable test of genuine poetry, and is, perhaps, nowhere found in higher perfection than in the enchanting pages of Hōrātius. He has described his personal appearance in terms not very flattering, and the cheerfulness of his disposition seems to have deserved greater commendation than the mildness of his temper. It is admitted, that he embraced the doctrine of Epicūrus, and his love of ease and tranquillity set a very moderate value on riches and splendour. He died about 7 B. C., leaving his property to Augustus, from which some have inferred, that he outlived Mæcenas. On this subject the learned are not agreed. Cūlāber Flāccus (Mart. viii. 18). Adj. Hōrātius, a. um. Hōrdēōnūs Flāccus, Hōrdēōnū Flāci, m. an officer in the Roman army, of a feeble mind, and unequal to the command even in peaceful times; but, with the turbulent army in Germany, when of advanced life, he only exposed himself to scorn. These disadvantages did not prevent his obtaining the government of that country, an important station which, at that period, required an active officer, who had courage and activity to execute whatever prudence suggested, or circumstances required. He embraced the interest of Vespasianus, which enraged the troops, because a sum of money had been sent by Vitellius as a donative which Hördeonius imprudently gave in name of Vespasianus. Their antipathy, perhaps of long standing, revived at this deception, and, after carousing during part of the night with the money which he had given them, they rushed into his tent, concealed by the darkness, dragged him out of his bed, and killed him on the spot (Tac. Hist. i. 9 seq.).

Hörēsti, orum, m. the Horestians, a people of Scotland, who inhabited, according to some, Angus-shire, and, according to others, a part of Fifeshire. Tacitus does not mention Agricola's penetrating farther than the Firth of Tay, which renders it more probable that the Horestians lived in the latter county (Agric. 38).

Hörētas, e. Orītas, arum, m. a people of Gedrosia, who gave their name to Haur (Curt. ix. 10).

Hörizon, ōtis, m. the line which terminates the view. In Geography and Astronomy it is a great circle of the sphere, dividing the world into two parts or hemispheres, the one visible, the other invisible. The horizon is distinguished into sensible and rational, or real; the former is that circle in the heavens of which the plane touches the earth at the spectator; the rational horizon is a great circle passing through the earth's centre, parallel to the sensible horizon, from which it is distant the semi-diameter of the earth, or eight thousand miles nearly.

Hörmisda, æ, m. a Persian, grandson of Nirsēus according to Eutrōpius (ix. 25). He was the elder brother of Šāpor, but set aside by the nobles in consequence of a threatening speech, which he had made to one of them during his father's lifetime. On obtaining his freedom, he fled to Constantinus, and afterwards commanded the Roman forces against the Persians. He had a son of the same name (Amm. Mar. xvi. 10 seq.).

Hörmius, i, m. a river of Boëtia, sacred to the muses (Stat. Th. vii. 284).

Hörmus, i, m. a freedman of Vespasianus, who, some maintain, suggested the idea of giving Crēmōna up to plunder, in which cruel action, Tacitus says, he did not degenerate from his former principles. In the following year, he was raised to the equestrian rank (Tac. Hist. iii. 12 seq.).

Hōros, i, m. a Babylonian, son of Amyn-tas (Prop. iv. 1. 77).

Hōrrātas, æ, m. a Macedonian of some distinction (Curt. ix. 7). See Dioxippus.

Hōrrē, es, f. a town of Mēsopotāmia (Amm. Mar. xviii. 10).

Hōrrēm, i, n. a city of the Mōlōssi in Epirus, which fell into the hands of the Romans almost without resistance in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Hōrta, æ, f. v. Hōrtānum, i, n. Orta, a town of Etruria, on the banks of Tiber, the Tevere, nearly opposite the mouth of Nār, the Nera. Adj. Hōrtinus, æ, um. Hortina classes, the boatmen or watermen of Horta. The meaning of Virgilinus has been much disputed; but since it would be difficult to produce an instance of classis being applied to land-forces, the poet most probably meant the boatmen, including fishermen, who were in the vicinity of that town, which still furnishes barges for Rome (Æn. vii. 716). Heyne explains Clāssis by forms, adding that Clāsses formed the division of the Roman state, an explanation both far-fetched and unpoetical.

M. Hōrtālus, M. Hōrtāli, m. grandson of the celebrated orator Hōrtēnsius, whom Augustus intreated to marry, to prevent the extinction of that illustrious family. In his poverty he applied to the senate, met in the palace, and addressed a speech to Tiberius, imploring his protection for his four children, to which the emperor made a plausible reply, showing the impropriety of granting his request. The senators applauded, and the emperor no sooner observed that he had gained his object than he proposed to give a small sum to each of the sons of Hōrtālus. From that period, the ruthless Tiberius looked with unconcern on the distress of Hōrtālus, and saw the family moulder into ruin. Tacitus writes M. Hōrtālus, but his full name must have been M. Hōrtēnsius Hōrtālus (Ann. ii. 38).

Q. Hōrtālus, Q. Hōrtāli, m. a friend of Cātullus, to whom he addresses one of his poems (lxxv). He is more commonly called Q. Hōrtēnsius. Some consider Hōrtālus a cognomen of the Hōrtēnsii.

L. Hōrtēnsius, L. Hōrtēnsii, m. a tribune of the people in 421 B. C., who commenced a prosecution against C. Sēmpronius Atratinus, consul of the former year, but his four colleagues prevailed upon him to desist, by their declaring that if Sēmpronius changed his apparel they would do the same along with him (Liv. iv. 42).—2. Was elected prætor, 172 B. C., and succeeded C. Lūcrētius Gāllus q. v., in the command of the Roman fleet in the Archipelago, on which station his conduct was marked with great cruelty and injustice towards the Abdēritæ and Chalcidēnses, of which they complained to the senate, who disapproved of his conduct, and forbade any but the master of the ship to lodge on shore (Liv. xliii. 4—9).

Q. Hōrtēnsius, Q. Hōrtēnsii, m. a Roman dictator, who brought back the plebeians, after they had seceded to Jāniculum, on account of a dispute with the patricians about debt. He died in that office (Liv. Ep. 11).—2. A Roman nobleman who, after the second defeat of M. Brūtus, killed himself. About forty of the nobility followed the example of that patriotic Roman (Liv. Ep. 124).

Q. Hōrtēnsius Ortālus, v. Hōrtālus, Q. Hōrtēnsii Ortāli, m. a Roman author, of whose writings a few fragments only remain. As an orator he stood next to Cicero, who was only eight years younger, Cicero having been born in 107 B. C., and Hōrtēnsius in 115 B. C. He held the office of prætor in 70 B. C., six years after he had been edile. Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Crēticus was his colleague in the consulship. Cicero has called one of his treatises Hōrtēnsius, in honour of the orator, who does not appear to have always acted towards him with that sincerity, steadiness, and candour, which the talents and patriotism of Cicero merited. That orator gives the following character of him: "He was distinguished by brilliancy of diction, elegance of style, and fertility of invention, the result of the greatest talents and unwearied exertion. He had recourse to no artificial mode to assist his memory. He arranged his discourse with acuteness, and seldom neglected any topic connected with the cause, whether calculated to strengthen his own arguments or to refute those of his opponent. His voice was harmonious and pleasing, his motion and gesture were more artificial than was requisite for the bar" (Clar. Orat. 88). The family of Hortensius sunk rapidly into poverty. His Annals are praised by nobody but Velleius Paterculus (ii. 16). See M. Hortensius. His son fell in the battle at Philippi (Vel. Pat. ii. 79). Hortensius Cörbio, his grandson, was a most infamous character (Val. Max. iii. 5). Adj. Hortensianus, a, um. Hortensiana eloquentia (Val. Max. viii. 3). Hortensiana ades (Suet. Aug. 72).—2. A poet whose verses appear to have been very reprehensible (Ov. Trist. ii. 441). Perhaps he is the same with the orator, and these verses may have been the thoughtless effusions of his younger days.

Höstilla, æ, f. Ostiglia, a village not far from Crémone (Tac. Hist. ii. 100).—2. A senate-house built by Tullus Höstilius (Liv. i. 30).

Quarta Höstilla, Quarte Höstilla, f. wife of C. Cälpurnius Piso, consul. She was condemned for putting her husband to death, on purpose to procure the consulship for her son by a former marriage (Liv. xl. 37). See Q. Faleius Flæcus.

Höstilianus. See Valeus.

A. Höstilius Cato, A. Höstili Cätönis, m. obtained the government of Sardinia on being elected prætor in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 36).—2. One of the ten commissioners appointed to distribute lands in Samnium and Apulia among the veteran soldiers of P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus in 203 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 4).—3. A lieutenant-general under L. Cornélius Scipio, who was tried on the same charge with his general, convicted and condemned to pay a fine of eighty pounds' weight of gold, and four hundred and three of silver, in 189 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 55). Adj. Höstilius, a, um. Höstilia cürta (Vel. Pat. ii. 12).

A. Höstilius Manceinus, A. Höstili Mäncini, m. was elected prætor at Rome in 182 B. C., and obtained the jurisdiction of the city. Ten years after, he was appointed consul, and Mæcöndia fell to his lot as his province. He appears to have conducted the war with little ability or success. Appius Claudius Céntho was sent by him into Illyrium, where he lost the greater part of his army; other unfavourable circumstances occurred, on which account he was ordered back to Rome to hold the elections, and all the senators were summoned to attend (Liv. xl. 35 seq.).

C. Höstilius, C. Höstili, m. one of the three ambassadors sent to Alexandria on purpose to end the dispute between the kings of Syria and Egypt, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 19).

C. Höstilius Cato, C. Höstili Cätönis, m. held the office of city prætor at Rome in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 36).

C. Höstilius Manceinus, C. Höstili Mäncini, m. elected consul at Rome with M. Æmilius Lepidus, in 189 B. C. In opposition to the omens he went to Spain, was driven out of his camp by the Nümantini, who, although only four thousand in number, defeated thirty thousand Romans, on which he made a disgraceful peace with that nation. From due respect to their own dignity, and the character of the Romans, the senate refused to ratify the treaty; and, to clear themselves of the imputation of breach of faith, delivered up C. Höstilius Manceinus to the Nümantini, but they would not receive him (Liv. Ep. 55 seq. Flor. ii. 18). Adj. Mäncinianus, a, um. Mänciniana deditiö (Flor. iii. 14).

C. Höstilius Tübulus, C. Höstili Tübüli, m. elected city prætor in 211 B. C., when he both vowed and celebrated the games of Apöllo. In an engagement with Hännibal at the distance only of four miles from Rome, he killed four thousand of his men, and took nine military standards. To this success against the noble Carthaginian, he was probably indebted for being continued in command next year (Liv. xxvii. 6 seq.).

L. Höstilius Cato, L. Höstili Cätönis, m. one of the ten commissioners appointed to distribute lands in Samnium and Apulia, among the veteran soldiers of Scipio Africanus, in 203 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 4).—2. An ambassador sent to Alexandria by the Roman senate (Liv. xxxviii. 55).

L. Höstilius Manceinus, L. Höstili Mäncini, m. despatched by Q. Fäbius Muximus to reconnoitre, when Hännibal was in Fälernus ager. His orders were to retreat before he came in sight of the enemy, instead of which, attacking some Numidians and rashly pursuing them near their camp, he and the chosen men of the party were cut off by Cäthälo, the commander-in-chief of Hännibal's cavalry (Liv. xxii. 15).

Höstus, i, m. a man in the Roman army cut off by Hännibal, at the siege of Sığuntum, Murviödro (Sil. Ital. i. 437).—2. A soldier in the Carthaginian army, who attacked the poet Ennius, and was killed by an arrow discharged at him by Apöllo. He was the son of Hämpeägöras q. v. (Sil. Ital. xii. 403—414). Lävius calls him Höstus q. v.

Höstus Höstilius, Hösti Höstili, m. the bravest warrior on the side of the Romans against the Sabines, in the engagement at the foot of the citadel. In the front of the army, by his spirit and intrepidity, he enabled the Romans to support the battle, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground; but, on his falling, they gave way, and were driven back to the old gate of the Piliatium. He was the grandfather of Tullus Höstilius, the third king of Rome (Liv. i. 12 seq.).

Hucumbra, orum, n. a village on the Tigris, between the towns Nischara and Nischanabis (Amm. Mar. xxv. 1).

Hünni, orum (Sing. Hünnus, i), m. a fierce and barbarous people, who, when first mentioned in history, which was after the middle of the fourth century, possessed the country adjoining to the Aläni, between Cäspium Märe, the Caspian Sea, and Pöntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. These two nations bore little resemblance to each other; for the Aläni were of great stature, had beautiful countenances, blue eyes, and yellow hair; the Hünwere little men, with small eyes, a flat nose, broad-shouldered, swarthy-tinted, and almost beardless. The latter continued, according to Prœcœpius, in the country already described, until about the year 376, when they took possession of the lands on the banks of Tanaïs, the Don, expelling the Alani who lived there, and afterwards the Ostrôgôthi, or Ostrogoths. Extending their conquests westward, they overran the whole country between the Don and the Danube, and made frequent inroads on the western empire, committing every act of barbarous hostility. Continuing to increase in numbers, and becoming daily more formidable, under Attila, about the year 440, they subdued all the northern countries from Pœrsia to the Rhine. This ferocious chieftain frightened the eastern emperor from Constantinople, subdued the provinces to the north of Greece, and invaded Gallia, desolating by fire and sword wherever he went. From this country, Ætius, the Roman general, and Theodric, king of the Goths, drove him with prodigious slaughter, and rendered him incapable of any formidable attack in future. On his death, which happened about the year 453, the Huns ceased to be an object of terror, and could not keep in subjection the nations which Attila had conquered. Their power remained considerable till the age of Charles the Great, with whom they entered into an alliance which they soon broke, and joined his enemies. To punish this act of perfidy, as soon as he had overcome the states with which he was at war, he marched against them with a powerful army, desolated their country, in which he remained for eight years, and nearly extirpated the whole nation. Since that period the Huns have not existed as a separate state, or distinct people. Their name is perpetuated in a part of Pannonia which they conquered, and has since, from them, been called Hungary. Claudianus gives a horrid description of this nation (iii. 321 seq.).

Hÿacinthus, h. m. son of Amÿclas, a Lacedæmonian, and Diômêdê, was the brother of Sÿnôrtês. Apôllodôrus makes him the son of Vênus and Adônîs, and states that Apôllo had a strong attachment to Hÿacinthus, whom he unintentionally deprived of life by a coit. That god, grieved at the death of his favourite, changed his blood into a flower of the same name, on which were inscribed the letters am, expressive of his grief. According to Pausanias, Vênus, Minêrva, and Diana exalted Hÿacinthus to heaven with his sister Pôlybea, who died a virgin. Ovidius makes Hÿacinthus a native of Spôrta, calls him Amÿclides, and states that Apôllo would have given him a place in the heavens if the Fates had permitted. The same poet attributes the death of Hÿacinthus to his running rashly for the coit which Apôllo had thrown, and which, having rebounded from the earth, struck the youth on the face, and stretched him lifeless on the ground. Cebâlides, ce. m. frequently denotes Hÿacinthus, but it must be understood expressive of his country, not of his parentage, for Cebâlus was his nephew, and grandson of Amÿclas. Patronymics have always a reference to parentage, and are never formed by anticipation, which would be the case in this instance were Cebâlides applied to Hÿacinthus, accounted a patronymic (Ov. Met. x. 162—219). Adj.

(Hÿacynthus, a. um. Hÿacynthia anabæ (sacra), an annual festival of the Lacedæmonians, celebrated, according to some, in spring; and, according to others, in summer (Ov. Met. x. 219).

Hÿalê, es, f. one of Diana's nymphs, whom Ovidius makes five in number (Ov. Met. iii. 171).

Hÿampêus, a. um. Hÿampêus vërter, one of the summits of Parnâsus, Liakura (Herod. viii. 39).

Hÿampôlis, is, f. Bogdana, a city of Phœcis, which had its name from the Hÿântes, whom Cædms conquered and compelled to flee from Thêbe, Theba. The neighbouring people called their town Ἰάντων πόλις, i. e. the city of the Hÿântes, which they gradually changed to Hÿampôlis. Stâtius places the situation of the town before his reader in three words, Hÿampôlis subnixæ acris scôpulo (Th. vii. 345). It was taken by the Roman consul, T. Quinctius Flâminius, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 18).

Hÿârôtes, is, m. the Biah, a river of India, one of the branches of Indus, the Sind. It is also written Hÿdrôtes (Curt. ix. 1).

Hÿas, æ, v. antis, m. a king of Bœotia, from whom both the inhabitants and the country derived their names. Inh. Hÿântes, um (Sing. Hÿas, antis), m. On being expelled by Cædms, they settled in Phœcis, and built a town from them called Hÿampôlis q. v. Hÿântis, idis, f. the territory of Bœotia, also applied to females or nouns feminine. Hÿântides, um, f. the Muses, from Hêlêcon, Zagara, being in Bœotia. Adj. Hÿântêus, v. Hÿântius, a. um. Hÿântêa âqua, Bœotian water, i. e. the waters of Agânippê, sacred to the Muses (Mart. xii. 3). Hÿântia agrî, Bœotian lands (Stat. Th. i. 183). Hÿântia sorôres, Bœotian sisters, i. e. the Muses (Stat. Syl. ii. 7. 8). Hÿântius jûcenis, a Bœotian youth, i. e. Actæon (Ov. Met. iii. 147).—2. Son of Atlas and Æthra, Hÿgêius says Plêiônê, who was killed in hunting. Of his death different accounts have been given. According to some, a lion or a bear tore him in pieces; according to others, he lost his life by the bite of a serpent. Hÿades, um (Sing. Hÿas, adis), f. the sisters of Hÿas, whose death they so violently lamented, that Jûpter, from compassion, changed them into a constellation in the forehead of the sign Taurus (Ov. Fast. vi. 712). Their name has been derived from their brother Hÿas; from their position between the horns of Taurus, resembling the Greek letter τ ; and from a Greek verb to rain; hence they are called Nimbæ, Pluvia, &c., Hÿades, and from their violent grief, Tristes. Euripides makes their number only three, Hÿgêius five (Phœsyla, Ambrosia, Corônîs, Eudôra, and Pôlyxo), and Phêrécÿdes seven. According to some, they were the nurses of Bæchus; Hÿgêius says of Jûpter, which accounts for their being called Dôdônides, from his temple at Dôdôna (Hÿg. 182 seq.).

Hÿbla, æ, f. a mountain of Sicily, the bees of which produced excellent honey. There were three cities of this name in Sicily, Hÿbla major, Paterni, of which the inhabitants were called Hÿblæi; Hÿbla minor, Ragusa, or, Callagiron, which was also known by the name Hêrea; and Hÿbla pârva, e. Hÿbla Mëgârciis, called Gâlcôitis, and Mëgâra, from Grecians migrating from Mëgâra to it.

Hence the inhabitants were called Gālētōe and Mēgārēnses. Bochartus derives Hýbla from Hibla, a tract of country, not from Hýblus, a king of Sicily, which is the derivation of the name according to Stēphānus. Adj. Hýbleus, a, um. Hýblae apes (Virg. B. i. 55). Hýblaeum grāna (Luc. Phar. ix. 291).

Hýbrās, a, m. an orator born at Mýlāsa (Val. Max. ix. 14).

Hýbristas, a, m. a Lacedæmonian pirate (Liv. xxxvii. 13).

Hýdārnēs, is, m. son of Hýdārnēs, who, in the army of Xērxēs, commanded the troops called the Immortals (Herod. vii. 83).

Hýdāspēs, is, m. a Trojan, whom Sācrātōr killed (Virg. Æn. x. 747).

Hýdāspēs, is, m. the Behat, Chelum, Ielum, or, Vidusta, one of the eastern branches of Indus, the Sind, but loses its name by joining Acēsīnēs, the Chunab, or, Chuna, before it falls into that river. The ancients believed it contained gems, hence gēmmifer Hýdāspēs (Sen. Med. 725).

Hýdra, a, f. a monstrous serpent at Lērna, Paleo Castro, which some maintain had many heads; in the opinion of Pausānias, only one (ii. 37). See Lērna.

Hýdrēla, a, f. a name added to Cāria, denoted a city within that district. Inh. Hýdrēlētē, arum, m. Adj. Hýdrēlātānus, a, um. Hýdrēlātānus ager (Liv. xxxvii. 56).

Hýdrīānus, i, m. supposed the Sagee, a river of Cārmanīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Hýēla. See Vēlia.

Hýdrūntum, i, n. v. Hýdrūs, ūntis, f. Otranto, a maritime town of Cālābria, in Italy (Liv. xxxvi. 21). Applānus, by mistake, writes Sigintum (Bel. Civ. 704).

Hýēmpsal. See Hīēmpsol.

Hýēia, a, f. the goddess of health, was the daughter of Escūlāpius (Mart. xi. 61). Plinius writes Hýgia (v. 126).

Hýlāctor, ōris, m. (Barker), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 224).

Hýlēi, orum, m. a Scythian nation, who fought against the Argonauts under their commander Sýēnēs. Hērōdōtus calls their country Hýlēa (iv. 18). Adj. Hýlēus, a, um. Hýlēa gens (Val. Flacc. vi. 74).

Hýlēus, i, m. a centaur, killed by Bāchus. Virgilius calls him nūbigēna and bimēmbri (G. ii. 457. Æn. viii. 294).

Hýlēus, i, m. (Ringwood), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 213).

Hýlas, a, m. a youth, son of Thīōdāmas, one of the Argonauts, whom Hērēclēs loved, and whom he sent to fetch water from a spring, where he was carried off by the nymph who presided over it, called Drýōpē by Valērius Flācus (iii. 529), on account of his remarkable beauty (Virg. B. vi. 43). Hērēclēs lamented his death, and the Argonauts called out long for him in vain, hence it is said that it was the custom annually to call aloud for Hýlas. The fiction of his being carried away by the nymph, is explained by the circumstance of his having been drowned in the fountain. Thēōcritus has written a beautiful pastoral on this unfortunate youth (Idyl. xlii). His name became a common appellation with poets for a beautiful boy (Mart. iii. 19 gē).—2. An actor of pantomime, whom, on a complaint by the prætor, Augūstus caused to be whipped in his own house, when all who chose were at liberty to witness the punishment (Suet. Aug. 45).

Hýlax, āctis, m. the name of a dog (Virg. B. viii. 107).

Hýlē, es, f. a town of Bēōtīa, mentioned by Hōmērus, among others of that district (Il. ii. 500). Some authors make it the name of a tract, which they support by Strābo and Stāsius. Eurýmēdon commanded the inhabitants of Hýlē in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 267).—2. A town of Cýprus.

Hýlēs, a, m. a centaur, killed by Pēlēus, in the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the marriage of Pīrithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 378).

Hýlēus, ōs, m. one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 312).—2. A centaur, of prodigious strength and ferocity, whom Stāsius calls dūplex, referring to his double form, that of a man and of a horse (Th. iv. 140).

Hýlinus, mēlius, Ylinus, i, m. a Scythian, who, with Scōlōpitus, having been banished from their own country, carried along with them a great number of the youth, and settled near the river Thērmōdon, the Termeh (Just. ii. 4).

Hýllus, i, m. a Trojan, killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 535).—2. Son of Hērēclēs and Dēiānira, who married Iōlē (Ov. Met. ix. 279. Stat. Th. viii. 507).

Hýllus, i, m. "fishy," a river, between Thýātira and Sārdes (Hom. Il. xx. 392), called also Phrýgius. On its banks Antiochus was defeated by the Romans, under L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, in 192 B. C.

Hýlēnōmē, es, f. the most comely, neat, and captivating of all the female centaurs. She was the wife of Cýllārus, on whom she doated with uncommon fondness, and when he had fallen in the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the marriage of Pīrithōus, she gave herself a mortal wound with the same weapon, which, from an unknown hand, had transfixed her husband (Ov. Met. xii. 405 seq.).

Hýlus, i, m. a man, to whom Mārtiālls writes several immoral epigrams (ii. 51 gē).

Hýmēn, inis, et, Hýmēneus, i, m. the god of marriage, the son of Bāchus and Vēnus, or, of Apōllo, and one of the Muses. He was represented as holding a torch in the one hand and a purple vest in the other. On his head he wore a crown of flowers, either roses or marjoram. Unless Hýmēn attended at the celebration of a marriage, the ancients believed the parties would be miserable during the remainder of their lives.

Hýmētus, i, m. Trelo-couni, a mountain of Attica, famous for bees, and the excellence of the honey which they produced, from the wild flowers with which it abounded; hence dūleis Hýmētus (Juv. Sat. xiii. 185). Thēseus Hýmētus, from Thēseus, being an Athenian, and Hýmētus, a mountain of Attica (Mart. xiii. 104). Adj. Hýmētus, a, um. Hýmētia trābes, Hymettian chapiters, or, entablatures. Hōrātiū means marble of Hýmētus, Trelo-couni, which was of great value, not timber, which is generally the meaning of the word trābes, since it does not appear that that mountain was ever famous for wood (Od. ii. 18. 3); and Plinius uses trābes, evidently meaning stone. Hýmētia mēlla (Hor. Sat. ii. 2. 15). Hýmētium mār-mor (Liv. xxxi. 26). Hýmētia cōllumæ, pillars of Hymettian marble (Val. Max. ix. 1).

Hypacris, is, m. a river of Scythia, rising from a lake, and running through the country of the wandering Scythians, falls into the sea near the town Carcinitis, supposed to have been on the gulf of Muscovia (Herod. iv. 55).

Hypæpe, arum, f. Berki, a town of Lydia, south of Sardes, Sart. Inh. Hypæpēni, orum (Sing. Hypæpēnus, i.), m. The women were said to be uncommonly beautiful (Steph.).

Hypānis, is, m. a Trojan, killed by his companions, in consequence of his having assumed the Grecian arms when Troy was in flames (Virg. Æn. ii. 423).—2. A Colchian commander, who fought on the side of the Argonauts, against the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 252).—3. A man of no distinction, killed in the Theban war, by Hamon (Stat. Th. viii. 491).

Hypānis, is, m. the Bog, a river of Scythia, according to Ovidius, but more properly of Sarmatia, which joins Borysthēnes, the Dniester. Virgilius makes the channel of this river rocky. It is probably the Hypacris of Pömpönius Mela, which, Plinius says, had its source among the Auchēta (li. 471).—2. A river, which flows through the country of the Nomādes and Hylei, and falls into the lake Būges, by an artificial channel, and, by a natural channel, into Corētus (Plin. i. 469).—3. The Kuban, a river of Sarmatia, which, running westward, divides into several streams, some of which fall into Pālūs Mæotis, the Sea of Asoph, and others into Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea.—4. A river of India, to which Pröpertius is supposed to refer (l. 12. 4). Strophianus mentions a city of this name, which does not occur in any other author.

Hypāsis, e. Hypāsīs, is, m. the Caül, a branch of Indus, the Sind (Curt. ix. 1).

Hypāta, e. f. Castritza, a town of Thessaly, to which Antiöchus, king of Syria, sent a garrison of two thousand men, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 16). Inh. Hypātæi, orum, m. Eighty Hypātæi of distinction, of the party of Pröxenus, having been banished, were invited to return, and Eupölēmus pledged the faith of the public for their safety. They were, however, no sooner within the gates, than they were murdered, 176 B. C. (Liv. xli. 25). Adj. Hypātēnsis, is, e. Hypātēnsis ager, the territory of Hypāta, ravaged by Mānius Acilius Glābrio, the Roman consul, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 14—16).

Hypātius, i. m. the colleague of Eusēbius in the consulship (Amm. Mar. xviii. 1). This historian mentions another of the same name, the grandson of Anästāsius.

Hypēnor, ōris, m. a Trojan prince killed by Dömōdes, at Trōja (Hom. Il. v. 144).

Hypērbōrēi, orum, m. a people fabled by the ancients to live beyond the north wind, at the very extremity of the world. From the description of Plinius, their country must have been at the north pole, since they had only one day and one night in the year. That both the Hypērbōrēi and their country existed only in the imagination of the writers, by whom they are mentioned, requires no proof, since it has baffled the utmost efforts of modern ingenuity and enterprize, to reach the poles, or even to discover whether their vicinity is land or water. Besides, the people who wrote of the Hypērbōrēi, knew nothing of northern Europe beyond the 55th of latitude, and still less did their knowledge of Asia extend in that direction. Adj. Hypērbōrēus, a. um. Hypērbōrēa ura (Stat. Th. i. 693). Hypērbōrēa nix (Stat. Th. v. 590).

Hypērenor, ōris, m. a man in the army of Pölýnices, killed by Hamon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 493).—2. A Trojan prince killed by Mēnēläus before his native city. He was the brother of Euphōrbus (Hom. Il. xiv. 516 seq.).

Hypērēsia, e. f. a city of Achāia (Hom. Il. ii. 573), afterwards called Ægira (Paus. vii. 26).

Hypēria, e. Hypērēa, e. f. a fountain of Thēssālia, Thessaly, near the city Phēra (Plin. i. 423. Hom. Il. ii. 734).—2. Another in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morca (Val. Flacc. iv. 375).—3. A town of Sicily, afterwards called Cāmārīna, from which Nausithōus carried the Phæaces to Schēria (Hom. Od. vi. 4).

Hypērīdes, is, m. an orator who flourished at Athens in the time of Dēmōsthēnes. Quatilhānus allows him the praise of discernment and pleasantness, but calculated to excel in causes only of little importance (x. l. 77. Tac. Or. 12. Just. xiii. 5).

Hypērion, ōnis, m. a son of Cælus and Tērra, and brother of Cæus, Crīus, Iapētus and Sātūrnus, who was the youngest of the sons of Cælus. According to Hēsiodus, he married Thia, by whom he had Sol, Lūna, and Aurōra. Hence his name is frequently used to denote the sun. Hōmērus usually writes Hēlius Hypērion (Od. xii. 133). Hypērionides, e. m. a son or descendant of Sol; Æetes (Val. Flacc. v. 472). Adj. Hypērionāus, a. um. Hypērionius Phæthos (Stat. Th. xii. 413). Hypērionāus lanqas, the sun (Sil. Ital. xv. 214).

Hypērmonēstra, e. f. Hypērmonēstrē, e. f. eldest daughter of Dānāus, whom her father married to Lyncēus, one of the sons of her uncle Ægyptus q. v. Dānāus pretended reconciliation with his brother, and proposed that his fifty daughters should be given in marriage to the fifty sons of Ægyptus, who, acceding to the proposal, lost all his sons in one night except Lyncēus. Dānāus, in perfidious cruelty, ordered his daughters to murder their husbands on the first night of their marriage, and provided them with instruments for that purpose. Hypērmonēstra, from tenderness of heart and conjugal affection, disregarded her father's cruel mandate, and kept her hands unstained with her husband's blood, who, after her father's death, became king of Argos. By him, Hypērmonēstra had one son, Abas. Hōrātius praises Hypērmonēstra for discovering her father's treachery, and thus saving her husband's life (Od. iii. 11. 33—52).

Hypērōchus, i. m. a noble Greek, the father of Itymōnēus, slain by Nestor. Hypērōchides, e. m. Itymōnēus (Hom. Il. xi. 672).—2. A man in the Trojan army, who fell by the hand of Ulysses at the same time with Hippodāmus (Hom. Il. xi. 335).

Hypētion, ōnis, m. a Colchian commander, who joined the Argonauts against the Scythians, and in that war lost his life by the hand of Cōlāxes (Val. Flacc. vi. 637).

Hypōplācus, i. f. a town in the territory of Asiatic Thēbē, which Hōmērus calls woody. Andrōmāchē was the daughter of Eētōn, king of this town. Adj. Hypōplā-ēlus, a, um. Hypōplācia Thēbē (Hom. II. vi. 397).

Hypsa, a, m. the Belici, one of the largest rivers in the western part of Sicily, Sicily, which running southward falls into the Mediterranean Sea, near Selinus (Plin. i. 345).—2. The Drago, another river of Sicily, near Agrigentum, Girgenti.

Hypsa, a, f. a woman of quality, said to have been of the Plotian family. Caelor Hypsa, blinder than Hypsa, became a proverb, but it is unknown whether it proceeded from her having very bad eyes, or from her excessive fondness for an ill-looking man, that she was insensible of his disagreeable and disgusting countenance (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 91).

Hypseus, i, m. a Roman praetor whose camp the slaves carried in the Servile war (Flor. iii. 19).

Hypenor, ōris, m. son of Dolopion, slain by Eurypylus in the Trojan war (Hom. II. v. 76 seq.).—2. Son of Hippasus, killed by Dēiphobus, a son of Priamus, in the war between the Trojans and Greeks (Hom. II. xiii. 411).

Hypseus, ōs, m. a son of the river Asopus, was one of the warriors at the siege of Thēbae, Theba, and fought in the army of Etēocles. He was of prodigious size, shading the four horses which drew his chariot. To great strength he added great courage, and commanded the troops from Itōnē, Arnē, Graea, Midē, Plātea, Pēteon, Euripus and Anthēdon. After supplicating his father, he aimed a javelin at Amphiarāus; but Apōllo turned it aside, so that it killed Hērēs the charioteer of that prophet, on which Apōllo assumed the reins (Stat. Th. vii. 310 seq.).—2. A man who killed Protēnor, and was himself killed by Lyncides, at the marriage of Perseus (Ov. Met. v. 98).—3. A king of Thessaly, son of Peneus, and father of Cyrene (Just. xiii. 7. Diod. Sic. iv. 81).

Hypades, is, m. a friend of Mēnēdēmus who fell in battle with Spitamēnes, and, refusing to survive him, he rushed into the thick of the enemy and was slain (Curt. vii. 7).

Hypsipylē, es, f. daughter of Thōas and Nērinē, was queen of Lēmnos. The women of that island having slighted Vēnus by neglecting her rites, the enraged goddess rendered them disgusting to their husbands by the offensiveness of their breath, on which they deserted them, and attached themselves to Thracian captives. In revenge, the wives put their fathers and husbands to death, but the queen saved her father. The Argonauts landed at Lēmnos on their way to Cōlchis, and Hypsipylē by Iāson became the mother of Evēnus and Nēbrōphōnos (Dēiphylus, Hyg.). For her filial affection in preserving her father's life, the Lemnian women, on coming to the knowledge of the fact, killed him, sold her, and she became a servant in the house of Lycurgus, king of Nēmēa. Hygēnus says that she fled from Lēmnos, and was taken by pirates who carried her to Thēbas, Theba, and sold her to king Lycus. He adds that she kept the king's son, whose name was Archēmōrus or Ophēltes, that having placed him on very high parsley (because an oracle forbade his being laid on the ground until he was able to walk), whilst she brought water to the seven commanders who went against Thēbas, Theba, a serpent devoured him, which Adrastus and his companions killed. They prevailed on Lycus to forgive Hypsipylē, and instituted funeral games in honour of the boy, which were celebrated every fifth year. At these exhibitions the victors received a chaplet of parsley. Statius says she conducted the Argive army to the river Lāngia (Th. iv. 775). To her history Propertius alludes (i. 15. 18), and Persius (Sat. i. 34). Adj. Hypsipylēus, a, um. Hypsipylēa tellūs, Lēmnos (Ov. Fast. iii. 82).

Hypsista, arum, f. one of the seven gates of Thēbas, Theba, of which Eurymēdon had the command, and which Pōlyneices attacked, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 356).

Hypsō, ūs, f. the mother of Amphion and Deucalion two of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 367).

Hyrēania, v. Hircania, a, f. a country of Asia, on the southeast of the Caspian Sea. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to ascertain the boundaries of this country. According to Plinius, only a small part of the coast of the Caspian Sea was in the possession of the Hyrēani, and part only of that body of water was called by their name. Tācitus informs us, that there were Macedonians in Hyrēania; but the cause and date of their settlement are unknown (Ann. ii. 47). The capital of this country was of the same name, now Corcan, or Jorjan. Hyrēania vāstia silvis (Luc. Phar. iii. 268). Inh. Hyrēani, orum (Sing. Hyrēanus, i), m. Adj. Hyrēanus, et, Hyrēanius, a, um. Hyrēanum mārē, the Caspian Sea (Prop. ii. 30. 20). Hyrēana silva (Luc. Phar. viii. 343). Hyrēana opes, the power, or empire of the Hyrēani (Claud. vii. 35). Hyrēanum mārē, the Caspian Sea (Plin. i. 674).—2. Marmora, a town of Lydia. Adj. Hyrēanus, a, um. Hyrēanus cāmpus (Lāv. xxxvii. 38).

Hyrēanus, i, m. a man whom Cn. Pōmpeius Magnus made king of Jūdæa (Flor. iii. 5).

Hyrēis, is, m. a river of Scythia, one of the branches of Tānāis, the Don (Herod. iv. 57).

Hyrīa, a, f. a town of Italy, on the bay of Tārentum (Herod. vii. 170).

Hyrīē, es, f. the mother of Cycnus by Apōllo, who, not knowing that the life of her son had been preserved by transformation into a swan, wholly dissolved into tears, and formed a lake which retained her name (Ov. Met. vii. 371).

Hyrīeus, ōs, m. the reputed father of Orion. Hygēnus makes him king of Thracēa, and calls him Byrseus, but this is unquestionably a false reading, and should be Hyrīeus (195). Having hospitably entertained Jupiter, Nēptūnus and Mercūrius, they, in return for his kindness, promised to give him whatever he should ask, and, having neither son nor daughter, he wished for children. See Orion. Adj. Hyrīeus, a, um. Hyrīēa prōles, Orion (Ov. Fast. vi. 719).

Hyrītius, i, m. son of Gyrtius, who commanded the Mysi, was killed by Ajāx Telāmōnius at Troy. Gyrtiades, a, m. Hyrītius (Hom. II. xiv. 511).

Hysie, arum, f. a town of Boeōtia (Herod. vi. 108).—2. A village of Attica (Herod. v. 74).

Hystäspes, is, m. a Persian nobleman, one of the Achæmënides, son of Arsämes, and father of Därius, who was his eldest son. He held the office of prefect, or governor, among the Persians, which shows the high rank he enjoyed among his countrymen, although it is probable that he stands indebted solely to his son for transmitting his name to future ages (Cor. Nep. Reg. 1).

Iacchus, i, m. a name of Bæchus, often used to signify wine. Some mythologists distinguish between these two, and make Iacchus, the son of Ceres. Hence his worship formed a part of the Eleusinian mysteries.

Jacetani, orum, m. a people of Hispania, Spain, at the foot of Pyrenæi Mōtes, the Pyrenees, near the middle of that chain of mountains (Cæs. B. C. i. 60).

Jäder, ëri, m. a river of Dalmatia, which flows into Adriaticum märe, the Gulf of Venice, near Salōne (Luc. Phar. iv. 405).

Jädëra, æ, f. Lara, a maritime town of Dalmatia, which Plinius and Ptolémæus call a colony. It most probably took its name from the river Jäder. In modern times the town is considerable, and noted for an excellent liquor made there, consisting of the juice of different herbs, and known by the name of Marasquin de Zara. Inh. Jädërtini, orum, m.

Jädmon, önis, m. a Samian, heir of Æsöpus (Herod. ii. 134).

Jæra, æ, f. one of the Nereids, or daughters of Nereüs, a sea god (Hom. II. xviii. 42).

Jälmenus, i, m. a son of Märs and Astyöchë, in the Greek army at Troy (Hom. II. ii. 512; ix. 82). See Altimënus.

Jälýsus, i, m. son of Cêrcäphus and grandson of Sol, who built in the island Rhodus, Rhodes, a town to which he gave his own name; afterwards called Rhodus (Plin. i. 616). On his picture Protögenes spent seven years (Gel. xv. 31). Adj. Jälýsius, a, um, of Rhodes, Rhodian. Jälýsi Telchines (Ov. Met. vii. 365).

Jämënas, i, m. a warrior in the Trojan army, attacked and killed by Lëöntëus, one of the Lápithæ. In this onset, Lëöntëus had the aid of Pölýpætës of the same nation (Hom. II. xii. 139 seq.).

Jämphoräna, æ, f. the capital and citadel of Mædica, which Philippus, king of Mæcëdönia, besieged, and to whom it surrendered in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 25).

Jänassa, æ, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. II. xviii. 47). The poet has here given the names of 33 of these nymphs.

Jänëýrus, i, m. a king of Scythia, on whom Därius made war with seven hundred thousand men, because he had been refused his daughter in marriage. After losing eighty thousand men, Därius fled from Scythia (Just. ii. 5).

Jänicülum, i, n. a fort or citadel, built by Jänus, whence its name. It stood on a mountain on the other side of the Tevere from Rome, which was afterwards known by this name, now Monte Gianicolo, and joined to the city by Ancus Märcius. Plinius informs us that it was anciently called Antipölis, because it was opposite to the citadel, or town, built by Sätürnus, and from him called Sätürnä, afterwards known by the name of Cäpitölünus mōns from Cäpitölüm. Ancus built a wooden bridge over the Tevere (Sublucius pōns), which was the first that was erected over that river; of it some vestiges still remain. Of this mountain, now often called Monte Aureo, from the yellow colour of the gravel or sand of which its surface is composed, a considerable part is inhabited in modern times. Water from the lake Bracciano, descending along the steep surface of this mountain, puts in motion a number of mills erected on its brow.

Jänira, æ, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. II. xviii. 47).

Jänthë, es, f. a virgin of Crëta, Cædäa, daughter of Telëstes, distinguished for her beauty, and betrothed to Iphis, whom she supposed to be a man, from wearing that dress. On discovering that Iphis was of her own sex, she was instantly overwhelmed with grief, which Isis soon removed, by changing Iphis into a man, at the request both of Iphis himself and the mother of that youth (Ov. Met. ix. 714 seq.).

Jänthis, idis, f. the wife of Stëlla. This is a Greek name equivalent to the Latin Violantilla (Mart. vi. 21).

Jänus, i, m. a son of Apöllo and Crëüsa, daughter of Erëctheüs, king of Athens. She was afterwards married to Xipheüs, who, by order of the oracle of Dëlphi, Castri, adopted Jänus as his son, for Crëüsa bare him no children. Not satisfied with his paternal kingdom, he sailed with a great fleet to Itälia, Italy, and took possession of a hill, on which he built a town called from his name Jänicülum, Monte Gianicolo. Virgil calls it a fort or citadel, and, at first, it is probable personal security would require it to be well fortified. If not the most ancient king of Italy, he certainly ranks among the first mentioned in history. His name is said to have been derived from presiding over gates, hence he is called claviger dëus. The invention of folding doors, locks, and keys, has been ascribed to him. According to Aurëlius Victor, he introduced the worship of the gods, and religious observances only, whilst Sätürnus taught mankind agriculture, checked their predatory habits, and civilized their manners (Or. 3). In general, he was represented with two faces (bifrons), for which different reasons have been assigned. Of these the most probable is, that a porter has the double duty of watching both who enters, and who goes out of the house. Sometimes the statues of Jänus had four faces, which were supposed to represent the four seasons of the year. After his death, he was worshipped as a god, in consequence of the equity of his reign, and the benefits which he had conferred on his subjects. Numa Pömpilius built a temple to him at the foot of Argiletum, which was to be open in time of war, and shut in time of peace. The latter only took place three times during the period of seven hundred years after its erection, the first under Numa, the second at the end of the first Punic war, and the third after the battle of Actium. The first Roman coin had the double head of Jānus on the one side, and on the other a ship, in remembrance of the arrival of Sātūrnus by sea at Tiber, the Tevere. From him the first month of the year was called Jānūārius. Macrobius gives him different names, Jānus Gēminus, Jānus Quirinus, Jānus Pātūleius, and Jānus Clausius, the last two from the doors of his temple being open in war, and shut in peace. He adds, that in the Sabine war the enemy rushed in at Pōrta Jānālīs, and that a number rushed from the temple of Jānus who dispersed the enemy, hence the Romans resolved that his temple should be open during war, as if that god had gone forth for the protection of the city. Pacīficus Jānus (Mart. viii. 66). Gēminus Jānus (Flor. iv. 12). Vacūum duellis Jānum Quirīnum clausit, he (Augustus) hath shut Jānus Quirinus free from war, i. e. shut the temple of Jānus, when the Romans were free from war, viz., after the battle of Actium. The common reading in Hōrātius is Jānum Quirīnū, which conveys the idea of Rōmūlus being the founder of that temple, contrary to history (Od. iv. 15. 9). Hōrātius calls him Pater Mātūtinus for reasons assigned in the same satire (il. 6. 20). Jānigēna, w. e. g. a descendant of Jānus; Cānēs, a daughter of Jānus (Ov. Met. xiv. 381). Adj. Jānālīs, is, e. Jānālīs virga (Ov. Fast. vi. 165).

Iāones, um, m. a people of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. Some suppose the Athenians are called Iāones, which was a general name among foreign nations for the Greeks. It is sometimes written Iāones.

Iāpētidēs, w. m. a musician who was killed at the nuptials of Pērsēs, by Pētālūs (Ov. Met. v. 111 seq.).

Iāpētus, i, m. the son of Cēlus and Tērra, married Asia (Clymēnē, Hes. Th. 507), by whom he had four sons, Atlas, Epimēthēus, Mēnētus, and Prōmēthēus. Virgilius mentions the earth as his mother, without naming his father, and states that he was produced at the same time with Cēus and Tīphōeus (G. i. 279). Satus Iāpēto, the son of Iāpētus, i. e. Prōmēthēus (Ov. Met. i. 82). Audar q̄nus Iāpēti, the daring son of Iāpētus, i. e. Prōmēthēus (Hor. Od. i. 3. 27). Iāpētōnides, w. m. a son of Iāpētus; Atlas (Ov. Met. iv. 631). Iāpētōnīdēs, arum, m. Prōmēthēus and Epimēthēus (Claud. xx. 491).

Iāpis, idis, m. son of Iāsīs. He was, of mortals, the greatest favourite of Apōllo, who bestowed on him a knowledge of augury, of the lyre, and shooting with the bow. From a wish to extend his father's life, however, he preferred skill in the use of herbs, and in the practice of medicine. He cured Aēnēs of the wound which he received from an unknown hand, in which he appears to have had the assistance of Vēnus. Iāsides, w. m. a patronymic of Iāpis (Virg. Aen. xii. 391 seq.).

Iāpūdia, w. f. a district on the east coast of Mārē Hadrīaticum, the Gulf of Venice, towards the top of that gulf. According to Plīnius, Tēdānium, which Ptolēmeus calls Tēdānīs, the Zermagna, was the boundary of Iāpūdia. Inh. Iāpūdes, um, m. Junc-taque (regio) Iāpūdm (Plin. i. 373).

Iāpūgia, w. f. a district in the southeast extremity of Itālia, Italy, called also Apūlia, or, Calābria. The name is derived from Iāpūx, a son of Dādālus, who settled there. Inh. Iāpūges, um (Sing. Iāpūx, ūgis), m. Adj. Iāpūx, ūx, ūx, gen. Igis, et, Iāpūgius, a, um. Iāpūx Daunus (Ov. Met. xiv. 458). Prater Iāpūga (vēntum), except the Iapygian or Apulian wind, i. e. the wind blowing from that part of Italy to those sailing from Brūndisium, Brindisi, to Greece, by which Hōrātius probably meant the point nearly north-west (Od. i. 3. 4). Iāpūx equus (Virg. Aen. xi. 678). Iāpūx cāmpus (Sil. Ital. xi. 1). Iāpūgium promōntōrium, e. Aera Iāpūgia, Cape Leuca (Plin. i. 353, 355).

Iāpūx, ūgis, m. a man severely wounded by Thēsēs, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. xii. 746).

Iāpūx, ūgis, m. a river of Iāpūgia.

Iārbas, w. m. a son of Jūpiter, and the nymph Gārāmāntis, king of the Maxdāni, who demanded Elissa q. v. in marriage. This suit, urged by all the nobles of the Carthaginian queen, drove her to the desperate resolution of terminating her life on a funeral pile, which she erected on pretence of appeasing her husband's Mānes (Just. xviii. 6). Zēlōtūpus Iārbas, from his jealousy of Elissa's preferring Aēnēs to him (Juv. Sat. v. 45). Gētūlus Iārbas (Ov. Ep. Her. vii. 125).—2. One of the Gārāmāntes, killed by Mūrrus at the siege of Sāgūntum (Sil. Ital. i. 417).

Iārbitas, w. m. a man who attempted to imitate Tīmāgēnes, in which he failed, and burst from excessive vexation. The Scholiast on Hōrātius says he was a Moor, and that his real name was Cōdrus (Epist. i. 19. 15).

Iārdānus, i, m. the father of Omphālē, queen of Lydia. Iārdānis, idis, f. a patronymic of Omphālē from her father (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 103).—2. A man whose servant by Hērclēs became the mother of the Hērāclidēs (Herod. i. 7).

Iārdānus, i, m. a river of Elis in Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. Phēia, Shaphidius, stood on a promontory at the mouth of this stream (Hom. Il. vii. 135).—2. A river of Crēta, Candia, on the banks of which the Cŷdōnēs lived. Their town, Cŷdon, was not far from this stream (Hom. Od. iii. 292).

Iāsūs, i, v. Iāsion, ōnis, m. son of Cōrītus, king of Tuscany, and Elēctra; but Hŷginus and Apōllōdōrus make him the son of Jūpiter and Elēctra. According to the first of these accounts, Dārdānus was only his maternal brother, being the son of Elēctra; but Jūpiter was his father. Hence the cause assigned for the dispute between the two brothers for the sovereignty. Cēres formed an attachment to Iāsūs, by whom she became the mother of Plūtus, to which Ovidius alludes (Met. ix. 422); but Apōllōdōrus, Strābo, and Cōnon say, he was struck dead by lightning, because he attempted to insult that goddess. The writers of antiquity have given different and contradictory statements respecting Iāsūs and Dārdānus. Iāsīs, idis, f. a patronymic of Atālānta, daughter of Iāsūs, who is sometimes called Arcādīa, to distinguish her from Atālānta, daughter of Schenēus, who is called Argītea, v. Bacōica. Like the other Atālānta, she excelled in rowning (Prop. i. 1. 10).—2. A king of Argos (Stat. Th. ii. 219). Iásides, a, m. a patronymic of Adrástus, a descendant of Iásius (Stat. Th. i. 541), or from being an Argive, the sense in which the word is applied to Phædimus (Th. viii. 488). Iásis, idis, f. of Argos, applied to females or nouns feminine (Stat. Th. ii. 254). Adj. Iásius, a, um. Iasia virgo, 10 (Val. Flacc. iv. 353). This is contrary to the commonly received opinion, which is, that she was the daughter of Inachus, and acknowledged by this poet immediately before, and soon after, the line above quoted; therefore the word must be understood as referring to her country, not to her parentage.

Iáson, onis, m. a famous hero of antiquity, was the son of Æson, king of Iólcos, a town of Magnésia, a district of Thessalia, Thessaly, on Sinus Pagæus, the Gulf of Volo, and Aleimédē. Pélías, a son of Týro, Æson's mother, by Néptúnus, banished him from that city, and mounted the throne. But no sooner had Iáson finished his education under the Centaur Chiron, than he went boldly to the usurper and demanded the kingdom. As Pélías was conscious both of the injustice of his cause, and disaffection of his subjects, he durst not appeal to arms; but to accomplish his ruin, advised the warlike youth to undertake an expedition against Æetes, king of Colchis, who had murdered their relation Phryxus, and, on his return, promised to resign to him the crown. To this proposal Iáson readily agreed, and undertook that voyage to obtain the golden fleece, so celebrated in ancient history, under the name of the ARGONAUTIC EXPEDITION. After a series of wonderful adventures, he arrived at Colchis, where, through the influence of Chalcidopē, obtained by the solicitation of her son Argus, and by the assistance of Médēa, whom he promised to marry, he fulfilled the hard terms on which he was to accomplish the object of his voyage. By her aid and direction, he was enabled to tame the bulls with horns and feet of brass, which breathed nothing but fire, and to plough with them the field of Mars; to kill a huge serpent, and sow its teeth, which sprang up armed men (hence called sua segeti tellure creatis hostibus, Ov. Met. vii. 30; terrigēnas, Ov. Met. vii. 36), who, on his throwing a stone among them, fell by mutual wounds; to destroy a terrible dragon, which watched continually at the foot of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended; and then to carry off the prize in the presence of all the Colchians, who were equally confounded at his intrepidity and success. According to Apollónius Rhódus, Æetes himself had yoked the bulls, the workmanship of Vúlcānus, ploughed the field, sowed the serpent's teeth, and killed the men which sprang from them in complete armour, and this proposal appears to have originated as much in a desire to prove the bravery of the Argonautic commander, as to procure his death. He returned to Thessaly in great triumph, but his future life was rendered miserable by his infidelity, and the barbarous mode of revenge adopted by Médēa q. v. The time and manner of his death are unknown. Iáson is, from his father, called Æsonides, Æsona nātus, and Heros Æsonus. Iásontides, arum, m. the sons of Iáson; Thōas and Eunōos (Stat.

Th. vi. 340). Adj. Iásontius, a, um. Iásonium promontorium, Jasoua, or, Yasoua, a promontory on the Black Sea, east of the river Sidēna. Iásontius rēmis (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 1. 1).—2. A king of Phēra, Beldetia, in Thessalia, Thessaly, and the most powerful monarch of that period, who came to Athens on purpose to defend Timothēus, then on his trial. The respect paid by Iáson to Timothēus q. v. may be appreciated by considering that the monarch who thought himself insecure in his own country without guards, came to Athens unprotected, risking his life for the honour of his friend (Cor. Nep. Timoth. 4).—3. A Thessalian monarch, who was killed by his own men at the time he was preparing to make war on the king of Persia (Val. Max. ix. 10). See Taxillus.

Iásontion, i, n. a city of Margiāna (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).—2. Cope Jasoua, in Pontus. Iásontius, i, m. a mountain in Média (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Jāssus, i, f. Assem-Kalasi, a town of Cāria, at the top of a gulf to which it gave name (Liv. xxxii. 33). Inh. Jāssii, orum (Strab. 942), et, Jāssenses, ium, m. (Liv. xxxvii. 17). Adj. Jāssius, a, um. Jāssius Sinus, the gulf of Assem-Kalasi (Pom. Mel. i. 16).

Iāsus, i, m. the father of Pálinūrus, who is hence called Iāsides (Virg. Æn. v. 843).—2. Son of Sphēlus, commanded the Athenians, and fell by the hand of Ænēas (Hom. Il. xv. 332).—3. A king of Cýprus, and father of Dmētor. Iāsides, a, m. Dmētor (Hom. Od. xvii. 443).

Iāxāmāte, arum, m. a people who lived on Pálus Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Iāxartes, is, m. a man of Colchis, at the court of Æetes (Val. Flacc. v. 597).

Iāxartes, is, m. the Sir, or, Shion, a river of Sōgdiana, Al-Sogd. In Ammianus Marcellinus it is improperly written Araxartes (xxiii. 6). Iāxartæ, arum, m. (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Iāzyges, um (Sing. Iāzyx, ygis, m. a people who lived on the northwest coast of Pálus Mæotis, the Sea of Azoph (Ov. Trist. ii. 191). They are generally written Iāzyges Sārmāte. Their manner of fighting indicates a rude and uncivilized people (Tac. Ann. xii. 29).—2. Another tribe of the same name, inhabited the banks of Týras, the Dniester, who, from their situation with respect to this river and the Gēte, were called Týrigēte.—3. A third tribe lived on Tribiscus, the Teisee, a northern branch of the Danube, and were called Iāzyges Mētānāste. Vālerius Flaccus describes them on the approach of old age, giving themselves up to their children to be killed (vi. 122).

Ibēra, a, f. a town of Spain, on Ibērus, the Ebro, from which it has its name (Liv. xxiii. 28).

Ibēria, a, f. a country of Asia, which now forms part of western Georgia. Colchis bounded it on the west, and Albānia on the east. Inh. Ibēri, orum, et, Ibēres, um (Sing. Iber, ēris, Val. Flacc. v. 167), m. a colony of whom, according to Plīnius, on the authority of M. Vārro, migrated into Spain (i. 290). Dīonýsius maintains an opposite opinion, that the Ibēri were originally a people of Spain, who removed to the country betwixt the Caspian and Black Sea, and engaged in war with the Hýrcāni. Others assert, that neither of these nations was descended from the other, and Strābo seems to think that they had the same name from being employed in working mines, and amongst metals (729). Tāctus mentions their own account, that they were of Thessalian descent, followed Iāson when he returned with Mēdēa and their children to take possession of Cōlchis on the death of Ætēs (Ann. vi. 34).

Ibērīna, a. f. a lewd woman mentioned by Juvēnalis in his satire against women, a poem more remarkable for strength of thought, than purity of description (Sat. vi. 53).

Ibērus, i. m. the Ebro, a large and rapid river of Hispānia, Spain, which has its source in the mountains of Santillano in Old Castile, runs in a southeast direction, and, receiving a number of tributary streams, falls, after a course of 370 miles, into the Mediterranean, nearly opposite Insulæ Bālēāres, the islands Majoreā and Minorca. Appianus inaccurately states, that it divides Spain in the middle, and falls into the northern ocean (Bel. Hisp. 258). Ibēria, a. f. Spain, so called from this river. Ibēria nescit Maurum, Spain does not fear the Moor (Claud. xxi. 19). Inh. Ibēri, orum, (Sing. Iber, ēri) m. the Spaniards. Quidquid (auri) fudit Iber v. Hiber (Luc. Phar. vii. 755). Celtibēria, a. f. another district of Spain. Inh. Celtibēri, orum (Sing. Celtiber, ēri) m. the Celtiberians, who had this name from their being originally Celts, and settling in Ibēria. In prose authors, these appellations are chiefly applied to the northern part of the country, and its inhabitants. The Celts appear to have lived to the north of Ibērus, the Ebro, on which account Celtibēria never occurs as a name of Spain, and the same remark will apply to Celtibēri. Adj. Ibērus, Ibēricus, Ibērinus, et, Ibēriacus, a. um. Ibērum armentum, the cattle of Geryon (Ov. Epis. Her. ix. 91). Ibēra domus, the family of Trājanus (Claud. viii. 20). Ibēricum Mārē, that part of the Mediterranean, near the mouth of the Ebro, which is also called Bālēaricum (Plin. i. 336). Ibērici fūtes, Spanish ropes, i. e. ropes made of Spanish broom (Hor. Epod. iv. 3); just as in Scotland they were made of twisted birch. Ibērica terra, Spain (Sil. Ital. xiii. 510).—2. The Ktisia, a branch of Cýrus, the Kur.

Ibērus, i. m. the owner of the horse Pānchētes, which gained the prize in the chariot-race appointed by Scipio Africānus on his conquest of Spain (Sil. Ital. xvi. 354).

Ibes, is, f. a state in Spain, the sovereignty of which was disputed, in 208 B. C., by two cousins-german, Cōrbis and Orsua. They determined the controversy by single combat, in which Cōrbis was victorious (Liv. xxviii. 21).

Ibis, is, v. Idos, acc. in, f. an Egyptian bird, not unlike the Curlew, which devoured the serpents with which that country is greatly infested; flying serpents, animals by some considered fabulous, but which Belon saw in Egypt, and has given drawings of them, with two wings and with two legs. This species of bird is now very rare, if not extinct.

Ibýeus, i. m. a lyric poet, born at Rhēgium, Reggio, which he quitted in early life, and went to Sāmos about the 50th Olympiad. His writings, which were chiefly of the amatory kind, have wholly perished; but his history has, in some measure, been transmitted by means of Greek epigrams written upon him. Cicēro has mentioned him, as have also Athēneus and Sūidas. When travelling he fell into the hands of robbers, who were preparing to put him to death when some cranes flew over his head, on which he exclaimed, "These birds will some time be my avengers." He was instantly murdered, and when these robbers were afterwards in a theatre, some cranes flew over it, and they sneeringly exclaimed, "Lo! the avengers of Ibýeus." These words having been reported to the magistrates of the state, a diligent search was made for Ibýeus, and not having been found, his murderers were apprehended, questioned, at last having been put to the torture, confessed their guilt, and suffered the punishment of their crime. Hence Ibýei grūes became a proverbial expression, denoting that crimes were often very unexpectedly discovered. To his death Stātilius alludes (Syl. v. 3. 153).

Icāria, a. f. Nicaria, an island in Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, west of Sāmos, near which Icārus, son of Dædalus, fell, and from whom it received this name. Plinūs calls it Icāros, and adds, that it gave name to the neighbouring sea; but Strābo, Pōmponius Mēla, and Ptolēmaeus call it Icāria. It had likewise the name of Māeris, Dōlēhē, and Ichthýōssa, the first two from its length, and the last from its abounding with fishes.—2. A town of Attica, which had its name from Icārius, father of Erigōnē.—3. An island in the Red Sea. Stēphānus writes Icāros, not Icāria.

Icārius, i. m. son of Cēbālus, a Lacedæmonian, who married Eēlbow, a Naiad, who bore him five sons, Thōas, Dēmāstippus, Imēusimus, Alētes, and Pēricēus; and one daughter, Pēnēlōpē, who was married to Ulysses, king of Ithaca. Gēner. Icārī, Ulysses (Ov. Ib. 568). Icārīotīs, Idīs, f. Pēnēlōpē (Prop. iii. 13. 10). Icārīotīs tēla, the web of Pēnēlōpē (Ov. Ep. Pont. iii. 1. 113). Icāris, Idīs, f. Pēnēlōpē (Ov. Ib. 591).

Icārus, i. m. son of Dædalus who flew on waxen wings from Crēta, Candia. Vain of his success in this hazardous attempt, in opposition to the advice of his father, he raised himself too high, and the sun having softened or melted the wax, he fell into that part of Mārē Egēum, the Archipelago, which from him was called Icārium Mārē. Dædalus Icārus, Icārus, son of Dædalus (Hor. Od. ii. 20. 13). Adj. Icārius, a. um. Icārī fluctus, the billows of the Icarian sea (Hor. Od. i. 1. 15). Scopulis Icārī (maris) (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 21). Icārium pēlāgus (Claud. xx. 265).—2. v. Icārius, i. m. father of Erigōnē, who hospitably entertained Bæchus, on which account the god gave him a quantity of wine, and instructed him how to cultivate the vine. He set out with his daughter, and dog Mæra, for Attica, carrying wine along with him, of which he gave a part to shepherds, who, having become drunk, beat him to death, supposing the liquor to be poison. On being deprived of life, he was changed into a star under the name of Arētūrus, Erigōnē into the sign Virgo, and Mæra into the constellation Cāncrēda (Hvg. 130). A different account of these constellations occurs in various authors of antiquity, particularly of Virgo. Adj. Icārius, a, um. Icārii dōves, tardā sidēra, i. e. Septētrionēs (Prop. ii. 33. 24). Icāria umbra, the shade of the vine (Stat. Th. iv. 655). Icārii lūtrātus, the barkings of the dog of Icārus, i. e. the constellation Canicula (Stat. Syl. iv. 4. 13).—3. Son of Mōpsus, and brother of Dōrylas, whom Hānnibal killed with a stone at Sāgūntum (Sil. Ital. ii. 133 seq.).

Icēlus, i, m. a nobleman of the Rēmi. He and Antēbrōgius were sent ambassadors to Caesar in the second year of the Gallic war (Cæs. B. G. ii. 3).

L. Icēlus, L. Icēl, m. an acquaintance of Hōrātius, to whom he addresses one of his odes (i. 29). Having discontinued the study of philosophy, he entered the army, and, from love of plunder, attached himself to the expedition which Augustus was fitting out against Arābia Fēlix (Hor. Od. i. 29).

Icēlos, i, m. (resemblance), one of the sons of Sōmnus, who, in sleep, assumed the form of birds, and beasts, and living creatures. By the gods he was called Icēlos, and by men Phōbētor (fear) (Ov. Met. xi. 640).

Icēlus, i, m. a freedman of the emperor Gālba, who, on being created a Roman knight, received the name of Mārtiānus, to suit his new dignity. His influence with Gālba equalled that of T. Vinūus, the consul, or of Cōrnēlius Lāco, who held the sovereign power in their hands. By enormous rapacity, Icēlus, in a very short time, amassed prodigious wealth, which he did not live long to enjoy. On the accession of Otho, he lost his life by the hands of the common executioner, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 13—46).

Icēni, orum, m. the Icēnians, a powerful nation of ancient Britain, whose capital was Venta, Caster, near Norwich, others say Norwich itself, which is the principal city of Norfolkshire (Tac. Ann. xii. 31).

Icēsias, æ, m. an Athenian whose son Lēon was a man of great eloquence (Liv. xxxviii. 10).

Ichnē, arum, f. a town of Mēsōpōtāmia, built by the Macedonians, near which P. Licīnius Crāssus, son of M. Licīnius Crāssus, the triumvir, and other noble Romans lost their lives in 55 B. C. (Ap. Bel. Par. 146).—2. A town in Bōtāia (Herod. vii. 123).

Ichnōbātes, tis, m. (Tracer), one of Aetāon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 207).

Ichnon, ōnis, m. a man of Cŷzīcus, killed by Hērēcles (Val. Flacc. iii. 167).

Ichnūsa, æ, f. an ancient name of Sārdīnia, so called by the Greeks from its supposed resemblance to the print of the human foot (σφραγις ποδός) (Sil. Ital. xii. 358. Sal. Frag. 2).

Ichthyophāgi, orum, m. (i. e. fish-eaters), a people of Africa, who lived on the coast of the Arabian gulf. They appear to have inhabited different tracts on the Nile, towards the sources of that river (Herod. iii. 20 seq.). Of this name different tribes or nations occur in the writings of the ancients, and in different parts of the world, generally on the seacoast, or on lakes of considerable extent.

L. Icilius, L. Icilli, m. a tribune of the people, to whom Virgīnia had been betrothed before Appius Claudius, the dēcēmvir, conceived his iniquitous design against her innocence. Icilius was a man of great spirit, and of approved zeal in the cause of the commons. After Claudius, by promises and bribes, had failed to corrupt the nurse of Virgīnia, by his advice one of his dependants claimed her as his slave; but the strong opposition of Icilius prevented her being given over to the dēcēmvir. On his being required to find sureties, the whole multitude showed their willingness to be bound for him. Virgīnius, dressed in a mourning habit, led his daughter Virgīnia to the forum, demanding, rather than soliciting, the aid of the commons, and urging his own merits as a soldier in defence of their wives and children. These arguments which Icilius followed up with others of similar import, had no effect on the brutal dēcēmvir, and therefore, her father, to preserve her purity, put her to death. Icilius and Nūmītōrius raised the lifeless body and exposed it to the view of the people, lamenting the necessity which had urged a father to such a deed. For the terms in which Icilius had spoken of the dēcēmvir, he was summoned to attend his tribunal, but being supported by a band of young patricians, besides a crowd of commons, he refused to obey, and when the lictors approached to seize him, they were repulsed, and their fasces broken. Quitting the town and repairing to the camp, he prevailed on the army to make a secession and return to Rome. The two Roman armies took their station on Mōns Avēntīnus, and communicated with the senate through L. Vālērīus and M. Hōrātius. Icilius well skilled in political intrigue, and anxious to obtain office, procured the appointment of military tribunes, who were favourites with the people, lest they should be elected plebeian tribunes, and thus gratified his ambition by being nominated one, at the first assembly at which the pontifex Māximus presided. The commons deputed him in their name to thank L. Vālērīus Pōtītus and M. Hōrātius Bārbātus, the deputies of the senate, a proof that he stood high in the favour of the people (Liv. iii. 44—54).—2. A plebeian tribune in 411 B. C., who employed himself in exciting sedition by Agrarian laws, from his first entry on office, as if it had been a task incumbent on his name and family. From political disputes, a pestilence diverted men's thoughts, and turned them to their own personal safety. The historian remarks, that the effects of the pestilence were less fatal than the sedition would have proved, had it proceeded with the violence with which it began (Liv. iv. 52). Adj. Icilius, a, um. Icilia lēx, a law for granting to the commons Mōns Avēntīnus, on purpose to be built upon and inhabited (Liv. iii. 32).

Sp. Icilius, Sp. Icilli, m. one of the five tribunes of the people who were elected at the Cōmītia tribūta, in 471 B. C. Previously to this date, the number was two, and they were elected at Cōmītia Cārlīsta (Liv. ii. 58).

Iemālius, i, m. the name of an ingenious artist, derived from his working in wood, which he made useful after it had become dry (μυρτα το ξηρανθησαι) (Hom. Od. xix. 57).

Iconium, i, n. Konieh, or, Koniyah, a very celebrated city of Lŷcāōnia, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (Amm. Mar. xiv. 2).—2. A town of Cilīcia (Plin. i. 587).

Icōsium, i, m. Sersol, a town of Maurītānia, on the coast (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Icus, i, f. an island between Scŷrus, Sciro, and Scáthus, at which the combined fleet of the Romans, Issei and Attalus, king of Asia, were detained by a violent north wind for several days, 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 45).

Ida, æ, f. Idē, es, f. a chain of lofty mountains to the N. of Trōja. Gārgārus, Kozdagly, is the highest range of Ida, in which a late traveller supposes Scāmānder, the Mender, takes its rise. The length and height of Ida have not been ascertained by actual measurement. In general it is cultivated at the bottom, the middle part covered with wood, and the region towards the summit with snow. All the high mountains of Natalia are marked by three tracts, the arable, the woody, and the snowy, or frozen. On Idē, Pāris adjudged the golden apple to Vēnus, in preference to Jūno and Minēra, which was the cause of the Trojan war. Idālis, Idis, f. of Ida, applied to females or nouns feminine. Idālis tēlūs (Luc. Phar. iii. 204). Readings here are various, and commentators divided in opinion. Adj. Idāus, a, um. Idāus iudex, Pāris (Ov. Fast. vi. 44). Idāen nūmes, Cýbēlē (Juv. Sat. iii. 138). Idāen naves, Idæan ships, i. e. ships built of wood which grew on mount Ida (Hor. Od. i. 15. 2). Idāen māter, Cýbēlē q. v. (Liv. xxix. 10).—2. Paloriti, a lofty mountain nearly in the centre of Crēta; Candia, on which Jūpiter was brought up. Idāi, orum, m. the Cōrybāntes, attendants of Jūpiter in his infancy.

Idāus, i, m. the charioteer and armour-bearer of Priāmus, king of Troy. Hōmērus says he was the herald and cup-bearer of Priāmus, and escaped by Vūlcānus carrying him off (Il. ii. 248 seq. Virg. Æn. vi. 485).—2. A Trojan who, with Actor, carried the mother of Eurýalus into the house, after the death of her son, lest her wailing should dispirit the troops (Virg. Æn. ix. 500).

Idāltum, i, n. v. Idālia, æ, f. Dalīa, a city of Cyprus, sacred to Vēnus (Virg. Æn. i. 681). Idālīē, es, f. a name of Vēnus from this city (Ov. Met. xiv. 694). Adj. Idālīus, a, um. Idālīa Vēnus (Virg. Æn. v. 760). Idālīa volūcrēs, pigeons (Stat. Th. v. 63).

Idārnēs, is, m. a priotor under Dārius, defeated by Balārchus, in 332 B. C. (Curt. iv. 5).

Idas, æ, m. whom Hýgīnus makes son of Aphāreūs, king of Mēssēnia, and Arēnē, carried off Mārpēssa, daughter of Evēnus q. v., in a winged chariot, which he received from Nēptūnus. Apōllo, another lover of Mārpēssa, met him as he was going to Mēssēniē, and took her from him. To terminate the contest between Apōllo and Idas, Jūpiter allowed Mārpēssa to take either of them she chose for her husband, and she preferred Idas, fearing the god would forsake her when she became old. Idas and his brother Lyncēus were present at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Idas was one of the Argonauts (Stat. Th. v. 405). Pausānias says, that the tomb of Idas and Lyncēus was shown at Scias, in Arcādia.—2. A man killed by Phīnēus, at the marriage of Pērsēus and Andrōmēda (Ov. Met. v. 90).—3. A companion of Diōmēdes, who was changed into a bird (Ov. Met. xiv. 504).—4. A native of Tēnārus, killed by the tame tigers near Thēbus, Theoi, after they had torn in pieces the charioteer of Amphīarāus (Stat. Th. vii. 588).—5. A Boetian, born at Onchēstus, whom Týdēus levelled with his spear, and the burning torch with which he had alarmed the Argive army, set fire to his own head as he lay on the ground (Stat. Th. vii. 466–471).—6. The commander of the Pisans in the Theban war. He entered the lists for the prize in the foot-race, and had formerly gained the same prize at the Olympic games (Stat. Th. vi. 553). From his swiftness, Stātius calls him præpes Idas (Th. ix. 122).—7. A man in the army of Etēocles, killed by Pārthēnōpēus in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 755).

Idē, es, f. a Theban matron, whom Stātius introduces lamenting the death of two sons killed by Týdēus. They were in the ambuscade laid against the life of that gallant soldier. The poet, in the character of Idē, gives an animated and striking picture of an affectionate mother, driven almost to distraction by grief. The excessive suffering, depicted in her countenance, excited horror rather than compassion. She is not dissolved into tears or stupified by sorrow, but rendered frantic by the poignancy of her affliction. Hence maternal sympathy fled from her face, and from a tender mother she passes into a fury. Such sometimes are the effects of severe bereavements, when the heart is tender, and the mind not under the influence of Divine truth (Stat. Th. iii. 134).

Idistāvisus, i, m. (Cāmpus), a plain between Visūrgis, the Weser, and a chain of mountains, on which a bloody battle was fought by a Roman army under Gērmānicus, and the Germans under Arminius, in the year 16. The former gained a decisive victory (Tac. Ann. ii. 16).

Idmon, ōnis, m. a Rutulian, whom Tūrnus sent with a message to Ætēas, proposing to decide the war by single combat (Virg. Æn. xii. 75).—2. A native of Cōlōphon, a city of Iōnīa, the father of Arāchnē. Adj. Idmōnīus, a, um. Idmōnīa Arāchnē (Ov. Met. vi. 133).—3. Son of Apōllo and Astēria, a native of Argos, who was one of the Argonauts, and pretended to the gift of prescience. He died during the expedition (Val. Flacc. i. 228 seq.).—4. A man skilled in medicine, hence Stātius calls him Epīdaurius Idmon, who cured Týdēus of his wounds, on returning to Argos from his embassy at Thēbe, Theba (Stat. Th. iii. 393).—5. A Nasamonian, killed by Q. Fābius Māximus, when Hānūbal had surrounded the troops of M. Minūcius Rūfus, his colleague in the dictatorship. Falling on a place covered with blood, before he could regain his feet, the dictator pinned him to the ground with his lance (Sil. Ital. vii. 609 seq.).

Idōmēneūs, ēos, Greek; in Latin generally, ei, m. a famous king of Crētē, who joined the Greeks in the Trojan war, with eighty ships. He was a brave soldier, and put many of the Trojans to death. On his return home, being overtaken by a violent storm, he vowed to Nēptūnus that for his preservation he would sacrifice to him whatever he should first meet with at his landing. It happened, unfortunately, that his own son, who came to welcome his arrival, was doomed to be the victim. The fulfilment of his promise rendered him so odious to the Cretans, that he was obliged to leave the island. He settled in Calābria, a district in the south of Italy, spent his life in making his subjects happy, and died in old age universally regretted. Ingens Idōmēneūs, mighty Idómēneus, i. e. renowned in war (Hor. Od. iv. 9. 19).

Idōthēa, v. Idōthēia, æ, f. a daughter of Prōtēus, who informed Mēnelāus how he might seize her father, and obtain from him whatever information he might need respecting his voyage (Hom. Od. iv. 366).

Idrias, adis, f. a district of Cāria (Herod. v. 118).

Idrus, i, m. a mountain of Cāria, sacred to Dīana (Catul. lxiv. 301).

Idūmāa, æ, v. Idūmē, es, f. the Land of Edom, which was properly a part of Arābia Pētræa. Adj. Idūmæus, a, um. Idūmæa pāl-mæ, palms of Edom, i. e. palms of the very best kind (Virg. G. iii. 12). Idūmæa pōrta, a gate of Rome, which had this name from Vespāsiānus and Titus entering the city through it, when they triumphed over the Jews (Juv. Sat. viii. 160).

Idus, i, m. a man in the army of Hānibal, at the siege of Sāgūntum, Murciadro, killed by Theron (Sil. Ital. ii. 164).

Idus, uum, f. the Ides, one of the divisions of the Roman month. In March, May, July, and October, the Ides were on the 15th, and in the other months on the 13th. Hence, some derive the word from the Tuscan verb, idūare, to divide, as they were nearly in the middle of the month. Others have supposed, with some probability of truth, the different divisions of the month ought to be referred to the different situations, or appearances, of the moon. When in conjunction with the sun, Rōmulus appointed a person to proclaim the change; see Kalēnda. Her first emersion from the solar rays he called novæ luna, new moon, afterwards Nonæ, and Idus from idæ, beauty, when that luminary was full, from her being then in her greatest beauty. Other derivations of Idus have been conjectured, but too fanciful, to merit attention. Like the Kalends, and Nones, the Ides were reckoned backwards.

Idya, v. Idyia, et, Idyia (3syl.), æ, f. youngest daughter of Océānus and Tēthys, who married Eētes, king of Cōlchis, to whom she bore Mēdæa and Absyrtus (Apollōnius Rhōdius says Chalcidopē and Mēdæa, iii. 248). Ovidius calls her Ipsæ, but the readings vary greatly, and it is probable that Idya is the right word (Ep. Her. xvii. 232).

Iēnysus, i, f. Khan Younes, a town which stood on the border, between Arābia and Sýria (Herod. iii. 5).

Iērnē. See Hibernia.

Iētes, æ, m. a man of great height, who killed Nērius, in the battle at Trāsmēnus, the lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 259).

Iesalēnses, ium, m. an African nation (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Iētas, æ, m. v. Iētas, arum, f. Iato, a town of Sicilia, Sicily, on Crimēsus, the Belici. From its elevated situation, Silius Itālicus calls it Cēlus Iētas (xiv. 271). Inh. Iētēnses, ium, m. (Plin. i. 347).

Igilgilli, n. Gigeri, a town of Maurītānia, at which a colony appears to have been planted. Adj. Igilgītānus, a, um. Igilgītānum littus (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Igillum, i, n. Gliho, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, off the coast of Etrūria, v. Hetrūria, Tuscany, opposite Albinia, the Albigna (Cæs. B. C. i. 34).

Igitūrvium, i, n. a town of Umbria, supposed to be the same with Igūvium q. v.

Ignigēna, æ, m. a name of Bæcehus, from his miraculous preservation by Jūpiter, whose celestial splendour had reduced to ashes his mother, Sēuclē, when pregnant with him.

Igūvium, i, n. Gubbio, a town of Umbria, in Apēnninus, the Apennines (Cæs. B. C. i. 12). From the notice taken of this town by Silius Itālicus, it appears to have been subject to frequent rains. Inh. Igūvini, erum, m.

Ilēcāōnēnses, ium, m. a people of Spain, who lived on the seacoast, near the mouth of the Ebro (Liv. xxii. 21).

Ilēda, æ, f. Lerida, a town of Hispānia Citerior, the north of Spain, on Sicōria, the Segre, about four miles above its junction with Cinga, the Cinca, both of which have their sources in the Pyrenees. Cæsar pitched his camp between these rivers previously to his defeating Afrānius and M. Pētræus, lieutenant-generals of Pōmpeius (Cæs. B. C. i. 41 seq.). Alta Ilēda (Luc. Phar. iv. 261). Inh. Ilēdēnses, ium, m.

Ilēdes, is, m. a competitor for the prize given by Scipio Afrīciānus, at the conclusion of the Spanish war, for throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. xvi. 566).

Ilēgētes, um (Sing. Ilēges, etis), m. (Ilēgētes, Ptol.), a people of Spain, at the foot of the Pyrenees, whom Hānibal conquered on his march to Italy, 220 B. C. Hānibāl prevailed on them to revolt, after they had given hostages to Cn. Cōrnelius Scipio, who took by storm their capital, Athānāgia, compelled them to give a greater number of hostages, and to pay a fine of money (Liv. xxi. 22—61.)

Ilētes, æ, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, advanced in life, but retaining the powers of his mind in full vigour (Sil. Ital. iii. 255).

Ilēus, ēos, m. a man who cultivated part of Hymētus, Trelo-vouni, and marched in the army of Thēseus, against the Thebans, after the two brothers, Eteōcles and Pōly-nices, had fallen by mutual wounds (Stat. Th. xii. 622).

Ilia, æ, f. only daughter of Nūmītor, eldest son of Prōcas, king of Alba. Amūlius, younger brother of Nūmītor, having supplanted him, mounted the throne, put his sons to death, and made his daughter Ilia, or Rhēa Silvīa, a vestal, to prevent her having children, hence Virgilius, Rhēa sūcērdos (Æn. vii. 639). Notwithstanding of her vow binding her to perpetual virginity, she became pregnant, bare twin sons, and declared that Mārs was their father. Aurēlius Victor says that Amūlius was the father of the twins (Or. 19). By her uncle's orders she was loaded with chains, and cast into prison, where she died, and her infants were thrown into Tiber, the Tevere. She was fabled, after death, to be married to Tibēriānus, god of the Tevere, probably from having been buried on its banks (Ov. Fast. ii. 598); but Ovidius seems to make her the wife, or a favourite, of Anlo, the Teverone (Amor. iii. 6. 47 seq.). Stāttius calls her Dārdāna sūcērdos (Syl. i. 2. 192).

Iliēnses, ium, m. a people of Sardinia, with whom the Romans fought several successful engagements, in 183 B. C. Necessity at last compelled them to submit to the Roman government, not, however, without great reluctance. Livius says they are a nation "not very friendly to us at this day" (Liv. xl. 34. arg.).—2. A people of the Troad, a district of Asia Minor, of which Troy was the capital.

Iliona, n., v. Ilione, es, f. eldest daughter of Priamus, king of Troy (Virg. Æn. i. 638). According to Hyginus, she was the wife of Polymnestor, king of Thræcia, and killed herself in consequence of the fate of her parents. Edormit Ilionam, he (Fusus) sleeps Iliona, i. e. he acts the part of Ilione asleep, viz., in the play of Accius, or, Pæcivius (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 61).

Ilioneus, eos, v. ei, m. a Trojan, son of Phorbas, one of the chief companions of Æneas. He appears to have been one of the principal favourites of that hero, and, although he does not act a very prominent part in the Æneid, his character is not devoid either of interest or respect. He possessed no inconsiderable portion of eloquence, a quality which Hómærus has likewise ascribed to his father (Virg. Æn. i. 120).—2. A son of Artabazus, made prisoner at the battle of Issus (Curt. iii. 13).

Ilipa, n., f. a town of Hispania Bætica, at which P. Cœnilius Scipio gained a decisive victory over the Lusitani, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 1).

Ilissus, i, m. a river, or rather a rivulet, of Attica, which runs past Athènes, Athens, described by Statius as very pure (Th. viii. 765). One of its branches is called Eridanus. On its banks stood a temple sacred to the Muses hence called Ilissædes (Paus. i. 19). Ilissos conscius raptæ Orithyia, alluding to Boreas carrying off Orithyia, daughter of Erætheus, king of Athens, Athens (Stat. Th. xii. 631). Ilissias, adis, f. of Ilissus, applied to females or nouns feminine.

Ilithyia, n., f. the goddess who presided over childbirth, and who is generally considered the same with Lûcina and Diâna. Ovidius makes Alcmène complain, that Ilithyia, at the request of Jûno, retarded the birth of Hercules, and thereby greatly increased the severity of her sufferings (Met. ix. 283 seq.).

Ilium, i, n. (which Hómærus in various places writes Ilios, i, f., and he has been copied by Hôrâtius and Ovidius), one of the names of Trôja, Troy (Eng.), is said to have stood to the S. of Ida, a mountain, or rather a chain of mountains, in Phrygia, a district of Asia Minor, Natolia. Dardanus, a son of Jûpiter and Elætra, founded this city, and from him it received the name of Dardania, and the inhabitants of Dardania. To this monarch Erichonius succeeded, and on his death, Tros assumed the reins of government. Ius next mounted the throne, and to his name must be referred Ilium, Troy. Non semel Ilios vexata, Troy not once, i. e. oftener than once, harassed; Troy twice taken, first by Hercules, and afterwards by Agamemnon (Hor. Od. iv. 9. 18). Ilîades, um, f. Trojan women. Ilîenses, um, m. the inhabitants of Troy. Ilîades, n., m. Gânymêdes, grandson of Ius (Ov. Met. x. 169); but Apollodorus says Ius died childless (iii. 12). Ilîade fratres, Rômulus and Rémus (Ov. Fast. iii. 62). Ilias, adis, f. Homer's poem on the Trojan war (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 7. 34); also the district of Troy (Herod. v. 122). Adj. Ilîacus, et, Ilius, n., um. Ilîacæ mûri, the walls of Troy (Hor. Epist. i. 2. 16). Ilîacum carmen, the song of Troy, i. e. the Iliad (Hor. Art. Poet.

129). Ilîacus puer, Gânymêdes (Juv. Sat. xiii. 43). Ilîacus mûritus, Æneas (Stat. Syl. iii. 1. 74).—2. A town in Mæcedonia, taken by force by L. Apustius, a lieutenant-general of P. Sulpicius Gâlba, the Roman consul, 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 27).—3. A town of the Troad, destroyed by Fimbria, because it had adhered to Sûlla, in 87 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 83). Inh. Ilîenses, um, m. showed every degree of respect to the Romans under L. Cœnilius Scipio, consul, who marched with his brother Africânus against Antiochus, king of Syria, and the Romans testified their joy at being sprung from that origin, 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 27).

Ilhbëri, n., v. Ilhbëris, is, f. Elne, a town of France, at the Pyrenees, which Cônstantinus Magnus called Hêlêna, in honour of his mother; hence the modern name. Near this town, Hannibal pitched his camp, after crossing the Pyrenees (Liv. xxi. 24).

Illiturgi, n. indec. v. Illiturgis, is, f. a town of Spain, of which the ruins are visible near Andujar. It belonged to the Turdûli. It was frequently besieged by the Carthaginians, who were as often attacked by Roman commanders, and obliged to quit the place. Inh. Illiturgitani, orum, m. who, after the death of Cn. and P. Cœnilius Scipio, revolted to the Carthaginians, and added treachery and murder to the breach of their allegiance. Scipio Africânus commanded in person against the Illiturgitani, in 268 B. C., who displayed the greatest bravery, and were nobly supported by their wives and children. The victorious troops of Scipio yielded to the furious efforts of the inhabitants, when their general rebuked them sharply, ordered them instantly to bring the ladders, and threatened to scale the walls himself, if they did not instantly mount. In a few minutes, the town was in possession of the Romans. The citadel was carried at a place where it was deemed impregnable. The conquerors cut down indiscriminately armed and unarmed, men, women, and even infants. Besides, they burned the houses to ashes, and what the fire could not destroy they levelled with the ground, that no vestige of the city might remain (Liv. xxiii. 49 seq.).

Ilucia, n., f. See Ilucia.

Ilurgavonenses, um, m. a nation of Spain, near the mouth of Ibêrus, the Ebro (Cæs. B. C. i. 60). Plinius mentions the country of the Illergaones, probably the same people; but nothing certain respecting their history, or geographical position, is known. Adj. Ilurgavonensis, is, e.

Illyricum, v. Illyrium, i, n. Upper Albania, an extensive country of Græcia, Greece, the precise limits of which are not ascertained by ancient geographers. It was bounded on the W. by Mârê Hædræticum, v. Adriaticum, quod et Sûpërum, the Gulf of Venice, which separated it from Italia, Italy; on the E. by that range of mountains of which Parnassus, Lihura, Pindus, Mezzono, &c., form a part, which divided it from Thessalia, Thessaly; on the S., according to Plôrus, by the river Titius; and on the N. by Aræa, the Ara. Læcum Illyricum (Manil. iv. 609). Illyris, idis, f. of Illyricum, applied to females or nouns feminine. Illyris ora (Ov. Trist. ii. 225). Illyris is sometimes used to denote the country, but then perhaps terra, or some such word, is understood (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 2. 79).

Illyris vicina ripis, i. e. littoribus Hadræacis (Manil. iv. 689). Inh. Illyrii, orum (Sing. Illyrius, i), m. were a savage people, and in general infamous for their piracies. The Romans subdued them, and L. Anicius Gellus divided Illyricum into three parts, of which it is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain what the first included; the second comprehended the Labætes; and the third the Agraonites, the Rhizonites, the Olciniaæ, and their neighbours, 168 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 26). Illyria, as the name of the region, occurs in Propertius. Adj. Illyricus, Illyrius, et, Illyricianus, a, um. Illyrica unda, the billows of the Gulf of Venice (Hor. Od. i. 28, 29). Illyrica pax (Ov. Art. Am. ii. 658). Illyrius ager (Gel. xi. 3). Illyricianus exercitus (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 4).

Illyrius, i, m. an associate of Pëdicæas, after whose death Antigonus declared war against Alcetas, Pëthion, and Illyrius (Just. xlii. 8).

Iloteæ. See Helos.

Ilyæ, æ (Greek, Æthalcæ, es, v. Æthalia, æ), f. Ilyæ, or, Ilyca, an island near the south-west coast of Italy, situated about 42° 40' N. latitude, and is about eight miles in length and two in breadth. It was celebrated in ancient times for its iron mines, of which it still retains a few, whence it had the name of Læmnus. Limestone and fine marble are found in this island (Virg. Æn. x. 173).

Ilyætes, um, m. a nation of the Ligures, who joined the Insübres, Cænömāni, and Boii, in 202 B. C., plundered Placentia, of which they burned a part, crossed the Po, and advanced to ravage Crēmōna. In consequence of the defeat of the Insübres, they submitted to the Roman consul, Q. Minucius Rëfius, three years after, and were the last of the Gauls who laid down their arms. They are called Ilyætes Ligurum, and Ligustini Ilyætes (Liv. xxxi. 10 seq.).

Iluclia, æ, f. a town of the Oretāni, taken by C. Flaminius, in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 7).

Ilus, i, m. the original name of the son of Æneas and Crëusa, who was afterwards called Iulus g. v.—2. A king of Troy, who was the eldest son of Tros and Callirhœ, and brother of Assaræus and Ganymëdes. His tomb was in the middle of the plain (Hom. Il. xi. 166). From him Tröja was called Ilium (Virg. Æn. vi. 650).—3. A Rutulian, at whom Pallas, from a distance, had aimed his strong spear, which Rhœtëus, coming between them, intercepted, and by which he was killed. This accident, fatal to Rhœtëus, saved the life of Ilus (Virg. Æn. x. 400).—4. Son of Mërmërus, hence called Mërmërides, and grandson of Phëres, who was the son of Iæson and Mëdëa (Hom. Od. i. 259).

Imagines, um, f. Images. Jus Imaginum, the right of Images, i. e. the right of forming Images of themselves, enjoyed originally only by the Patricians in the Roman state. Certain offices, usually called the curule magistracies, which included the curule edileship, pretorship, censorship, consulship, and dictatorship, conferred this privilege, although the person was by birth a Plebeian. The honour naturally resulted from these offices being at first solely held by Patricians. In process of time, the Plebeians, to whom the curule magistracies were denied, became eligible to the highest dignities in the state, and all who obtained any curule magistracy, had themselves not only the Jus Imaginum, but likewise their descendants. The Images were busts made of wax, having labels enumerating the honours which the individual had enjoyed, and the achievements which he had performed. These inscriptions the Romans called tituli, from which comes the English word title. Illam ceram, that wax, i. e. the wax of which the Images were made (Sal. Jug. 4).

Imānūcëntius, i, m. a Briton, the father of Māndubrātius, and king of the Trinobāntes. He was killed by Cassivëlanus (Cæs. B. G. v. 20).

Imāon, ōnis, m. a companion of Hālësus, whom the latter protected at the cost of his own life (Virg. Æn. x. 424).

Imāus, i, m. Altai and Chaltai, a mountain of Scythia, adjoining to Parapamisus, Pam-badam. Ammiānus Mārcellinus uses this word in the plural (xxiii. 6).—2. A mountain in India.

Imbrāsus, i, m. a Lycian, the father of Glæucus and Lædes, whom Turnus killed; and who, from their father, are called Imbrāsides (Virg. Æn. xii. 343).—2. A Trojan, the father of Asius, whose patronymic, of consequence, is Imbrāsides (Virg. Æn. x. 123).—3. A Thracian nobleman of Ænus. Imbrāsides, æ, m. Pirrus (Hom. Il. iv. 520).

Imbrinium, i, n. a place in Sānnium, at which a battle was fought between the Romans and Samnians, in 324 B. C. (Liv. viii. 30).

Imbrīus, i, m. son of Mëntor, and husband of Mëdëscästë, a reputed daughter of Præmus, killed by Tëucer. He was a brave soldier, and rich in horses (Hom. Il. xiii. 171—181).

Imbro, v. Imbrus, i, f. Imbro, Embro, or, Lembro, an island in the northern part of Mærë Ægëum, the Archipelago, near the mouth of Hëllëspōntus, the Dardanelles. Here Antiochus, king of Syria, touched when he crossed the Archipelago to make war in Greece (Liv. xxxv. 43). When the Romans conquered Philippus, king of Mæcëdōnia, they gave Imbro to the Athenians (Val. Flacc. ii. 443).

Imërtë, es, f. an island in the Archipelago, abounding with pines.

Imëlcë, es, f. the wife of Hännibal, a native of Cästulo, Carthago, a town of Spain; Silius Italicus makes her a descendant of Cästilius, a native of Párnäus, Liakara, who built that town, and called it by his mother's name (iii. 97).

Inächia, æ, f. a woman whom Hörätius loved, and of whom little is known, as her name only occurs in Epods xi and xii.

Inächus, i, m. the son of Ocëänus and Tëthys, was the founder of the kingdom of Argos, hence Hörätius calls him princeps Inächus (Od. ii. 3. 21). From him the Greeks were called Inächii, orum, and, Inächida, arum, m. (Stat. Th. ii. 245). Quantum distat ab Inächio Codrus, how long a period intervenes between Inächus, i. e. the first king of the Argives, and Codrus, i. e. the last king of the Athenians (Hor. Od. iii. 19. 1). Inächis, Idis, f. of Inächus, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine (Stat. Th. xii. 303); Io (Val. Flacc. iv. 350). Inächides, æ, m. Epäphus, the son of Io, and grandson of Inächus (Ov. Met. i. 753); Përsëus (Ov. Met.

iv. 719). Adj. Ināchius, et, Ināchus, a, um, of Ināchus, of Greece, Grecian. Ināchta bos, 16, afterwards Isis (Ov. Fast. iii. 658). Inācha pūbes (Stat. Th. i. 619).

Ināchus, i, m. the Planizza, Zeria, or, Inācho, an inconsiderable river of Argolis, a country in Peloponnēsus, the Morea, which rises in Artēmiōtum, and falls into Sinus Argolicus, the Gulf of Napoli. Pouqueville says the waters of the Planizza are clearer than those of Alphēus, the Roufia, and that, although fed from a number of sources, and running for many miles in dark forests, it is nearly dry in summer. Ināchus q. v., the founder of Argos, Argo, was, after his death, believed to preside over this river, to which he gave his name; most probably because he built the capital of his kingdom on its banks. —2. The Krikeli, rises in Pindus, and joins Achēlōus, the Aspro Potamo, and having run beneath the sea, afterwards rises near Argos under the same name. This is mere fable.

Inārimē, es, f. Ischia, an island called also Pithēcia and Enāria, four miles distant from Prōchytē, Procida. It is about eighteen miles in circumference, and may contain about seventy square miles. Ischia, the capital, gives name to the island, besides which there are about nine other towns, and some villages. Epōpēis, Epomeo, more frequently called Monte San Nicola, forms the principal feature of the island which was anciently subject to earthquakes, hence the fiction of its being placed over Tūphōeus (Luc. Phar. v. 101). It is now cultivated and fertile, yielding a considerable revenue to the king of Naples (Virg. Æn. ix. 716).

Incitātus, i, m. the favourite horse of the emperor Cālgūla, for which he built a marble stable with an ivory manger, clothed him with scarlet cloth, to which he added a bracelet of jewels, besides appointing him a house, slaves, and fine furniture for the entertainment of such as were invited in name of the horse. Nor did his madness stop here, since it was reported, that he intended to make him consul (Suet. Cal. 55).

—India, es, f. India, a very extensive and opulent country of Asia, with the boundaries of which the ancient geographers do not seem to have been well acquainted. Like other kingdoms of Asia, its territories might be different at different times. In modern geography, India is bounded on the north by Tartary and Thibet; on the east by Avā and the Bay of Bengal; on the south by the Indian Ocean; and on the west by Persia and the Arabian Sea. The eastern coast of the peninsula of India is called the Coromandel, and the western, the Malabar, coast. This country has its name from one of the largest rivers in Asia, Indus, the Sinde, or, the Indo, of which the sources are unknown. Its course extends about 1000 miles, and like the Ganges and Nilus, the Nile, it was supposed to form a Delta of very considerable extent, through which it fell into the Indian ocean by many mouths. But a late traveller says it has no Delta, and only one stream. Ind. Indi, orum (Sing. Indus, i), m. reputed unwarlike by the Romans, hence Virgilius, imbellis Indus (G. ii. 172). Indi, and Mauri, with the Roman poets indicated the inhabitants of the most eastern and western parts of the world (Juv. Sat. vi. 387). Colorati Indi, sun-burned Indians (Virg. G. iv. 293).

Here perhaps the poet meant Ethiopians, as he does probably also in Æn. viii. 706, since there were no Indians in the army of Antōnius at the battle of Actium. Ad. Indus, v. Indicus, a, um. Indi dentes, the teeth of the elephant (Ov. Met. viii. 228), which the same poet calls Inda bellia (Trist. iv. 6. 7). Indus lapis, the diamond (Claud. viii. 585). Indicum ebur, Indian ivory (Hor. Od. i. 31. 6). Indicum litus (Mart. x. 88).

Indibilis, is, m. one of the competitors for the prize given by Scipio Africānus, at the conclusion of the Spanish war, for throwing the javelin (Sil. Ital. xvi. 564). —2. A prince of the Ilērgētes. By the united efforts of himself and his brother Māndōnius, their countrymen were roused to arms, and their first efforts were directed against the Roman allies in their neighbourhood, whom they plundered in 219 B. C. Cn. Cōrnēlius Scipio, the Roman commander, sent a party against Indibilis, who commanded the invaders, when a number of the Ilērgētes were killed, others made prisoners, and almost all disarmed. P. Cōrnēlius Scipio charged Indibilis, as he marched at the head of seven thousand five hundred Soessitāni, to join the Carthaginians, but the battle was scarcely begun, when the Numidian cavalry under Māsīnissa, attacked the Romans in the flank, and two Carthaginian armies in the rear. Scipio fell, and the greater part of the troops were cut off. After Scipio Africānus assumed the command of the Roman army in Spain, amongst other noble prisoners were the daughters of Indibilis, in the bloom of youth and beauty, and the wife of their uncle Māndōnius. At the request of the latter, he gave strict orders that the female prisoners should be treated with the greatest delicacy, and not, as formerly, subjected to rudeness and insult. Indibilis and his brother revolted from the Carthaginians and joined the Romans, probably with the view of procuring the release of their female relations. Disappointment at not obtaining the government of the whole of Spain, added to the fickleness of barbarians, made these princes withdraw from the Roman interest, raise troops, and again make war on the allies of Rome. The Roman general engaged two-thirds of their forces, of which not one man escaped, on which the two princes with the other third, who had viewed the battle from the heights, fled; afterwards solicited and obtained forgiveness; but the generosity of the conqueror did not secure their fidelity, for again they took up arms, were defeated, and Indibilis pinned to the ground by a javelin. Māndōnius and the other princes who had excited the war, were delivered up to the Romans for punishment (Liv. xxii. 21 seq.).

Indibilis, is, f. v. Intibili, n. Ind. a town near the coast of Spain, to the south of the river Ebro.

Indigēnae. See Autōchthōnes.

Indutiōmārus, i, m. a chief man among the Trēviri, father-in-law to Cingētōrix, who attacked T. Lābiēnus, but was repulsed and slain (Caes. B. G. v. 3 seq.). Florus inaccurately states that he was killed by Dēlābella (iii. 10).

Indus, i, m. a river of Cāria, so called from an Indian having been thrown from his elephant into it. Indus signified the manager of an elephant (Liv. xxxviii. 14). —2. The Sinde, Sindeh, or, Indo, sometimes called Nīlā (i. e. the blue river), is one of the largest streams of India q. v.; its source has not hitherto been explored. Its course has been estimated at a thousand miles, before it reaches the Delta, in the province of Sīndī, after which it falls into the sea by many mouths (Just. xii. 10).

Ingevōnes, um, m. a German nation, who bordered on the seacoast, and derived their name from one of the three sons of Mānnus (Tac. Mor. Ger. 2).

Ingaunī, orum, m. a tribe of the Ligūres, who were at war with the Epāntērii, mountaineers, at the time Māgo took Gēnūa, Genoa. With this nation he formed a treaty, and made war on their enemies the Epāntērii. In 203 B. C., Māgo, the brother of Hānnibal, arrived in the country of the Ingaunī, but deputies from Africa soon after landed with orders for him to return immediately, as his brother Hānnibal was to do the same. This refusal of the Carthaginian commanders allowed the Ingaunī to act for themselves, and they entered into a treaty with P. Emīlius Pīetus, consul, in 203 B. C. which they did not long observe. After various defeats in battle, and the capital punishment of the promoters of the war, they were, at last, obliged both to submit and give hostages to L. Emīlius Paullus, proconsul, who led in triumph a number of their chiefs. At their own request the senate appears to have granted a treaty of perpetual peace, for they now saw that neither by treachery nor by arms, were they able to resist the power of Rome. Livius writes them Ligūres Ingaunī (xxviii. 46 seq.).

Ingenūus, i, m. a brave warrior, whose full name was D. Lælius Ingenūus, who commanded in Pānnōnia under the emperor Gallienus, against whom he raised the standard of rebellion, and caused his troops to proclaim him emperor. Enraged at this act of treachery, Gallienus, who was then in France, hastened into Illyricum, and obtained a complete victory over Ingenūus at Mursa, Essek, upon the river Drave, and the usurper either fell in battle, or preferred a Roman death to coming into the hands of the emperor, in the year 261 (Eutrop. ix. 8). In Aurēlius Victor he is called Ingebus, probably an error of the transcribers, since no other author gives him that name (Cæs. 33).

Inguomērus, i, m. the paternal uncle of Arminius, whose cause he espoused against the Romans. Gērmānicus defeated him, and he then fled to Marōbōdius, in whose army he fought against his own nephew Arminius, disdaining to obey the orders of a boy (Tac. Ann. i. 60).

Inō, ūs, f. a daughter of Cādms and Hērmiōnē, who married Athāmas, king of Thēba, Thēba, after the divorce of Nēphēlē, his former wife, by whom he had Phryxus and Hēllē. Inō treated these children with great cruelty, on account of their having a just right to the crown, in preference to her sons. To avoid the plots of their step-mother, Phryxus and Hēllē fled from their father's house, on a golden ram, intending to go to Cōlchis; but the latter, becoming giddy from their flight through the air, fell from behind her brother, and was drowned in the Strait between Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, and Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, which, in commemoration of her fate, was called Hēl-lēspōntus; i. e. the Sea of Hēllē, now the Dardanelles. On Athāmas becoming mad, and putting Lēarchus, one of Inō's sons, to death, she, from grief, threw herself with her other son Mēlicērtā, v. Mēlicertes, who had also the name of Pālemon, into the sea, from an impending rock called Mōlūris, Moluris, at Sciron, whom Nēptūnus, at the solicitation of Vēnus, the mother of Hērmiōnē, and grandmother of this unhappy queen, made sea deities, called by the Greeks Leucōthōē and Pālemon, and by the Romans, Mātūta and Pōrtūnus, often improperly written Portūnnus. Pausānias writes that her dead body was cast ashore at Mēgāra, where it was buried (i. 42). Adj. Inōus, a, um. Inōus Pālemon, Pālemon, son of Inō (Virg. Æn. v. 823). Inōus Mēlicērtā (Virg. G. i. 437). Inōi dōli, the stratagems which Inō devised against Phryxus and Hēllē (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 176).

Inōpus, i, m. a small river of Dēlos according to Strābo, but Plinius calls it a fountain, and considers it the same with the Nile, assigning as a reason, that it rises and falls at the same time with that celebrated river. The natives believed that it flowed from the Nile, by a subterraneous passage, and arose in their island (Paus. ii. 5). In modern times, no vestige either of the fountain or stream has been discovered (Val. Flacc. v. 105).

Insechī, orum, m. the Insechians, an Asiatic nation who joined the Romans in the year 58. They lived near the eastern extremity of the Black Sea (Tac. Ann. xiii. 37).

Instāntius Rūfus, Instāntii Rūfi, m. a man to whom Mārtiālis addresses an epigram or two (vii. 67 &c.).

Instēius Cāpito, Instēii Cāpitōnis, m. a prefect of the camp (Tac. Ann. xlii. 39).

Instēius Cāto, Instēii Cātōnis, m. a commander of the Italians, mentioned by Vellēus Pātērcūlus among other eminent Roman commanders (ii. 16).

Insūbres, ium, v. Insūbri, orum (Siag. Insūber, bri, v. bris), m. a Gallic nation who quitted the territory of the Ædūi, and went into Italy, under Bēllōvēsus. Hearing that the district in which they had settled was called Ager Insūbriūm, they embraced the omen, built a town which they called Mēdiōlānum, Milan, and gave their name to a district in the north of Italy. By the advice of the Boii, they joined the Carthaginians whom they met on Rhōdānus, the Rhone, promised Hānnibal their assistance, and offered to conduct him over the Alps. In the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia, one of their knights, Dūcārius, killed the Roman consul, C. Flāminius. Fond of war, and addicted to plunder, they frequently took up arms, and ravaged the countries in their neighbourhood; but, in 199 B. C., C. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, consul, gained a complete victory over them, on which all the revolted towns surrendered to the Romans. For the reduction of this turbulent and warlike people, Cōrnēlius had the honour of a triumph, and his colleague Q. Mutiūcius Rūfus shared in that honour, although in an inferior degree, for he exhibited his procession only on the Alban mount. Three years after, L. Valērius Flāccus, proconsul, obtained a decisive victory over the Insūbres Gālli, and Boii, in a pitched battle near Mēdiōlānum. From Tācītus, the Insūbres appear to have been admitted to the senate in the year 48. Florus describes them as having bodies more than human, and possessing the dispositions of wild beasts (Liv. v. 34 seq. Tac. Ann. xi. 23. Flor. ii. 4).

Insūla, ae, f. Isola Tiberina, an island formed in Tiber, the Tevere, between Cāmpus Martius and Jāniculūm, Monte Gianicolo, by the crop of the Tarquins, growing in the former, being consecrated to Mars, and thrown into the river, when its waters were very low. The sheaves were so numerous, that the stream could not carry them away, and having stuck on the shallows, were sanded up, and afterwards enlarged by other materials brought down by the current. In the opinion of Livius, mounds were added, and nature was assisted by art. The whole island had the appearance of a ship, and an obelisk represented the mast. The Romans surrounded it with a wall, and afterwards built several temples upon it, of which one was dedicated to Faunus, and another to Esculāpius. To the latter the whole island was sacred (Liv. ii. 5 seq.), hence Suetonius calls it Insūla Esculāpi (Claud. 25).

Intemēlli Ligūres, a tribe of the Ligurians, on the seacoast, to the north of the Ingauni (Liv. xl. 41).

Intemēllia, i, n. a place in Rome; but whether a street or an area is unknown (Liv. xxxiii. 26).—2. Vintimiglia. See Albium Intemēllum.

Intērāma, ae, f. et, Intērāmmum, i, r. Intērāmma, orum, n. Torre di Termini, or, L'Isolotta, a town of the Volsi in Lātium, between the rivers Liris, the Garigliano, and Mēlpi, from which circumstance it had its name. Hither the Romans sent a colony in 313 B. C. Inh. Intērāmnātes, iun (Sing. Intērāmnas, ātis), m. surnamed by Plinius, Succasini and Lirinātes, incurred the displeasure of the senate, by pleading inability to furnish the supplies required by the state during the war with Hannibal in Italy, 212 B. C., and the state of the country did not allow the Romans to exert their authority. After the noble Carthaginian had ceased to become formidable, the senate took the subject again under consideration, and decreed, that the Intērāmnātes, and every other people, who had acted in the same manner, should, from the wealthier citizens, furnish double the number of foot soldiers, and a hundred and twenty cavalry besides, or three foot soldiers for each horseman short of that number, and serve out of Italy whenever occasion required. Against this severe resolution their ambassadors remonstrated, but in vain (Liv. xxvii. 9—xxix. 15).—2. Terni, a town of Umbria, on Nār, the Nera, adjoining to which is a beautiful and fertile valley. The emperors Hōstiliānus and Vōlūsiānus were killed at this town about the year 252, as they went to Messia to attack the usurper Emiliānus (Eutrop. ix. 5). Inh. Intērāmnātes, r. Nārtes, iun, m. (the one derived from the town, the other from the river). Plinius calls them Intērāmnātes, surnamed Nārtes (i. 364).—3. Terramo, on Batinus, the Tordino, at no great distance from the coast of the Gulf of Venice. Like other towns which take their name from their site, there were probably others so called by the Romans, besides the three above-mentioned. Adj. Intērāmnas, as, as; ātis. Intērāmnas ager (Liv. x. 39).

Intērātia, ae, f. a city of Spain, belonging to the Vāccaei, to the north of the Douro, not far from Astorga. It was taken by storm in 153 B. C., when P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Emiliānus, then a military tribune, was the first who mounted the walls (Liv. Ep. 48). Inh. Intērātiū, orum, m.

Intērrex, ēgis, m. a person at first appointed by the Romans to perform the functions of royalty, between the death of one king, and the election of his successor. The import of the term readily suggests the nature of the office at its original establishment. The Intērrex had not only the chief direction of affairs, but had all the ensigns of monarchy. During the commonwealth, the Intērrex neither wore the insignia of a king, nor claimed unlimited authority over his fellow-citizens. When there was no dictator, and the consuls had either died, or fallen in battle, an Intērrex was named to hold the elections, which he often found, from the opposition of the tribunes, impossible to accomplish, and consequently resigned his office, but not before he had named a successor. It frequently happened, that three in succession were nominated Intērrex before the elections could be held; in 365 B. C., there were eight, and thirteen years after, eleven. M. Valērius Cōrvus was the fifteenth from the commencement of the interregnum, and L. Emilius the fourteenth. These prolonged contentions owed, in general, both their commencement and continuance to the turbulence and obstinacy of the tribunes of the people. An Intērrex might be appointed to hold the elections in the absence of the dictator. The patricians at first chose an Intērrex without consulting the people, but as the latter rose in power and consequence, they often usurped the appointment of all the magistrates, and likewise that of the Intērrex.

Intibili, n. Benicarlo, a town of Spain, near Illiturgi, at which the Carthaginian armies under Hāsdrūbal, Māgo and Hāmīlcar, the son of Bāmīlcar, were defeated with great loss in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 49).

Inūi cāstrum, a town on the territory of the Rūtūll, so called from Inūus whom the ancient Italians reckoned among the class of semi-gods called Fauni and Pānes. Sērvius makes Inūus a name of Pān (Virg. Aen. vi. 776). Inh. Cāstrāni, orum, m.

Inūus, i, m. a name given by the Latins to Pān (Liv. i. 5). From Roman authors it appears evident, Inūus was one of the rural gods. In the opinion of some, Inūus is a derivative from the verb Inēo.

Iō, ūs (ōis), Plant. Aul. iii. 6. 20), f. a daughter of Ināchus, who founded Argos, Argo, on the bank of a river afterwards known by his name, now the Planizza. Jupiter, to conceal his wickedness from Jūno, his wife, after he had done violence to Iō, transformed her into a beautiful white cow. But the queen of the gods having discovered the fraud, and solicitous to punish her rival, requested a present of the cow, with which Jupiter, to avoid suspicion, complied. Iō was then committed to the charge of Argos q. r., who watched her so closely, that all intercourse between the sovereign of the gods and his favourite was prevented. On her keeper being put to death by Mēretrius, at the request of Jūpiter, Iō, distracted by the furies which Jūno sent to torment her, went to Egypt, where, at the intercession of her lover, she was restored to her original form. From her quitting her native country, Hōrātius calls her egē (Art. Poet. 124). She married Osiris, the king of that country, and, after her death, was worshipped under the name of Isis. The priests of Iō or Isis were always clothed in linen, which is said to have been her invention. Hence, colūter linigēra turbā (Ov. Met. i. 747). Ināchis, Idis, f. a patronymic of Iō, from her father Ināchus q. v. Islācus, i. m. a priest of Iō or Isis.

Ioānnes Bārgiōra, Ioānnis Bārgiōre, m. a Jew who had the command in the middle precinct, while Simon defended the walls, and Elēzārus kept possession of the temple of Jerusalem, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. v. 12). The readings vary.

Iōbātes, as. m. a king of Lēcia, and father-in-law of Bēllērōphon, described by Hōmērus, but without mentioning his name (Il. vi. 169—193).

Iōcāsta, ae. v. Iōcāstē, es. f. sometimes called Epicāstē, was the daughter of Mēnoceus, and wife of Lāius, to whom she bore Œdipus whom his father exposed at his birth, because an oracle had forewarned him, that his son would prove a parricide. On the fulfilment of this prophecy, Crēon, king of the Plātænses and the sister of Iōcāsta, assumed the government of Thēbe, Thebe, and, some time after, they offered the widow of Lāius and the Theban kingdom to the person who would explain the enigma put forth by the sphinx. Œdipus gave a satisfactory explanation of the riddle, and obtained immediate possession of the crown; but unfortunately by marrying Iōcāsta he became the husband of his own mother. By her, he had two sons Pōlyneices and Etēocles, and two daughters, Ismēnē and Antigōnē. According to some, these were the children of Œdipus and Eurȳgēnia. As soon as Iōcāsta discovered that her husband was her son, she hanged herself. Diōdorus Siculus makes Crēon the father of Iōcāsta, in which he differs both from Apōllōdōrus and Hȳginus (iv. 64). Her unhappy fate entitles her to commiseration, for, so far as design or inclination is concerned, she appears blameless.

Iōlāus, i. m. son of Iphiclus and Autōmēdusa, daughter of Alcāthōus, was a favourite companion of Hērclēs, at whose request his wife Hēbē restored him to the bloom and vigour of youth, after he had arrived at a very advanced age. He was present at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pausānias informs us, that he distinguished himself at the Olympian games, attended Hērclēs in many of his labours, and conducted a colony from Athens and Thēspie, Neochoria, to Sardinia, where he died, and the natives held his name in respectful remembrance (v. 8 seq. Sil. Ital. xii. 364). Hȳginus mentions him among the Argonauts.—2. A Theban, grandson of Amphitryōn (Pin. Pyth. ix. 137).

Iōlcos, v. v. Iōlcos, i. f. Volo, a town of Māgnesia, a district of Thēssalia, Thessaly (hence Lūcānus, Emōnta Iōlcos, Phar. iii. 192), of which no vestige remains; on that part of Māre Egeum, the Archipelago, called Sinus Pāgāseus, the Gulf of Volo. It was so called from Iōlcos, son of Amȳrus. Pōmponius Mēla says it was afterwards called Lārisa, Larissa; but others make Iōlcos a seaport, famous for being the birthplace of Iāson. The kingdom of Iōlcos was the hereditary right of Ēson, the father of that hero; but his natural brother, Pēlias expelled him from his dominions, and then usurped his crown. See Iason. Hōrātius uses Iōlcos in the sense of Thēssalia, as he does Ibēria in the same line for Pōntus, of which Ibēria was only a district (Epod. v. 21). Adj. Iōliciācus, a. um. Iōliciācus sinus, the Gulf of Volo. Iōliciāci pōrtus (Ov. Met. vii. 158).

Iōlē, es. f. a daughter of Eurȳtus, whom Hērclēs sought in marriage. Her father refused him, on which account he took Echēlia by storm, and began to put her parents to death before her face, that she might be induced to accept of him in order to save their lives. Such was her firmness of mind, that she allowed them to be killed, and after that bloody action, Hērclēs sent her captive to his wife Dēlānira. She married Hȳllus, a son of that hero (Ov. Met. ix. 278). Some write the name Jōlē (Hyg. 35).

Iōllas, v. v. Iōlas, ae. m. the master of Cōrindon (Virg. B. ii. 57).—2. The lover of Phylis (Virg. B. iii. 76).—3. A Trojan, overthrown by Cātillus (Virg. Ēn. xi. 640).—4. A son of Antipāter. He and his brothers Philippus and Cāssānder, were cupbearers to Alēxānder Lȳncesta, and, according to Justinus, administered a poison so powerful, that it could not be contained in iron, brass, or in an earthen vessel, but in the hoof of a horse. On the sixth day after the monarch drank the poison he expired (Just. xii. 14, 15).

Ion, ōnis, m. son of Xūthus and Crēusa, daughter of Erētheus, king of Athens. He married Hēlicē, daughter of Selinus, king of Egālēia, and succeeded his father-in-law in the throne. From him the district lying along the southern shore of Cōrinthiācus sinus, the Gulf of Lepanto, in the time of Hērōdōtus called Achāia, came to be known by the name of Iōnia and the inhabitants Iōnii. Compelled at a future period to leave their country, the Ionians settled first in Attica, but, some time after, the greater part emigrated to Asia Minor, Nutolia, and took possession of the maritime part of Lydia, or Mēōnia, from them called Iōnia. This district was bounded on the south by Cāria, on the east by Lydia, on the north by Eōlia, and on the west by Māre Egeum, the Archipelago. Iah. Iōnii, orum (Sing. Iōnius, i. m. more frequently Iōnes, um (Sing. Iōnis, m. Adj. Iōniācus, Iōnicus, et. Iōnius, a. um. Iōniāca pūlla (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 73).—2. A man killed by Chronis in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 252).—3. A priest of Jūpiter at Pisa, who, in the Theban war, tumbled from his horse Dāphneus, priest of Apōllo (Stat. Th. viii. 453).—4. Of Thēssalōnia, an officer in the army of Pērsēus, king of Mācedōnia. He delivered up to Cn. Octāvius the children of that monarch in 170 B. C., in the island Sāmōthracē, Samothrace, to which he had fled after his defeat near Pȳdna (Liv. xlii. 58—xlv. 6).

Ion, ōnis, m. a northern branch of Pēneus, the Salampria.

Iōnia, ae. f. the maritime part of Lydia, or Mēōnia, as it was likewise called. Iah. Iōnes, um (Sing. Iōnis, i. v. Iōnii, orum).

m. (Just. ii. 5), took possession of the tract along the seacoast of Mæonia or Lÿdia, and from them it was called Iônia, and built Ephesus; Miletus, Cólophon, Priênê, Lebêdus, Myus, Erythra, Clazômênæ, Phœcea. Besides they took possession of many islands in the Archipelago (Vel. Pat. i. 4). Adj. Iônias, Iônicus, et, Iônâcus, a, um. Iônium (Mære, v. Æquor), called by Hörâtius, Iônus sinus (Epod. x. 19), and by Lûcânus, Iônus pontus (Phar. v. 614), the Ionian sea, an ancient name of that part of the Mediterranean which washed the western coast of Græcia, Greece, to the S. of Mære Adriaticum, v. Hâdriaticum, quod et Sûperum, the Gulf of Venice. To account for this appellation, some authors refer to a tradition which reported that Iô, distracted by the furriest by Jûno to torment her, crossed that sea. This derivation is totally inadmissible, since no adjective is formed from her name, and if there had, it would have been Ious, not Iônus. Besides, on quitting Argos, she went to Egypt, nearly in the opposite direction. It were perhaps better to trace it from Ion, an Athenian, son of Xûthus and Crêusa, q. v. Théopompus derives this adjective from the name of the man who conducted a colony of the Iônes to the island lying in this sea (Strab. 459). Appianus refers it to Iônus, son of Dÿrrhâchius, inadvertently killed by Hêrcules who threw his dead body into the sea, which was afterwards called by his name (Bel. Civ. 451). The Romans first entered this sea in 222 B. C., during the consulship of M. Valerius Laevinus (Flor. ii. 7). Iônici môtus, Ionian dances, i. e. immodest or lascivious dances (Hor. Od. iii. 6. 21). Iônicus attâgen, the Ionian wood-cock (Hor. Epod. ii. 54). Martialis writes Attâgenæ, arum, f. not Attâgen, ênis, m. with Hörâtius, but both agree in celebrating the delicacy and fine flavour of this bird (Mart. xiii. 61), in which they are joined by Plinius (ii. 440). This kind of bird abounded in Iônia.

Iônus, i. m. the first king of Thessaly, said by some to have been a son of Apôllo, and the first who coined both gold and silver. Others make him a son of Dÿrrhâchius who, having been killed unintentionally by Hêrcules, was thrown into the sea which received his name. Sôlinus derives this appellation from a king; but does not say whether he was called Ion, or Iônus (Luc. Phar. vi. 402; Sol. 23).

Iôpas, m. a musician at the court of Elissa, queen of Carthage, who had been taught by Atlas. Musicians, in ancient times, allowed their hair to grow to a great length in imitation of Apôllo who presided over that art; hence crinitus Iôpas (Virg. Æn. i. 740).

Iördânes, is, m. the Nahr-El-Arden, or the El-Sharia, a river of Pâleestina, which takes its rise in Hêrmon, a branch of Antilibanus, passes through Lâcus Sâmochonites, and afterwards falls into Lâcus Gennêsartitis, v. Mære Tiberias, the lake of Gennêsaret, the Sea of Tiberias, or, Sea of Galilee. Thence issuing again, it waters a large valley, at the extremity of which it loses itself in Lâcus Asphâlites (i. e. the bituminous lake), called also Mære Môrtuum, the Dead Sea. Its breadth between these two lakes does not, in general, exceed sixty or eighty feet, but its depth may be estimated at ten or twelve. In winter it overflows its narrow channel, and, when swelled by rain, spreads its waters a quarter of a league. The overflowing generally happens in March, when the colour becomes yellow, and its course impetuous. This periodical inundation forms a kind of second channel covered with forests of reeds, willows, and various shrubs which serve as a covert for wild beasts. Hence the Scriptural expression "a lion from the swelling of Jordan" (Jerem. xlix. 19). At its mouth this river does not exceed sixty paces (Tac. Hist. v. 6).

Ios, i. f. Nio, a small island near Clâros, on which Hômerus died.

Jôseph, m. a son of Jacob, but not the youngest, as Jûstinus has falsely asserted. This historian mentions, that his brethren fearing the superiority of his genius, sold him to foreign merchants, by whom he was carried into Egypt, where he learned the magical arts by the shrewdness of his intellect, and, in a short time, became a great favourite of the king. He was very skilful in prodigies, and the first who established the doctrine of dreams. Nothing of divine or human law seemed unknown to him; he even foresaw a famine many years before it came to pass, and the whole inhabitants of Egypt would have perished, had not the king, by his advice, caused grain to be laid up for many years; and such was the confidence in him, that his answers appeared not to be given by a man, but by a god (Just. xxxvi. 2). For a correct account of the life of Jôseph, the reader is referred to the Sacred Volume.

Jôsêphus, i. m. a Jewish historian, of great reputation, whose writings contain much valuable information, supplied by no other writer, and interesting from containing the state of that nation, the most distinguished on earth, in the last years of their existence as a separated people. By Nicânor, a tribune of the Emperor Vêspâsianus, he was taken from a cave into which he had fled, made prisoner, and loaded with chains. In this wretched condition, he foretold that the same Vêspâsianus would give him his liberty, but not until he had obtained the empire. According to Suetonius, this prediction was fulfilled. The biographer says he was a person of high birth (Vesp. 5).

Jotapiânus, i. m. a man of ambition, whose life atoned for the rebellion which he attempted to excite in Sÿria, in the reign of Dêcius (Aur. Vic. Cas. 29).

Jôvianus, i. m. son of Varrônianus, a native of Pannônia, was elected to the empire of Rome, on the death of Jûliânus, surnamed the Apostate, when, according to Ammiânus or Marcêllinus, he was only first of the domestics, but this appointment conferred the dignity of a senator. From Eutrôpius we learn, that he obtained the favour of the soldiers more from the merit of his father, than from his own. When he obtained the purple, the army was to the east of Tigris, the Dejilah, and the danger of the situation obliged him, a few hours after the death of his predecessor, to put the army in motion, the only measure calculated to extricate the troops from present peril. Sâpor, king of Pêrsia, annoyed his rear, and cut off stragglers. On reaching the banks of the Dejilah, without provisions and without courage, he concluded a peace with that monarch, necessary, says Eutrôpius, but disgraceful, conceding to him five provinces.

to the east of the Dejlah, and the impregnable city of Nisibis. The dishonourable terms excited universal disapprobation, and the inhabitants of the empire appear to have considered it his duty to violate the oaths, by which the peace was ratified, in order to remove the disgrace from the state. Jöviānus, however, in opposition to all remonstrances, preserved inviolate the sanctity of his oath, by fulfilling the conditions of peace into which he had entered with the Persian monarch. He sincerely embraced the religion of the Gospel, on which account Christian writers have bestowed great applause on Jöviānus, contrasting his character with that of his predecessor, the Apostate. In the pages of Pagan authors, the conduct of Jöviānus appears to less advantage, because their worship almost ceased during his reign, and never revived in the same countries. In seven months, the Roman army returned to Antiochia, Antakia, having performed a march of fifteen hundred miles, and endured all the hardships of war, famine, and climate. After remaining there six weeks, he set out for Constantinople, which he never reached. He expired at Dadastina, Kastabul, on the first day of the year 364. Jöviānus married Chärito, daughter of Leclianus, by whom he had a son called Värrönianus, from his paternal grandfather. At his father's death, Värrönianus was an infant, and Välcenianus and Välens succeeded to the throne (Eutrop. x. 17).

Iphëus, ëos, m. a noble Lycian in the Trojan army, killed by Pätröclüs clad in the armour of Achilles (Hom. II. xvi. 417).

Iphlässa, æ, f. a daughter of Proetus, who, with her sisters, was struck with madness, by Jüno, in revenge for her treating contemptuously that goddess. Mëlampus, having cured them, received the third of the kingdom of Proetus, and his daughter Iphlässa in marriage.—2. A name of Iphigëia, daughter of Agämënnon and Clÿtëmnëstra (Lucret. i. 86).

Iphicles, is, m. a philosopher of the Cynic sect, mentioned by Ammianus Märcellinus (xxx. 5).

Iphiclus, i. m. the father of Prötësilläus, and king of Phylacë, was the maternal uncle of Iäson, and one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 473).—2. Son of Thëstius and Eurÿthëmis, daughter of Clëöbëa, brother of Clÿmënus, who was one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. i. 370).—3. Son of Amphitrÿon and Alcmëna, whom his mother bore to her husband at the same time she bore Hërcülës to Jüpiter. Apöllödorus writes this name Iphicles (ii. 4. 8 seq.).—4. Son of Phÿläcus, and father of Mëdon, was surpassed by Nëstor in running (Hom. II. xxiii. 636).

Iphicrätës, is, m. an Athenian who acquired great distinction by improvements in military discipline, and by a superior kind of armour. Fertility of invention, regulated by a powerful judgment, suggested numerous ameliorations in every department, and enabled him to take all advantages of the condition of the enemy, as well as of the bravery and temper of his own troops. He conquered the Thracians, restored Sëuthës, an ally of the Athenians, to his kingdom, and intercepted the Mora (i. e. 500 or more men) of the Lacëdæmonians. Artäxërxës, in preparing for war against the Egyptians, requested Iphicrätës to command twelve thousand mercenary troops, which he brought to the highest state of discipline. His timely arrival at Lacëdæmon prevented Epäminönidas from taking that town. He lived to a great age, respected by his countrymen, who had, at a former period, brought him and Timöthëus to trial for their lives. His personal appearance corresponded with his mental endowments, so that his countenance and gait commanded the respect of every beholder. Iphicrätës, ium, m. soldiers instructed in the military discipline of Iphicrätës, compared, by Cörnëlius Nëpos, to the Fäbiäni (Vit. Iphic. Curt. III. 13).

Iphidämas, antis, m. a son of Antënor, brought to Thräcia by Cissëns. He first wounded Agämënnon, on which account Hömërus gives a minute description of his education. Agämënnon killed him (Hom. II. xi. 221 seq.).—2. An Argonaut of this name, mentioned by Orphëus, but the good editions read Amphidämas q. v. (150).

Iphigëia, æ, f. a daughter of Agämënnon, king of Mycëne, and Clÿtëmnëstra, who was a daughter of Tÿndärus and Lëda, and consequently the sister of Hëllëna. When the princes of Greece had, in fulfilment of their oath, taken up arms to revenge the criminal conduct of Päris, Agämënnon, on account of his military talents and being the brother of Mëncläus, was appointed commander-in-chief of the combined forces. After that prodigious armament had assembled in the port of Aulis, Fathë, or, Megala Fathë, Diäna, provoked at his having killed one of her favourite stags, prevented, by contrary winds, their sailing for Tröja. On consulting the oracle, the Greeks were informed that Iphigëia must be sacrificed, to appease the enraged goddess, otherwise they must remain in the harbour. Struck with horror at this awful response, Agämënnon sternly refused to give up his daughter to be murdered, and ordered the princes with their troops to return home. But the winning eloquence of Ulyssës, added to the urgent remonstrances of the other chiefs, at last prevailed, and parental affection yielded to military fame. Ulyssës was then sent to Mycëne, to carry the beautiful Iphigëia to bleed on the altar of Diäna. By falsely assuring Clÿtëmnëstra that her daughter was to be married to Achilles, he quickly accomplished his mission. The innocent victim attended him to Aulis, and her blood procured a favourable wind to the Grecian fleet. Her behaviour at the altar is described with inimitable beauty by Æschÿlus, in his tragedy of Agämënnon. Sëuëca and Thomson have written tragedies bearing the same title. But neither the performance of the Latin, nor that of the English poet can be compared with the work of Æschÿlus, than which it would perhaps be difficult to name any dramatic production of greater excellence. Some authors maintain, that when Iphigëia was on the point of being immolated, Diäna substituted a hart, and carried her to Taurica, where she became the priestess of that goddess. This appears to have been the opinion of Jüvënalis, who calls the substitution of the hart a furtive expiation (Sat. xii. 120). Some antiquities, lately discovered in Greece, seem to confirm that opinion. From Taurica, Iphigëia at a future period brought a statue of Diäna to Brauron (Paus. i. 33). Jüvënalis uses Iphigëia to denote any marriageable virgin in the prime of youth and beauty (Sat. xii. 119). To her the Tauri sacrificed all the Greeks, and shipwrecked persons who fell into their hands (Herod. iv. 103). Hómērus calls her Iphlānassa (Il. ix. 145), as does also Lācerētius (i. 86). The fiction respecting her being sacrificed must have been invented after the days of Homer, for he describes her as being alive and in his own house, in the last year of the Trojan war, in the line above referred to.

Iphimēdia, æ, f. the wife of Alōēus. By Nēptūnus she became the mother of Otus and Ephialtes (Hom. Od. xi. 304). Pindārus calls them the boys of Iphimēdia (Pyth. iv. 157).

Iphinoē, es, f. a Lemnian matron, whom the Fury excited against her husband (Val. Flacc. ii. 162).

Iphinoūs, i, m. a man killed in the Theban war, by Amphlārāus (Stat. Th. vii. 714).—2. Son of Dexias (Dēxīlades), a Grecian nobleman, killed by Glaucus, son of Hippōlōchus (Hom. Il. vii. 14).

Iphion, ōnis, m. the father of Alcimēdon, who gained the prize for wrestling, at the Olympic games (Pin. Ol. viii. 106).

Iphis, idis, c. g. a child of Ligdus and Telēthūsa, of Crēta, Candia, was born a girl, but, to pacify her father, who had an ardent wish for a son, declared to be a boy, and was put accordingly into the male dress. Neue, except the midwife, knew that she had assumed an appearance to which nature gave her no title, and, therefore, she grew up without suspicion of being different from what her dress indicated. Her father betrothed her to Ianthē; and, on the day of her marriage, Isis, at the earnest supplication of Telēthūsa, changed Iphis into a man, between whom and Ianthē the nuptials were then celebrated, in the presence of Jūno, Vēnus, and Hymēneus (Ov. Met. ix. 665–796).—2. The grandfather of the preceding (Ov. Met. ix. 708).—3. The father of Evādne, who married Cāpānēus, and in vain dissuaded her from terminating her life by throwing herself on the funeral pile of her husband. Iphias, adis, f. Evādne (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 1. 22).—4. A native of Cyp̄rus, of very low extraction, who conceived an ardent attachment to Anāxarētē, a descendant from Tēucer, who repelled his advances with scorn, on account of the meanness of his birth. Her indignant treatment drove him to despair, and he terminated his life by strangulation. Anāxarētē looked at his funeral with perfect indifference, and immediately was changed into stone (Ov. Met. xiv. 698 seq.).—5. A man killed in the Theban war, by Athamas (Stat. Th. viii. 445).—6. Son of Alēctor, according to Pausānias, whom Vālērīus Flāccus makes one of the Argonauts. He did not return, but fell in battle with the Māriandyni (Val. Flacc. vii. 423).

Iphition, ōnis, m. son of Otr̄yntēus and a Naid, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 382).

Iphitus, i, m. an aged Trojan, a companion of Enēas (Virg. Ēn. ii. 435).—2. A son of Eur̄ytus, king of Cēchālia. Hērclēs tumbled him headlong from a rock, after he had killed his brother (Stat. Th. v. 400).—3. Son of Naubolus, and charioteer of Lālus, was, according to Vālērīus Flāccus (i. 363), one of the Argonauts, but according to Apōllōnius Rhōdius, that Iphitus, the Argonaut, was the son of Eur̄ytus, king of Cēchālia (i. 86).—4. The father of Archēptōlēmus, hence called Iphitides (Hom. Il. viii. 128).—5. The father of Schēdius, a prince of considerable dominion who lived at Pānōpē (Hom. Il. xvii. 306).—6. A king of Elis, who, according to Pātērclūs, founded the Olympic games. Others say that he only renewed them, having been first established by Hērclēs (Vel. Pat. i. 8).

Ipsēa. See Idja.

Ipsithilla, æ, f. a woman to whom Cātūlus addresses one of his poems, of which the sentiment does little credit to either the poet or Ipsithilla (xxxii).

Iphthima, æ, f. a daughter of Icārius, in whose appearance Pallas sent out a phantom to lessen the grief of Penēlopē (Hom. Od. iv. 797).

Ira, v. Hira, æ, f. one of the cities on the seacoast of Mēssēnia, belonging to Agāmēnon, which, with other gifts, he promised to Achilles, if he returned to the war (Hom. Il. ix. 150 seq.). It was taken by the Lacedæmonians after a siege of eleven years. There was also a mountain of this name (Paus. iv. 20 seq.).—2. Mesjid Ali, on the west bank of Euphrātes, and a little to the south of Bāb̄ylon.

Irēsia, arum, f. a town of Thessaly, which, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Roman army under T. Quinctius Flāminius, who followed him, Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, burned, took the inhabitants along with him, and allowed them to carry away as much of their property as they could, 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Iria, æ, f. Voghera, a town of Ligūria. Inh. Iriates, ium, m.—2. The Staffora, a river which has its rise in the same district.

Iris, idos, acc. Irim, v. Irin, f. the daughter of Thāmas and Elēctra, was the messenger of Jūno (nuncia Jūnōnis), and the goddess of the rainbow, often used to denote the rainbow itself. The ancients believed that Iris raised water from the earth to the clouds; hence she is represented bringing them supplies, in order to deluge the world. She stood or sat behind the queen of the gods, adorned, according to Ovidius, with a thousand colours, which must be considered as a poetical exaggeration, since it is the primitive colours only which appear in the rainbow, and their real number is exactly seven, viz., red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. From these, "myriads of mingling dyes result, and myriads still remain" (Ov. Met. i. 270 seq.). Hómērus calls her wind-footed, i. e. having feet swift as the wind. Thaumāntis, īdos, v. Thaumāntis, idos, f. a patronymic of Iris, from her father; hence she is also called Thaumāntēa Virgo.

Iris, is, m. the Jezil-Ermek (i. e. the Green river), a river of Pōntus, into which Lycus, the Kolli-hisar, and several other streams flow (Plin. i. 653). Like the other rivers of Pōntus, it falls into the Black Sea (Val. Flacc. iv. 600).

Iron, ōnis, m. a man of C̄yzicus, who lost his life in a skirmish with the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. iii. 111).—2. A Scythian commander, who fell by the hand of a Greek, in the war against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 201).

Irpinus, i, m. a Roman, drowned in ex-tempting to cross Trēbia, the Trebia, when his countrymen were engaged with the Carthaginian army under Hannibal (Sil. Ital. iv. 595).

Irus, i. m. a beggar of Dūlichium, remarkable for gluttony, who, by his humour, amused the suitors of Pēnelōpē, and executed their commissions, for which they maintained him at the expense of Ulysses. He was a man of great size, but not of proportional strength. Ulysses, on his return, brought him to the ground by a single blow, because he attempted to prevent his entering the gates, and afterwards killed him. According to Hōmērus, his proper name was Arngēus q. v., but the youth called him Irus, because he was the messenger of Penelope's lovers (Od. xviii. 5 seq.). Prōpērtius contrasts him with Cræsus, king of Lydia, in consequence of the poverty of the one, and the wealth of the other, having become proverbial (iii. 5. 17). Paupērior Iro (Mart. v. 40).

Is, f. Hit, a city of Bābylōnia, appears to have had a variety of names. There is reason to believe that there was also a river under this appellation in the same country, which flows into Euphrātes (Herod. i. 179).

Iseus, i. m. a native of Chalcis, in Eubœa, Negropont, who removed to Athens, and was the instructor of Dēmōsthēnes. His eloquence appears to have been flowing, rapid, and impetuous. He is commended by Quintilianus (xii. 10. 22), and by Juvēnalis (Sat. iii. 74).—2. A native of Assīria, who flourished at Rome under the emperor Hadrīanus, and was a voluminous writer. Plinius commends highly the fluency and energy of his oratory.

Isāfēnses, ium, m. a people of Africa (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Isāica, e. m. a prefect of the Gætulians, in the army of Hannibal, in Italy (Liv. xxiii. 18).

Isālees, is, m. an African, the son-in-law of Mago, in the army of Hannibal, killed by Apollus in the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 289 seq.).

Isandrus, i. m. son of Bellerōphon and Philōnōē, the brother of Hippōlōchus and Lāodāmia (Hom. II. vi. 197).

Isāra, æ, m. the Iser, a river of Gālīa, which takes its rise in Alpes, the Alps, and running westward falls into Rhōdānus, the Rhone, near Vāllēntīa, Valence (Luc. Phar. i. 399).—2. The Oise, a branch of Sēquāna, the Seine, Briva Isāra, Pont-Oise.

Isauria, æ, f. a maritime district of Asia Minor, Natolia, between Cilīcia and Pāmphyliā. Plinius says, that many did not consider it as forming a separate division, but made Pāmphyliā the western boundary of Cilīcia. The chief town was Isaura, v.

Isaurum, i. n. Bei Shehr, which the Roman proconsul, P. Sērvilius, took, in 77 B. C., for which he received the surname of Isauricus (Liv. Ep. 93. Flor. iii. 6). To this town the adjective Vetus is frequently added, and to another in this country built after the former had been destroyed, the adjective Nova, now Sidi Shehr. Inh. Isauri, orum (Sing. Isaurus, i.), m. were given to robbery and plunder (Amm. Mar. xiv. 2). Adj. Isaurus, et, Isauricus, a, um. Isaura opes (Ov. Fast. i. 593). Isaurica gens (Plin. i. 587).

Isaurus, i. m. a river in the north of Italy, a branch of Sāpis, the Savio. Commentators are divided in opinion respecting the true reading in Lūcānus; some have "junctus Isāpis Isaurus;" others, "junctus Sāpē Pē-saurus," but the best MSS. have "junctus Sāpis Isaurus" (Phar. ii. 406).

Ischōmāchē, es, f. daughter of Atrācius, called also Hippōdāmīa, v. Hippōdāmē, who had this name from ισσος, I have, and μαχη, a battle, because at her marriage with Pirithōus, king of the Lāpithæ, a bloody battle was fought between them and the Centaurs (Prop. ii. 2. 9). Hŷgīnus makes her the daughter of Adrāstus (33).

Isēllus, i. m. a freedman of the emperor Gālba, who, afterwards, obtained the surname of Mārtiānus, and was one of the chief counsellors of his sovereign (Aur. Vic. Ep. 6).

Isidōrus, i. m. an officer under Antōchus, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 20).—2. The commander of the pirates who infested the Mediterranean Sea, and were defeated by P. Sērvilius Isauricus, in 79 B. C. (Flor. iii. 6).—3. A Cynic philosopher, who told the emperor Nēro that he sung the misfortunes of Nauplius well, but behaved himself very ill. For this freedom of speech, Nēro only banished him from Italy (Suet. Ner. 39).

Isiōnda, æ, f. a city of Iōniā. Inh. Isiōndēnses, ium, m. whose citadel was besieged by the Tērmēssēnses. At their request the Roman consul, Cn. Mānlius Vulsō, on his march against the Gāllogræci, compelled the Tērmēssēnses to desist, and draw off their troops, 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Isis, idis, f. a goddess of the Egyptians, whom Diōdōrus considers a daughter of Sātūrnus and Rhēa. Some writers on mythology maintain that Iō q. v., daughter of Imēchus, on recovering the human form, taught the Egyptians agriculture, legislation, &c., on which account they paid her divine honours after her death. Her attention to agriculture and transformation into a cow, account for her being worshipped under that form. She married Osiris, who lost his life in the rebellion raised against him by his brother Typhon, and the Egyptians supposed, that the tears of Isis occasioned the annual overflowing of the Nile. Her worship prevailed over all Egypt, and her priests, who were clothed in linen, had their heads always shaved, lived in perpetual celibacy, walked bare-footed, and abstained from certain articles of food, practices which have been adopted by some orders of the Monks. According to Hērōdōtus, her statue was that of a woman, with the horns of an ox (ii. 41 seq.). She held in her right hand a sistrum, with a stroke of which the ancients believed she could inflict diseases, and her priests also carried one, for which reason Mārtiālis calls them sistrata turba. From their wearing only linen, and having their heads shaven, that poet in the same line calls them linigēri calvi (xii. 29). Isīāus, i. m. a priest of Isis. Assumpto Isīāci habitu, having put on the dress of a priest of Isis (Val. Max. vii. 3). The priests of Isis were fortune-tellers, and strolled about the towns and villages, practising that deception for money, on which account Cicerō calls them Isīāci conjēctōres. Isēum, i. n. a temple of Isis, built at Rome by the emperor Dōmītiānus (Eutrop. vii. 23). Adj. Isīāus, a, um. Isīāica lēna (Juv. Sat. vi. 489), whence it appears the priestesses of that goddess at Rome, led vicious and infamous lives, which is confirmed by Jōsephus. Isiaci tumultus, the agitated worshippers of Isis (Auson. 418). Isiacum sistrum (Manil. i. 916).

Ismārus, i, m. v. Ismāra, orum, n. a town and mountain of Thrācia, Romania, belonging to the Cīcōnes. Ismāris, idis, f. a lake in the vicinity of the town. Adj. Ismārius, Ismārus, et, Ismāricus, a, um, of Ismārus, also of Thrācia, Thracian. Ismāria gentes, Thracian nations (Ov. Met. x. 305). Ismāra patria (Virg. Æn. x. 351).

Ismēnē, es, f. a daughter of Œdīpus and Iocāsta. In early age she was betrothed to Atys g. v., a youth of Cīrha. She showed much affection for her mother, and was present when she laid violent hands on herself (Stat. Th. viii. 555 seq.).

Ismēnias, a, m. a Theban, who accompanied Pelōpidas, at the time Alexander, tyrant of Phēre, Belestina, seized both, and threw them into prison. Epāmlnōndas made war on Alexander, and procured their release (Cor. Nep. Pelop. 5).—2. A prince of the Thebans, who assisted, with forces raised at his private expense, the Athenians then oppressed by thirty tyrants (Just. v. 9).—3. A prince of the Boeotians, who appears to have been in the interest of Pērcēus, king of Mācedōnia (Liv. xlii. 38).

Ismēnus, i, m. the Ismeno, a river of Boeōtia, according to Pflūius, sacred to the Muses, near Thēbe, Theva, which passes that town, and falls into Eurīpus, the Strait of Negropont. A bloody contest was fought during the Theban war in this stream, in which Hippōmēdon signalized himself by slaughtering a number of the Boeotians (Stat. Th. ix. 229 seq.). Ovid adds the epithet celer to Ismēnus, which is not very applicable to so very inconsiderable a stream, which, a late traveller says, may be stepped over. It has no water except after heavy rain, when it rushes into the lake Hylika, about four miles west of Theva. Plūtarchus states it was first called the foot of Cādmus, and that it took the name of Ismēnos from a son of Amphion and Niōbē, who was drowned in it; Pausānias says, from a son of Apōllo and Melia. Ismēnis, idis, f. of Ismēnus, applied to females, or to nouns feminine; Crōcālē, daughter of Ismēnus (Ov. Met. iii. 169). Ismēnides, um, f. Theban women. Ismēnius, i, m. Apōllo, from having a temple at Thēbe. Adj. Ismēnius, a, um, Theban.

Isōcrātes, is, m. an Athenian orator of great celebrity, was the son of Thēōdōrus, a maker of musical instruments. To the elegance and accuracy of his diction, he paid uncommon attention, and in some instances descended to niceties, which subjected him to the charge of puerility. At his excessive refinement Lūcilius sneers in his 5th Satire. His first attempts at public declamation were unsuccessful, afterwards he confined himself to the composing of orations in private, as his natural timidity had unfitted him for the tumult of large assemblies. Grief for the loss of the battle at Charōnē made him abstain from the use of food, and he expired on the fourth day, at the age of ninety-eight. His name often occurs in the writings of Cicēro, who calls him the father of eloquence (de Orat. ii. 2), and Quintiliānus says, he studied all the beauties of speech (x. l. 79). In Pausānias he is extolled for perseverance, prudence, and independence (i. 18). Isōcrātī, orum, m. the imitators of Isōcrātes. Adj. Isōcrāticus, a, um (Gel. xviii. 8).

Israel, or, Israhel, ēlis, m. a son of Isaac, whom Jūstinus makes a king of Dāmāseus, the successor of Abraham (xxxvi. 2). This historian states that he had ten sons, of whom the youngest was Jōseph, among whom he divided the kingdom, and that after the death of Jūda they all took the name of Jūdai. Here all is inaccuracy; the true history of these patriarchs is only to be found in the Holy Scriptures.

Issa, a, f. Lissa, an island in Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, near the coast of Illīricum (Cæs. B. C. iii. 9). Inh. Issēi, orum, et, Issenses, ium, m. Adj. Issēus, Issēicus, a, um, et, Issēnsis, is, e. Issalci lembi (Liv. xxxii. 21). Issenses naves (Liv. xliii. 9).

Issē, es, f. daughter of Mācārēus, whom Apōllo, having assumed the appearance of a shepherd, deprived of innocence. From her father she is called Mācārēis (Ov. Met. vi. 124).

Issēdōnes. See Essēdōnes.

Issus, i, f. Aissae, a town of Cilicia, at which Dārius engaged Alexander the Great, in 333 B. C. (Diod. Sic. xvii. 32). To it Jūstinus alludes (xi. 9). Adj. Issicus, a, um. Issicus sinus, the Bay of Scanderoon.

Istevōnes, um, m. a German nation, descended from one of the three sons of Mānus (Tac. Ger. 2).

Ister, e. Istrus (Tib. iv. 1. 146), et, Hister, tri, m. the ancient name of that part of the river Dānūbius, the Danube, from the junction of Sāvus, the Save, to Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. Ister commences at Axīōpōlis, Rassovat, or, from Vīndōbōna, Vienna. From its having two names Ovidius (Ep. Pont. i. 8. 11), and Silius Italicus (i. 326), call it bīnōminis. The Danube is the largest river in Europe, rises about 30 miles from Rhēnus, the Rhine, in the black forest in Germany (according to Strābo and Plīnius in the mountain Abnōba), runs in an easterly direction through Austria, Germany, Hungary, part of Turkey in Europe, and discharges itself into Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. It has 60 navigable branches, and 120 smaller streams. Pōmpōnius Mēla says it had as many mouths as the Nile, of which 3 were small, and 4 navigable, which Ammīānus Mārcellinus calls Pēucē, Naracustōma, Calōnstōma, Pseudostōma, Boreonstōma, Sthenostōma, much less than the rest. To the seventh he gives no proper name, but adds it was very large and black, from its marshy appearance (xxii. 8). Six still remain, but they can scarcely be entered by ships considerable either for size or burden. The course of the Danube has not, perhaps, been accurately measured; but it cannot be estimated below 1700 miles. Though of great breadth and depth in many places, it is not generally navigable, on account of the cataracts. Strābo, Dīodōrus Sicīlus, Tācītus, and Plīnius have given descriptions of this river in many respects different, and all exceedingly inaccurate. With the whole course of the Danube the Greeks and Romans were very imperfectly acquainted. Their knowledge of the countries to the N. of this large river, was almost wholly obtained by vague report from unlettered barbarians, and, of course, very incorrect. In the decline of the Roman empire, to that people it became better known, in consequence of almost all the barbarous nations, who assailed that state, commencing hostilities by ravaging the country on the banks of the Danube. But learning had sunk with the state, and no minute or accurate account of this river is found in classic authors. Scythicus Ister (Luc. Phar. ii. 50).

Isthmus, i. m. a neck of land which connects a peninsula with the continent. Cōrinthiōcus isthmus, Hexamilī, lies between Peloponnēsus, the Morea, and the mainland of Greece, having Sinus Saronicus, the Gulf of Egina on the east, and Sinus Cōrinthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto, on the west. Its breadth does not exceed five miles (although the modern name makes it six), yet every attempt to cut a canal across it failed for reasons now unknown. The ancients used to draw ships over it by means of machinery. The soil, not anciently reckoned fertile, continues in a state of nature, which cannot excite surprise, for agriculture can never flourish under Turkish sloth and oppression. Its hills are finely clad with firs as in ancient times. This isthmus was strongly fortified during the celebrated eras of Grecian liberty; but was often taken, notwithstanding its advantages both from nature and art. The Roman emperor Nero attempted to cut through it; animated his guards by a speech to begin the work, first himself broke ground and carried off a basketful of earth on his shoulders (Suet. Ner. 19). How long he continued his efforts to accomplish this undertaking, history gives no information, nor is that of any consequence, since, like others who had begun the same plan, he was mortified with disappointment. Adj. Isthmius, et, Isthmiācus, a. um. Isthmia (cērtāmina); Isthmii, the Isthmian games, instituted in honour of Mēlicēta, nearly the same with those of Olympia, &c., celebrated every three years, not five years as some inaccurately maintain. Isthmiorum (cērtāminum) stātum ludicrum, the stated solemnity of the Isthmian games (Liv. xxxiii. 32). Isthmius labor, Isthmian exertion, i. e. effort to gain the Isthmian prize (Hor. Od. iv. 3. 3). Isthmia cōrōna, i. e. pinēa v. apla, a chaplet of pine-leaves, afterwards of withered parsley, which after a while was discontinued, and the garland of pine-leaves came again into use. Isthmia claustra, the barriers of Hexamilī (Stat. Ach. i. 407). Isthmiāca fauilla, the ashes of Corinth (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 63). Isthmiāca arēna, the place on which the Isthmian prizes were contended for (Stat. Th. vi. 557). The adjective Isthmiācus is used in reference to the inhabitants and town of Syracūsē, because it was founded by a colony from Cōrinthus.

Istria, a. f. a country of considerable extent, lying on the northeast extremity of Mare Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, annexed to Italy by the emperor Augustus. It had its name from Ister, the Danube, probably from the ancients erroneously supposing that a branch of that river fell into the Gulf of Venice. Inh. Istri, et, Istriāni, orum, m. a savage nation, says Livius, infamous for their piracies (x. 2). According to common report, they were originally a Colchian people, sent by Æetes in pursuit of the Argo- navis, by whom his daughter Mēdia had been carried off. They had their name from the river, and the country from them (Jen. xxxii. 3). Adj. Istricus, a. um. Istricus bellum (Liv. xxxix. 55). Istricus ritus (Liv. xxiv. 10).

Istrus, v. Histrus, i. f. a city of Thraciā, but in ruins when Amulianus Marcōllinus wrote (xxii. 8).—2. A town of Creta, otherwise called Istro (Steph.).

Issus, i. m. a reputed son of Priāmus, killed by Agamēnnon (Hom. Il. xi. 101).

Itālia, a. f. Italy, a large and celebrated country of Europe, situated between 7 and 19 degrees of E. longitude, and between 38 and 46 degrees of N. latitude; bounded on the S. by Frētum Sicilum, the Strait of Messina, which separates it from Sicily; and on the N. E. by Mare Adriaticum, v. Adriaticum, quod et Sūperum, the Gulf of Venice, which divides it from Græciā, Greece, now part of Turkey in Europe. Alpes, the Alps, form the boundary between Italy and Germany, on the N.; and on the S. W. it is washed by that part of the Mediterranea formerly called Mare Tyrrhēnum, v. Tuscum, quod et Infērum, the Tuscan sea, not in use. Hyginus refers the name to Itālus, son of Telégōnus and Pendlopē; Timæus to Itālos, an ox, in ancient Greek, a derivation which Festus has adopted, "the country was called Itālia, because it had great Itāli, i. e. oxen;" and Servius to Itālus, a king of Sicily, who sailed from that island to the mouths of Tiber, the Tevere, and called the country from his own name, Itālia (Virg. Æn. i. 26). Apenninus, the Apennines, form a ridge of mountains which extends from the Alps to Rhēgium, Reggio, the whole length of the country. The sources of all the rivers in Italy are found in these mountains. Rōma, Rome, for many years the seat of universal empire, was the capital of Italy. From it, the inhabitants of Italy were frequently called Rōmāni, a name originally given only to the natives of that city and its territory, which was for many years very small. According to Virgilius, the original inhabitants, particularly on the banks of the Tevere, were Fauns, nymphs, and a race of men who sprang from trees; by which expression he probably meant people who had no houses, but sheltered themselves from the weather in the hollow trunks of trees (Æn. viii. 314).

Itālia contains 1200 square miles. Tācitus considers the part of Italy between the Po and the Alps, the most valuable of the whole country (Hist. ii. 17). The Romans did not subject to their power the whole of Italy until 268 B. C., four hundred and eighty-six years after the foundation of their city, according to Flōrus (ii. 1), the five hundredth year, but his date is at variance with the consular calendar. Inh. Itāli, et, Itālici, orum (Itālōtārum, Herod. iv. 15), m. the Italians. Itālis, idis, f. of Itālia, Italy, applied to a female, or to a noun feminine. Itālis ora (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 3. 84). Adj. Itālus, et, Itālicus, a. um. Itāla tellus (Ov. Fast. iv. 64). Itālicum littus (Ov. Met. xiv. 17). Itālica gens, the Romans (Stat. Syl. iv. 6. 78). Itālicum mārē, i. e. Tuscum mārē (Just. xx. 1).

Itālica, a. f. Servilla La Vieja, a town of Bætica, about seven miles from Hispālis, Seville, on the opposite bank of Bætis, the Guadalquivir, which afterwards changed its course (Cass. B. C. ii. 20). It was built by Scipio Africanus for the accommodation of his wounded soldiers, hence the name is derived. It has been gratuitously asserted that the poet Silius was a native of this town, from which he was surnamed Italicus. Besides other great men, the emperors Trajan and Adrian were born in Itālica. Ich. Itālicēnses, ium, m.

Itālleus, i, m. a king of the Suevian nation, who brought assistance to Vespasianus, and took his post in the front of the lines. As he succeeded to the crown on the death of Vāngio, it is probable he was either the son of that monarch, or the son of Sido q. v. (Tac. Hist. iii. 21).—2. A chief of the Cherusians, was the son of Flāvius, and brother of Arminius. Cātūmērus, chief of the Catti, was his paternal grandfather (Tac. Ann. xi. 16).—3. See Silius.

Ithāca, v, r. Ithacē, es, f. Theaki, or, Theachi, a small rocky island in the Ionian sea, of which Ulysses was king, as also of a part of the continent opposite, in Epirus (Hom. Od. xiv. 100). It is about thirty-two miles in circumference, Pliūius makes it twenty-five, and Strābo eighty, stadia. Its population is about eight thousand who are contained in its capital Bathy, and the three villages of Perakobio, Adōi, and Oxōi. It has eight harbours, and is distant nearly four miles from Cephalēnia. There was a cognominal town on this island. Adj. Ithācēus, Ithācēsius, a, um, et, Ithācēnsis, is, e. Ajax, in contempt, calls Ulysses, Ithācus, on account of the smallness and sterility of the island (Ov. Met. xiii. 98). Ithācis veribus, on Ithacan spits, i. e. on the spits of Ulysses and his companions (Prop. iii. 12. 29). See Lämpetē. Ithācēsia carbūsus, the sail of Ulysses (Stat. Ach. i. 558). Ithācēnsis Ulysses (Hor. Epis. i. 6. 63).

Ithācus, i, m. son of Pterēlāus, a native of Cēphallēnia, who passed into the nearest island which from him was called Ithāca. He had two brothers Nēritus and Pōlyctor (Hom. Od. xvii. 207).

Ithāmēnes, is, m. a noble Lycian, father of Stēnēlāus (Hom. Il. xvi. 586).

Ithēmon, ōnis, m. the commander of the Autōlōles, who fought under Hannibal at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 546).

Ithōmē, es, f. a mountainous city of Thessaly (Hom. Il. ii. 729).—2. Vulcano, a mountain and fortress of Mēssēnē, in the Morae, reckoned one of the two horns of Pēlōpōnēnsis. There was also a cognominal town, to which an allusion is made by Hōmērus (Paus. iv. 9). Adj. Ithōmēus, a, um.

Itius, i (ae. portus), m. a harbour in the country of the Mōrini, in Gallia Belgica, which, according to some, was Boulogne, and, according to others, Vissant, or, Calais. Ptolemy mentions it as a promontory, now Cape Grisez, although it cannot be doubted, that there was likewise a cognominal harbour. From his description, this seems to be the place which he had in view. It could not be Calais. Caesar set out from Itius Pōrtus, when he sailed the second time for Britain (Cass. B. G. v. 2).

Iton, ōnis, Itonē, es, et, Itonus, i, called also Siton, ōnis, f. Idria, a city of Thēssālīa, mentioned by Hōmērus (Il. ii. 696), so called from Itonus q. v., a son of Apōllo.—2. A town in Epirus, Lower Albania.—3. Another, in Itālia.—4. Another, in Bēōtia, which Strābo mentions as named from that in Thessaly (631), and which Stātilius calls Adōnia Itonē (Th. ii. 721). Ich. Itonai, ōrum (Sieg. Itonaeus, i), m. joined the Thebans under Hypeūs, against the Argives (Stat. Th. vii. 530).—5. Another, in Lydia. Itonis, idis, et, Itonias, adis, f. of Iton, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Adj. Itonaeus, et, Itonius, a, um. Itonau, v. Itonia Minērea, who is also called Itonias, et, Itonis.

Itonus, i, m. a son of Apōllo, reckoned by the Scholiasts the first king of Thessaly. From him the town Iton v. Itonus, Idris, in Thessaly, had its name.—2. A son of Amphictyon, a Boeotian (Paus. ix. 24).

Itūrea, v, f. a mountainous country of Asia, to the east of Gālīlea, from which it was separated by Jōrdānes, the El-Sharia, and Mārē Tibērias. Ich. Itūrai, v. Ithyrarai, ōrum, m. the Itureans, who were excellent archers, and their bows, according to Virgil, were made of the yew-tree (G. ii. 448). Adj. Itūreus, et, Ithyrēus, a, um, of Itūrea, also of Pārthia, Parthian, from its being often under the dominion of the Parthians. Itūrai taxi (Virg. G. ii. 448).

Itūrius, i, m. a creature of Jūlia Sillāna, who accused Agrippina, was afterwards banished, and in a short time received a free pardon from her son, the emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19 seq.).

Itylus, i, m. son of Zēthus, brother of Amphion, and of Aedon, a daughter of Pāndārius. His mother unintentionally put him to death, for which she was changed into a nightingale (Hom. Od. xix. 522). Later writers narrated the fable differently, and changed his name to Itys q. v.

Itymōnēus, ōis, m. a native of Elis, killed by Nēstor. He was the son of Hypeōrchus, hence called Hypeōrchides (Hom. Il. xi. 671).

Itys, ōis, m. a Trojan killed by Tērōus (Virg. Aen. ix. 574).—2. The son of Tērēus and Prōcē, whom his mother killed, dressed and served up to his father at a banquet, in revenge for the injury which her sister, Phylōmēla, had received from her husband. Itys was transformed into a pheasant, his father into a lapwing, and his aunt, Phylōmēla, into a nightingale (Ov. Met. vi. 437). Hōrātius calls her infelix avis, atērnūm opprobriūm Cēcrōptae dōmus, the unhappy bird, the eternal disgrace of the house (family) of Cēcrōpis (Od. iv. 12. 6). Cātullus calls Itys, īglus, expressing by the diminutive, his infancy, and the tenderness due to that period of life (lcv. 14). Ismāritus Itys, from his being a native of Thrācia (Mart. x. 51).—3. A man in the army of Etēocles, killed in the Theban war by Pārthēnōpēus (Stat. Th. vii. 642).—4. A native of Cylēus, who fell by the hand of Cāstor, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 189).

Jūba, v, m. a king of Maurītānia, Morocco and Fez, who, in the civil war, joined the standard of the Republic; and almost annihilated the forces of Caesar under the command of Cārō. He added his troops to those of Scipio, and continued to oppose the interests of Caesar even after the battle of Pharsālīa; but was at last vanquished at Thāpsus, Demaos, by that fortunate general, and procured his own death by the assistance of his slave (Ces. B. C. ii. 25 seq.). See Pétrius.—2. Son of Juba, carried to Rome, by C. Julius Caesar to adorn his triumph. Augustus educated him at court, where he distinguished himself by his talents and literature. That emperor gave him in marriage young Cléopatra, a daughter of M. Antonius and Cléopatra, and appointed him king of Mauritania, because Numidia, his father's kingdom, had been reduced to a Roman province. His son Ptolémæus succeeded him (Tac. Ann. iv. 5).—3. One of Hannibal's men at the siege of Saguntum, Murciédre, killed by Théron (Sil. Ital. ii. 160).

Jubaleni, orum, m. an African nation (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Jûda, e, m. a son of Jacob, from whom the whole nation was called Jûdei (Just. xxxvi. 2).

Jûdæa, e, f. a name of Pâlæstina q. s., derived from its inhabitants Jûdæi, orum (Sing. Jûdæus, i.), m. Tacitus has given a very false and injurious character of this nation, evidently dictated by inveterate national prejudice and unmanly hatred. The absurdity of his etymological assertion in deriving Jûdæi from Ida, a mountain of Crète, Candia, which he makes the cradle of the Jews, is not more remote from the truth, than his other statements respecting the history of that once highly-distinguished, but now despised and insulted people (Hist. v. 2). The exclusive religious system of the Jews rendered them unpopular with the neighbouring states, and certain peculiarities in their national character exposed them to obloquy and misrepresentation. Roman writers in particular, either from ignorance or contempt, seldom mention the descendants of Abraham, but with the view of exposing them either to ridicule or hatred. Against the vituperation of the Jews by the Romans, the young reader should be warned before the writings of Hôrâtius, Jûvénâlis, Pêrsius, Martiâlis, Tâcitus, &c., are put into his hands. The Jews were conquered by Cn. Pômpeius Mâgnus, who took their temple, 67 B. C., till that period unviolated, and by the lieutenant-generals of M. Antonius the triumvir in 38 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 102–128). From Jûvénâlis, it appears that the Jews at Rome, when he wrote, pretended to fortune-telling by means of dreams, which they accommodated to the wish of the persons who consulted them (Sat. vi. 547). Récûliti Jûdæi (Mart. vii. 30). Adj. Jûdæus, et Jûdæicus, a, um. Jûdæa rêgina (Plin. iii. 153). Jûdæicum (jus), the Jewish law, i. e. the moral law, as delivered by Moses (Juv. Sat. xiv. 101). Jûdæicus pânis, unleavened bread (Tac. Hist. v. 4). Jûdæica vèla, Jewish curtains, i. e. tapestry ornamented with the figures of imaginary creatures by the Jews, or in the Jewish manner. They excelled early in the art of weaving (Claud. xviii. 357).

Jûdas, e, m. a Jew under whose conduct, and that of Hêrôsôlýmus, his countrymen quitted Egypt, and took possession of Canaan, according to the account given by Tâcitus (Hist. v. 2). This groundless hypothesis requires no confutation.

Jûgântes, um, m. a British nation, whom Camden supposes to be the same with the Brigântes q. v. Others consider them a different people. The good editions of Tâctus have e Brigântum cieltâte (Ann. xii. 40).

Jûgârius, i, m. (vicius), a street in Rome (Liv. xxiv. 47).

Jûgum, i, n. a yoke. In military tactics, jûgum was two spears fixed in the ground and one laid across them at the top, through which conquered armies, stript of their arms and generally of part of their dress, were sometimes obliged to pass, as a mark of disgrace. It indicated that they were as much under the power of the conquerors, as oxen in the yoke are under the power of their drivers (Liv. iii. 28).

Jûgûrtha, e, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, whom Théron killed at Saguntum (Sil. Ital. ii. 165).—2. Was the son of Mâstânâbal by a concubine. His paternal uncle, Mâsinissa, king of Numidia, Algiers, brought him up in his own house, and gave him the same education as his own sons. Jûgûrtha early acquired great celebrity by his activity, courage, and modesty. Observing his superiority to his cousins in point of personal accomplishments, and perhaps also in mental endowments, he, most probably in very early life, formed the design, which he afterwards executed, of dispossessing the sons of Mâsinissa, and seizing on the crown of Numidia. Aware of his ambition, and suspicious of his principles, the aged monarch formed different schemes by which he expected Jûgûrtha would lose his life. The extreme popularity of the youth rendered any attempt at cutting him off by violence very hazardous, if not impracticable. Mâsinissa, therefore, endeavoured to gain his affections not only to himself, but also to his sons, Adhêrbal and Hîempsal, by treating him with the utmost kindness, and at last by leaving to him the third part of his kingdom. Far from satisfying the ambitious mind of Jûgûrtha, this act of generosity, in place of endearing to him the king's sons, stimulated him to procure their death and to seize their possessions. Having at last accomplished his iniquitous design, he attempted to bribe the Roman senators to secure him in the kingdom which he had obtained by murder. At one period he had nearly succeeded; but his notorious bribery and insulting impudence at Rome, whither he had been called by the senate, roused the indignation of all men of principle, and ultimately it was resolved that war should be declared against him. For a long time he successfully resisted and frequently defeated the Roman forces; but at last was betrayed by Bôechus, king of Mauritania, whose daughter he had married (Sal. Jug. 80), into the hands of C. Mârius, the Roman commander, who led him in triumph with his two sons, after which he was put to death in prison 107 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 64–67). Adj. Jûgûrthînus, a, um. Jûgûrthînum bellum, the war against Jûgûrtha (Hor. Epod. ix. 23). Sallustius has written a minute and elegant account of this war, which many consider as one of the purest models of historical composition. Jûgûrthînus triumpfus, triumph over Jûgûrtha (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 3, 45). Jûgûrthîna viclôria, the victory over Jûgûrtha (Eutrop. v. 1). Jûgûrthîna panna, the punishment of Jûgûrtha (Claud. xxviii. 381). From Lucanus it appears to have been strangulation (Phar. ix. 600), and this is affirmed by Eutropius (iv. 27).

Juhonés, um, m. a German nation in alliance with the Romans, nearly destroyed by the bursting forth of a subterraneous fire in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 57). Here the readings vary, and are very doubtful.

Júlia, as, f. the aunt of C. Jūlius Cæsar and wife of C. Mārius, on whose death he pronounced a funeral oration, tracing his descent from Vēnus (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 6).—2. Sister of C. Jūlius Cæsar and wife of M. Atilius Bālbis, by whom she became the mother of Atia q. v. (Suet. Aug. 4).—3. Daughter of C. Jūlius Cæsar and wife of Cn. Pōmpēius Māgnus, after she had repudiated her former husband Sērvilius Cēpio. She died in 56 B. C., and the people, from honour to her memory, ordered, that she should be buried in Cāmpus Mārtius (Livy. Ep. 106).—4. Wife of A. Mānlius Tōrquātus, whose nuptials Cātullus celebrates. The poet compares her form and beauty to those of Vēnus (lxi).—5. Daughter of Augustus by his wife Scribōnia, who was three times married, first to Mārcellus, son of Octāvia, sister of Augustus, secondly to Agrippa, and thirdly to Tiberius, who succeeded her father in the imperial government. In her character, we find nothing to praise. Abandoned to gross lasciviousness, she disgraced her sex by every species of irregularity. Augustus, on account of her adulterous intrigues, banished her to the island Pāndātāria, L'isle Saint Marie, afterwards to Rhēgium, Reggio, where her husband allowed her to pine away, and where she died in the 14th year of our era, and 52d of her age (Tac. Ann. i. 53 seq.).—6. Daughter of Agrippa and Júlia, and grand-daughter of Augustus, who was married to L. Æmilius Paullus, and rivalled her mother in vice and infamy. During the lifetime of her grandfather, her adulterous practices banished her to the island Trinacrus, Tremiti, and she died in exile in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 71).—7. Daughter of Gērmānicus and Agrippina, born at Lesbos, married to M. Vinicius (Tac. Ann. vi. 15).—8. Daughter of Nēro Claudius Drūsus, married first to Nēro Cæsar, son of Gērmānicus and Agrippina, and afterwards to Kōbēllus Blandus. The malice of Mēssālina accomplished her destruction (Tac. Ann. iii. 29 seq.).

Júlia Agrippina, Jūliæ Agrippinæ, f. daughter of Gērmānicus and Agrippina, sister of Caligula, was first married to Cn. Dōmīttus Ahēnōbārbus, by whom she had Nēro. After the death of Ahēnōbārbus, she became the wife of Pāssienus Crispus; and, being again a widow for some time, she, still in the prime of life, was married to her uncle, the Roman emperor Claudius, whose death she caused, by mixing a subtle poison with mushrooms, in order that her son might succeed. Tacitus mentions, that in early life she resigned her person to M. Æmilius Lēpidus, afterwards became the prostitute of Pallas, and crowned her vices by her incestuous marriage with her uncle. From this historian, she appears to have been a monster both of lewdness and cruelty. At last, her son resolved on her death, and deliberated, whether it should be accomplished by poison, or by the sword. After hesitating for a considerable time, Anicētus q. v. proposed to build a ship in such a manner that it would readily fall to pieces, even on a calm sea, and suggested that Agrippina should be taken on board; and in this manner either killed by the falling in of the deck, or drowned by the vessel giving way under her. On the seamen executing their murderous order, by allowing the deck to fall, it was expected she would be crushed to death; but she effected her escape unhurt, and therefore Nēro ordered her to be put to death by violence; and while the assassins were in the act of killing her, she desired the centurion to strike her on the belly, probably in reproach of her son, who commanded this matricide. According to some, Nēro looked at her dead body, admired some, and censured other, parts of her lifeless corpse; but others deny it (Tac. Ann. xiv. 2—9). Dio Cāssius writes, that Agrippina, having uncovered her belly, said, "Anicētus, strike! strike this, since it gave birth to Nēro" (lxi. 13). Sēneca has put similar language into the mouth of the chorus, but gone a little more into detail (Octav. 368—376). She wrote her own life, and the history of her family, from which she appears to have possessed great abilities and accomplishments, which she readily sacrificed, as well as every principle of virtue, in pursuit of unlimited power or sensual gratification (Tac. Ann. iv. 53). Adj. Agrippinus, a, um, v. Agrippinensis, is, e. Agrippina cōlōnia, v. Agrippinensis cōlōnia, Cologne, on the Rhine, so called from Agrippina having been born there (Tac. Hist. i. 56). Viciōrinus, who took upon him the Roman empire, was slain at this city, in the second year of his reign, in the year 259 (Eutrop. ix. 9).

Júlia Augūsta, Jūliæ Augūstæ, f. the name of Livia Drūsilla, after her son, the Roman emperor Tiberius, ascended the throne (Tac. Ann. v. 1).

Júlia Cōnstāntia, Jūliæ Cōnstāntiæ, f. of which the original name was Oset, Alcala de Guadaira, a town of Spain, not far from Hispālis, Seville (Plin. i. 294).—2. Júlia Cōnstāntia, anciently Lācōūmūrgi, another town of Spain, of which nothing certain is known (Plin. i. 296).—3. A town of Mauritānia, Morocco and Fez, which had the additional name of Zilia, now Arzila (Plin. i. 521). Júlia Cōnstāntia was perhaps not recognised by the natives, in any of these three instances, and, therefore, the name is only found in Roman authors. Plinius has mentioned several other towns, called by his countrymen Júlia, with an additional name, as Cōncōrdia Júlia, &c.

Júlia Dōmna, Jūliæ Dōmnæ, f. wife of the Roman emperor L. Sēptimius Sēvērus, by whom she had two sons, Cāracālla and Gēta. She was a native of Emēsa, Homs, a town of Syria, and of royal birth, according to the historians of the empire, although her parents are unknown. Her singular elegance of form and extraordinary powers of mind she debased by the most loathsome and offensive vices. According to Eutrōpius, she was the stepmother of Cāracālla, and, after the death of Sēvērus, his wife (viii. 20). Other writers make her the mother of Cāracālla; and the inhabitants of Alēxāndria, giving him the name of Œdipus, and her of Iocasta, seem to prove the inaccuracy of Eutrōpius, besides the concurring testimony of the other historians. After the death of Cāracālla, she ended her life by violence.

Júlia Drūsilla, Jūliæ Drūsillæ, f. daughter of the emperor Cāligūla and Cēsōnīa. Of her being his own child, Cāligūla considered there would be no stronger proof than the cruelty which she discovered, even when a child, amongst those of her own age, with whom she was at play. She was dashed against the wall and deprived of life, at the time her father and mother were killed (Suet. Cal. 25, 59).

Jūlia Māmmæa, Jūlia Māmmæe, f. daughter of Jūlius Avitus, a man of consular rank, and Jūlia Mæsa, was wife of Gēnsius Mārclānus, by whom she became the mother of the Roman emperor Alexander Sēvērus. When the senate declared Hēllōgābālus a public enemy, Jūlia Māmmæa, her sister Jūlia Sōēmīa, and their mother, Jūlia Mæsa, were included in that decree. To the excellent instructions received from his mother, whom Eusēbius calls a princess of great piety, may be attributed most of the amiable and virtuous qualities which adorned the future life of Sēvērus. History affords no certain evidence of her having embraced the Christian religion. After his cousin Hēllōgābālus had adopted Sēvērus, Māmmæa took care to preserve his morals entire, in opposition to the schemes of the emperor, and therefore he plotted his ruin, which her caution and prudence prevented. Suspicious of his being poisoned, she cooked and served up to her son every article of food, and strengthened his constitution, by causing him to be trained to the use of arms, and horsemanship. Secret stratagems having failed, Hēllōgābālus had recourse to open violence; but the character of his adopted son had attached the soldiers to his person, so that when it came at last to a trial of strength, Māmmæa animated the troops, who embraced the interest of Sēvērus, and by them Hēllōgābālus was killed. She received the title of Augūsta, and governed during the minority of her son, whom she trained with the most assiduous attention to every thing virtuous and praiseworthy. Against Dōmitius Ulpīanus, the most distinguished amongst the friends of Sēvērus, she conceived an unfounded aversion, which she had no sooner discovered, than she restored him to her former confidence, went with him to the war against the Germans, where her son was assassinated, and she fell by the hands of the same murderers (Eutrop. viii. 23).

Jūlia Prōcilla, Jūlia Prōcille, f. was the wife of Jūlius Gracīnus, by whom she became the mother of Cn. Jūlius Agricōla. Tacitus gives her an excellent character, which is all of her history that has been transmitted to modern times, except that a descent from Otho's fleet, in quest of spoil, plundered her estate, murdered herself, and carried off a considerable quantity of booty (Tac. Agric. 4-7).

Jūlia Sōēmīa, Jūlie Sōēmīe, f. a daughter of Jūlius Avitus, a man of consular rank, and Jūlia Mæsa, was married to Vārius Mārcellus, by whom she had Hēllōgābālus, the Roman emperor. Her mother appears to have been an unprincipled woman, who, in order to induce the soldiers to receive her grandson, Hēllōgābālus, as their emperor, declared that he was not the son of Vārius Mārcellus, her daughter's husband, but of Caracālla, thereby making her daughter an adulteress, and her grandson a bastard. Sōēmīa displayed an intrepidity and courage unusual in her sex; and the measures which she adopted and executed, in order to secure the empire to her son, prove that she possessed a vigorous mind, as well as personal courage. To female purity she can have no claim, since she acquiesced in her mother's declaration, and, whether true or false, it must be received as satisfactory evidence, that she disregarded the character of a chaste and faithful wife. Sōēmīa perished with her son, in the year 222, and her head was cut off, either in contempt, or in proof that the assassins had executed their duty. Eutropius calls her Sōēmīa Sūra (viii. 22). The name is variously written, Soemīs, Sōēmīa, Semia, Symia, Semiamira, &c. On ancient coins, the name is Sōēmīa.

Jūliānus, i. m. son of Cōnstāntius, brother of Gallus, and nephew of Cōnstāntius Māgnus. The infancy of these two brothers saved them from the sword of Cōnstāntius, their cousin, who massacred almost all his relations. From him they received an education not unsuited to the dignity of their birth, and not unmixed with that suspicious restraint, from which they could portend neither future security nor kindness. On Gallus being declared Cæsar, he obtained complete freedom, and the situation of his brother became more comfortable; but on Cōnstāntius commanding Gallus to be put to death, a strong guard escorted Jūliānus from Iōnia to Milan, where, for seven months, he daily expected the sentence by which his brother was deprived of life, would be executed on himself. The emperor Cōnstāntius and he now only remained, of all the male descendants of Cōnstāntius Chlōrus. The intrepidity, caution, and steadiness of Jūliānus baffled the efforts of his enemies to discover grounds for impeachment; and the empress, Eusēbia, espoused his cause, advised his preservation, and withstood the remonstrances of all who plotted his destruction. After the emperor fixed his residence at Athens, and began to study Grecian literature, he adopted both the manners and language of the Athenians. His dispositions were softened by the culture of philosophy, and Eusēbia prevailed on him to invest Jūliānus with the title of Cæsar, and to grant him the government of the countries beyond the Alps. By this act, she obtained a victory over the enemies of Jūliānus, and, perhaps, also over the emperor, who, along with the imperial dignity, gave him Hēlēna, his sister, in marriage. He then quitted Athens, crossed the Alps to defend his territories against the incursions of the Germans. His natural activity and personal courage, added to his mental powers, which were not inconsiderable, soon converted this military novice into an experienced commander, who not only cleared France of the invaders, but carried his arms across the Rhine. His civil administration, regulated by the principles of justice, and by regard for the happiness of his subjects, raised his character as a magistrate above that of a general. Detesting the exactions of the emperor, he pitied the distresses of the people; and his moderation, conjoined with his success in arms, contributed to retard the ruin of the Western Empire. The character of Jūliānus excited in the breast of the emperor a spirit of jealousy, which the attachment of the army had no tendency to allay. With a view to his destruction, the emperor ordered the legions in Gallia to march to the east, that the Cæsar might be left unprotected. Refusal on the part of Jūlianus would have been rebellion, and although he distinctly saw the emperor's design, yet he yielded to duty; but the night before the troops were to march, they proclaimed him Augustus, and compelled him to assume the purple. Whether the whole of this scheme did not proceed from the deep-laid measures of Jūlianus seems very doubtful, and the suspicion is increased by his immediately strengthening the army, by his marching against the Franks, and by the letters which he wrote to the emperor. About this time, his wife, Hēlena, who had previously suffered by several untimely births, died in childbirth. After a fruitless negotiation, he resolved to make war on Cōstantius, whose death, on 3d November, 361, prevented the atrocities of civil contention, and left Jūlianus sole emperor. Before he set out for this expedition, he had renounced the Christian religion, an act of great immorality, which procured him the surname of the Apostate. In his persecution of that harmless sect, candour must allow, that it was his intention to deprive them of all the advantages resulting from the possession of wealth, of knowledge, of respectability, and authority. His conduct towards the Arians exhibits only cruelty and injustice, which he aggravated by profane insult. He banished Athanasius, and, after the suppression of Christianity, and the establishment of heathenism, he set out for the conquest of Pārthia. He invaded Assyria, where, in his plans and movements, his military talents appeared to advantage; but a stratagem of Sapor checked his progress, and compelled him to trace back his steps, with all the disadvantages and losses of a retreating army. At last a javelin pierced his ribs, and fixed in the lower part of the liver, which it was found impossible to extract. His death was the immediate consequence, to the great joy of the surviving Christians. He expired in the year 363, and Jōvianus, without opposition, succeeded to the purple (Eutrop. x. 14).—2. A man who bathed in very hot water (Mart. iii. 25). No other writer mentions his name.

Jūlianus Titius, Jūliani Titii, m. the commander of a Roman legion, who obtained consular ornaments, when M. Apōulus, governor of Moesia, gained a victory over the Rhoxolaniæ, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 79).

Jūlii, orum, m. an Alban clan, who, on their removal to Rome, were admitted into the senate (Liv. i. 30). Adj. Jūlianus, a. um. Jūliāna partes (Vel. Pat. ii. 55).

Jūlius, i. m. the name of a very celebrated Roman tribe, brought from Alba to Rome by Rōmulus, who derived their origin from Iūlus, a son of Æneas. Adj. Jūlius, Jūleus, et. Jūlianus, a. um. Jūleæ carina, ship of Augustus (Prop. iv. 6. 17), called by the same poet, Jūllæ rostra (ib. 54). Jūllæ prōles ab origine Vēnēsis (Manil. i. 797).

Jūlius Africānus, Jūlii Africāni, m. a native of Gallia, France, of whose origin no account remains. Minōtus and Sērvæus, after their condemnation, accused Jūlius Africānus and others (Tac. Ann. vi. 7).

Jūlius Agrēstis, Jūlii Agrēstis, m. a centurion, who gave a remarkable proof of his fidelity to Vitēllius, whom he could not rouse to activity, or animate to enterprise. He obtained permission to view the ruins of Crēmōna, which he did openly, despising the idea of going as a spy. On his return, the emperor disbelieved his narrative, and he said, "I perceive you require a remarkable proof, and since neither my life nor death can benefit you, I shall give you what you may believe." Retiring from the presence of Vitēllius, he fell upon his sword, confirming his words by a voluntary death (Tac. Hist. iii. 54).

Jūlius Agrippa, Jūlii Agrippæ, m. a Roman of some distinction, banished to an island in the Archipelago, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Jūlius Alpīnus, Jūlii Alpīni, m. a Helvetian chief, whom Cæcina caused to be publicly executed, from his having been one of the leading chiefs in an insurrection, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 68).

Jūlius Alūnus, Jūlii Alūni, m. banished to an island in the Archipelago, under the emperor Nēro (Tac. Ann. xv. 71).

Jūlius Antōnius. See Antōnius.

Jūlius Aquilla, Jūlii Aquillæ, m. a Roman knight, who obtained prætorian honours, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xii. 15–21).

Jūlius Asiatīcus, Jūlii Asiatici, m. supposed by some to be the Asiaticus who fought on the side of Vindēx, in the revolt of the Gallic provinces. This is mere conjecture. Sēcundus wrote the life of Jūlius Asiaticus (Tac. Or. 14).

Jūlius Atticus, Jūlii Attici, m. a soldier of the body guards of the Roman emperor Gāba, who falsely declared that he had killed Otho (Tac. Hist. i. 35).

Jūlius Auspēx, Jūlii Auspēis, m. a chief among the Rēmi, who supported the interest of the Romans against Tūllius Valēntinus q. v. (Tac. Hist. iv. 69).

Jūlius Brigānticus, Jūlii Brigāntici, m. a Batavian, who deserted to Cæcina with a small body of horse. His mother was sister to Civilis, and he had a violent hatred at his uncle. His zeal in the service of the Romans distinguished his whole conduct, and he fell at Vāda, in making an attack at the head of a squadron of horse, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. ii. 22 seq.).

Jūlius Būrdo, Jūlii Būrdōnis, m. a commander of the German fleet in the service of the Romans, whom Vitēllius saved from the fury of the soldiers, by concealing him in prison, until his success had appeased their wrath, and he then set him at liberty, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 58).

Jūlius Cālēnus, Jūlii Cālēni, m. an Æduan, warmly attached to Vitēllius. In the Roman army he held the rank of tribune, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iii. 35).

Jūlius Cārus, Jūlii Cāri, m. a legionary soldier, who killed T. Vinūlus Rūfinus (Tac. Hist. i. 42).

Jūlius Cēlus, Jūlii Cēlsi, m. a Roman knight, and tribune of the city cohorts, charged with a conspiracy, and condemned to lose his life. Whilst he lay fettered in prison, he contrived to lengthen his chain, so as to wind it round his neck, and thus avoided a public death by strangulation, in the year 82 (Tac. Ann. vi. 14).

Jūlius Clāssiciānus, Jūlii Clāssiciāni, m. a Roman officer in Britain, at variance with Suetōnius, the commander-in-chief, and wrote to Rome, pressing the necessity of recalling him. In this attempt he failed, and Suetonius continued governor of Britain (Tac. Ann. xiv. 38).

Jūlius Clāssicus, Jūlii Clāssici, m. the commander of the whole cavalry of the Trē-viri, who revolted, assumed the dress of a Roman commander, routed the cavalry of Cērālīs, and crossed the Rhine. Vanity impelled him to believe that he would obtain the empire, at least in that country, and, pleased with his imaginary government, he loitered away the time in indolence, until exertion became fruitless (Tac. Hist. ii. 14 seq.).

Jūlius Cōnstantius, Jūlii Cōnstantii, m. second son of Cōnstantius Clōrus by Thēōdōra his second wife. His nephew, Cōnstantius q. v., married his daughter, and he was himself massacred by the soldiery, soon after the death of his brother Cōnstantinus, the Great. Of the whole family only the youngest two of his children escaped that carnage.

Jūlius Cōrdus, Jūlii Cōrdi, m. a man who prevailed on the people of Aquitānia to take the oath of allegiance to Otho, in the year 75, which they soon broke (Tac. Hist. i. 76).

Jūlius Dēnsus, Jūlii Dēnsi, m. a man of equestrian rank, against whom an accusation had been brought on account of his attachment to Gērmanicus. The emperor suppressed the prosecution (Tac. Ann. xiii. 10).

Jūlius Flōrus, Jūlii Flōri, m. a Trevirian, who commanded a regiment of horse raised among his countrymen, but trained to the Roman discipline. Powerful from the number of his debtors and dependants, he tried to seduce the troops, and to begin war by a general massacre of the Roman merchants. Only a small number listened to his advice, and near the forest of Ardūenna a complete victory was gained over him and the undisciplined multitude by a countryman, Jūlius Indus q. v. Surrounded by the Roman soldiers who were in search of him, he died by his own hand, in the year 21 (Tac. Ann. iiii. 40—42).

Jūlius Frōntinus, Jūlii Frōntini, m. a Roman prætor, who had the chief command in Britain in the year 73. He excelled in a knowledge of law, and of military affairs; the latter he had acquired both by theory and experience. His talents did not raise him higher in the opinion of his countrymen, than his virtues. He wrote four books on stratagems, and one on the aqueducts of Rome, which still exist. Plinius has recorded his last injunction, that no monument should be erected to his memory; because he considered it an unnecessary expense (Epis. ix. 19). Tacitus mentions him (Hist. iv. 39 seq.).

Jūlius Frōnto, Jūlii Frōntōnis, m. præfect of the nightwatch, and brother of Jūlius Grātus. The soldiers suspected both, and loaded them with chains, solely on account of their being in different armies. Frōnto in Otho's and Grātus in that of Cæcina (Tac. Hist. ii. 26).

Jūlius Græcinius, Jūlii Græcini, m. a man of senatorian rank and a native of Fōrum Jū-lum, Fregus, who married Jūlia Prōcilla by whom he had Cn. Jūlius Agricōla q. v. His virtues incurred the displeasure of the emperor Cāligūla, who ordered him to undertake the prosecution of M. Silānus, which he refused, and was therefore put to death (Tac. Ag. 4).

Jūlius Grātus, Jūlii Grāti, m. præfect of the camp, who fell under the suspicion of the soldiers in the year 69, merely because his brother held the office of a tribune in Otho's army (Tac. Hist. ii. 26).

Jūlius Indus, Jūlii Indi, m. a Trevirian, who defeated his countryman Jūlius Flōrus with the rebels under his command, in the year 21. These Trevirians were at variance before the revolt of Flōrus, which made Indus more anxious to crush his opponent, and he had no sooner accomplished his wish, than his countrymen returned to their allegiance (Tac. Ann. iiii. 42).

Jūlius Mānsuetus (v. Mānsuetus 3 syl.), Jūlii Mānsueti, m. a Spaniard, who enlisted into the legion named Rēpax, and his son, then a child, entered the seventh legion raised by Gālba. In an engagement near Crēmōna, between the armies for Vitellius and Vespasianus, Mānsuetus fell by the hand of his own son, who recognised his father in rifling the body, and the father opening his eyes knew his son. A bitter lamentation ensued, and the son, embracing the body of his murdered parent after life had fled, committed it to the grave dug by his own hands, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iiii. 25).

Jūlius Mārāthus, Jūlii Mārāthi, m. a freedman of Augustus, who states that the emperor was five feet nine inches in height. Except this measurement of the emperor, modern times owe no obligation to Mārāthus, who himself is only known from being noticed by the biographer for that solitary fact (Suet. Aug. 79).

Jūlius Mārīnus, Jūlii Mārīni, m. one of the earliest and most faithful friends of the Roman emperor Tiberius, who had followed him to Rhōdus, Rhodes, and continued with him in Cāpræ, Capri. Tiberius at last ordered his execution, which the public saw without regret, since Sejanus had accomplished the destruction of Cūrtius Atticus by his agency, in the year 32 (Tac. Ann. vi. 10).

Jūlius Mārtilis, Jūlii Mārtilis, m. a particular friend of Mārtilis, on whose gardens he writes an epigram (iv. 64), and to whom he sent his sixth book. His name is of frequent occurrence in the writings of the epigrammatist, who appears to have had a particular respect for him, and probably owed him obligations.—2. A military tribune, who commanded the camp at the time an insurrection broke out which ended in the murder of Gālba, and raised Otho to the imperial throne (Tac. Hist. i. 28).

Jūlius Māximus, Jūlii Māximi, m. despatched with Claudius Victor by Civilis to Geldūba, Gelb, at the head of the veteran cohorts against Vōcūla (Tac. Hist. iv. 33).

Jūlius Mōntānus, Jūlii Mōntāni, m. a man of senatorian rank, who encountered the emperor Nēro in one of his nocturnal riots, defended himself with bravery, and defeated the party. No apology could soften the resentment of the prince, and Mōntānus found it necessary to put an end to his own life (Tac. Ann. xiii. 25).

Jūlius Paullus, Jūlii Paulli, m. a Bata-vian of royal descent, put to death by Fōn-teius Cāpito under a false charge of rebellion (Tac. Hist. iv. 13).

Jūlius Pēlignus, Jūlii Pēligni, m. a man whose deformity of person excited derision, and whose qualities of mind corresponded with his external figure. With the title of Imperator, he obtained the command of Cappadocia in the year 52, and undertook to recover Armenia, plundering, in his route, the allies, as if they had been the Iberians. Deserted at last by his followers, he fled to Rhodanistis whom he advised to assume royal honours. What followed this nefarious proceeding, history does not mention. He had been intimate with Tiberius, and spent his time in the company of buffoons (Tac. Ann. xii. 49).

Julius Placidus, Jūlii Plācidi, m. the tribune of a cohort, who dragged forth Vitellius from his lurkingplace, in order that he might be killed (Tac. Hist. iii. 85).

Julius Pölio, Jūlii Pölliōnis, m. a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, who had under his custody an infamous woman named Lœusta q. v. The emperor, Néro, called in the aid of both to accomplish the destruction of Germanicus, the legal heir of the crown (Tac. Ann. xlii. 15).

Julius Pöstimus, Jūlii Pöstimi, m. a man high in favour with the elder Livia. His reception at court he owed to an adulterous intercourse with Mithra Prisca. He appears to have been a very wicked man, and a ready accomplice in any sort of crime (Tac. Ann. iv. 12).

Julius Priscus, Jūlii Prisci, m. praefect of the praetorian guards. To this honour, Caecina raised him from being a centurion. Vitellius sent him to secure the passes in the Apennines after the battle at Crémōna, and, having deserted the camp, he returned to Vitellius. After the death of that emperor, Mucianus took from him his commission, and he immediately killed himself (Tac. Hist. ii. 92 seq.).

Julius Sabinus, Jūlii Sābini, m. one of the Lingones, who pretended to derive his pedigree from C. Julius Caesar, who had a child by his great-grandmother. Tacitus refers this genealogy to the natural vanity of Sabinus. After he had destroyed all evidence of an alliance between the Romans and his countrymen, he caused himself to be proclaimed Caesar. At the head of an undisciplined army, he attacked the Sequanians, who routed his forces, and he concealed himself for nine years, chiefly in subterraneous places, experiencing the utmost fidelity on the part of his friends, and unalterable affection on that of his wife Epponina. His lurkingplace having at last been discovered, both he and his wife were sent to Rome, where they were put to death (Tac. Hist. iv. 55 seq.).

Julius Sacerōvir, Jūlii Sacerōviri, m. an Aeduan of illustrious birth, who, with Julius Florus, headed an insurrection of the Gallic states, in the year 20. Defeated in the first engagement, he threw himself into the town of Augustodūnum, Autun, which he soon quitted, lest he should be given up, and in a neighbouring village put himself to death (Tac. Ann. iii. 40—46). Adj. Sacerōvirianus, a. um. Sacerōvirianum bellum (Tac. Ann. iv. 18).

Julius Sēcundus, Jūlii Sēcundi, m. an orator who died in early life, and yet left a considerable name. Quintilianus makes honourable mention of Sēcundus (x. 1. 120), and Tacitus introduces him as one of the speakers in his dialogue on oratory (2).

Julius Tugūrinus, Jūlii Tugūrii, m. a Roman knight who entered into a conspiracy against the emperor Néro, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 50).

Julius Tūtor, Jūlii Tūtōris, m. a Trevirian, who joined Julius Clāssicus with Julius Sabinus q. v. He compelled the colony at Agrippina to take the oath to the empire of the Gauls. In this revolt he displayed greater bravery than Julius Sabinus, the pretended descendant of C. Julius Caesar, and an aspirant at the throne. He crossed the Rhine, but was routed. Of his future life nothing is known (Tac. Hist. iv. 55 seq.).

Julius Vindex, Jūlii Vindici, m. revolted from the Romans, but was defeated with his whole army, the booty of which enriched the victorious legions. From the notice taken of him and his actions by Tacitus, he must have been a person of some eminence (Tac. Ann. xv. 74 seq.).—2. A Roman, who had the command in Gallia, France, as proprietor. He earnestly entreated Gālba to assume the reins of government, promising powerful assistance, should circumstances require it. To this, allusion is made by Suetonius in his life of Néro (40, 41). His transactions, however, are more fully related by Tacitus (Hist. i. 51 seq.).

C. Julius, C. Jūlii, m. a noble Roman, named dictator in the camp, in consequence of a decree of the senate, sent thither to the consuls for that purpose, in 851 B. C. (Liv. vii. 21). He would probably have the surname of Iulus.—2. A Roman senator, who wrote a history of his countrymen in the Greek language, about 144 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 53). Nothing further of him is known.—3. One of the associates of Catilina, whom he despatched to Apulia, with the view of procuring additional strength to the conspiracy (Sal. Cat. 27).

C. Julius Emiliānus, C. Jūlii Emiliāni, m. governor of Mesia and Pannonia, whose troops routed the barbarians, and declared him emperor, in the year 253. He was a man of very obscure birth, says Eutrōpius, and of obscurer reign, having been killed in the third month after he had assumed the purple, by the troops under Hostilianus and Volusianus (ix. 5 seq.).

C. Julius Caesar, C. Jūlii Caesaris, m. was put to death with his brother L. Julius Caesar, in 89 B. C., by L. Cornēlius Cinna and C. Mārius, who stuck up their heads on the rostrum (Liv. Ep. 80).—2. The first distinguished character of the Caesars, was the son of Caius Caesar, and Aurēlia, the daughter of Cōtta. He was born in the 6th consulship of Mārius, 99 years B. C. When only in his 17th year, he obtained the office of Flāmen Dialis, i. e. High Priest of Jupiter. His marriage with Cōrnēlia, the daughter of Cinna, excited against him the hatred of Sūlla, to whose suspicion he had, from his early years, been exposed, in consequence of his aunt Jūlia being the wife of Mārius. To escape assassination, he was obliged to conceal himself, until, by the intercession of the vestal virgins, and entreaties of his relations, the tyrant was induced, although reluctantly, to spare his life. That Sūlla formed, at an early period, a correct opinion of his talents and ambition, is proved by the answer which he returned to his friends, who reproached him for the measure of wishing to put a boy to death: "In that boy," said he, "I see many Marii." The first military honour which Cæsar obtained, was a civic crown, at the siege of Marseilles, when the Roman army was commanded by Thermus, the prætor. On Sulla's death he returned to Rome, and, before he had completed his 34th year, accused Dénitilla of extortion. Although the prosecution terminated in the acquittal of the defendant, Cæsar in that trial gave such proofs of his abilities, as ranked him, in the public opinion, high among the most distinguished orators. Not having obtained any public office, and wishing to avoid the odium necessarily attendant on an unsuccessful impeachment, he retired to Rhodes (1 syl.), to study eloquence under Apollonius, the son of Milius, who was a very eminent teacher of rhetoric. Near the island Phœnæum, on his way to Rhodes, he was taken by pirates, among whom he remained 40 days. At the end of that time, he purchased his liberty for 50 talents. Soon after obtaining his freedom from the pirates, he procured a ship, pursued them, and, to verify the threat which he expressed when their captive, put them all to death by crucifixion. After his return to Rome, he was, by the vote of the people, appointed a military tribune. He afterwards obtained the offices of Quæstor, Edile, High Priest (Pontifex Maximus), Prætor, and Consul. During his Quæstorship, his wife Cornelia, and aunt Julia, the widow of Marius, died; and he delivered a funeral oration from the Rostra in honour of both. He then married Pœpœa, the daughter of Q. Pœpœus, and grand-daughter of Sulla. To gain the favour of the people, when Edile, he surpassed all his predecessors in the extravagance and magnificence of his shows. To dazzle and captivate the multitude, and to weaken the power of the nobles, was his constant aim. In the pursuit of his favourite plans, he had recourse to means the most wicked and flagitious. Of moral restraint he knew nothing, nor used this appear wonderful, since, in his speech for the traitors engaged in the conspiracy of Cætilina, he avows his disbelief of the immortality of the soul, and consequently of a state of rewards and punishments (Sal. Cat. 51). In spite, however, of his vices, the agreeableness of his manners, and splendour of his talents, added to his martial valour and intrepidity, gained him many admirers. The success of his military enterprises rendered him a favourite with the army, and his profuse bribery secured in his interest the populace of Rome. That his object, from his early years, had been his own aggrandizement on the ruin of his country, is manifest from his having been concerned, first, in the conspiracy of Crassus and Sulla, and afterwards in that of Cætilina (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 9). Appianus states expressly, that he certainly knew of the conspiracy, if not an accomplice (Bel. Civ. 430). The judgment which he gave in the senate, with respect to the punishment of Léntulus, Cethegus, &c., accomplices of that rebel, the conduct of the Roman equites, who guarded the temple where the senate was met, and his being arraigned as an associate of that incendiary before the Quæstor and the senate, sufficiently prove both the public opinion and his guilt. He leagueed with these traitors, not to promote their schemes, but by their means to destroy the liberties of his country, and become the unlimited sovereign of Rome. Cæsar divorced Pœpœa, because Clodius had been detected in his house, while she and other matrons were celebrating the rites of Bona Dea, from which every male creature was most carefully excluded. Clodius was tried for this crime, and, through bribery, obtained a sentence of acquittal. As Clodius was a man of great influence and popularity, Cæsar, although certain of the fact, declined bearing evidence against him, lest it should have, at any future period, been in the smallest degree injurious to his plans of ambition. About this time he subdued the Lusitanians (Liv. Ep. 103). The senate seem to have been apprehensive of the power and influence of Cæsar, by the time he was elected consul, which induced them to decree provinces of little or no importance, woods and roads, to the consuls for that year. This provoked his resentment, and he laboured to effect a reconciliation between Pœpœus and Crassus, which he at last, after great exertion, accomplished. The interest of the former he had keenly supported in the passing of the Manilian law, which conferred extraordinary powers on that commander, and likewise on other occasions, though not without an ultimate view to his own advantage. Whatever power, beyond what was usual, had been assigned to others, served as a precedent for his soliciting the like for himself. With Crassus, a man of prodigious wealth, but of no great personal merit, he had long been in habits of friendship. Of all the Roman citizens Pœpœus possessed the greatest power, Crassus the greatest riches, and Cæsar the greatest abilities. In this condition, which was in fact a conspiracy against the liberties of Rome, they solemnly swore that nothing was to be done in the state but by their common consent. The scandalous combination of these three great men was called the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE. Of the three, Pœpœus was the least criminal. He appears to have been duped by the insinuating address of Cæsar, in whose consulship he expected to get his acts in Asia ratified. The decree could only gratify his vanity, which was his ruling passion; but the means which he employed to accomplish it were highly criminal. The object of Crassus was to add to his wealth, and to increase his influence in the state by the power and talents of the other two, and that of Cæsar, by occasionally yielding to Pœpœus' fame, to raise his own, and "crown his mad ambition." From this period the state was wholly managed by Cæsar; and the violence of his proceedings rendered the triumviri objects of abhorrence to all classes of the community. Cicero, to whom Pœpœus confessed he had been duped by Cæsar, advised him to break off all connexion with that intriguing and unprincipled politician; but with him the winning address of Cæsar had more influence, who not only preserved their former intimacy, in opposition to the advice of Cicero, but strengthened their union by giving Pœpœus in marriage his daughter Julia, a woman of the most amiable dispositions, and of the most engaging manners. So great was her influence with both her father and husband, that, in spite of the mutual jealousy and aversion which afterwards subsisted between them, she prevented their coming to any rupture as long as she lived. To increase his power in the state, and to command the interest of Piso, who succeeded him in the consulship, he married his daughter Calpurnia. A strong and respectable party, animated by love of their country, then began warmly to oppose the measures of the triumvirate. Caesar, anxious to intimidate them, bribed Vettius, who had formerly preferred an accusation against himself, to declare that he had been urged by some of the nobles to assassinate Pömpēius. But this villany being detected by the people, was treated with such contempt, that he was glad to drop it; and, to prevent discovery, he put Vettius to death in prison. Notwithstanding these acts of enormity, he still retained a very powerful party in the state. Previously to the expiration of his consulship, he obtained from the people, through his agent, the tribune Vatinus, the province of Gallia Cisalpinga, and Illyricum, Upper Albania, with three legions, for five years; and the senate, at the desire of Caesar, added Gallia Transalpinga, France, and another legion. These legions were gradually increased to thirteen. Some of the succeeding magistrates wished to annul his acts, and to prosecute him for his illegal conduct during his consulship; but having the tribunes in his interest, a veto was put on all their proceedings. Caesar is supposed to have set out for Gallia Transalpinga, France, in the end of March, 57 B. C. Of his conquest of that country, checking the inroads of the Germans, and over-running part of Britain, the Commentaries of the Gallic war contain a rapid, but well written, account. The young reader must not infer that all his engagements with these nations are fully recorded, or every circumstance of his conduct with regard to them either minutely or faithfully detailed. Respect for his character as a man, induced him to conceal many particulars, and to hint at, rather than describe, others. The precise time in which he conquered Gallia is not ascertained. Some make it 10 years (gemina lustris, Luc. Phar. i. 283), others 8, and himself 9 (B. C. i. 7). His cruelty and injustice in attacking the states in alliance with Rome, called forth merited reprehension in the senate, when it was even proposed, that, for his abuse of power in that country, he should be given up to the enemy. But the splendour of his success prevented that motion from passing into a law. The first seven books of the Commentaries were written by Caesar. To them Hirtius Pansa, at the request of Balbus, added an eighth, which brings down the narrative of Caesar's military operations in Gallia to the time when he passed the Rübicon, which formed the commencement of the Civil war. The dissimulated friendship which had, for some time, existed between Caesar and Pömpēius, on the death of Julla and Crassus, gave place to personal hatred and open hostility. Neither of these generals could bear an equal, much less a superior. Through the influence of Pömpēius, the senate had received Caesar's petitions with contemptuous indifference, which was with him a good reason for involving his country in all the horrors of intestine bloodshed. Caesar's crossing the Rübicon, the boundary of Gallia Cisalpinga, which the laws did not allow him to pass while in command, was an actual declaration of hostilities. Pömpēius and his friends fled from Italy, and crossed to Greece. In 160 days, Caesar conquered all Italy, entered Rome, and took possession of the treasury, which Pömpēius, by an unaccountable oversight, had left behind him. To diminish his guilt in plundering Sanctus ararium, he states that it was left open. But this assertion is contradicted by Dio, Appian, Plutarch, and Florus. Having seized the government-money, he left the command of the army in Italy to Antony, and went against Pömpēius' best troops, which were then in Spain, under Pētrēius, Afrānius, and Vārro, observing, on his quitting the capital, "That he was going to fight an army without a general, and would return to fight a general without an army." He was well received by the inhabitants of all the towns on his road thither, except the people of Māssilia, Marseilles, who refused to admit him within their gates. Unwilling to spend much time in the reduction of that city, he gave the command of the troops who were to attack it by land to Trēbōnius, his lieutenant-general, and of the fleet to Dēcimus Brūtus. Having brought the war in Spain to a successful termination, on his return to Rome he compelled the inhabitants of Marseilles, after a long and brave resistance, to surrender (see Māssilia). He then prepared to follow Pömpēius into Greece, conscious that, during his life, he would neither enjoy tranquillity nor security. After several skirmishes, the two armies came to a decisive engagement on Phārsālia, the plain of Pharos, in which Pömpēius was completely defeated, and his camp taken. Immediately after that disastrous battle, he, accompanied with only 30 horsemen, hastened to the shores of Mitrē Agēum, the Archipelago, and afterwards fled to Egypt, where he was murdered. Caesar, resolved to pursue his enemy into whatever part of the world he might go, followed him into Egypt, which he reached soon after the murder of Pömpēius. Embracing the interest of Clēōpātra, Caesar became attached to her person, and for some time the character of the conqueror was lost in that of the voluptuary. By her he had a son called Cēsārion, or, Cēsārion, who, at the age of 18, five years after he had been proclaimed, by his mother and Antony, king of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cōlē-Syria, was put to death by Augustus. His military enterprises in Egypt are related in Commentarii de Bello Alexandrino, by an author whose name has not been transmitted. Having placed the crown of Egypt on Clēōpātra, with whom he had associated in the kingdom her younger brother, Ptolēmeus, merely to save appearances, he advanced with her up the Nile, and would probably have gone to Æthiōpia, had not his soldiers refused to follow him. Roused at last from his indolence and effeminacy by the revolt of Phārnāces, king of Pōntus, he marched against that monarch, defeated him, and subdued his country, with such ease and rapidity that, in writing an account of it to a friend at Rome, he employed only three words, Veni, vidi, vici. To Mithridātes, from whom he had received so much assistance in the Alexandrine war, he gave the kingdom of Bōs-pōrus on Pālūs Mæōtis, the Sea of Azoph, and intrusted Dōmītiūs with the settlement of other affairs in Asia. To quell the commotions in Italy, he returned to that country, levying great contributions from the states through which he passed, for the African war, of which a full account has been given in Commentarii de Bello Africāno, by an unknown author. The good fortune of Cæsar did not fail him in this expedition; he defeated the republican forces under Scīpio, in an engagement near Thāpsus, and reduced the kingdom of their ally, Jūba, king of Mauritānia, to a Roman province. On hearing of Cæsar's success, Cāto killed himself at Utica. Returning to Rome, Cæsar, at the interval of a few days, triumphed four different times, in consequence of his having conquered Gallia, France, Ægyptus, Egypt, Pōntus and Africa, i. e. Nūmīdia, Algiers, Mauritānia, Morocco and Fez, &c. The plunder of so many countries enabled the conqueror of the world to glut his soldiers with presents, and the citizens with largesses. To dazzle the eyes of the multitude, and to divert the minds of the citizens from the extinction of their liberties, he exhibited shows of uncommon magnificence, and gave feasts of the most unbounded profusion. He also enacted some useful laws, and regulated the Calendar according to the course of the sun. Cnēius and Sēxtus, the sons of Pōmpēius, aided by Lābiēnus, having drawn together a powerful army in Spain, Cæsar was again obliged to leave Rome, and march against them. They came to a decisive battle at Mūnda, in which the former two displayed great heroism and generalship. The veterans of Cæsar were forced to fly, and it required all his address to bring them again to the charge. Victory at last declared for that general, which put a final period to the war, and left the conqueror in the peaceful possession of the Roman empire. The eyes of his countrymen were now opened. Though his triumph surpassed, in splendour and magnificence, all that had ever been seen in Rome, the people, with sorrowful hearts, gazed at the pompous procession, and stood silent. No acclamation followed the car of the conqueror. The splendid exhibition was beheld as the final extinction of Roman independence, and the commencement of degrading slavery. The citizens justly considered Cæsar as triumphing, not over the natives of Spain, but over the sons of Pōmpēius, their favourite general, over the nobles of Rome, and over the laws of the commonwealth.

Flōrus mentions that he displayed no representation of Phārsālīa, Thāpsus, and Mūnda, an indubitable proof that the Romans at large neither approved of his conduct, nor rejoiced at his success. No stranger to vanity, dread of public disapprobation must have induced him to withhold emblems of victories which both gratified his ambition, and left him sole monarch of Rome. The senate has been blamed for conferring such extravagant honours, and for bestowing such unlimited power, on Cæsar; but in this they only yielded to the inclination of the conqueror, and merely granted what they had then no power to withhold. They elected him consul every year, and dictator for life; appointed him superintendent of public morals, and conferred upon him the titles of Im-pērātor, and Father of his country. Nor did they stop here. They decreed him an elevated seat in the theatre, a golden chair in the senatehouse, and on the tribunal in the forum. To complete their extravagance and impiety, to the man who had destroyed their constitution, and enslaved his fellow-citizens, they voted temples, altars, and priests. The command of the army, disposal of the treasury, and nomination of the magistrates, he considered to be vested in him by the success of his arms, hence the concurrence of the senate in these matters was deemed unnecessary. To decoy the people, with some of those powers he used occasionally to dispense; but only when it suited the object which he had in view. By remitting a third part of their rents (lōcātiōnes), he obtained the favour of the knights (Ap. Bel. Civ. 435). It must not be denied that his conduct, when supreme commander, was marked with great clemency, and that he enacted several salutary laws for the better regulation of the state. He administered justice without partiality, and added to the greatness of the empire by planting Roman colonies beyond seas. But his elevated station, as well as the measures by which it had been obtained, created him enemies; and the chief of the senate, among whom was his most intimate friend Brūtus, conspired against his life. Warned by the soothsayer Spūriūna, that he should beware of the Ides of March, he laughed at the prediction, and refused the request of his wife Cālpūrnia, who had been alarmed by dreams during the preceding night, that he should remain at home. Of this contempt of danger, his life was the forfeiture (Vel. Pat. ii. 57). He died in the senatehouse, 15th March, 44 B. C., in the 56th year of his age, pierced by 23 wounds, after he had enjoyed the peaceful possession of the empire only five months (Eutrop. vi. 25). Thus, says Flōrus, he who had filled the world with the blood of his fellow-citizens, at last filled the senatehouse with his own blood (iv. 2). Of Cæsar's intrepidity as a soldier, and abilities as a commander, the armies which he defeated, and the countries which he conquered, are sufficient proofs. To the talents of a consummate general, he added those of an elegant historian, and a persuasive orator. Much of his commentaries, or journals, of the Gallic and Civil wars, were, it is said, composed on the spot where his battles were fought. The purity and neatness of his style, notwithstanding the rapidity with which he must have written, have not been surpassed by any Roman writer. His narrative is perspicuous, simple, and natural. It is at once chaste and animated. His lucid and picturesque description places the whole scene distinctly before the reader, who accompanies him in all his marches, and is a witness of every engagement. Few passages occur in his writings which the most illiterate do not understand, and the most polished do not approve. To compose a simple narrative of his campaigns, for the amusement of himself and his friends, seems rather to have been his object, than to give a specimen of his talents as a profound historian or deep politician. Hence it were absurd to expect in the commentaries a finished history. They are mere outlines which he, perhaps, entertained the hope of seeing filled up, either by himself or by some other hand. Besides a few juvenile pieces mentioned by Suetonius, and a collection of apophthegms, Caesar left, at his death, two books on Grammar (de Analogia, Gel. i. 10), and a poem which he called Iter, or The Journey. But these, as well as his letters to the senate and his friends, are lost. None of his writings now remain, except 7 books of the Gallic, and 3 of the Civil, war. The 8th book of the Gallic war, as formerly mentioned, is the composition of A. Hirtius Pansa; but it is not known who wrote the accounts of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars. Of Caesar's talents as an orator, we have the opinion of Cicero and Quintilianus. His orations were admired for two qualities, not always united, strength and elegance. Cicero places him among the first orators, and Quintilianus asserts he spoke with the same spirit with which he fought. Had not ambition, says that great critic, diverted Caesar from the arts of peace, he would have rivalled the eloquence of Cicero. His mode of writing secretly is described by Gellius (xvii. 9). To him Maenius alludes, v. 512. Ilum (i. e. C. Jullum Cæsarem) qui deduxit domitos Quirites ad sua flagra, him who brought down the tamed Romans to his scourges, i. e. C. Jullus Caesar who enslaved his country and treated Roman citizens like slaves (Juv. Sat. x. 109). Caesar is often used as synonymous with Emperor; hence, ad iniquas mensas Cæsaris, at the unequal tables of the emperor, i. e. tables where food was set before the guests, which, in point of quality, corresponded with their rank (Juv. Sat. v. 4). Adj. Cæsareus, Cæsarianus, et, Jullianus, a. um. Cæsaria domus, the palace of Augustus (Ov. Trist. i. 1. 70). Cæsariana Pallas (Mart. viii. 1). This applies to Domitian. Cæsarianum civile bellum, i. e. inter Cæsarem et Pompeium (Cor. Nep. Att. 7). Julliana partes, the partisans of C. Jullus Caesar (Tac. Ann. i. 2).

C. Jullus Caesar Strabo, C. Julli Cæsaris Strabonis, m. was a curule edile, 90 B. C., but his character as a man of wit, humour, eloquence, and original genius, is more conspicuous than as a politician or a warrior. From the writings of Cicero, it cannot be doubted, that he stood very high in his opinion. In these turbulent times neither talents nor wealth procured tranquillity or secured life. By order of Cinna, he was killed and his head stuck up in the rostrum (Cic. de Orat. ii. 3 seq. Vel. Pat. ii. 9).

C. Jullus Hyginus, C. Julli Hygini, m. was by birth a Spaniard, although it has been maintained he was an Egyptian, brought from Alexandria by C. Jullus Caesar at the time he took that city. From his great knowledge of antiquity, many gave him the name of Polyhistor. He was the keeper of the Palatine Library, yet this did not prevent him from teaching great numbers. Among his intimate friends were the poet Ovid, and the historian C. Licinius, who was of consular rank, and stated that Hyginus died very poor, depending solely on his liberality. Jullus Modestus, the freedman of this grammarian, followed the steps of his patron both in his pursuits and learning (Suet. II. Gram. 20).

C. Jullus Iulus, C. Julli Iuli, m. obtained the consulship in 482 B. C., and thirty-one years after, when a decemvir, he brought to trial P. Sestius, of patrician rank, whom he arraigned before the people, acting the part of an accuser in place of sitting as a judge, with the view of adding to the liberty of the commons by diminishing the power of the magistracy (Liv. iii. 33—50).—2. Consul in 447 B. C. with M. Geganius Macerinus. They prevented injurious consequences resulting from combinations formed by the tribunes against the young nobles. He twice afterwards obtained the same dignity (Liv. iii. 65 seq.).—3. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 407 B. C., who contended with great keenness and obstinacy against P. Cornélius Cossus; both refused to be directed by the senate, who referred the matter to the tribunes, that the people might compel them to obey, as they had done formerly in the case of consuls. The plebeian tribunes rejoiced at the dissension among the patricians, refused to interfere; on which their colleague Servilius Ahula named P. Cornélius Cossus dictator. He was afterwards re-elected and died when censor in 391 B. C. (Liv. iv. 56 seq.).

C. Jullus Mento, C. Julli Mentonis, m. consul in 431 B. C., had a violent contention with his colleague T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, both refusing to obey the senate, and to name a dictator against the Æqui and Volsi, until compelled by a decree of the Commons. He dedicated a temple to Apollo, in the absence of his colleague, without having recourse to the lots, at which Quinctius was offended, and appealed to the senate, but without any effect (Liv. iv. 26—29).

C. Jullus Verecindares Düblius, C. Julli Verecindaris Dübli, m. an Ædian, who dedicated an altar to C. Jullus Caesar at the junction of the Saone with the Rhone, for which purpose he had been appointed priest, 14 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 137). Some have supposed that in the vicinity of the river, Dübli, the Doubs, was a town of the same name, of which he was a native, hence called Düblius.

Cn. Jullus Agricola, Cn. Julli Agricole, m. son of Jullus Gracinus and Julla Præcilla, was born at Forum Jullum, Fregus. His ancestors appear to have been Roman knights. Although his father held the rank of senator, Caligula put Gracinus to death, and that before Agricola had attained that age capable of being benefited by the conduct and intelligence of his virtuous parent. His mother carried him when a child to Marselles, where he received an excellent education, of which he reaped the full advantage by the intenseness of his application, and the vigour of his intellect. In after life, he used to mention, that he studied the philosophy of the Greeks with greater ardour than became a Roman, and a senator. Under Suetonius Paulinus, he served his first campaign in Britain, and that officer kept him near his person, on purpose to make him acquainted with the duties of a soldier. His professions became his study, and, on obtaining the tribuneship of a legion, he paid every attention to his office, consulted the more experienced, and kept company with the best and the most valiant. Vanity never impelled him to meet danger rashly, and courage prevented his declining it from fear. The successes and disasters of Suetonius formed an excellent school for the young soldier, who gained knowledge by experience, and his breast kindled with the love of military fame, as he became more acquainted with the events of war. Having returned to Rome, he married Dömütia Decidiāna with whom he led a very happy life, and their affection had suffered no diminution when death dissolved their union. After obtaining the offices of questor, tribune of the people, and prætor, the emperor conferred on him the consulship, and the dignity of a pontiff. Vespāsianus appointed him commander-in-chief in Britain in the year 75, where he almost extirpated the Ordōvices, overran Mōna, Anglesey, and extended his conquests northward to the Tweed. In subsequent campaigns, he subjected to the Roman empire Scotland to the line of the great canal. With the view of conciliating, to the Roman government, the natives whom he had subdued, he exhorted them to build houses, to cultivate the lands, and to educate their children. Unconscious of his object, they discontinued their warlike habits, and entered into all the Roman refinements, which they considered marks of politeness, whilst in reality they were the very fetters of slavery. Ever on the alert, he overpowered the refractory at all seasons of the year, and the defeat of Cālgācus near the Grampian hills, rendered resistance on the part of the Britons vain. It does not appear that he ever crossed the Tay. A Roman fleet by his orders sailed round the north of Scotland, and ascertained what the Romans did not previously know, that Britain was an island. Of this adventure some Usipian deserters suggested the idea. They fled from Britain, and, after a very perilous voyage, returned to their countrymen, and related their adventures which were soon known at Rome. Dömütianus became jealous of this noble Roman, and recalled him from Britain, which he had governed with uniform success during seven years, for which he decreed him the honours of a triumph. The tyrant plotted his destruction, yet did not venture to outrage justice by condemning him on the false charges, probably preferred against Agricōla at his own suggestion. No certain account of his death has been transmitted, which even his son-in-law either did not know or did not choose to communicate. The reader of Agricōla's life can scarcely fail to perceive, that Tacitus believed he had been cut off by poison secretly administered. Agricōla left behind him only one daughter, the wife of his biographer, his son predeceased him, and he appointed the emperor joint heir with his wife and daughter.

L. Jūlius, L. Jūlii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Iūlus) elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular power in 438 B. C. Eight years after, A. Pōstūmus Tūbērtus nominated him master of the horse, and he obtained the consulship in 430 B. C. (Liv. iv. 16–30).—2. Chosen a military tribune with consular power in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30).—3. Elected prætor in 185 B. C., and obtained Gallia for his province, to which the senate ordered him to set out immediately, in consequence of Transalpine Gauls attempting to settle where the city Aquilēia afterwards stood (Liv. xxxix. 45). A prætor of the same name occurs in Liv. xlv. 44.

L. Jūlius Cæsar, L. Jūlii Cæsāris, m. a Roman consul, who, in 92 B. C., fought without success, against the Sāmnites, but he afterwards had the honour of obtaining a brilliant victory over that nation, on account of which the inhabitants of Rome laid aside the military dress. He was killed along with his brother, C. Jūlius Cæsar q. r. (Liv. Ep. 73–80).—2. Was consul with C. Mārcus Figūlus, 66 B. C. During their consulship, L. Sērgius Cātīlina formed the design of overturning the government of the Roman empire, which he attempted to carry into execution next year, when M. Tūllius Cicēro and C. Antōnius held the highest office. By the vigilance and promptitude of Cicēro, the conspiracy was crushed, and the traitors punished (Sal. Cat. 17).—3. Maternal uncle of M. Antōnius, by whom he was proscribed (Liv. Ep. 120. Flor. iv. 6).—4. A relative of C. Jūlius Cæsar, who put him to death, at the taking of Utica, after the battle of Pharsālia. It appears that he had adopted the cause of the republic, and served as a questor under Cāto, in the town already mentioned (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 75).

L. Jūlius Cāllidus, L. Jūlii Cālidi, m. a Roman poet, highly commended by Cōruilius Nēpos. In the opinion of that biographer, he was by far the most elegant poet, from the time of Lūcrētius and Cātullus, and not less respectable for his integrity and his knowledge of the fine arts, than for his poetical genius. P. Völūmnius, principal engineer of M. Antōnius, had entered his name in the list of the proscribed, on account of his large possessions in Africa; and T. Pōmpōnius Atticus, who never forgot his friends, exerted himself for his preservation, in which he happily succeeded (Cor. Nep. Att. 12).

L. Jūlius Iūlus, L. Jūlii Iūli, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 402 B. C. (Liv. v. 1). Other two of this name, who held the same office, are mentioned by Līvius, in his 5th and 6th books.

L. Jūlius Mōcilla, L. Jūlii Mōcillæ, m. a noble Roman, who had held the office of prætor, whom T. Pōmpōnius Atticus resolved to protect, together with his son and A. Tōrquātus, against the proscription formed by the second triumvirate (Cor. Nep. Att. 11).

L. Jūlius Sēquēstris, L. Jūlii Sēquēstris, m. a Roman, who was killed by lightning, and likewise his horse, on the road to the Sābines, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 26).

M. Jūlius Philippus, M. Jūlii Philippi, m. was a native of Bōstra, Bosra, a town of Trāchōnitis. According to Aurēlius Victor, his father commanded a band of robbers. In the Roman army, he had risen to high rank, and on the death of Mysithæus, whom some suppose he murdered, Gōrdiānus appointed him prætorian præfect. One crime naturally gives rise to another, and, therefore, it excites no surprise to find that Philippus soon formed measures for the destruction of his benefactor. In order to excite discontent among the soldiers, he artfully contrived to render provisions scarce, and, having ingratiated himself with the principal officers, induced the army to declare him the colleague of the emperor. Even this exalted situation did not satisfy the ambition of Philippus, who secretly deprived Gōrdiānus of life, and succeeded him in the throne. Amongst the first acts of his reign, he conferred the title of Cæsar on his own son, then a boy, and not long after, that of Augūstus. The situation of affairs necessarily called him to Rome. Before he left the army in Syria, he made peace with Sapor, king of Persia. After having strengthened his authority in the capital, he marched against the Carpi, who inhabited the Carpathian mountains, defeated them, and returned victorious to Rome. In the consulship, he took for his colleague his son, only ten years of age. Several unsuccessful attempts were made, in different parts of the empire, to obtain the imperial authority; at last Décus raised the standard of rebellion, and gained a decisive victory over this unprincipled emperor, at Vérone, in the year 249. Philippus died either in that town, or in the field of battle, after a reign of five years and some months. The praetorian guards killed his son, as soon as they heard of his father's death. He planted a colony near Bostra, Bostra, which, from his own name, he called Philippópolis. Eutrópius mentions that both father and son were ranked among the gods (ix. 3).

Séxtus Jūlius Caesar, Séxti Jūlii Cæsaris, m. held the office of praetor, and the government of Sicily, in 210 B. C.—2. Held the office of consul at Rome, 93 B. C., the year in which the Picētes, Mārsi, and Pēlign, after having been long subject to the Romans, claimed the freedom of the city, which being refused, produced the Social war (Eutrop. v. 3). In that contest, he lost his army, and returned to Rome, covered with blood, exhibiting a melancholy spectacle (Flor. iii. 18).—3. Was killed by the legion which he commanded in Syria, and it then revolted to Bāsus (Liv. Ep. 114).—4. Of the family of Caesar, a young man of great forwardness, whom the army put to death for his insolence (Ap. Bel. Civ. 575).

Séxtus Jūlius Iūlus, Séxti Jūlii Iūli, m. a military tribune with consular authority, at Rome, in 423 B. C. (Liv. iv. 35).

Iūlus, i, m. a surname of Ascānius, the son of Ēneas and Crēusa, a daughter of Prīamus, the last king of Troja. During the night in which the Greeks obtained possession of that renowned city, Ēneas, after many brave but ineffectual attempts to regain it by force of arms, perceiving that further exertion would be vain, yielded to fate, and taking his father, the venerable Anchises, on his shoulders, and his son Ascānius by the hand, retired, before the dawn of morn, to a temple of Ceres, which stood at a considerable distance from the walls. Anchises accompanied his son to Sicilia, Sicily, where he died, and funeral games were instituted to his memory. Ascānius distinguished himself as a warrior in Italy, and succeeded his father in the throne of Lavinium. At a future period, he built Alba Lōnga, to which he transferred the seat of government, and left to his stepmother, Lavinia, the city which his father had built, and, in honour of his wife, called Lavinium. The crown of Alba Lōnga was transmitted to the descendants of this monarch, in regular succession, for 487 years (400, Liv.), until the reign of Tūllus Hōstilius, who levelled the city with the ground, and removed the inhabitants to Rōma, Rome. Such is the common account of Ascānius, which Virgilius has adopted (Ēn. v. 597); but Livius seems doubtful whether Crēusa or Lavinia was the mother of the prince who founded Alba Lōnga. If the latter had a son of that name, which the same historian mentions as a fact, there can be no doubt that his birth was subsequent to the death of Creusa's son. The history of Trojan Ascānius, from his father's settlement in Lātium, must therefore be regarded as uncertain or unknown (Liv. i. 3. Just. xliii. 1). The Julian clan traced their descent and name from this son of Ēneas (Virg. Ēn. i. 288). Iūli, orum, m. the descendants of Ascānius (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 190). Adj. Iūlēas, a, um, of Iūlus, of Jūlius Caesar, and of the other Cæsars. Iūlēus mōns, i. e. Mons Albānus (Mart. xiii. 109). Iūlēa olīva (Mart. ix. 36). Iūlēa habēna, the imperial government (Mart. ix. 104).

Iūlus Antōnius, Iūli Antōnii, m. son of M. Antōnius the triumvir, convicted of adultery with Jūlia, the daughter of Augūstus, for which criminal conduct he was punished with death (Tac. Ann. iv. 44).

Iūncus Virgilianus, Iūnci Virgiliani, m. a man of senatorian dignity, who was hurried to execution at the time C. Silius suffered the punishment of death for his intercourse with Messalina (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Jūnia, æ, f. sister of M. Jūnius Brūtus, niece of M. Pōrcius Cato Uticēnsis, and wife of C. Cāssius Lōnginus. She died in the year 22, possessed of great riches, which enabled her to leave marks of her respect to almost all the eminent men in Rome. The name of the emperor Tibērius did not occur in her will, and this omission gave him no offence, considering it the exercise of a civil right. The magnificence of her funeral displayed not only her wealth, but also her connexion with the most illustrious families (Tac. Ann. iii. 76).—2. Another sister, the wife of M. Ēmilius Lēpidus the triumvir (Vel. Pat. ii. 88).—3. Wife of Fārius Cāmillus Scribōniānus, and mother of M. Fārius Cāmillus Scribōniānus. She had been driven into banishment, where, from having felt the severity of her fate, a charge of harbouring resentment against the emperor Claudius, was brought against her, which he suppressed, and boasted of his clemency to a disaffected family (Tac. Ann. xii. 62).

Jūnia, v. Jūlia Cālvinia, Jūniæ Cālvinæ, f. sister of D. Jūnius Silānus, a woman of an elegant person, but lascivious character, accused, by Vitellius, of incest with her brother. The charge had no foundation in truth, and had been raised on purpose to gain the favour of Agrippina; yet she was banished from Italy. The emperor Nero, after his mother's death, recalled her (Tac. Ann. xii. 4 seq.).

Jūnia Claudilla, Jūniæ Claudillæ, f. daughter of M. Jūnius Silānus, and wife of the emperor Cālgūla (Suet. Cal. 12).

Jūnia Silāna, Jūniæ Silānæ, f. wife of C. Silius who repudiated her through the influence of Messalina. She afterwards became intimate with Agrippina, against whom she attempted to frame an accusation, in which Itūrius and Cālvisius acted the principal part. This wish to injure Agrippina, originated in the latter preventing the marriage of Jūnia Silāna with Séxtus Africānus, by mentioning her vices. Having no children, her large possessions would have devolved on her husband. The accusation failed, and, sentence of banishment having been pronounced against her, she died in exile (Tac. Ann. xi. 12 seq.).

Jūnia Tōcquāta, Jūniæ Tōcquātæ, f. sister of Silianus, a virgin of uncommon sanctity (Tac. Ann. iii. 69).

M. Junianus Justinus, M. Juniani Justinus, m. a Roman historian, supposed to have lived under Antoninus Pius; but of his native country and family nothing is known. He abridged the history of Trogus Pompeius, which would have been more valuable, had the accuracy of his statements merited the same commendation as the elegance of his style, and the justness of his remarks. Still his work contains much information not to be found in any other ancient author. A correct edition, with notes pointing out the inaccuracies, and supplying a few defects, would be a valuable school-book. This observation applies with equal propriety to the writings of Flavius Eutropius q. v.

Junii, orum, m. a patrician clan at Rome, who traced their descent from L. Junius Brutus, by whom the Tarquins were expelled. Adj. Junius, a, um. Junia gens; Junia domus (Liv. ii. 5).

Junius, i, m. a senator, in whose house a statue of the emperor Tiberius was saved from the flames which destroyed all the houses on mount Caelius where his stood, on which account the senate voted, that it should, in future, be called Mons Augustus (Tac. Ann. iv. 64).

Junius Blæsus, Junii Blæsi, m. an officer in the Roman army, who had the command in Pannonia, where he relaxed the discipline of the troops which, however, he prevented from sedition, for a considerable time, and, at last, suggested the propriety of their appointing a deputy to the emperor, and they nominated his own son deputy. His son had the honour of being a second time chosen to that duty. He succeeded Aprilius in the government of Africa, in which he gained great advantages over Tacfarinas, for which he obtained triumphal honours, although he did not bring the war to a termination. Blæsus was the maternal uncle of Scjanus, and was involved in the disasters of his nephew (Tac. Ann. i. 16 seq.). Tacitus perhaps only alludes to the sons of Junius Blæsus (Ann. vi. 40).

2. Son of the former, whom the troops under his father in Pannonia, twice sent to Rome, as their deputy to inform the emperor of their grievances. His own merit, or interest, for he possessed great wealth, procured him the government of Gallia Lugdunensis, from which he sent an imperial retinue to Vitellius, on which account, stimulated by envy, instead of being impressed by gratitude, that emperor became first jealous of Blæsus, afterwards hated him, and, at last, procured his death by poison. Vitellius witnessed the effects of the fatal draught and expressed a savage joy at its consequence (Tac. Ann. i. 19 seq.).

Junius Brutus Scævæ, Junii Bruti Scævæ, m. a noble Roman who held the consulship with L. Furius Cimbillus, in 324 B. C. (Liv. viii. 29).

Junius Cilo, Junii Cilonis, m. governor of Pontus, who brought Mithridates to Rome. For his services, Cilo received consular ornaments, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xii. 21).

Junius Læpius, Junii Læpi, m. a member of the Roman senate, who commenced a prosecution against Vitellius, which, through the interposition of Agrippina, ended in his own banishment, and in the acquittal of the arraigned (Tac. Ann. xii. 42).

Junius Mævilius, Junii Mævili, m. a consul elect, who moved in the senate, that Antistius Sostianus should resign his praetorship, and then suffer death according to law, which Pætus Thrasea opposed, and moved that he should be banished, and his goods confiscated, to which a majority of the senate assented (Tac. Ann. xiv. 48). To him Seneca addressed a letter on the death of his son (Epis. 99).

Junius Mauricius, Junii Maurici, m. a man of sound judgment, deep sagacity, and great experience, was the brother of Arulenus Rusticus. Natural affection, similar manners, and congenial pursuits united these brothers in the closest bond of amity, and their distress at their separation excited the sympathy of the spectators, on seeing the one dragged to execution and the other driven into banishment (Tac. Agric. 45).—2. A Roman of some distinction, whose name occurs in Plinius (Epis. iv. 22). Martialis commends the Maurici for their equity, and the Mæri for their moral worth (v. 29).

Junius Növatus, Junii Növati, m. a plebeian, whom Augustus only fined in money, although he had published a very scurrilous letter against him, in the name of young Agrippa (Suet. Aug. 51).

Junius Otho, Junii Othonis, m. a Roman who, in his praetorship, united with some others in prosecuting C. Junius Silanus q. v. (Tac. Ann. iii. 66).—2. A tribune of the people in the year 37 (Tac. Ann. vi. 47).

Junius Rusticus, Junii Rustici, m. a man appointed by Tiberius to register the acts of the senators, a practice introduced by Julius Caesar (Tac. Ann. v. 4).

Junius Silanus Törquatus, Junii Silani Törquati, m. great-grandson of Augustus, whom the emperor Nero compelled to put an end to his own life. According to some, he was the brother to L. and M. Junius Silanus; but, according to others, their uncle (Tac. Ann. xv. 35).

Applius Junius Silanus, Applii Junii Silani, m. a Roman consul, the colleague of P. Silius Nerva, in the year 27 (Tac. Ann. iv. 68).

C. Junius Bübuleus, C. Junii Bübulei, m. was raised to the consulship in 317 B. C., an office which he twice after obtained, then that of censor, and lastly that of dictator. That Junius possessed the bravery of an eminent soldier, and the talents of an able commander, the pages of Livius sufficiently establish. In later times, his character would have stood higher, had he shown greater lenity to the conquered. To him, and his colleague in the censorship, the state was indebted for the making of roads through the fields at the public expense. In the war which he carried on with the Samnites, he vowed a temple to Sallus, for which he contracted in his censorship, and dedicated it in his dictatorship. A war with the Volsci procured him the last appointment, it was of short continuance, for on the eighth day he entered Rome in triumph (Liv. ix. 20 seq.).—2. Elected consul in 293 B. C. with L. Postumius Megellus (3) (Liv. xxvii. 6). In con. cal. these Junii had likewise the name of Brutus used both before and after Bübuleus.

C. Junius Nörbanus Flaccus, C. Junii Nörbani Flacci, m. held the consulship at Rome with L. Cornélius Scipio Asiaticus, in 85 B. C. Livius informs us that these consuls insulted the ambassadors of L. Cœnilius Silla, who came to offer conditions of peace, and that Silla defeated Nörbanius in battle, and made Scipio prisoner. Having been proscribed, Nörbanius went to Rhodus, Rhodes, where he put himself to death, as soon as he came to be known, in 83 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 85, 89). According to Eutrapius, the battle was fought near Cápua, when Silla killed six thousand, and took other six thousand prisoners, losing only a hundred and twenty-four of his own men (v. 7). To Nörbanius, Tacitus alludes (Hist. iii. 72).

C. Junius Silanus, C. Junii Silani, m. a proconsul of Asia, accused of extortion, of which, in the opinion of Tacitus, he was unquestionably guilty. The senate banished him to Gyarus, Joara; but Tiberius, from respect to the Junian family, and at the request of his sister, Jünla Törquäta q. v., changed the place of his residence to Cýthra, Cerigo. He probably had also the surname of Törquäus (Tac. Ann. iii. 66—69).

Décimus Jünlus Brütus, Décimi Jünli Brütü, m. a noble Roman, who, like Marcus Jünlus Brütus, was believed to be lineally descended from the father of Roman liberty.

Décimus Jünlus Jüvenälis, Décimi Jünli Jüvenälis, m. a Roman satirist of great merit, was born at Aquinum, Aquino, a small town of Lätium, a district of Italia, Italy, about the year 38. The names of his parents have not been transmitted. It is matter of doubt, whether he was the son or foster-son of a rich freedman, by whom he was brought up, and from whom he received a liberal education. Of his early history, no ancient author has given any account, but general report affirms, that he continued the study of eloquence and of Roman law, until he reached his fortieth year. It does not appear certain, that he followed the profession of a lawyer as a mean of subsistence, for his fortune placed him above the drudgery of legal pleading, and the necessity of engaging in business to procure a livelihood. Amusement, or love of distinction, appears to have been his only motive, not a desire of riches, or necessity of toiling for daily bread. At the age already mentioned, either accident or the bent of his inclination led him to the writing of poetry. His first poetical effusions, the dictates of a virtuous indignation, were directed against Páris, a favourite of Domitianus. The pointed severity of his satires excited against him the hatred of the vicious, and particularly of those who smarted under his lash. The minion of the emperor, according to some, prevailed on his master to remove the satirist from Rome; accordingly he received the commission of a centurion, and was sent into Egypt. Jüvenälis naturally considered the measure not in the light of a military promotion, but of an honourable banishment. Many have questioned the exile of our poet, although it cannot be doubted that he was sometime on the banks of the Nile, yet there is no unquestionable evidence of his having been under the necessity of going to that country, and he may have been there from choice, not from compulsion. What renders this opinion probable, Páris fell into disgrace, and suffered death, soon after the period assigned for the banishment of Jüvenälis. Whether inclination or necessity carried him to Egypt, it does not appear probable that he continued long there, since all his satires bear evident marks of having been written at Rome. The present arrangement forms no criterion for ascertaining the order in which the different satires were written, nor does internal evidence guide to any thing like a probable conjecture on this point. Happily, neither the meaning nor right understanding of the poet's intention, at all depends on his chronological dates. Unambitious of wealth, Jüvenälis appears satisfied with his fortune, which must have been equal at least to his wants. He expresses no discontent at his lot as a citizen, nor seems envious of those in higher rank and of greater influence. Vanity formed no part of his character, otherwise many particulars of his history would have been recorded, which are now lost. Had he imitated Hörätius, his poetry would have afforded almost all the information which could have been obtained from autobiography. Other Latin poets have gone with equal minuteness into their own history. The mind of Jüvenälis was engrossed with the subject, and, while he held up virtue to adoration, he exhibited vice in all its loathsome filthiness. At must ever be regretted that, in the virtuous zeal with which he was animated, he has gone into such minuteness of detail and grossness of description, that a pure mind turns from many of his passages in revolting disgust. His impurity, however, is not gratuitous, like that of Hörätius or Mártialis, but the result of a settled conviction, that it was necessary to pursue vice into its foulest dens, and to exhibit it in all the abominations of naked deformity. No satirist has written with the force and keenness of Jüvenälis, or shown a nobler love of moral excellence. His satires are a model of dignified composition, and, notwithstanding of his living after the Augustan age, few objections can be made to the purity of his style, or to the structure of his verse. Mártialis was contemporary with Jüvenälis, to whom he writes two epigrams (vii. 90: xii. 18).

Décies Jünlus, Décii Jünli, m. appointed by the consul, Appianus Claudius, to command at the mouth of the river Valtürnus, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 22). Décies Jünlus Brütus, Décii Jünli Brütü, m. a noble Roman, the first who exhibited shows of gladiators, in honour of his deceased father, in 265 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 16); Valécius Máximus joins with him his brother Marcus (ii. 4). This murderous precedent cost many an unhappy being his life.—2. One of three commissioners, elected, in 196 B. C., to settle a Roman colony at Sipontum, Marina di Siponto, which had formerly belonged to the Alpini (Liv. xxxiv. 45).—3. Surnamed Gallícius, or, Gallícius, was consul at Rome, in 140 B. C., with P. Cörnilius Scipio Násica. By these consuls, C. Máxius was accused of deserting the army in Spain; and, the charge having been proved, he was first scourged under a gallows, and then sold for a slave. The tribunes of the people imprisoned Jünlus and his colleague, because they would not exempt from military service any ten soldiers whom they might think proper to exempt. To the soldiers who had served under Viriathus, Jünlus allotted lands, at a town in Spain, called Valentia. He afterwards subdued all Lusitania, Portugal, as far as the Atlantic Ocean, carrying thirty of the town by storm. On his soldiers refusing to pass the river of Ohlvin, he snatched up a standard, which he carried over the stream, and the whole troops followed him, in 139 B. C. In the north of Spain, he carried on war successfully against the Gallaeci. His bravery contributed greatly to the victory obtained by the consul, C. Sémpronius Tuditanus, over the Iapydes, in 131 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 55-59. Flor. ii. 17). He was a man of considerable learning, skilled in Greek as well as Latin, and lived in terms of great intimacy with the poet Accius (Val. Max. viii. 14).—4. Surnamed Albinius, a lieutenant-general, whom C. Julius Caesar left with C. Trébonius to carry on the siege of Massilla, Marseilles, in 51 B. C. He defeated the Bellovaci, who had rebelled, in 48 B. C. Junius was one of the conspirators against C. Julius Caesar. To prevent M. Antonius from advancing into Gallia Cisalpina, he took possession of Mutina, Mutina, where he was besieged by Antonius next year, and relieved by Augustus. In his absence, he was condemned, on account of Caesar's death, and, having been deserted by the legions which he commanded, he fell into the hands of his enemies, who, by order of M. Antonius, put him to death. See Cæpurnus Séquanus (Liv. Ep. 110-120).—5. Surnamed Sæva, master of the horse to Tib. Sempronius Mamercinus, in 438 B. C. Fourteen years after, he obtained the consulship with L. Furius Camillus, when the war against the Vescini fell to his lot. The sickness of his colleague, who, in martial knowledge, greatly surpassed him, rendered it necessary to elect a dictator, yet Junius retained the command, and, in one successful engagement, crushed the Vescini, so that they fled not to their camps, but dispersed through the towns, which he reduced, and gave the spoils of Scutina and Cingilia, Celiera, to the soldiers (Liv. viii. 12, 29).—6. A lieutenant-general to Sp. Cæcilius, consul, in the war against the Samnites, in 295 B. C. Next year he held the consulship with Q. Fabius Gurges; but the book of Livius, which contained the history of that year, is lost (Liv. x. 43 seque.).—7. Decimus Junius Silanus, Decii Junii Silani, m. in his pretorship governed Mæcedonia, and extorted money from that province, on which account Macedonian ambassadors preferred a charge against him to the senate who, at his own request, referred the matter to his father T. Manlius Torquatus. After a minute investigation, Manlius pronounced his son guilty, on which he ended his life by strangulation. His father disowned him, and would not even attend his funeral, but transacted business in his own house that day, as if nothing had happened (Liv. Ep. 54).—8. Held the office of consul with L. Licinius Murena, 64 B. C. They succeeded M. Tullius Cicero and C. Antonius. Being consuls elect, when the case of Cætilina and his accomplices came before the senate, Junius was first asked his opinion with respect to the punishment which ought to be inflicted on these traitors. He moved that they should be put to death. Either the speech of C. Julius Caesar convinced him that he was wrong, or fear influenced him to depart from his motion, and therefore he went over to the opinion of Tibertius Claudius Nerej, who was for strengthening the guards, and adjourning the debate. Cesar proposed that the property of the traitors should be confiscated, that they should be imprisoned for life in the strongest free towns, and that the man who made any motion to the senate, or appeal to the people, in their favour, should be held guilty of treason. M. Porcius Cato supported the motion from which Junius had fallen, and it having been unanimously carried, the traitors immediately suffered the punishment of death by strangulation in prison (Sal. Cat. 50-55).—3. The colleague of Q. Haterius Antoninus in the consulship in the year 53 (Tac. Ann. xii. 58).—4. Incurred the displeasure of Augustus by a criminal connexion with his daughter. This offence the emperor punished only by excluding him from his friendship, which the culprit understood to imply a sentence of banishment, and retired into voluntary exile. His brother Marcus prevailed on the emperor Tibertius to grant him permission to return to Rome, where he continued to live as a private citizen, without obtaining any public office. Tacitus simply calls him Decius Silanus (Ann. iii. 24).

L. Junius, L. Junii, m. son of Tärquinia, sister of L. Tärquinus Söperbus, who, having perceived that the principal men in the state, among whom were his own brothers, had been put to death by his uncle, assumed in early life the appearance of idiotism, on purpose that his property might be at the disposal of the king, and his life preserved; since the monarch could have no reason to apprehend from him either trouble or danger. To the surname of Brütus (a brute), he did not show the smallest dislike, and thus found security in contempt, which neither innocence nor submission could have procured. When he accompanied his two consins to Delphi, Castri, he carried, as a present to the god, a golden wand in a cornel staff, an emblematical representation of his own character, concealing, in the outward appearance of a fool, a bold and vigorous mind which was, at a future period, to establish the liberties of Rome. On the Tärquinii consulting the Delphian oracle, which of them was to succeed their father, a voice from the bottom of the cave uttered these words, "O young men! whoever of you shall first kiss his mother, will possess the sovereignty of Rome." The Tärquinii, who understood the response literally, resolved to conceal it from their youngest brother Sextus, to determine by lot which of the two should first salute his mother on their return to their native city. Brütus, with more judgment, thought that the words of the oracle should be understood figuratively, and, therefore, on their landing on the coast of Italy, he fell, as if his foot had accidentally slipped, and kissed the earth, the common mother of all. At a future period, L. Tärquinus Collatinus and he met, as they returned from Ardea to Rome, the messenger whom Locrëtia had sent for her husband, on the violation of her person by Sextus Tärquinus. Brütus was present when the latter recited the brutal conduct of that infamous wretch, and he pledged his honour, that he would revenge her cause. Inconsolable at the loss of her purity, and despising life, as a test of innocence, Locrëtia plunged into her heart a knife which she had concealed under her garments, and expired. Brütus, drawing it from the wound, and holding it up reeking with blood, took an oath which he also imposed on the rest, binding himself and them to prosecute to destruction L. Tärquinius Süpërbus, his impious wife, and their whole descendants, and that they would never suffer one of them or any other person to be king of Rome. His next step was to expose the dead body of Lücërtia in the forum, where he advised his countrymen to take up arms against those who had treated them as enemies, a call which the most spirited of the youth first, and afterwards the rest of the people, obeyed. Leaving one-half of the number at the gates, to defend Collatia, and appointing a guard to prevent intelligence being sent to the princes, Brütus marched at the head of the rest to Rome, where the people were summoned by a crier to attend the tribune of the Cëlëres, an office which he himself then held. In his speech, he gave proof of the counterfeited part which he had hitherto acted, recounted the atrocities of the Tarquins, and prevailed on the people both to deprive the king of his government, and to banish him, his wife, and their children, from Rome. After carrying this measure, he put himself at the head of the young men who voluntarily offered their services, and set out immediately for Ardëa on purpose to excite the troops to declare against the king, who had received intelligence of the extraordinary events at Rome, and hastened thither to suppress the commotions. By turning aside, Brütus avoided meeting him, and reached Ardëa about the time the monarch reached the capital, where he found the gates shut against his admission. The army with joy received Brütus as the deliverer of the city, and drove the king's sons out of the camp with disgrace. Soon after, the prefect of the city, according to the commentaries of Sërvius Tullius, held the Cönsilia Cönsüliata, at which L. Jünius Brütus and L. Tärquinius Collätinus were created consuls. With the consent of his colleague, Brütus had first the fusces, or ensigns of authority, in return for the zeal which he displayed as the assertor of liberty, of which he was afterwards the faithful guardian. Transported with the change of government, the comforts and advantages which they enjoyed under it, the citizens might naturally be expected in some instances to carry their anxiety for its preservation too far, yet the reader regrets to hear Brütus making a speech for the expulsion of his colleague, the husband of Lücërtia, on no other ground than that his name was Tärquinius. Exquisite pleasure or uncommon felicity is rarely of long duration. Honoured and almost adored by the state, Brütus was soon called to sit in judgment on his sons as traitors, and to witness their execution. The feelings of nature yielded to the sternness of the patriot, with whom the deliverance of his country outweighed every other consideration. With the Tarquins all hope of restoration was lost by the discovery of the plot, into which the sons of Brütus had entered, and the punishment of the offenders. The Tarquins then applied to the neighbouring princes for assistance, vainly expecting that what they could not accomplish by treachery, might be effected by force of arms. On the Romans first taking the field against the exiled princes, Brütus, who commanded the cavalry, had advanced to some distance before the army, in order to procure intelligence, and having been met by Arüus, son of Tärquinius Süpërbus, they engaged in single combat, regardless of personal danger, and only anxious each for the destruction of the other; each accomplished his wish by transfixing his antagonist at the same instant, on which they both fell lifeless to the ground. A bloody battle ensued, in which the Romans claimed the victory; the surviving consul, P. Vålërius, collected the spoils next day, and returned in triumph to Rome. He then celebrated the funeral rites of his colleague with the utmost magnificence, the public lamented the fall of Brütus as a national calamity, and the matrons mourned for him, as for a parent, during a whole year, in gratitude for his powerful exertions in avenging the cause of violated innocence (Liv. i. 56 seq.). Cästus Brütus, chaste Brütus, i. e. the punisher of injured chastity (Sil. Ital. viii. 361). Brütus a rëgë rëcepta Römë cönsüitor (Manil. i. 783). Adj. Jünius, a, um. Jünia familia, the Junian family or clan, of which L. Jünius Brütus was the founder (Cor. Nep. Att. 18).—2. A Roman of consular rank, who was one of the ten commissioners appointed to regulate the affairs of Mäcëdönia in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

L. Jünius Brütus Dämäsüppus, L. Jünii Brütü Dämäsüppi, m. was prætor Urbänus, and, having been ordered by C. Märlus to put to death all the noblemen whom he suspected of favouring the other party, assembled the senate under pretence of business, where he massacred a number of the leading nobles, alleging that they were in the interest of Sülla, 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 86). His own life atoned for this act of horrible cruelty. Sülla had no sooner gained the ascendancy than he ordered him to be slain (Vel. Pat. ii. 26. Sah. Cat. 51). Vålërius Mäximus writes, that he had no reputation to be destroyed, and therefore his memory might be treated with greater freedom; adding, that by his order the heads of the first men of the state had been mixed with the heads of victims, and the maimed body of Cärbo Arvina, a tribune of the people, fixed up in the porch (ix. 2).

L. Jünius Libo, L. Jünii Libönis, m. obtained the office of consul in 269 B. C. with M. Atilius Rëgulus. That year, the Roman senate declared war against the Sällëntini in Apulia, and the Bründisini with their cities were taken, and the conquerors had the honour of a triumph (Entrop. ii. 17).

L. Jünius Püllus, L. Jünii Püllü, m. the colleague of P. Claudius Pülcher in the consulship 251 B. C. In a storm he lost the fleet, which the Romans referred to his disast regarding the auspices (Val. Max. i. 4).

L. Jünius Silänus, L. Jünii Silänü, m. proconsul of Asia in 76 B. C. C. Jüllus Caesar wished him to put to death the pirates who had made him prisoner, an act of cruelty which Jünius refused to commit; but declared that he would sell them, on which Caesar put them all to death by crucifixion (Vel. Pat. ii. 42).—2. A noble Roman, betrothed to Octävia, daughter of the emperoye Claudius. He was the son of Appius Jünius Silänus, and Ämilia Lëpida, granddaughter of Augustus. To make himself better known to the Commons, he entered tained them with a splendid gladiatorial exhibition, which added to his celebrity, already very distinguished. Agrippina exerted herself to break off the match between him and Octavia, which could not be done according to Roman law without violation of justice, and to bring about a marriage between the emperor's daughter and her own son, Domitian, whom she had born to Ahenobarbus. Vitellius, to gain the favour of Agrippina, preferred a charge against Junius, of crimes better unmentioned than related, which prejudiced the emperor against him, and caused his expulsion from the senate. On this account, the virtuous Junius, who was unconscious of the base arts employed for his destruction, found himself obliged to resign his prætorship, an office on which he had lately entered. He killed himself on the day that the marriage was solemnized between Claudius and his brother's daughter Agrippina, in contempt of the law, which that same Vitellius had prevailed on the senate to pass, declaring marriages between uncles and nieces illegal. From the language used by Tacitus, it appears certain, that the death of this excellent Roman must be referred to Agrippina. This historian calls him L. Silanus; Juvénalis, Silanus; and Suetonius, who says, that Claudius put him to death, gives him the same name (Tac. Ann. xii. 3, & Suet. Claud. 24 seq. Juv. Sat. viii. 27).—3. Nephew of Junius Silanus Torquatus, was falsely accused, condemned, and banished to the island Naxos in the year 65. At Barius, a town of Apulia, a centurion, employed to deprive him of life, murdered this noble Roman, who defended himself with great bravery without a single weapon, until overpowered by honourable wounds (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8 seq.).

M. Junius, M. Junii, m. one of the deputies sent by the prisoners, who had fallen into the hands of Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, in 218 B. C., to the senate. Livius has recorded his speech in their behalf, but the senate refused to ransom them (Liv. xlii. 59).

M. Junius Brutus, M. Junii Bruti, m. a plebeian tribune, who supported the Oppian law, in which he and his colleague had the powerful assistance of M. Porcius Cato, notwithstanding of which, through the exertion of the women, it was repealed, by the unanimous vote of all the tribes, in 197 B. C. Three years after, he held the offices both of prætor urbanus, and prætor peregrinus, and dedicated a temple to the great Mater Idæa. In 180 B. C., he obtained the consulship with A. Manlius Vulso. In consequence of a report that the camp of his colleague had been taken by the Istri, he raised forces in the north of Italy, where he learned that the army of Manlius was safe, advanced into Istria, when the army of the natives dispersed, and the two consuls returned to their winter quarters at Aquileia. Early next spring, they marched against the Istri, ravaged their country, and compelled them to sue for peace, which was secured by their giving hostages. The army which they commanded was discharged as soon as they were obliged to resign, which they had previously refused, because C. Claudius Pulcher had not performed his vows, or left the capital in the military robe, attended by actors, according to custom.

After being sent a commissioner into Asia, Junius stood candidate for the censorship in 171 B. C., but did not succeed (Liv. xxxiv. 1 seq.).—2. The husband of Servilia, maternal sister of M. Porcius Cato. He appears to have been a tribune of the people in 84 B. C., to have obtained the government of Gallia Cisalpina, and to have been put to death by Cn. Pompeius in Sulla's war (Liv. Ep. 90). It must be acknowledged, that some degree of uncertainty hangs over the history of the Brutus mentioned by Cicero (Orat. pro Quint.); but whether he be the individual there named or not, there is absolute certainty respecting the parentage of the illustrious patriot who forms the subject of the following article.

—3. Son of the former, whose education, from his father's early death, devolved on his maternal uncle, M. Porcius Cato, who executed that trust with the utmost fidelity. The vigorous mind and unwearied application of Brutus, soon rendered him familiar with the opinions and doctrines of the various sects of Grecian philosophers. To the tenets of the old academy, he seems to have given a decided preference. Time has destroyed the whole of his writings, which were both varied and numerous. The extent of his information, the rectitude of his principles, and the integrity of his life, commanded universal esteem. In the letters of Cicero, some hints respecting usury, are thrown out; but stronger evidence and greater error would be required to tarnish the character of so great a man. Love of country overcame his hatred of Pompeius for the murder of his father, and, having joined the standard of that great man, he fought against the usurper, C. Julius Caesar, at Pharsalia. On the defeat of Pompeius, Brutus submitted to the conqueror, who gave particular orders to spare his life, from a strong attachment which he had in his early days to Servilia, the mother of Brutus. This youthful passion probably gave rise to the opinion, that Caesar considered him his own son, a conjecture disgraceful to all parties. The expression which Suetonius has put into the mouth of Caesar, as he fell by the hands of the conspirators, "non ex, stans," gives countenance to the idea of Brutus's illegitimacy; but it ought not to be forgotten, that the words are unnoticed by Plutarch, and denied by Dio. Caesar not only pardoned Brutus for fighting in the ranks of his opponent, but appointed him to the government of Gallia Cisalpina, an office in which he displayed uncommon sagacity and blameless integrity. About this time, without any pretext, he divorced his wife Claudia, that he might marry Porcia, the daughter of his uncle Cato, and widow of Bibulus. This step no moralist would undertake to defend, and it called down the severe censure of the public on a character in other respects pure and virtuous. From the usurper he received with silent indifference the office of city prætor, continued to lament the destruction of Roman liberty, and entered into a conspiracy against Caesar's life. In the opinion of some, the idea originated with Brutus, and in that of others, with C. Cassius Longinus. The friends of liberty and republicanism carried their plan into execution on the Ides of March, 44 B. C. The rashness of this measure appears from the consequences which followed it. The conspirators had no fixed plan, spent the time in hesitation, or concerting measures, which they ought to have employed in prompt and vigorous exertion, by raising an armament sufficient to bear down opposition, and in gratifying the people by restoring their lost privileges. M. Antōnius soon compelled them to quit Italy, on which they repaired to Greece, where Brūtus spent his time among the philosophers, not, however, without secretly making preparations for war. The army under P. Vātinus and his province submitted to the command of Brūtus, who reduced to subjection C. Antōnius, prætor in Epirus. Cāssius in Sýria raised a considerable force, and Brūtus, having publicly declared his intentions, soon found himself at the head of a powerful armament. By this time, all the provinces and armies beyond seas had submitted to these patriots, who met at Smyrna, and concerted measures for carrying on the war. Their united army advanced to Philippi, where Augustus and Antōnius met them. A general engagement ensued, in which Brūtus, who commanded the right, defeated Augustus and took his camp. Antōnius on the left, had the same success against Cāssius who, concluding all was lost, killed himself; this rash action gave a decided advantage to the enemy. In a few days after, Brūtus, now sole commander, came to a second engagement, in which he was completely routed, and escaped the tyranny of the conquerors by a voluntary death at the age of forty, some say thirty-seven. This fatal battle was probably the consequence of importunity on the part of his officers, or insubordination among his troops; for he could not fail to discern the advantages which he possessed over the other party, who were in want of provisions, and must have soon retreated, perhaps in different battalions, through a country not friendly to them, in which case an opportunity of destroying their forces would most probably have occurred. The defeat of the republican army was the extinction of Roman liberty (Liv. Ep. 116-124). That Cicero held Brūtus in high estimation, is evident from his inscribing several books to him, and what he has said of his character, talents and virtues. From his republican principles, Brūtus could only see in Caesar a usurper, destroying the constitution of his country, and exercising an unlawful authority over the lives and property of his fellow-citizens. Hence the absurdity of charging the patriot with ingratitude to Caesar, whose clemency was merely the tool of his ambition, not the dictate of his heart. Plūtarchus, Appiānus, and Florus relate that Brūtus, when sitting one night in his apartment, saw a spectre, at which he looked without emotion, and asked "what art thou?" "Thy evil genius," replied the apparition, "thou shalt see me again at Philippi." Brūtus calmly answered "well then, we shall meet again." The same spectre is said to have appeared a second time before the last battle. It were vain to attempt any explanation of this circumstance, which must have originated in the disordered imagination of Brūtus, harassed with cares of the greatest magnitude, or, what is more probable, in a dream, when he supposed himself awake (Flor. iv. 7. Plat. in vit.). He is sometimes called Q. Cæpio Brūtus, from his having been adopted by his maternal uncle Cæpio (Cic. Phil. x. 11). Adj. Brūtiānus, a. um. Brūtiāna cāstra (Vel. Pat. II. 72).

M. Jūnius Pēnnus, M. Jūni Pēnni, m. after being a plebeian edile, obtained the prætorship of the city in 203 B. C.; when the most memorable action in his official capacity, was the appointment of ten commissioners to distribute, among the veterans of Scipio Africānus, certain lands in Samnium and Apūlia, which belonged to the Roman people (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).—2. Was elected prætor in 175 B. C., when the north of Spain became his province; six years after, he was raised to the consulship, when Pisea fell to his lot (Liv. xlii. 9 seq.).

M. Jūnius Pēra, M. Jūni Pēre, m. nominated dictātor after the battle of Cānna, and, having appointed Tib. Sēmprōnius master of the horse, enlisted all the youth of seventeen years old, some even under that age. Anxious to raise a powerful force after that disastrous engagement, he disregarded character, admitted into the ranks men guilty of capital crimes, and debtors, which freed them from prosecution and payment. These amounted to six thousand, whom he armed with the spoils which C. Flāmius had taken from the Gauls. By these means he marched from the city at the head of twenty-five thousand armed men (Liv. xxli. 57 seq.).

M. Jūnius Silānus, M. Jūni Silāni, m. a Roman to whom the inhabitants of Naples gave up their city, that it might not fall into the hands of Hannibal. In 215 B. C., he was elected prætor, when the government of Etrūria, Tuscany, was assigned him, and, in that province, he was continued next year. To the assistance of Scipio Africānus, who commanded in Spain, Jūnius was sent by the senate, and by the orders of that commander he advanced against Hannō and Māgo, whom he overcame by the rapidity of his movements, his military skill, and the bravery of his troops. Hannō was taken prisoner. From Cōlchas, who reigned over eighteen cities, Jūnius brought to Africānus at Cāsūtūlo, three thousand foot and five hundred horse, the troops which that prince was to raise during the winter. In the battle of Bēcūla, he and L. Mārcius commanded the left wing. Of the Carthaginian army only about six thousand men survived, who fled with Hāsdrūbal and Māgo to the adjacent hills. After these commanders had deserted the men, Jūnius was left to reduce them by blockade, on which he entered into a conference with Māsīnissa, who commanded the Numidian cavalry, and gained him over to the Roman interest. When Scipio Africānus crossed to Africa, he left Jūnius in the command at Nōva Cārthāgo, and afterwards despatched him against the Lācētāni, in consequence of the revolt of their princes Mūndōnius and Indūbilis (Liv. xxlii. 15 seq.).—2. A præfect of the allies, who fell in a tumultuary battle with the Boii, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxlii. 36).—3. A noble Roman who had for his colleague in the consulship Q. Cæcilius Mētellus Numidicus, 111 B. C. The Cimbri in Gallia totally defeated him, to which Livius alludes (Ep. 65). Eutrōpius states, that he conquered the Cimbri; but the accuracy of Livius surpasses that of Eutrōpius, and therefore the former may be considered the true account (Eutrōp. iv. 27).—4. Passed over to M. Antōnius, in Gallia, pörus, on Pälls Mæöts, the Sea of Azoph, and intrusted Dömītius with the settlement of other affairs in Asia. To quell the commotions in Italy, he returned to that country, levying great contributions from the states through which he passed, for the African war, of which a full account has been given in Cömmöntäriti de Bëllö Africänö, by an unknown author. The good fortune of Cäsar did not fail him in this expedition; he defeated the republican forces under Scipio, in an engagement near Thäpsus, and reduced the kingdom of their ally, Jüba, king of Mauritänia, to a Roman province. On hearing of Cäsar's success, Cäto killed himself at Utica. Returning to Rome, Cäsar, at the interval of a few days, triumphed four different times, in consequence of his having conquered Gällia, France, Ägyptus, Egypt, Pöntus and Africa, i. e. Nümidia, Algiers, Mauritänia, Morocco and Fez, &c. The plunder of so many countries enabled the conqueror of the world to glut his soldiers with presents, and the citizens with largesses. To dazzle the eyes of the multitude, and to divert the minds of the citizens from the extinction of their liberties, he exhibited shows of uncommon magnificence, and gave feasts of the most unbounded profusion. He also enacted some useful laws, and regulated the Kalender according to the course of the sun. Cnëus and Sëxtus, the sons of Pömpëius, aided by Läbiënus, having drawn together a powerful army in Spain, Cäsar was again obliged to leave Rome, and march against them. They came to a decisive battle at Munda, in which the former two displayed great heroism and generalship. The veterans of Cäsar were forced to fly, and it required all his address to bring them again to the charge. Victory at last declared for that general, which put a final period to the war, and left the conqueror in the peaceful possession of the Roman empire. The eyes of his countrymen were now opened. Though his triumph surpassed, in splendour and magnificence, all that had ever been seen in Rome, the people, with sorrowful hearts, gazed at the pompous procession, and stood silent. No acclamation followed the car of the conqueror. The splendid exhibition was beheld as the final extinction of Roman independence, and the commencement of degrading slavery. The citizens justly considered Cäsar as triumphing, not over the natives of Spain, but over the sons of Pömpëius, their favourite general, over the nobles of Rome, and over the laws of the commonwealth.

Flörus mentions that he displayed no representation of Phärsälia, Thäpsus, and Munda, an indubitable proof that the Romans at large neither approved of his conduct, nor rejoiced at his success. No stranger to vanity, dread of public disapprobation must have induced him to withhold emblems of victories which both gratified his ambition, and left him sole monarch of Rome. The senate has been blamed for conferring such extravagant honours, and for bestowing such unlimited power, on Cäsar; but in this they only yielded to the inclination of the conqueror, and merely granted what they had then no power to withhold. They elected him consul every year, and dictator for life; appointed him superintendent of public morals, and conferred upon him the titles of Impërätor, and Father of his country. Nor did they stop here. They decreed him an elevated seat in the theatre, a golden chair in the senatehouse, and on the tribunal in the forum. To complete their extravagance and impiety, to the man who had destroyed their constitution, and enslaved his fellow-citizens, they voted temples, altars, and priests. The command of the army, disposal of the treasury, and nomination of the magistrates, he considered to be vested in him by the success of his arms, hence the concurrence of the senate in these matters was deemed unnecessary. To decoy the people, with some of those powers he used occasionally to dispense; but only when it suited the object which he had in view. By remitting a third part of their rents (lōcätiones), he obtained the favour of the knights (Ap. Bel. Civ. 435). It must not be denied that his conduct, when supreme commander, was marked with great clemency, and that he enacted several salutary laws for the better regulation of the state. He administered justice without partiality, and added to the greatness of the empire by planting Roman colonies beyond seas. But his elevated station, as well as the measures by which it had been obtained, created him enemies; and the chief of the senate, among whom was his most intimate friend Brütus, conspired against his life. Warned by the soothsayer Spürinna, that he should beware of the Ides of March, he laughed at the prediction, and refused the request of his wife Cälpürnia, who had been alarmed by dreams during the preceding night, that he should remain at home. Of this contempt of danger, his life was the forfeiture (Vel. Pat. ii. 57). He died in the senatehouse, 15th March, 44 B. C., in the 56th year of his age, pierced by 23 wounds, after he had enjoyed the peaceful possession of the empire only five months (Eutrop. vi. 25). Thus, says Flörus, he who had filled the world with the blood of his fellow-citizens, at last filled the senatehouse with his own blood (iv. 2). Of Cäsar's intrepidity as a soldier, and abilities as a commander, the armies which he defeated, and the countries which he conquered, are sufficient proofs. To the talents of a consummate general, he added those of an elegant historian, and a persuasive orator. Much of his commentaries, or journals, of the Gallic and Civil wars, were, it is said, composed on the spot where his battles were fought. The purity and neatness of his style, notwithstanding the rapidity with which he must have written, have not been surpassed by any Roman writer. His narrative is perspicuous, simple, and natural. It is at once chaste and animated. His lucid and picturesque description places the whole scene distinctly before the reader, who accompanies him in all his marches, and is a witness of every engagement. Few passages occur in his writings which the most illiterate do not understand, and the most polished do not approve. To compose a simple narrative of his campaigns, for the amusement of himself and his friends, seems rather to have been his object, than to give a specimen of his talents as a profound historian or deep politician. Hence it were absurd to expect in the commentaries a finished history. They are mere outlines which he, perhaps, entertained the hope of seeing filled up, either by himself or by some other hand. Besides a few juvenile pieces mentioned by Suetonius, and a collection of apophthegms, Cæsar left, at his death, two books on Grammar (de Analogia, Gel. i. 10), and a poem which he called Iter, or The Journey. But these, as well as his letters to the senate and his friends, are lost. None of his writings now remain, except 7 books of the Gallic, and 3 of the Civil, war. The 8th book of the Gallic war, as formerly mentioned, is the composition of A. Hirtius Pansa; but it is not known who wrote the accounts of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars. Of Cæsar's talents as an orator, we have the opinion of Cicero and Quintilianus. His orations were admired for two qualities, not always united, strength and elegance. Cicero places him among the first orators, and Quintilianus asserts he spoke with the same spirit with which he fought. Had not ambition, says that great critic, diverted Cæsar from the arts of peace, he would have rivalled the eloquence of Cicero. His mode of writing secretly is described by Gellius (xvii. 9). To him Manilius alludes, v. 512. Ilum (i. e. C. Julium Cæsarem) qui deduxit domitos Quirites ad sua flagra, him who brought down the tamed Romans to his scourges, i. e. C. Julius Cæsar, who enslaved his country and treated Roman citizens like slaves (Juv. Sat. x. 109). Cæsar is often used as synonymous with Emperor; hence, ad iniquas mensas Cæsaris, at the unequal tables of the emperor, i. e. tables where food was set before the guests, which, in point of quality, corresponded with their rank (Juv. Sat. v. 4). Adj. Cæsareus, Cæsarianus, et, Juliānus, a, um. Cæsarea domus, the palace of Augustus (Ov. Trist. i. l. 70). Cæsariana Pallas (Mart. viii. 1). This applies to Domitian. Cæsarianum civile bellum, i. e. inter Cæsarem et Pompeium (Cor. Nep. Att. 7). Juliāna partes, the partisans of C. Julius Cæsar (Tac. Ann. i. 2).

C. Julius Cæsar Strābo, C. Juli Cæsaris Strābonis, m. was a curule edile, 90 B. C., but his character as a man of wit, humour, eloquence, and original genius, is more conspicuous than as a politician or a warrior. From the writings of Cicero, it cannot be doubted, that he stood very high in his opinion. In these turbulent times neither talents nor wealth procured tranquillity or secured life. By order of Cinna, he was killed and his head stuck up in the rostrum (Cic. de Orat. ii. 3 seq.. Vol. Pat. ii. 9).

C. Julius Hyginus, C. Juli Hygini, m. was by birth a Spaniard, although it has been maintained he was an Egyptian, brought from Alexandria by C. Julius Cæsar at the time he took that city. From his great knowledge of antiquity, many gave him the name of Polyhistor. He was the keeper of the Palatine Library, yet this did not prevent him from teaching great numbers. Among his intimate friends were the poet Ovid, and the historian C. Licinius, who was of consular rank, and stated that Hyginus died very poor, depending solely on his liberality. Julius Mōdestus, the freedman of this grammarian, followed the steps of his patron both in his pursuits and learning (Suet. Il. Gram. 20).

C. Julius Iulus, C. Juli Iuli, m. obtained the consulship in 482 B. C., and thirty-one years after, when a dēcēmvir, he brought to trial P. Sestius, of patrician rank, whom he arraigned before the people; acting the part of an accuser in place of sitting as a judge, with the view of adding to the liberty of the commons by diminishing the power of the magistracy (Liv. iii. 33–50).—2. Consul in 447 B. C. with M. Geganius Maccrinus. They prevented injurious consequences resulting from combinations formed by the tribunes against the young nobles. He twice afterwards obtained the same dignity (Liv. iii. 65 seq.).—3. A tribune of the soldiers with consular authority in 407 B. C., who contended with great keenness and obstinacy against P. Cornélius Cossus; both refused to be directed by the senate, who referred the matter to the tribunes, that the people might compel them to obey, as they had done formerly in the case of consuls. The plebeian tribunes rejoiced at the dissension among the patricians, refused to interfere; on which their colleague Servilius Ahala named P. Cornélius Cossus dictator. He was afterwards re-elected and died when censor in 391 B. C. (Liv. iv. 56 seq.).

C. Julius Mēto, C. Juli Mētonis, m. consul in 431 B. C., had a violent contention with his colleague T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, both refusing to obey the senate, and to name a dictator against the Æqui and Volsce, until compelled by a decree of the Commons. He dedicated a temple to Apollo, in the absence of his colleague, without having recourse to the lots, at which Quinctius was offended, and appealed to the senate, but without any effect (Liv. iv. 26–29).

C. Julius Vēreindāres Dūbii, C. Juli Vēreindāris Dūbii, m. an Ædian, who dedicated an altar to C. Julius Cæsar at the junction of the Saone with the Rhone, for which purpose he had been appointed priest, 14 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 137). Some have supposed that in the vicinity of the river, Dūbis, the Doubas was a town of the same name, of which he was a native, hence called Dūbii.

Cn. Julius Agricola, Cn. Juli Agricola, m. son of Julius Gracinus and Julia Præcilla, was born at Forum Jūlium, Frejus. His ancestors appear to have been Roman knights. Although his father held the rank of senator, Cāligula put Gracinus to death, and that before Agricola had attained the age capable of being benefited by the conduct and intelligence of his virtuous parent. His mother carried him when a child to Marseilles, where he received an excellent education, of which he reaped the full advantage by the intenseness of his application, and the vigour of his intellect. In after life, he used to mention, that he studied the philosophy of the Greeks with greater ardour than became a Roman, and a senator. Under Suetonius Paulinus, he served his first campaigns in Britain, and that officer kept him near his person, on purpose to make him acquainted with the duties of a soldier. His profession became his study, and, on obtaining the tribuneship of a legion, he paid every attention to his office, consulted the more experienced, and kept company with the best and the most valiant. Vanity never impelled him to meet danger rashly, and courage prevented his declining it from fear. The successes and disasters of Suetonius formed an excellent school for the young soldier, who gained knowledge by experience, and his breast kindled with the love of military fame, as he became more acquainted with the events of war. Having returned to Rome, he married Dōmītia Decidiāna with whom he led a very happy life, and their affection had suffered no diminution when death dissolved their union. After obtaining the offices of quaestor, tribune of the people, and praetor, the emperor conferred on him the consulship, and the dignity of a pontiff. Vespasian appointed him commander-in-chief in Britain in the year 75, where he almost extirpated the Ordovices, overran Mōna, Anglesey, and extended his conquests northward to the Tweed. In subsequent campaigns, he subjected to the Roman empire Scotland to the line of the great canal. With the view of conciliating, to the Roman government, the natives whom he had subdued, he exhorted them to build houses, to cultivate the lands, and to educate their children. Unconscious of his object, they discontinued their warlike habits, and entered into all the Roman refinements, which they considered marks of politeness, whilst in reality they were the very fetters of slavery. Ever on the alert, he overpowered the refractory at all seasons of the year, and the defeat of Cālgicus near the Grampian hills, rendered resistance on the part of the Britons vain. It does not appear that he ever crossed the Tay. A Roman fleet by his orders sailed round the north of Scotland, and ascertained what the Romans did not previously know, that Britain was an island. Of this adventure some Usipian deserters suggested the idea. They fled from Britain, and, after a very perilous voyage, returned to their countrymen, and related their adventures which were soon known at Rome. Dōmītiānus became jealous of this noble Roman, and recalled him from Britain, which he had governed with uniform success during seven years, for which he decreed him the honours of a triumph. The tyrant plotted his destruction, yet did not venture to outrage justice by condemning him on the false charges, probably preferred against Agricola at his own suggestion. No certain account of his death has been transmitted, which even his son-in-law either did not know or did not choose to communicate. The reader of Agricola's life can scarcely fail to perceive, that Tacitus believed he had been cut off by poison secretly administered. Agricola left behind him only one daughter, the wife of his biographer, his son predeceased him, and he appointed the emperor joint heir with his wife and daughter.

L. Jūlius, L. Jūlii, m. (surnamed in con. cal. Iūlus) elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular power in 438 B. C. Eight years after, A. Pōstūmīus Tūbērtus nominated him master of the horse, and he obtained the consulship in 430 B. C. (Liv. iv. 16—30).—2. Chosen a military tribune with consular power in 378 B. C. (Liv. vi. 30).—3. Elected praetor in 185 B. C., and obtained Gallia for his province, to which the senate ordered him to set out immediately, in consequence of Transalpine Gauls attempting to settle where the city Aquilēia afterwards stood (Liv. xxxix. 45). A praetor of the same name occurs in Liv. xlv. 44.

L. Jūlius Cēsar, L. Jūlii Cēsāris, m. a Roman consul, who, in 92 B. C., fought without success, against the Sāmnites, but he afterwards had the honour of obtaining a brilliant victory over that nation, on account of which the inhabitants of Rome laid aside the military dress. He was killed along with his brother, C. Jūlius Cēsar q. r. (Liv. Ep. 73—80).—2. Was consul with C. Mārclius Figūlus, 66 B. C. During their consulship, L. Sērgius Cātīlīna formed the design of overturning the government of the Roman empire, which he attempted to carry into execution next year, when M. Tūllius Cicēro and C. Antōnīus held the highest office. By the vigilance and promptitude of Cicēro, the conspiracy was crushed, and the traitors punished (Sal. Cat. 17).—3. Maternal uncle of M. Antōnīus, by whom he was proscribed (Liv. Ep. 120. Flor. iv. 6).—4. A relative of C. Jūlius Cēsar, who put him to death, at the taking of Utica, after the battle of Phārsālīa. It appears that he had adopted the cause of the republic, and served as a quaestor under Cāto, in the town already mentioned (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 75).

L. Jūlius Cālīdus, L. Jūlii Cālīdī, m. a Roman poet, highly commended by Cōrnēlius Nēpos. In the opinion of that biographer, he was by far the most elegant poet, from the time of Lūcētius and Cātūllus, and not less respectable for his integrity and his knowledge of the fine arts, than for his poetical genius. P. Vōlūmīus, principal engineer of M. Antōnīus, had entered his name in the list of the proscribed, on account of his large possessions in Africa; and T. Pōmpōnīus Attīcius, who never forgot his friends, exerted himself for his preservation, in which he happily succeeded (Cor. Nep. Att. 12).

L. Jūlius Iūlus, L. Jūlii Iūli, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in 402 B. C. (Liv. v. 1). Other two of this name, who held the same office, are mentioned by Livius, in his 5th and 6th books.

L. Jūlius Mōcilla, L. Jūlii Mōcillae, m. a noble Roman, who had held the office of praetor, whom T. Pōmpōnīus Attīcius resolved to protect, together with his son and A. Tōrquātus, against the proscription formed by the second triumvirate (Cor. Nep. Att. 11).

L. Jūlius Sēquēstris, L. Jūlii Sēquēstris, m. a Roman, who was killed by lightning, and likewise his horse, on the road to the Sabines, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 26).

M. Jūlius Philippus, M. Jūlii Philippi, m. was a native of Bōstra, Bosra, a town of Trāchōnitis. According to Aurēlius Victor, his father commanded a band of robbers. In the Roman army, he had risen to high rank, and on the death of Mysīthaeus, whom some suppose he murdered, Gōrdiānus appointed him praetorian praefect. One crime naturally gives rise to another, and, therefore, it excites no surprise to find that Philippus soon formed measures for the destruction of his benefactor. In order to excite discontent among the soldiers, he artfully contrived to render provisions scarce, and, having ingratiated himself with the principal officers, induced the army to declare him the colleague of the emperor. Even this exalted situation did not satisfy the ambition of Philippus, who secretly deprived Gōrdiānus of life, and succeeded him in the throne. Amongst the first acts of his reign, he conferred the title of Cēsar on his own son, then a boy, and not long after, that of Augūstus. The situation of affairs necessarily called him to Rome. Before he left the army in Syria, he made peace with Sapor, king of Persia. After having strengthened his authority in the capital, he marched against the Carpi, who inhabited the Carpathian mountains, defeated them, and returned victorious to Rome. In the consulship, he took for his colleague his son, only ten years of age. Several unsuccessful attempts were made, in different parts of the empire, to obtain the imperial authority; at last Decius raised the standard of rebellion, and gained a decisive victory over this unprincipled emperor, at Verona, in the year 249. Philippus died either in that town, or in the field of battle, after a reign of five years and some months. The praetorian guards killed his son, as soon as they heard of his father's death. He planted a colony near Bostra, Bostra, which, from his own name, he called Philippópolis. Eutropius mentions that both father and son were ranked among the gods (ix. 3).

Sextus Julius Caesar, Sexti Julii Cæsaris, m. held the office of praetor, and the government of Sicily, in 210 B. C.—2. Held the office of consul at Rome, 93 B. C., the year in which the Picentes, Marsi, and Peligni, after having been long subject to the Romans, claimed the freedom of the city, which being refused, produced the Social war (Eutrop. v. 3). In that contest, he lost his army, and returned to Rome, covered with blood, exhibiting a melancholy spectacle (Flor. iii. 18).—3. Was killed by the legion which he commanded in Syria, and it then revolted to Bassus (Liv. Ep. 114).—4. Of the family of Caesar, a young man of great forwardness, whom the army put to death for his insolence (Ap. Bel. Civ. 575).

Sextus Julius Iulus, Sexti Julii Iuli, m. a military tribune with consular authority, at Rome, in 423 B. C. (Liv. iv. 35).

Iulus, i., m. a surname of Ascanius, the son of Aeneas and Creusa, a daughter of Priamus, the last king of Troja. During the night in which the Greeks obtained possession of that renowned city, Aeneas, after many brave but ineffectual attempts to regain it by force of arms, perceiving that further exertion would be vain, yielded to fate, and taking his father, the venerable Anchises, on his shoulders, and his son Ascanius by the hand, retired, before the dawn of morn, to a temple of Ceres, which stood at a considerable distance from the walls. Anchises accompanied his son to Sicily, where he died, and funeral games were instituted to his memory. Ascanius distinguished himself as a warrior in Italy, and succeeded his father in the throne of Lavinium. At a future period, he built Alba Longa, to which he transferred the seat of government, and left to his stepmother, Lavinia, the city which his father had built, and, in honour of his wife, called Lavinium. The crown of Alba Longa was transmitted to the descendants of this monarch, in regular succession, for 487 years (400, Liv.), until the reign of Tullus Hostilius, who levelled the city with the ground, and removed the inhabitants to Roma, Rome. Such is the common account of Ascanius, which Virgil has adopted (Æn. v. 597); but Livius seems doubtful whether Creusa or Lavinia was the mother of the prince who founded Alba Longa. If the latter had a son of that name, which the same historian mentions as a fact, there can be no doubt that his birth was subsequent to the death of Creusa's son. The history of Trojan Ascanius, from his father's settlement in Lavinium, must therefore be regarded as uncertain or unknown (Liv. i. 3. Just. xliii. 1). The Julian clan traced their descent and name from this son of Aeneas (Virg. Æn. i. 288). Iuli, orum, m. the descendants of Ascanius (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 190). Adj. Iulæus, a, um, of Iulus, of Julius Caesar, and of the other Caesars. Iulæus mōns, i. e. Mons Albānus (Mart. xiii. 109). Iulæa oliva (Mart. ix. 96). Iulæa habēna, the imperial government (Mart. ix. 104).

Iulus Antonius, Iuli Antonii, m. son of M. Antonius the triumvir, convicted of adultery with Julia, the daughter of Augustus, for which criminal conduct he was punished with death (Tac. Ann. iv. 44).

Iuvenus Virgilianus, Iuenci Virgiliani, m. a man of senatorian dignity, who was hurried to execution at the time C. Silius suffered the punishment of death for his intercourse with Messalina (Tac. Ann. xi. 35).

Julia, æ, f. sister of M. Junius Brutus, niece of M. Porcius Cato Uticensis, and wife of C. Cassius Longinus. She died in the year 22, possessed of great riches, which enabled her to leave marks of her respect to almost all the eminent men in Rome. The name of the emperor Tiberius did not occur in her will, and this omission gave him no offence, considering it the exercise of a civil right. The magnificence of her funeral displayed not only her wealth, but also her connexion with the most illustrious families (Tac. Ann. iii. 76).—2. Another sister, the wife of M. Aemilius Lepidus the triumvir (Vel. Pat. ii. 88).—3. Wife of Furius Camillus Scribonianus, and mother of M. Furius Camillus Scribonianus. She had been driven into banishment, where, from having felt the severity of her fate, a charge of harbouring resentment against the emperor Claudius, was brought against her, which he suppressed, and boasted of his clemency to a disaffected family (Tac. Ann. xii. 52).

Julia, æ, Julia Calvina, Julia Calvine, f. sister of D. Junius Silanus, a woman of an elegant person, but lascivious character, accused, by Vitellius, of incest with her brother. The charge had no foundation in truth, and had been raised on purpose to gain the favour of Agrippina; yet she was banished from Italy. The emperor Nero, after his mother's death, recalled her (Tac. Ann. xii. 4 seq.).

Julia Claudilla, Julia Claudilla, f. daughter of M. Junius Silanus, and wife of the emperor Caligula (Suet. Cal. 12).

Julia Silana, Julia Silane, f. wife of C. Silius who repudiated her through the influence of Messalina. She afterwards became intimate with Agrippina, against whom she attempted to frame an accusation, in which Iturius and Calvisius acted the principal part. This wish to injure Agrippina, originated in the latter preventing the marriage of Julia Silana with Sextus Africanus, by mentioning her vices. Having no children, her large possessions would have devolved on her husband. The accusation failed, and, sentence of banishment having been pronounced against her, she died in exile (Tac. Ann. xi. 12 seq.).

Julia Törquata, Julia Törquata, f. sister of Silanus, a virgin of uncommon sanctity (Tac. Ann. iii. 69).

¹¹ Junii, orum, m. a patrician clan at Rome, who traced their descent from L. Junius Brutus, by whom the Tarquins were expelled. ¹² Adj. Junius, n. um, Junia gēns; Junia domus (Liv. ii. 5).

¹⁶ Junius Brutus Scæva, Junii Bruti Scævae, m. a noble Roman who held the consulship with L. FORTES CIMILLUS, in 324 B. C. (Liv. viii. 29).

¹⁹ Junius Marcellus, Junii Marcelli, m. a consul-elect, who moved in the senate, that Antistius Sossianus should resign his praetorship, and then suffer death according to law, which Petus Thrasea opposed, and moved that he should be banished, and his goods confiscated, to which a majority of the senate assented (Tac. Ann. xiv. 48). To him Seneca addressed a letter on the death of his son (Epis. 99).

²³ Junius Rusticus, Junii Rustici, m. a man appointed by Tiberius to register the acts of the senators, a practice introduced by Julius Caesar (Tac. Ann. v. 4).

²⁵ Appius Junius Silanus, Appii Junii Silani, m. a Roman consul, the colleague of P. Silius Nerva, in the year 27 (Tac. Ann. iv. 68).

²⁷ C. Junius Norbanus Flaccus, C. Junii Norbani Flacci, m. held the consulship at Rome with L. Cornélius Scipio Asiaticus, in 85 B. C. Livius informs us that these con-

sals insulted the ambassadors of L. Cōrācillus Sūlla, who came to offer conditions of peace, and that Sūlla defeated Nōrbānus in battle, and made Scīpio prisoner. Having been proscribed, Nōrbānus went to Rhōdus, Rhodes, where he put himself to death, as soon as he came to be known, in 83 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 85, 89). According to Eutrōpius, the battle was fought near Cāpua, when Sūlla killed six thousand, and took other six thousand prisoners, losing only a hundred and twenty-four of his own men (v. 7). To Nōrbānus, Tācītus alludes (Hist. iii. 72).

C. Jūnius Silānus, C. Jūni Silāni, m. a praecōsul of Asia, accused of extortion, of which, in the opinion of Tācītus, he was unquestionably guilty. The senate banished him to Gyārus, Jourā; but Tiberius, from respect to the Junian family, and at the request of his sister, Jūnia Tōrquāta q. v., changed the place of his residence to Cŷthēra, Cerigo. He probably had also the surname of Tōrquātus (Tac. Ann. iii. 68—69).

Dēclmus Jūnius Brūtus, Dēclmi Jūni Brūti, m. a noble Roman, who, like Mārcus Jūnius Brūtus, was believed to be lineally descended from the father of Roman liberty.

Dēclmus Jūnius Jūvénālis, Dēclmi Jūni Jūvénālis, m. a Roman satirist of great merit, was born at Aquinū, Aquino, a small town of Lātium, a district of Itālia, Italy, about the year 58. The names of his parents have not been transmitted. It is matter of doubt, whether he was the son or foster-son of a rich freedman, by whom he was brought up, and from whom he received a liberal education. Of his early history, no ancient author has given any account, but general report affirms, that he continued the study of eloquence and of Roman law, until he reached his fortieth year. It does not appear certain, that he followed the profession of a lawyer as a mean of subsistence, for his fortune placed him above the drudgery of legal pleading, and the necessity of engaging in business to procure a livelihood. Amusement, or love of distinction, appears to have been his only motive, not a desire of riches, or necessity of toiling for daily bread. At the age already mentioned, either accident or the bent of his inclination led him to the writing of poetry. His first poetical effusions, the dictates of a virtuous indignation, were directed against Pāris, a favourite of Dōmītiānus. The pointed severity of his satires excited against him the hatred of the vicious, and particularly of those who smarted under his lash. The minion of the emperor, according to some, prevailed on his master to remove the satirist from Rome; accordingly he received the commission of a centurion, and was sent into Egypt. Jūvénālis naturally considered the measure not in the light of a military promotion, but of an honourable banishment. Many have questioned the exile of our poet, although it cannot be doubted that he was sometime on the banks of the Nile; yet there is no unquestionable evidence of his having been under the necessity of going to that country, and he may have been there from choice, not from compulsion. What renders this opinion probable, Pāris fell into disgrace, and suffered death, soon after the period assigned for the banishment of Jūvénālis. Whether inclination or necessity carried him to Egypt, it does not appear probable that he

continued long there, since all his satires bear evident marks of having been written at Rome. The present arrangement forms no criterion for ascertaining the order in which the different satires were written, nor does internal evidence guide to any thing like a probable conjecture on this point. Happily, neither the meaning nor right understanding of the poet's intention, at all depends on their chronological dates. Unambitious of wealth, Jūvénālis appears satisfied with his fortune, which must have been equal at least to his wants. He expresses no discontent at his lot as a citizen, nor seems envious of those in higher rank and of greater influence. Vanity formed no part of his character, otherwise many particulars of his history would have been recorded, which are now lost. Had he imitated Hōrātius, his poetry would have afforded almost all the information which could have been obtained from autobiography. Other Latin poets have gone with equal minuteness into their own history. The mind of Jūvénālis was engrossed with the subject, and, while he held up virtue to adoration, he exhibited vice in all its loathsome filthiness. It must ever be regretted that, in the virtuous zeal with which he was animated, he has gone into such minuteness of detail and grossness of description, that a pure mind turns from many of his passages in revolting disgust. His impurity, however, is not gratuitous, like that of Hōrātius or Mārtiālis, but the result of a settled conviction, that it was necessary to pursue vice into its foulest den, and to exhibit it in all the abominations of naked deformity. No satirist has written with the force and keenness of Jūvénālis, or shown a nobler love of moral excellence. His satires are a model of dignified composition, and, notwithstanding of his living after the Augustan age, few objections can be made to the purity of his style, or to the structure of his verse. Mārtiālis was contemporary with Jūvénālis, to whom he writes two epigrams (vii. 90: xli. 18). Dēclmus Jūnius, Dēclmi Jūni, m. appointed by the consul, Appianus Claudius, to command at the mouth of the river Vultūrus, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 22). Dēclmus Jūnius Brūtus, Dēclmi Jūni Brūti, m. a noble Roman, the first who exhibited shows of gladiators, in honour of his deceased father, in 265 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 16); Valērius Māximus joins with him his brother Marcus (ii. 4). This murderous precedent cost many an unhappy being his life.—2. One of three commissioners, elected, in 196 B. C., to settle a Roman colony at Sipōntum, Mario di Siponto, which had formerly belonged to the Alpini (Liv. xxxiv. 45).—3. Surnamed Cāllicus, or Gāllicus, was consul at Rome, in 140 B. C., with P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Nāsēn. By these consuls, C. Mātīēnus was accused of deserting the army in Spain, and the charge having been proved, he was first scourged under a gallows, and then sold for a slave. The tribunes of the people imprisoned Jūnius and his colleague, because they would not exempt from military service any ten soldiers whom they might think proper to name. To the soldiers who had served under Mātīēnus, Jūnius allotted lands at a town in Spain, called Valēntia. He afterwards subdued all Lusitānia, Portugal, as far as the Atlantic Océan, carrying thirty of the towns by storm. On his soldiers refusing to pass the river of Oblivion, he snatched up a standard, which he carried over the stream, and the whole troops followed him, in 139 B. C. In the north of Spain, he carried on war successfully against the Gallaeci. His bravery contributed greatly to the victory obtained by the consul, C. Sémpronius Tuditānus, over the Iapydes, in 131 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 55—59. Flor. ii. 17). He was a man of considerable learning, skilled in Greek as well as Latin, and lived in terms of great intimacy with the poet Lucius (Val. Max. viii. 14).—4. Sur-named Albīnus, a lieutenant-general, whom C. Julius Cæsar left with C. Trébōnius to carry on the siege of Massilia, Marseilles, in 51 B. C. He defeated the Bellovaci, who had rebelled, in 48 B. C. Junius was one of the conspirators against C. Julius Cæsar. To prevent M. Antonius from advancing into Gallia Cisalpina, he took possession of Mutina, Modena, where he was besieged by Antonius next year, and relieved by Augustus. In his absence, he was condemned, on account of Cæsar's death, and, having been deserted by the legions which he commanded, he fell into the hands of his enemies, who, by order of M. Antonius, put him to death. See Cæpionus; Séquānus (Liv. Ep. 110—120).—5. Sur-named Scæva, master of the horse to Tib. Æmilius Māmercinus, in 338 B. C. Fourteen years after, he obtained the consulship with L. Furius Cāmillus, when the war against the Vēstini fell to his lot. The sickness of his colleague, who, in martial knowledge, greatly surpassed him, rendered it necessary to elect a dictator, yet Junius retained the command, and, in one successful engagement, crushed the Vēstini, so that they fled not to their camps, but dispersed through the towns, which he reduced, and gave the spoils of Scutina and Cingula, Celiera, to the soldiers (Liv. viii. 12, 29).—6. A lieutenant-general to Sp. Cæcilius, consul, in the war against the Samnites, in 295 B. C. Next year he held the consulship with Q. Fabius Gurgēs; but the book of Livius, which contained the history of that year, is lost (Liv. x. 43 seq.).

Dēciūs, or Dēcīnus; Junius Silānus, Dēcī Junii Silāni, m. in his praetorship governed Mācēdōntia, and extorted money from that province, on which account Macedonian ambassadors preferred a charge against him to the senate who, at his own request, referred the matter to his father T. Mānlius Tōrquātus. After a minute investigation, Mānlius pronounced his son guilty, on which he ended his life by stranguation. His father disowned him, and would not even attend his funeral, but transacted business in his own house that day, as if nothing had happened (Liv. Ep. 54).—2. Held the office of consul with L. Licinius Murena, 64 B. C. They succeeded M. Tullius Cicero and C. Antonius. Being consuls elect, when the case of Cātlinia and his accomplices came before the senate, Junius was first asked his opinion with respect to the punishment which ought to be inflicted on these traitors. He moved that they should be put to death. Either the speech of C. Julius Cæsar convinced him that he was wrong, or fear influenced him to depart from his motion, and therefore he went over to the opinion of Tibērius Claudius (Nero) who was for strengthening the guards, and adjourning the debate. Cæsar proposed that the property of the traitors should be confiscated, that they should be imprisoned for life in the strongest free towns, and that the man who made any motion to the senate, or appeal to the people, in their favour, should be held guilty of treason. M. Porcius Cato supported the motion from which Junius had fallen, and it having been unanimously carried, the traitors immediately suffered the punishment of death by stranguation in prison (Sal. Cat. 50—55).—3. The colleague of Q. Haterius Antoninus in the consulship in the year 53 (Tac. Ann. xii. 58).—4. Incurred the displeasure of Augustus by a criminal connexion with his daughter. This offence the emperor punished only by excluding him from his friendship, which the culprit understood to imply a sentence of banishment, and retired into voluntary exile. His brother Marcus prevailed on the emperor Tibērius to grant him permission to return to Rome, where he continued to live as a private citizen, without obtaining any public office. Tacitus shrewdly calls him Dēcīus Silānus (Ann. iii. 24).

L. Junius, L. Junii, m. son of Tārqūnia, sister of L. Tārqūnius Sūpērbus, who, having perceived that the principal men in the state, among whom were his own brothers, had been put to death by his uncle, assumed in early life the appearance of idiotism, on purpose that his property might be at the disposal of the king, and his life preserved; since the monarch could have no reason to apprehend from him either trouble or danger. To the surname of Brūtus (a brute), he did not show the smallest dislike, and thus found security in contempt, which neither innocence nor submission could have procured. When he accompanied his two consins to Delphi, Cestri, he carried, as a present to the god, a golden wand in a cornel staff, an emblematical representation of his own character, concealing, in the outward appearance of a fool, a bold and vigorous mind which was, at a future period, to establish the liberties of Rome. On the Tārqūnii consulting the Delphian oracle, which of them was to succeed their father, a voice from the bottom of the cave uttered these words, "O young men! whoever of you shall first kiss his mother, will possess the sovereignty of Rome." The Tārqūnii, who understood the response literally, resolved to conceal it from their youngest brother Sēxtus, to determine by lot which of the two should first salute his mother on their return to their native city. Brūtus, with more judgment, thought that the words of the oracle should be understood figuratively, and, therefore, on their landing on the coast of Italy, he fell, as if his foot had accidentally slipped, and kissed the earth, the common mother of all. At a future period, L. Tārqūnius Collātinus and he met, as they returned from Ardea to Rome, the messenger whom Lūcrētia had sent for her husband, on the violation of her person by Sēxtus Tārqūnius. Brūtus was present when the latter recited the brutal conduct of that infamous wretch, and he pledged his honour, that he would revenge her cause. Inconsolable at the loss of her purity, and despising life, as a test of innocence, Lūcrētia plunged into her heart a knife which she had concealed under her garments, and expired. Brūtus, drawing it from the wound, and holding it up, reeking with blood, took an oath which he also imposed on the rest, binding himself and them to prosecute to destruction L. Tárquinius Súpérbus, his impious wife, and their whole descendants, and that they would never suffer one of them or any other person to be king of Rome. His next step was to expose the dead body of Lúcrétia in the fórum, where he advised his countrymen to take up arms against those who had treated them as enemies, a call which the most spirited of the youth first, and afterwards the rest of the people, obeyed. Leaving one-half of the number at the gates, to defend Collátia, and appointing a guard to prevent intelligence being sent to the princes, Brútus marched at the head of the rest to Rome, where the people were summoned by a crier to attend the tribune of the Céleres, an office which he himself then held. In his speech, he gave proof of the counterfeit part which he had hitherto acted, recounted the atrocities of the Tarquins, and prevailed on the people both to deprive the king of his government, and to banish him, his wife, and their children, from Rome. After carrying this measure, he put himself at the head of the young men who voluntarily offered their services, and set out immediately for Ardéa on purpose to excite the troops to declare against the king, who had received intelligence of the extraordinary events at Rome, and hastened thither to suppress the commotions. By turning aside, Brútus avoided meeting him, and reached Ardéa about the time the monarch reached the capital, where he found the gates shut against his admission. The army with joy received Brútus as the deliverer of the city, and drove the king's sons out of the camp with disgrace. Soon after, the prefect of the city, according to the commentaries of Sêrvius Túllius, held the Cómítia Cêntrúfata, at which L. Június Brútus and L. Tárquinius Collátinus were created consuls. With the consent of his colleague, Brútus had first the fúces, or ensigns of authority, in return for the zeal which he displayed as the assertor of liberty, of which he was afterwards the faithful guardian. Transported with the change of government, the comforts and advantages which they enjoyed under it, the citizens might naturally be expected in some instances to carry their anxiety for its preservation too far, yet the reader regrets to hear Brútus making a speech for the expulsion of his colleague, the husband of Lúcrétia, on no other ground than that his name was Tárquinius. Exquisite pleasure or uncommon felicity is rarely of long duration. Honoured and almost adored by the state, Brútus was soon called to sit in judgment on his sons as traitors, and to witness their execution. The feelings of nature yielded to the sternness of the patriot, with whom the deliverance of his country outweighed every other consideration. With the Tarquins all hope of restoration was lost by the discovery of the plot, into which the sons of Brútus had entered, and the punishment of the offenders. The Tarquins then applied to the neighbouring princes for assistance, vainly expecting that what they could not accomplish by treachery, might be effected by force of arms. On the Romans first taking the field against the exiled princes, Brútus, who commanded the cavalry, had advanced to some distance before the army, in order to procure intelligence, and having been met by Arúns, son of Tárquinius Súpérbus, they engaged in single combat, regardless of personal danger, and only anxious each for the destruction of the other; each accomplished his wish by transfixing his antagonist at the same instant, on which they both fell lifeless to the ground. A bloody battle ensued, in which the Romans claimed the victory; the surviving consul, P. Valérius, collected the spoils next day, and returned in triumph to Rome. He then celebrated the funeral rites of his colleague with the utmost magnificence, the public lamented the fall of Brútus as a national calamity, and the matrons mourned for him as for a parent, during a whole year, in gratitude for his powerful exertions in avenging the cause of violated innocence (Liv. i. 56 seq.). Cástus Brútus, chaste Brútus, i. e. the punisher of injured chastity (Sil. Ital. viii. 361). Brútus a régè recépta Rómæ conditor (Manil. i. 783). Adj. Június, a, um. Júnia familia, the Junian family or clan, of which L. Június Brútus was the founder (Cor. Nep. Att. 18).—2. A Roman of consular rank, who was one of the ten commissioners appointed to regulate the affairs of Mácédônia in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

L. Június Brútus Dámásippus, L. Júnii Brúti Dámásippi, m. was prætor Urbínus, and, having been ordered by C. Márius to put to death all the noblemen whom he suspected of favouring the other party, assembled the senate under pretence of business, where he massacred a number of the leading noblemen, alleging that they were in the interest of Súlla, 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 86). His own life atoned for this act of horrible cruelty. Súlla had no sooner gained the ascendancy than he ordered him to be slain (Vel. Pat. ii. 26. Sal. Cat. 51). Valérius Máximus writes, that he had no reputation to be destroyed, and therefore his memory might be treated with greater freedom; adding, that by his order the heads of the first men of the state had been mixed with the heads of victims, and the maimed body of Cárbo Arvínas, a tribune of the people, fixed up in the porch (ix. 2).

L. Június Líbo, L. Júnii Líbonis, m. obtained the office of consul in 269 B. C. with M. Atílius Régúlus. That year, the Roman senate declared war against the Sállentini in Apúlia, and the Brúndisíni with their cities were taken, and the conquerors had the honour of a triumph (Eutrop. ii. 17).

L. Június Púllus, L. Júnii Púlli, m. the colleague of P. Claudius Púlicher in the consulship 251 B. C. In a storm he lost the fleet, which the Romans referred to his disbelieving the auspices (Val. Max. i. 4).

L. Június Silánu, L. Júnii Siláni, m. præconsul of Asia in 76 B. C. C. Július Cæsar wished him to put to death the pirates, who had made him prisoner, an act of cruelty which Június refused to commit; but declared that he would sell them, on which Cæsar put them all to death by crucifixion (Vel. Pat. ii. 42).—2. A noble Roman, betrothed to Octávia, daughter of the emperor Claudius. He was the son of Appius Június Silánu, and Æmília Lépida, granddaughter of Augústus. To make himself better known to the Commons, he entered tained them with a splendid gladiatorial exhibition, which added to his celebrity, already very distinguished. Agrippina exerted herself to break off the match between him and Octavia, which could not be done according to Roman law without violation of justice, and to bring about a marriage between the emperor's daughter and her own son, Domitian, whom she had born to Ahenobarbus. Vitellius, to gain the favour of Agrippina, preferred a charge against Junius, of crimes better unmentioned than related, which prejudiced the emperor against him, and caused his expulsion from the senate. On this account, the virtuous Junius, who was unconscious of the base arts employed for his destruction, found himself obliged to resign his praetorship, an office on which he had lately entered. He killed himself on the day that the marriage was solemnized between Claudius and his brother's daughter Agrippina, in contempt of the law, which that same Vitellius had prevailed on the senate to pass, declaring marriages between uncles and nieces illegal. From the language used by Tacitus, it appears certain, that the death of this excellent Roman must be referred to Agrippina. This historian calls him L. Silanus; Juvénalis, Silanus; and Suetonius, who says, that Claudius put him to death, gives him the same name (Tac. Ann. xii. 3, 8. Suet. Claud. 24 seq. Juv. Sat. viii. 27).—3. Nephew of Junius Silanus Torquatus, was falsely accused, condemned, and banished to the island Naxos in the year 65. At Barius, a town of Apulia, a centurion, employed to deprive him of life, murdered this noble Roman, who defended himself with great bravery without a single weapon, until overpowered by honourable wounds (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8 seq.).

M. Junius, M. Junii, m. one of the deputies sent by the prisoners, who had fallen into the hands of Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, in 218 B. C., to the senate. Livius has recorded his speech in their behalf, but the senate refused to ransom them (Liv. xxii. 59).

M. Junius Brutus, M. Junii Bruti, m. a plebeian tribune, who supported the Oppian law, in which he and his colleague had the powerful assistance of M. Porcius Cato, notwithstanding of which, through the exertion of the women, it was repealed, by the unanimous vote of all the tribes, in 197 B. C. Three years after, he held the offices both of praetor urbanus, and praetor peregrinus, and dedicated a temple to the great Mater Idæa. In 180 B. C., he obtained the consulship with A. Manlius Vulso. In consequence of a report that the camp of his colleague had been taken by the Istri, he raised forces in the north of Italy, where he learned that the army of Manlius was safe, advanced into Istria, when the army of the natives dispersed, and the two consuls returned to their winter quarters at Aquileia. Early next spring, they marched against the Istri, ravaged their country, and compelled them to sue for peace, which was secured by their giving hostages. The army which they commanded was discharged as soon as they were obliged to resign, which they had previously refused, because C. Claudius Pulcher had not performed his vows, or left the capital in the military robe attended by lictors according to custom.

After being sent a commissioner into Asia, Junius stood candidate for the censorship in 171 B. C., but did not succeed (Liv. xxxix. 1 seq.).—2. The husband of Servilia, maternal sister of M. Porcius Cato. He appears to have been a tribune of the people in 84 B. C., to have obtained the government of Gallia Cisalpina, and to have been put to death by Cn. Pompeius in Sulla's war (Liv. Ep. 90). It must be acknowledged, that some degree of uncertainty hangs over the history of the Brutus mentioned by Cicero (Orat. pro Quint.); but whether he be the individual there named or not, there is absolute certainty respecting the parentage of the illustrious patriot who forms the subject of the following article.

—3. Son of the former, whose education, from his father's early death, devolved on his maternal uncle, M. Porcius Cato, who executed that trust with the utmost fidelity. The vigorous mind and unwearied application of Brutus, soon rendered him familiar with the opinions and doctrines of the various sects of Grecian philosophers. To the tenets of the old academy, he seems to have given a decided preference. Time has destroyed the whole of his writings, which were both varied and numerous. The extent of his information, the rectitude of his principles, and the integrity of his life, commanded universal esteem. In the letters of Cicero, some hints respecting usury, are thrown out; but stronger evidence and greater error would be required to tarnish the character of so great a man. Love of country overcame his hatred of Pompeius for the murder of his father, and, having joined the standard of that great man, he fought against the usurper, C. Julius Caesar, at Pharsalia. On the defeat of Pompeius, Brutus submitted to the conqueror, who gave particular orders to spare his life, from a strong attachment which he had in his early days to Servilia, the mother of Brutus. This youthful passion probably gave rise to the opinion, that Caesar considered him his own son, a conjecture disgraceful to all parties. The expression which Suetonius has put into the mouth of Caesar, as he fell by the hands of the conspirators, "non est clementer," gives countenance to the idea of Brutus' illegitimacy; but it ought not to be forgotten, that the words are unnoticed by Plutarch, and denied by Dio. Caesar not only pardoned Brutus for fighting in the ranks of his opponent, but appointed him to the government of Gallia Cisalpina, an office in which he displayed uncommon sagacity and blameless integrity. About this time, without any pretext, he divorced his wife Claudia, that he might marry Porcia, the daughter of his uncle Cato, and widow of Bibulus. This step no moralist would undertake to defend, and it called down the severe censure of the public on a character in other respects pure and virtuous. From the usurper he received with silent indifference the office of city praetor, continued to lament the destruction of Roman liberty, and entered into a conspiracy against Caesar's life. In the opinion of some, the idea originated with Brutus, and in that of others, with C. Cassius Longinus. The friends of liberty and republicanism, carried their plan into execution on the Ides of March, 44 B. C. The rashness of this measure appears from the consequences which followed it. The conspirators had no fixed plan, spent the time in hesitation, or concerting measures, which they ought to have employed in prompt and vigorous exertion, by raising an armament sufficient to bear down opposition, and in gratifying the people by restoring their lost privileges. M. Antōnius soon compelled them to quit Italy, on which they repaired to Greece, where Brūtus spent his time among the philosophers, not, however, without secretly making preparations for war. The army under P. Vātinus and his province submitted to the command of Brūtus, who reduced to subjection C. Antōnius, prætor in Epirus. Cāsius in Sýria raised a considerable force, and Brūtus, having publicly declared his intentions, soon found himself at the head of a powerful armament. By this time, all the provinces and armies beyond seas had submitted to these patriots, who met at Smýrna, and concerted measures for carrying on the war. Their united army advanced to Philippí, where Augūstus and Antōnius met them. A general engagement ensued, in which Brūtus, who commanded the right, defeated Augūstus and took his camp. Antōnius on the left, had the same success against Cāsius who, concluding all was lost, killed himself; this rash action gave a decided advantage to the enemy. In a few days after, Brūtus, now sole commander, came to a second engagement, in which he was completely routed, and escaped the tyranny of the conquerors by a voluntary death at the age of forty, some say thirty-seven. This fatal battle was probably the consequence of importunity on the part of his officers, or insubordination among his troops; for he could not fail to discern the advantages which he possessed over the other party, who were in want of provisions, and must have soon retreated, perhaps in different battalions, through a country not friendly to them, in which case an opportunity of destroying their forces would most probably have occurred. The defeat of the republican army was the extinction of Roman liberty (Liv. Ep. 116-124). That Cicero held Brūtus in high estimation, is evident from his inscribing several books to him, and what he has said of his character, talents and virtues. From his republican principles, Brūtus could only see in Cæsar a usurper, destroying the constitution of his country, and exercising an unlawful authority over the lives and property of his fellow-citizens. Hence the absurdity of charging the patriot with ingratitude to Cæsar, whose clemency was merely the tool of his ambition, not the dictate of his heart. Plūtarchus, Appiānus, and Florus relate that Brūtus, when sitting one night in his apartment, saw a spectre, at which he looked without emotion, and asked "what art thou?" "Thy evil genius," replied the apparition, "thou shalt see me again at Philippí." Brūtus calmly answered "well then, we shall meet again." The same spectre is said to have appeared a second time before the last battle. It were vain to attempt any explanation of this circumstance, which must have originated in the disordered imagination of Brūtus, harassed with cares of the greatest magnitude, or, what is more probable, in a dream, when he supposed himself awake (Flor. iv. 7. Plut. in vit.). He is sometimes called Q. Cæpio Brūtus, from his having been adopted by his maternal uncle Cæpio (Cic. Phil. x. 11). Adj. Brūtiānus, a. um. Brūtiāna cāstra (Vel. Pat. ii. 72).

M. Jūnius Pēnnus, M. Jūni Pēnni, m. after being a plebeian edile, obtained the prætorship of the city in 203 B. C., when the most memorable action in his official capacity, was the appointment of ten commissioners to distribute, among the veterans of Scipio Africānus, certain lands in Samnium and Apūlia, which belonged to the Roman people (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).—2. Was elected prætor in 175 B. C., when the north of Spain became his province; six years after, he was raised to the consulship, when Pise fell to his lot (Liv. xlii. 9 seq.).

M. Jūnius Pēra, M. Jūni Pēre, m. nominated dictātor after the battle of Cānna, and, having appointed Tib. Sēmprōnius master of the horse, enlisted all the youth of seventeen years old, some even under that age. Anxious to raise a powerful force after that disastrous engagement, he disregarded character, admitted into the ranks men guilty of capital crimes, and debtors, which freed them from prosecution and payment. These amounted to six thousand, whom he armed with the spoils which C. Flāminius had taken from the Gauls. By these means he marched from the city at the head of twenty-five thousand armed men (Liv. xxli. 57 seq.).

M. Jūnius Silānus, M. Jūni Silāni, m. a Roman to whom the inhabitants of Nuples gave up their city, that it might not fall into the hands of Hannibal. In 215 B. C., he was elected prætor, when the government of Etrūria, Tuscany, was assigned him, and, in that province, he was continued next year. To the assistance of Scipio Africānus, who commanded in Spain, Jūnius was sent by the senate, and by the orders of that commander he advanced against Hāmo and Māgo, whom he overcame by the rapidity of his movements, his military skill, and the bravery of his troops. Hāmo was taken prisoner. From Cōlehas, who reigned over eighteen cities, Jūnius brought to Africānus at Cāsūtūlo, three thousand foot and five hundred horse, the troops which that prince was to raise during the winter. In the battle of Bæcūla, he and L. Mārcius commanded the left wing. Of the Carthaginian army only about six thousand men survived, who fled with Hāsdrūbal and Māgo to the adjacent hills. After these commanders had deserted the men, Jūnius was left to reduce them by blockade, on which he entered into a conference with Māsīnissa, who commanded the Numidian cavalry, and gained him over to the Roman interest. When Scipio Africānus crossed to Africa, he left Jūnius in the command at Nōva Cārhāgo, and afterwards despatched him against the Lācētāni, in consequence of the revolt of their princes Māndōnius and Indībilis (Liv. xxlii. 15 seq.).—2. A præfect of the allies, who fell in a tumultuary battle with the Boii, in 198 B. C. (Liv. xxxlii. 36).—3. A noble Roman who had for his colleague in the consulship Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Numidicus, 111 B. C. The Cimbrī in Gallia totally defeated him, to which Livius alludes (Ep. 65). Eutrōpius states, that he conquered the Cimbrī; but the accuracy of Livius surpasses that of Eutrōpius, and therefore the former may be considered the true account (Eutrōp. iv. 27).—4. Passed over to M. Antōnius, in Gallia, who had fled from the havoc at Mütina, and afterwards obtained the consulship with Augustus in 27 B. C. (Vol. Pat. ii. 77).—5. Son of Appius Jūnius Silānus and Emilia Lepida, grand-daughter of Augustus. He was the brother of L. Jūnius Silānus, whose death was attributed to Agrippina, and Marcus fell a sacrifice to the cruelty of that worthless woman, without the knowledge of Néro. Marcus had obtained the office of proconsul of Asia, and Agrippina employed P. Cæler, a Roman knight, and Heliū a freedman, to cut off the amiable Jūnius, which they accomplished by poison. The ambition of Agrippina impelled her to this crime. From his unblemished character, illustrious descent, and maturity of understanding, M. Jūnius Silānus appeared well qualified for succeeding to the empire, and the public voice was loudly declared in his favour. At that period, Néro had not attained the years of manhood. Cālīgūla called Marcus, Aurēā pēcus (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1).—6. Consul with L. Nōrbānus Bālbis in the year 19. To his noble birth and personal influence, he added the accomplishment of a distinguished orator, by which he prevailed on the emperor Tiberius to permit his brother to return from banishment, in the year 20. He proposed in the senate, that the year should no longer take its name from the consuls, but the persons invested with tribunician power. The object of this motion was the adulation of the princes, at the expense of consular dignity. Cālīgūla transferred the command of the legion from M. Jūnius Silānus, then governor of Africa, to an imperial lieutenant, in consequence of his suspecting Jūnius. This change produced contention between the rival commanders, which ended in favour of the imperial lieutenant. Cālīgūla afterwards ordered Jūlius Gracinus to prosecute M. Jūnius Silānus, whose daughter he had married, and the refusal of Gracinus cost him his life. His eminent virtues rendered him an object of hatred to the tyrant, and his honest counsels added to the aversion of the emperor, who compelled him to put an end to his own life (Tac. Ann. ii. 59 seq.).

P. Jūnius Brūtus, P. Jūni Brūtī, m. a tribune of the people, and colleague of M. Jūnius Brūtus, in 197 B. C. Both supported the Oppian law, but without success, although they had the powerful aid of M. Pōrcius Cato. After being a curule edile, he was created prætor in 192 B. C. Tuscany fell to his lot, in which he was continued prætor, and afterwards ordered to march for the south of Spain. Before he reached that country, of which he was to be the governor, L. Emilius Paullus had obtained a decisive victory over the Lūstāni, which had a powerful effect in rendering the Spaniards quiet and peaceful (Liv. xxxiv. 1 seq.).

Q. Jūnius, Q. Jūni, m. one of the tribunes of the people, who complained of the unmerited death of Sp. Mælius, who had suffered for aspiring at the sovereignty. By that and similar methods, they accomplished their purpose in procuring the election of military tribunes, instead of consuls for next year, 457 B. C. (Liv. iv. 16).—2. A Spaniard, whom Cæsar frequently sent to treat with Ambdrix.

Q. Jūnius Rusticus, Q. Jūni Rustici, m. held the office of consul with Hadrianus, in the third year of his reign, and 120th of the Christian era. Others, with less probability, suppose Jūvenālis refers to Appius Jūnius Sabinus, who was consul with the emperor Dōmitiānus, thirty-six years before the date above-mentioned (Sat. xv. 27). The reading is doubtful.

Jūno, ōis, f. was the daughter of Sātūrnus and Ops, the sister and wife of Jūpiter. In consequence of her marriage, she became the queen of the gods, hence Rēgia Jūno, or simply, Rēgina. According to Virgilius, she presided over marriage, hence pronūa Jūno (Æn. iv. 59 seq.). The poets describe her as jealous, revengeful, and inexorable in the highest degree. She was represented as sitting on a throne, with a golden sceptre in her right hand, and a crown on her head. Iris stood behind her, adorned with the various colours of the rainbow. Among birds, the hawk, the goose, and the peacock (by the last her chariot was drawn) were sacred to her. Among flowers, the dittany, poppy, and lily were her chief favourites. The lily was, at first, of the same colour as the crocus; but when Jūpiter applied Hērēcles to Jūno's breast while asleep, some of the milk fell to the earth, and changed it into a beautiful white, and some fell upon that part of the heavens which, from its brightness, is called Lactēa via, the milky-way (Ov. Met. i. 169). Virgilius makes Sāmos her favourite place, but Hōmērus, Argos, Mýcēnē, and Spārtā (Il. iv. 52). She is called Sātūrnia Jūno, and simply Sātūrnia, from her father Sātūrnus. From Virgilius, it appears that she could prevent a prophet from telling what he knew, as in the case of Hēicūus, who was not allowed to inform Ænēas of all that was to befall him (Æn. iii. 380). Inferna Jūno, Prōsērpina (Virg. Æn. vi. 138). Jūnōnīgēna, w. m. Vūlcānus, a son of Jūno (Ov. Met. iv. 173). Jūnōnīcōla, w. a worshipper of Jūno. Jūnōnīcōla Fātisci (Ov. Fast. vi. 49). Adj. Jūnōnālis, is, e, et, Jūnōnius, a, um, of, or belonging to, Jūno. Jūnōnia avis, the peacock (Ov. Art. Am. i. 627); which Claudianus calls Jūnōnius vōlūcr (xxxv. 97). Mensis Jūnōnius, et, Tempus Jūnōnale, the month of June (Ov. Fast. vi. 63).

Jūpiter, Jūvis, m. was, according to Hēsiodus and Apollōdōrus, a son of Sātūrnus and his sister Rhēa. Diōdōrus Sicilius says, besides that Jūpiter there was another more ancient, the brother of Cœlus. Cicero enumerates three of this name; the first, born in Arcādia, was the son of Æther, and father of Prōsērpina and Liber; the second, likewise a native of Arcādia, was the son of Cœlus, and the father of Minērvā; and the third, a Cretan, was the son of Sātūrnus. The inhabitants of Crēta, Candia, showed the tomb of the third Jūpiter at the commencement of the Christian era. Some writers of antiquity make the number not less than three hundred. The son of Sātūrnus and Rhēa, or, Ops, is the most distinguished, and the one who received divine honours from the Greeks and Romans. They considered him as the father of gods and men, and believed that souls were emanations from him, to whom, after death, they returned. But in his character, as it appears in their writings, there is little either to be admired or imitated. He was a slave to the basest passions, and to the most criminal indulgences. The righteous government of the universe, and the perfect happiness of his creatures, could form objects but of very inferior consideration in his polluted mind, almost wholly bent on impure and criminal gratification. In the pursuit of his favourite pleasures, in general most degrading and vicious, he was never restrained by an esteem of virtue, a respect for innocence, a love of justice, or a regard for truth. Meanness is ever the concomitant of vice. Hence we find the sovereign of the gods assuming the form of an eagle, a bull, &c., for purposes which the most worthless of men would be ashamed to acknowledge! Such ideas of a Supreme Being were formed by the human mind, unaided by Revelation! Jüpiter was generally represented sitting on a throne of gold or ivory, holding in his right hand thunderbolts, and in his left a sceptre of ivory. An eagle, with expanded wings, stood at his feet. That bird was sacred to him, because the ancients believed that the eagle was never killed by lightning (Plin. ii. 394). Among trees, the oak was sacred to him. At Olympia was a statue of Jüpiter, sixty feet high, uniting all the beauty of form, with all the splendour of effect, which the highest excellence of the statuary and painter can produce. It was adorned with metallic ornaments and precious stones. Jüpiter Férétrius, whose temple was the first which was consecrated at Rome, on Rómulus killing the commander of the Cæminenses (Liv. i. 10). Jüpiter Stator, to whom Rómulus vowed a temple, at the time the Romans were flying before the Sabines (Liv. i. 12). Tártarus Jüpiter, Pluto (Val. Placc. i. 730). Latiaris Jüpiter, was worshipped with human sacrifices at the time Lætantius wrote (l. 21). Jüpiter Anxurus, presiding over Anxur (Virg. Æn. vii. 799). Patula Jovis arbore, from the spreading tree of Jüpiter, i. e. from the oak (Ov. Met. i. 106). Jüpiter is taken for the air; sub Jove frigido, in the cold air; madidus Jüpiter, a moist atmosphere; mælus Jüpiter, unwholesome air. Jovis ales, the eagle. Stigius Jüpiter, Pluto. Vejüpiter, v. Vejôvis, young Jüpiter, without a beard, or a thunderbolt. Dîjôvis, a title of Jüpiter. Jovem lapidem, was the most solemn oath among the Romans (Gel. i. 21). Crônides, æ. m. a patronymic of Jüpiter, from his father Crônus, i. e. Sâtürnus (Hom. II. xix. 340). Adj. Jovius, a, um, of Jüpiter, begotten of Jüpiter. Jovialis, is, e, of, or, fit for, Jüpiter. Neither of these adjectives is of frequent occurrence in good writers. Jovia cohors (Claud. xv. 418).

Jûra, æ. m. Jura, a chain of mountains, which, extending from Rhodanus, the Rhone, to Rhénus, the Rhine, separated Helvétia, Switzerland, from that part of Gallia Cæltica which the Sæquani possessed, now called Franche Compté. The highest summit of this range is about 6,173 feet above the level of the sea. Strictly speaking, Jûra begins at the Rhone, and extends to the sources of Dûbis, the Doux. The northern part of this mountain has different names (Cæs. B. G. i. 2 seq.). See Vocellus and Vogesus.

Jûramentum, i, n. an oath. Jûno, in swearing, names all the subterranean gods, who are called Titans (Hom. II. xiv. 274).

Jûstina, æ. f. a woman mentioned by Martialis, with whom he seems to have been a favourite (l. 72).

Justinus, i, m. a man on whose birthday-banquet Martialis writes an epigram (xi. 86).

Justitium, i, n. (from jus and sisto) a cessation of all civil business, when legal proceedings were suspended, from which the term is derived. Shops of every kind were shut, and no business of any kind done, until the alarm or danger was over. Indicere, v. edicere justitium, to proclaim a cessation of all civil business, which was only done in cases of very great or imminent danger. The first mentioned by Livius, was ordered by T. Quinctius Barbatus Capitolinus, in his third consulship, 465 B. C., when the Æqui sent an army against the Romans to Algidum (Liv. iii. 3). Justitio finem facere, to put an end to the cessation, or, justitium remissum est, the cessation of civil business was discontinued, or the order for the discontinuance of civil business was discharged.

Justus Câtônus, Jûsti Câtônus, m. a centurion of the first rank in the Roman army, who was sent with L. Aprônus, delegate from the Roman army in Pannônia, to the emperor, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 29).

Justus Fabius, Jûsti Fabii, m. was consul, some part of the year 111. Pînius has addressed two letters to him (Epis. i. 11; vii. 2). Tacitus appears to have written his treatise on oratory either at his request, or from what had fallen from him in conversation on that subject (Orat.).

Juthungi, orum, m. a German nation, who seem to have lived on the banks of the Danube. Ammianus Marcellinus mentions their attacking the territory of the Rheti (xvii. 6). Their name is very differently written by different authors: Thütingi, Thiutungi, Juthiuntugi, and Vithungi.

Jüturna, æ. f. daughter of Daunus and Vénilla, whom Ovidius calls a nymph, and Virgilius a goddess; an honour which, the latter says, was conferred by Jüpiter for the violation which she sustained from him. Læcus Jüturna, a lake from the spring over which Jüturna presided, not far from that of Némelus. After issuing from the fountain, and spreading on the level ground into a lake, the waters flowed into Tiber, the Tevere (Virg. Æn. xii. 146).

Jüvenalis, is, m. see Decimus Jünus Jüvenalis.—2. A leading chieftain of the Tüngri. He and Cämpanus, both on their own account, and that of the whole nation, submitted to Cællis, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 66).

Jüventa, æ. et, Jüventas, âtis, m. the Roman name of the goddess of youth (Ov. Met. vii. 241). The Greeks called her Hêbê q. v. To her C. Licinius Læcillus dedicated a temple in the great circus at Rome, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 36).

Jüventus, i, m. a beautiful youth, to whom Câtullus addresses several of his poems.

Jüventus Lâtêrensîs, Jüventi Lâtêrensîs, m. a Roman of senatorian rank, a violent enemy of M. Antônus. Having unsuccessfully advised M. Æmilius Læpidus not to associate with that unprincipled Roman, he put an end to his own life (Vel. Pat. ii. 63).

L. Jüventus Thälus, L. Jüventi Thälus, m. a lieutenant-general under the prætor C. Cæpurnus, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 31).

Mânus Jüventus Thälus, Mânus Jüventi Thälus, m. a tribune of the people, who, with one of his colleagues, accused C. Læcilius Gællus of cruelty and injustice towards the Cæleidōnsēs, in which the senate joined, and condemned Lūcētius to pay a heavy fine. In 169 B. C., Jūvēntius was elected foreign praetor, when, by unprecedented means, he endeavoured to procure a declaration of hostilities against the Rhōdii. Instead of consulting the senate, or informing the consuls, he appealed to the people, contrary to previous practice, and thus gratified his enmity against that nation, but some of his colleagues interfered, and rendered his proceedings nugatory (Liv. xliii. 8 seq.). He afterwards became consul with Tib. Sēmprōnius Grāccus, when he conquered Cōrsica, for which the senate decreed thanksgivings. From excessive joy at this intelligence, he dropped down dead (Val. Max. ix. 12).

P. Jūvēntius, P. Jūvēntii, m. a Roman praetor, sent, in 150 B. C., against Andriscus, who had assumed the name of Philippus; hence called Pseudophilippus. This usurper defeated Jūvēntius with prodigious slaughter, and left himself among the slain (Entrop. iv. 13; Liv. Ep. 50).

T. Jūvēntius, T. Jūvēntii, m. a military tribune, who fell in an engagement with the Gauls, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 22).

T. Jūvēntius Thālma, T. Jūvēntii Thālma, m. elected praetor, and obtained the jurisdiction between Roman citizens and foreigners, in 196 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 43).

Ixion, ōnis, m. a son of Phlégyas, king of Thessaly, who treacherously murdered his father-in-law Elōneus, or, Deiōneus. In consequence of this crime, he was abhorred and shunned by the neighbouring princes. Jūpiter, from pity, took him up to heaven. He was the father of the Centaurs by a cloud, which Jūpiter had substituted for the queen of the gods. Provoked at his ingratitude and criminality, the sovereign of Olympus struck him with Tartarus by lightning, and ordered Mercūrius to tie him with serpents to a wheel which, turning continually round, rendered his punishment eternal. Ixiōnides, a, m. a son or descendant of Ixiōn; Pri-thōus, the son of Ixiōn (Ov. Met. viii. 566). Ixiōnida centauri (Luc. Phar. vi. 386). Adj. Ixiōnius, a, um. Ixiōnius orbis (Virg. G. iv. 484).

Iyrcæ, arum, m. a Scythian nation contiguous to the Thýssagēta, who lived by the chase, watched the game on trees, and, after wounding them, mounted their horses, which were trained to squat on the ground, and pursued with their dog (Herod. iv. 22).

Izāla, a, m. a mountain of Mēsōpōtāmia (Ann. Mar. xviii. 6 seq.).

Izātes, is, m. king of the Adiābēni, who favoured Mēhērdātes in outward appearance, but his heart inclined to Gōtārzēs, and he, therefore, deserted the former, in which act of treachery Acabārus, the Arabian, followed him. The infidelity of his allies proved the destruction of Mēhērdātes q. v. (Tac. Ann. xii. 13 seq.).

K

Kālēndæ, v. Cālēndæ, arum, f. the Kalends, the name given by the Romans to the first day of every month. A priest was appointed to give notice to the people of the change of the moon, or when the new moon was first visible; and there is no doubt that the term is derived from the Greek verb καλέω, I call. Like the other divisions of the Roman month, the Kalends were counted backwards, that is, they began at the highest number, and were reckoned downward, e. g. the 14th of December was the 19th of the Kalends of January, the 15th, the 18th of the Kalends of January, the 16th, the 17th of the Kalends of January, and so on till the 1st of the month, which was called the Kalends. The Nones and Ides had the name of the month to which they belonged, but the Kalends always that of the succeeding month. The table, on next column, will illustrate the Roman mode of calculation in this respect, which, both in simplicity and convenience, was certainly much inferior to that in use amongst the nations of modern Europe, and of other civilized countries. The word Kālēndæ, when preceded by a numeral adjective, may be written either in the genitive or accusative case; being governed in the former instance by a noun expressive of time, and in the latter, which is the more usual construction, by a preposition understood; thus, decimo die Kalendarum Martiarum, scipius, Martii; vel, Kalendas Martias, v. Martii, sc. xava, v. secundum, which was most commonly contracted in this manner, X. Kal. Mar. The Greeks having no Kalends, the Romans used the phrase ad Kalendas Græcas proverbially, to denote a period which would never arrive. The French have adopted the Latin expression, with little variation, to convey the same idea, aux Calendes Græques.

It is probable that most languages have a corresponding phraseology. In the same sense the English say at latter Lammas, there being only one in the year, and the Scots, The morn come never, i. e. the morrow which will never come.

Kālēnus. See Fūfius.
Kārthālo, ōnis, m. a man in advanced life, but still retaining strength for war. He was in the army of Hānibāl, and killed by Mūrus, at the siege of Sāgūntum, Murciēdo (Sil. Ital. i. 405).—2. A Libyan prince, killed by Nāsīdīus during the second Punic War, when Scipio Africanus commanded in Spain (Sil. Ital. xv. 450).

Kērsus, i, m. the Maherrey, a river of Sýria, which empties itself into Issicus Sinus, the Bay of Scanderoon.

Lābārus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, whom the Roman consul Scipio killed in an engagement, at the foot of the Alps, when Hānibāl invaded Italy (Sil. Ital. ix. 232).

Lābdācus, i, m. son of Pōlydōrus and Nēctēs, king of Thēbae, Thebae. Having lost his father in early life, Lēcus, his paternal uncle, governed the state during his infancy, and both, having been driven out, settled in Thýria. On account of their relation with Pēnthēus, they were admitted to the privileges of that state. A war having ensued, Lēcus, being declared governor and commander by the Thebans, fell by the hand of Zēthus and Amphion. Apollōdōrus does not state whether Lābdācus was ever king of Thēbae. At his death, he left a son, Lāius, who married Iocasta, by whom he had Ōdipus (Apol. iii. 5 seq.). To him Pindārus alludes (Isthm. iii. 26).

Lābdācis, idis, f. of Lābdācus, applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Lābdācides cōhortes (Stat. Th. ix. 650). The readings here vary. Lābdācides, w, m. a descendant of Lābdācus; Pōlyñices, great-grandson of Lābdācus (Stat. Th. vi. 451). Lābdācidae, arum, m. the Thebans (Stat. Th. ix. 223). Adj. Lābdāclus, a, um. Lābdācius dux, Etēoles (Stat. Th. ii. 210).—2. A Russian at the court of Etēoles, who, with Phlēgýas, voluntarily prepared to put the prophet Mæon to death (Stat. Th. iii. 80).

Lābēates, lum, m. a people of Illyricum, from whom the district was called Lābēatis, Idis, f. terra (Liv. xlv. 23). Lābēatis pālūs, the Lake of Scutari. Adj. Lābēatus, a, um. Lūcus Lābēātus (Liv. xlv. 31).

Lābēo, ōnis, m. a surname of the Antistii, Ascōnii, Atinii, Cēthēgi, Fābii, Pōmpēii, and Titidii.

Lābērius, i, m. a vain poet, or rather a man who boasted that he could write excellent verses, and yet composed none (Mart. vi. 14).

Dēclmus Lābērius, Dēclmi Lābērii, m. a man of great wit, and a writer of farces, which rendered him a particular favourite with Jūlius Cæsar. He acted one of his own mimic pieces, at the shows exhibited by Cæsar, on his becoming sole master of Rome, and, having been presented by the emperor with five hundred thousand sesterces, and a gold ring, passed from the stage, through the orchestra, into the seats of the knights (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 39). From Hōrātius, it appears that the poetry of Lābērius was not of the highest order (Sat. i. 10. 6). The abuse and arrogance of this writer, at last, offended the emperor, Jūlius Cæsar, who preferred the mimic compositions of P. Sýrus. Adj. Lābēriānus, a, um. Lābēriāni pērsūs (Gel. x. 17).

Q. Lābērius Dūrus, Q. Lābērii Dūri, m. a tribune of the soldiers in Cæsar's army.

L He was killed in Britain (Cæs. B. G. v. 15).

Lābīcum, i, n. v. Lāvīci, orum, m. Zagaruolo, a town in the northern part of Lātium, which Cōriōlānus took, when he commanded the Volscian army, in 492 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).

Inh. Lābīci, orum, v. Lāvīciāni, orum, m. The Roman senate suspected them of joining the Æqui, and, on receiving an evasive answer from their ambassadors, declared war against them. Q. Sērvilius Prīscus, after they had defeated the troops under the military tribunes, was nominated dictator, took their town by storm, and plundered it. A colony of fifteen hundred men was sent thither, each of whom received two acres of land, 415 B. C. (Liv. iv. 45—47). Adj. Lāvīciānus, v. Lābīciānus, a, um. Lāvīciānus ager, the territory of the Lāvīciāni (Liv. xxvi. 9), which Mārtiālis calls Lābīciāni hūmus (i. 69).

Lābīcus, i, m. a Roman of great bravery, who had distinguished himself in Sicily, against Hāmilcar. He fell, by the hand of Hānibāl, in the battle of Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 565).

Lābīēnus, i, m. a native of Cingulum, Cingoli, killed at the battle of Cannæ (Sil. Ital. x. 32).—2. A man of vicious habits. Mārtiālis has written several epigrams on Lābīēnus, which, like their subject, should have long ago been consigned to oblivion (Mart. ii. 62 &c.).

Lābros, i, m. (Warrior), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 224).

Lābūllus, i, m. a patron of Mārtiālis, to whom he writes a humorous and sarcastic epigram (xi. 25). In another, the poet lashes him for niggardiness in the treatment of his dependants (xii. 86).

Lābūrus, i, m. the brother of Nāmītor and Laurēus, each of whom commanded a hundred men, in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiii. 195).

Lāhýca, w, m. a man mentioned by Mārtiālis. The poet compares him to Cupid (vii. 86).

Lācēdæmon, ōnis, f. the capital of Lācōnia, a district in the south of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Mærea, which stood at the foot of mount Tāgētus, on the right bank of Eurōtas, the Fuñipolāmo, about thirty miles from the sea. The site of this celebrated city, some have supposed is now partly occupied by the small town Paleo-Chori, and others, perhaps with more truth, by Mistra. Strābo says, it was founded by Pātrōclous; but the more general opinion ascribes it to Lēlēx, about 1516 B. C. The city was, from its founder, called Lēlēgia, afterwards Lācēdæmon, from a son of Jūpiter and Tāgēta, a daughter of Atlas; and Spārta, from his wife, the daughter of Eurōtas. Others maintain that the original name was Spārta, afterwards, changed to Lācēdæmon.

mon; whilst some assert that they were different towns (Paus. iii. 11). The circumference of Lacedæmon was about six miles; but, like the other cities of Greece, rather resembled a number of adjoining villages, than a regular connected city. It was the rival of Athens; Athens, and this jealousy spread the flames of civil war over all the states of Greece, by which the liberty of that city was finally destroyed, after an obstinate and bloody contest, maintained with the greatest bravery, intrepidity, and valour, on both sides, had been continued for twenty years. All the principal passes into Læconia lead to that city. Libidinosa: Lacedæmon (Mart. iv. 65). Læco, et; Læcon, ōnis, m. et; Læcona, ae; f. a native of Lacedæmon, a Lacedæmonian; v. Lacedæmoniū, orum (Sing. Lacedæmoniū, i), m. (Cor. Nep. Con. 4). Mora Læcona, after the manner of a Lacedæmonian woman (Hor. Od. ii. 11. 24). Læconis, idis, f. of Lacedæmon, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Ad: Lacedæmoniū, v. Lacedæmoniū, et; Læconius, a, um. Lacedæmoniū Tarentum, Tarento, built by a colony from Lacedæmon (Hor. Od. iii. 5. 56). Lacedæmonia amica, Helēna (Mart. xiv. 167). Læconia purpurea, Lacedæmonian purple. The Lacedæmonians excelled in this dye (Hor. Od. ii. 18. 7. Plin. iv. 122 seq.). The brevity with which the Lacedæmonians conveyed their ideas became proverbial. Hence Læconismus, i, m. or, Læconicus Stilus, a short mode of expression. In English, Laconic has the same meaning, viz., the conveying of thought in the fewest words.

Læcēria, ae, f. a city of Magnēsia, a district of Thessalia (Pia. Pyth. iii. 59).

C. Læcērius, C. Læcērii, m. a tribune of the people, elected through the influence of the patricians, in 400 B. C. (Liv. v. 10).

Læcētia, ie, f. a district of Spain, at the foot of Pyræneus, the Pyrenees, near the middle of that chain of mountains. In: Læcētiā, orum, m.

Læches, etis, m. an Athenian joined in command with Chæriades q. v. in 426 B. C. (Just. iv. 3).—See Cerulus.

Læchēsis, is, f. one of the three fates or destinies. See Pæcca. Dum superest Læchēsis quod torquēat, whilst there remains to Læchēsis what she may twine or spin, v. e. whilst life remains (Juv. Sat. iii. 27).

Læchne, es, f. (Shag), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 222).

Læconium, i, m. (prōmōntōrium), the Cape of Colonia, in the territory of the Brūtii. Near it, Jūno had a famous temple, of which Livius has given a description (xxiv. 3). Here Hannibal spent the summer of 206 B. C., where he consecrated an altar, with a pompous inscription, both in the Carthaginian and Greek characters, narrating his own achievements. He murdered those who had taken refuge in this temple, because they refused to follow him to Carthage. Q. Fulvius Flæcus, in 174 B. C., took away the one half of the marble slabs which covered this temple, to form the roof of that of Fortūna equēstris, which he had vowed in the war with the Cæliberis. Enraged at this act of sacrilege, the senate ordered them to be replaced, but, after they were carried back, no tradesman, who knew how to put them again on the roof, could be found (Liv. xlii. 3). The ruins of the temple gave rise to the modern name, Adj. Læconius, a, um. Læconia dicit, Jūno (Virg. Æn. iii. 552).

Læmon, ōnis, m. a mountain of Apollōnia (Herod. ix. 93).

Læco, ōnis, m. a native of Achæia, who fell a victim to the cruelty of the emperor Tiberius. He was the father of Argollicus, who suffered the same fate, in the year 33 (Tac. Ann. vi. 18).

Læcon, ōnis, m. (Spartan, or, Barker), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 219).

Læconica, et, Læconia, ae, v. Læconice, es, f. a district in the southeast part of Pélōpōnnēsus, the Morea, of which the capital was Lacedæmon or Sparta, q. v. The first of these terms is, in strict propriety of speech, an adjective, when used to denote the territory; rēgio, v. terra, is understood. In: Læcones, um (Sing. Læco, ōnis), m. Adj. Læconicus, a, um. Læconicus ager (Liv. xxxv. 27). Læconica terra (Gel. xvi. 19).

Læcōtēna, ae, f. Merasch, a town of Arminia (Amm. Mar. xx. 11).

Lacumæces, is, m. the younger son of Gēsāles, king of Nūmidia. Mēzetulus, related to the royal family, took up arms against Capūsa, who succeeded Gēsāles in the crown, defeated his forces, and he fell in battle. The whole country submitting to Mēzetulus, he called Lacumæces, who was only a boy, king; and himself, protector. Māsīnissa defeated them both, although they had powerful succours from Syp̄hax, on which they fled into the country of the Carthaginians; but were kindly invited, by Māsīnissa, to return to their native country. He restored all his property to Mēzetulus, and gave the same station to Lacumæces which his father, Gēsāles, had enjoyed during the reign of Gāla (Liv. xxix. 29, 30). In the battle of Zāma he held a command (Ap. Bel. Pun. 22).

Lāda, ae, v. Lādē, es, f. an island in the Archipelago, opposite Milētus (Herod. vi. 7).

Ladas, ae, m. the swiftest runner of his age, who gained the prize at the Olympic games, soon after which he died, and was buried near Eurōtas, the Vasilipotāmo (Paus. ii. 19 seq.). The name is frequently employed to denote a very swift runner, and occurs in the writings both of Mārtialis and Cātullus.

Lādes, ae, m. son of Imbrāsus, and brother of Glaucus, a Lycian, who accompanied Ænēas to Italy, and was killed by Tūrnus (Virg. Æn. xii. 343).

Lādinus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed by Murrus, as he advanced to the assistance of Hībērus (Sil. Ital. i. 297 seq.).

Lādon, ōnis, m. one of the followers of Ænēas, killed by Hālēsus (Virg. Æn. x. 413).—2 A sailor who plied on Tiber, the Tevere, by which he acquired money sufficient to purchase a farm near his favourite river (Mart. x. 85).

Lādon, ōnis, m. a river of Archidia, one of the branches of Alphēus, the Roufia. Towards its source, it is called Poniatiko, afterwards the Rusca. Sýrlux was changed into a reed on its banks (Ov. Met. i. 702). Apollō became enamoured of Dāphnē, the daughter of this river, hence Stātilus, Apollinēus: Lādon (Th. iv. 837). Pausanias reckons it the most beautiful of all rivers (viii. 25).—Parrhāsus Lādon (Claud. xxi. 185).—2 A branch of Pēnēus, the River of Gastuni, running by Pylus. Its most distant sources are at the foot of mount Astra, and it is formed by many rivulets from the gorges of the woody heights extending to Lalla and Olympia.—3. A river of Beotia, the original name of Ismēnus (Paus. ix. 10).

Ladon, ōnis, m. (Catch), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 216).

L. Læcilius, v. Læcilius Bāssus, C. Læcili Bāssi, m. held the office of consul, with M. Licinius Crassus, surnamed Frūgi, in the year 64 (Tac. Ann. xv. 33).

Lælaps, āpis, m. (Tempest), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 211).

Lælia, æ, f. a woman of vicious morals, who married Quintus, her gallant, in order to avoid the penalty of Jūlia lēx. Her name occurs in several of the epigrams of Mārtialis (v. 76).—2. A vestal virgin, who died in 63, the memorable year in which Pōmpēi was overthrown by an earthquake (Tac. Ann. xv. 22).

Lælius, i, m. a primipilus of considerable military reputation, whose address to Cæsar at the commencement of the civil war, displays a mind devoted indeed to his commander, but destitute of every moral, humane, and patriotic principle. To the horrible and iniquitous sentiments of Lælius, the troops of Cæsar expressed their assent in such loud acclamation, that Lūcānus resembles it to the roaring of the northern blast amidst the tall pines on Ossa, Kiasano (Phar. i. 356—391).—2. A poet who criticised with severity the poems of Mārtialis; certainly the writings of few poets more justly deserve unqualified reprehension in point of gross indelicacy, than the epigrams published under his name (Mart. l. 92).

Lælius Archēlius, Lælii Archēlii, m. a grammarian mentioned by Suetōnius (ll. Gram. 2).

Lælius Bālbis, Lælii Bālbii, m. the accuser of Acūtia q. v. Jūnius Otho, a tribune, interposed, and Lælius did not receive the recompence adjudged to him for that action by the senate. He was afterwards banished from the senate on account of his immorality with Albucilla, a punishment well merited by the perversion of his powerful eloquence to accomplish the destruction of the innocent (Tac. Ann. vi. 47, 48).

C. Lælius, C. Lælii, m. the intimate friend of P. Cornēlius Scipio Africānus, who commanded the fleet at Tarrāco in 212 B. C., thence sailed to Carthāgo Nōva, Carthage, where his bravery contributed greatly to the carrying of the town, for which the commander-in-chief presented him with thirty oxen, and a golden crown. In the contention between Sextus Diglītus and Q. Trēbellius, he supported the claim of the former, and, by the propriety of his conduct, prevented bloodshed between the sea and land forces. Scipio despatched him to convey the news of that important victory to Rome, whither he carried Māgo and fifteen senators of old Carthage, who were made prisoners at Carthage. After returning to Spain, he sailed with the commander-in-chief to the court of Sýphāx, which he had previously visited, and procured a passport for Scipio. They reached the African coast in safety, concluded a treaty with that monarch, and came back to reduce the rest of Spain under the dominion of Rome. Both in the formation and execution of his plans, Scipio had the valuable assistance of Lælius, who felt the same interest for the character of his commander as for his own. In a short time, almost the whole of Spain submitted to the dominion of the Romans, nor was this accomplished more by force of arms than by the address, clemency, and conciliating measures of Scipio and Lælius. The latter commanded the fleets which conveyed the Roman troops to Africa, where to his talents, courage, and prudence, the victory of Scipio over Hannibal must, in no small degree, be attributed. In every thing connected with the conquest of Africa, the submission of the Carthaginians to the Romans, the condition of the treaty between the two states, and even in the conduct of individuals, we find Lælius an active agent, never losing sight of the honour of his country, but blending the moderation, delicacy and refinement of the scholar with the martial intrepidity and resolute firmness of the soldier. Neither he nor Scipio approved the harsh and unrelenting measures adopted by their countrymen against the Carthaginians, particularly the illustrious Hannibal. The honours which Lælius afterwards obtained, should have been voluntarily and unanimously conferred by his fellow-citizens, and not the result of an active canvass, and sometimes procured after a previous unsuccessful attempt. On obtaining the consulship with Lælius, the brother of his friend Scipio, he proposed, that for their provinces they should not have recourse to the lots, but refer the matter to the appointment of the senate, a thing quite new, or if it had ever before taken place, all remembrance of it was lost from distance of time. The senate decreed Asia to L. Cornēlius Scipio, probably in consequence of his brother Africānus having promised to serve under him as a lieutenant-general, and Gallia to Lælius, who was continued in command for another year (Liv. xxvi. 42 seq.). Silius Italicus has drawn a beautiful character of this distinguished Roman (xv. 453 seq.).—2. Sent an ambassador to Macedōnia in 176 B. C., and, four years after, he went in the same character to Gallia, France (Liv. xli. 22 seq.).—3. Son of C. Lælius, the friend of Scipio Africānus the elder, had the surname of Sāpiens on account of his knowledge. He obtained the consulship, in 142 B. C., with Q. Servilius Capio. In Spain he carried on a successful war against Viriāthus q. v. For his great celebrity he was less indebted to his martial abilities, than to his eloquence and learning. Of the friendship which subsisted between him and Scipio Africānus the younger, Cicero has given an admirable description in his treatise inscribed "Lælius," or, "in friendship." Terenus is supposed to have received considerable assistance in the composition of his plays, from these elegant scholars. From the writings of Cicero, it is manifest that he entertained a high idea of the propriety of his conduct, his mental acuteness, the extent of his information, and the elegance of his orations. It is to be regretted, that so few particulars of his history are known. Horatius mentions the mildness of his disposition, as well as his wisdom (Sat. ii. l. 72). He was the father-in-law of Q. Mucius Scavōla and C. Fannius (Cic. Brut. 21 seq.). The death of this eminent Roman is supposed to have happened about 126 B. C.

Dēcius Lælius, Dēci Lælii, m. a noble Roman, who, with C. Triarius, commanded the Asiatic ships under Pompeius (Cæs. B. C. iii. 5). According to Appianus, he was killed by the soldiers of Arabis, a king of Africa, during the second triumvirate. Cicero has introduced him in his treatise, De finibus bonorum et malorum. Adj. Lælianus, a. um.

D. Lælius Ingenuus. See Ingenuus.

Lænas, ætis, m. a Roman soldier who killed Myconus in the Spanish war (Sil. Ital. xv. 447).

Lænas, ætis, m. a surname of the Poppilii.

Læneus, e. Læneus, i. m. a freedman of Cn. Pompeius, who recorded some anecdotes of Mithridates, king of Pontus, and translated a tract on medicine from Greek into Latin, which had been written by that monarch (Gel. xvii. 16).

Lærces, is, m. a chief of the Myrmidones and father of Alcimædon, who fought at Troy under Achilles. He was the son of Æmon, hence called Æmonides (Hom. II. xvi. 197 seq.).—2. A celebrated goldsmith in Pylus (Hom. Od. iii. 425 seq.).

Lærtes, æ, m. the son of Arcæsius and Chileomedusa. He was king of Ithaca, Theaki, and Dulichium, islands to the W. of Greece, Greece, opposite Sinus Corinthiacus, the Gulf of Lepanto. This prince married Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus, who, at the time she gave her hand to him, is said to have been pregnant by Sisyphus, and to have born Ulysses, eight months after the marriage. In opposition to this surmise, may be advanced the conduct of Lærtes with respect to that child. He not only showed the most tender solicitude and affection in the education of Ulysses, but also, at an early period of life, resigned the crown to him, and retired into the country, where he spent his time in gardening. It were absurd to attempt reconciling such proceedings with any suspicion, much less a conviction, of Anticlea having imposed on him a spurious heir. See Ulysses. Lærtes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus. Lærtiades, æ, m. Ulysses (Ov. Met. xlii. 48). Adj. Lærtius, æ, Lærtidius (sometimes contracted into Lærtidius), a. um. of Lærtes; of Ulysses. Lærtius Hæros, Ulysses (Ov. Met. xlii. 124). Lærtia puppis, the ship of Ulysses (Stat. Ach. ii. 1).

Læstrygones, um (Sing. Læstrygō, ōnis), m. a barbarous and ferocious people of Italy, who inhabited first Formiae anciently Hormæ (Plin. l. 325). Homerus describes them as cannibals, and settles them in Italy near Circæis mōns (Od. x. 119 seq.). Thucydides mentions them as the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily; and Plinius fixes their residence near Læntini, Lentini. Adj. Læstrygōnius, a. um. of the Læstrygones, of Formiae. In Læstrygōniā amphōrā, in a Læstrygōnian, i. e. Formian cask, called Læstrygōnian from the Læstrygones once possessing that country (Hor. Od. iii. 16. 34). Læstrygōni recessus (Sil. Ital. vii. 410).

Læti, orim, m. a German nation, who were expert in acts of theft. At the time the Romans received them under their protection, they lived in Gallia, not in Germania (Amm. Mar. xvi. 11).

Lætorius, i. m. a tribune of the people, who uttered severe invectives against Appius Claudius, consul, and his family, in 471 B. C. (Liv. ii. 56).—2. A friend of Martialis, whom he mentions (xii. 25).

C. Lætorius, C. Lætorii, m. a curule edile who, with Tib. Sæmpronius Græchus, when consul elect, performed the Roman games which were repeated during three days. He rose to the prætorship in 210 B. C., and next year was created a decemvir for the performance of religious rites (Liv. xxiii. 30 seq.).—2. A young man of patrician rank who, on being convicted of adultery, pleaded his youth, and particularly that he was in possession of the ground which Augustus first touched upon his coming into the world. It is probable the senate showed him favour, since, by a decree of that assembly, the part of his house, in which Augustus was born, was consecrated (Suet. Aug. 5).

Cn. Lætorius, Cn. Lætorii, m. a lieutenant-general under L. Furius in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 21).

L. Lætorius, L. Lætorii, m. was elected a plebeian tribune in 204 B. C.; but, some irregularity in the appointment having been discovered, both he and P. Ælius Tubero resigned their offices (Liv. xxx. 39).

M. Lætorius, M. Lætorii, m. a Roman centurion of the first rank, appointed by the people to dedicate a temple to Mercurius. This honour was conferred not so much from respect to him, as from a desire to affront the consuls, 495 B. C. (Liv. ii. 27).

M. Lætorius Mergus, M. Lætorii Mergi, m. a military tribune whom Cornelius, a tribune of the people, summoned to stand trial for impurity. To avoid the disgrace, he fled, and afterwards killed himself (Val. Max. vi. 1).

P. Lætorius, P. Lætorii, m. a faithful and resolute friend of C. Sæmpronius Græchus, in whose defence he sacrificed his own life, in 123 B. C. (Val. Max. iv. 7).

Lævina, æ, f. a woman on whom the waters at Baia had an immoral effect. Martialis says she went thither Penelope, and returned Hélène (l. 68).

Lævinus, i. m. a man severely wounded in the battle at Trasimænus, the Lake of Perugia, by Hannibal. He appears to have been a native of Prævernum, Piperno, to have held a commission in the Roman army, and to have been a man of horrible ferocity (Sil. Ital. v. 544 seq.).—2. A Roman knight who slept, or rather pretended to sleep, in Pompey's theatre, lest he should be expelled, as his estate had fallen below that of the equestrian order (Mart. vi. 9).

Lægon, ōnis, m. a youth of great beauty, which appears from Plinius to have been his chief excellence (v. 125). In reference to his personal advantages, Martialis says, "we make Lægon alive," i. e. we write poetry as beautiful as the person of Lægon (ix. 51).

Lægos, i, f. a city of Ionia, which the inhabitants deserted on the approach of Cn. Mælius Vulpus, the Roman consul, as he marched from Ephesus against the Gallæci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Lægus, i. m. one of the Rutuli, killed by Pallas (Virg. Æn. x. 381).—2. The father of Ptolemæus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, who succeeded to the crown of Alexandria, and was the first Macedonian king who reigned in Egypt, hence Juvénalis calls Alexandria, Magna Lāgi (Sat. vi. 83). Cleopātra was a descendant of this prince. Phārius Lāgus (Luc. Phar. x. 86). Adj. Lāgēus, a, um, of Lāgus, of Alexandria, of Egypt, Egyptian. Lāgēus amnis, the Nile (Sil. Ital. i. 196). Lāgēa prōles, the descendants of Lāgus (Luc. Phar. x. 522). Lāgēa nōvālia (Val. Placc. vi. 118).

Lāis, idis, f. a native of Corinth, who obtained great distinction amongst women of her character and lewd practices. The sum which she obtained from personal prostitution was so high, as gave rise to the common saying, non cuius adire Cōrinthum contingit. Ephērea Lāis, Corinthian Lāis (Prop. ii. 6. 1). To her Mārtialis alludes (iii. 11). Sotio wrote her history (Gel. i. 8).

Lāius, i, m. son of Lābdāeus, who lost his father when only one year old. Lēus, the granduncle of Lāius, took upon him the administration of the government by appointment of his brother Nēctēus, who outlived his son Lābdāeus. Amphion and Zēthus, having put Lēus to death, expelled Lāius, who fled to Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morca, was kindly entertained by Pēlōps, and taught his son Chrysippus the art of charioteering. On the death of Amphion, he married Iōcāsta, daughter of Mēnēcūs; but, having been informed by an oracle, that he would fall by the hand of his own son, he resolved to have no children. In a fit of intemperance he forgot the prediction, and the result was eventually his death. When his wife had born to him a son, he gave the infant afterwards named Œdipus, to be exposed by a herdsman who obeyed his injunction, leaving the infant on Cithæron, Elatias. The child, having been brought up with care, on arriving at manhood, accidentally met with Lāius in a narrow way, and, having ordered him to give place, which he refused, transported with rage, Œdipus instantly killed his father, without knowing who he was, and his armour-bearer shared the same fate. Stāsius represents him as a man of great clemency, O mīssime Lāi (Th. vii. 365). Lāiades, æ, m. a patronymic of Œdipus (Ov. Met. vii. 759).

Lālāgē, es, f. a woman with whom Hērāclēus was in love (Od. i. 22. 10).—2. A servant girl cruelly punished (Prop. iv. 7. 45).

Lālētānia, æ, f. a maritime district of Hispania, Spain, to the north of Rūbricātus, the Lobregat. Tia Lālētānia (Mart. i. 50). Iah. Lālētāni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 300). Adj. Lālētānus, a, um. Lālētāna fax (Mart. i. 27). Lālētāna (vīna) (Plin. iii. 135).

Lāmāchus, i, m. a noble Athenian, son of Xēnōphānes, and one of the colleagues of Alcibiādes and Nicias, in an expedition against the Sýracūsāni. He possessed intrepidity and fortitude; but his poverty prevented him from having that dignity and influence essential to a great commander. In the third engagement with the Sýracūsāni, under Gýlippus, a Macedonian, Lāmāchus was killed (Just. iv. 4).—2. An Athenian general, sent against the Hērāclēenses in Pōntus, to compel them to enter into an alliance against the Persian monarchy. His fleet being wrecked, he owed his safety, and that of his surviving army, to the clemency of the Hērāclēenses (Just. xvi. 3).

Lāmbrus, i, m. the Lambro, a river in the north of Italy, which falls into the Po above Crēmōna. Lāmbrātū, orum, m. a people who lived on the banks of that stream (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 9). Here the readings vary, and, consequently, admit of various explanations.

Lāmfoctum, i, n. a town of Maurītānia. Adj. Lāmfoctēnsis, is, e. Lāmfoctēnsē opīdum (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Lāmila, æ, f. Zeitoun, a town of Phthiōtis in Thessaly, at which the Ætōli under Pýrrhūs, with auxiliaries from Attālus, king of Asia, and a thousand men sent from the Roman fleet by P. Sūpicius, were defeated by Philīppus, king of Mācēdōnia, in 210 B. C. Eighteen years after, it was taken by the Romans (Liv. xxvii. 30 seq.). Adj. Lāmīlicus, a, um.

Lāmīlē, es, e. Lāmīla, æ, f. the mother of Scýlla, according to Stēsichōrus (Virg. Cir. 66).—2. A woman of great riches and high rank, who was a native of Sēgēsta, a town of Sicily, hence Cicero calls her mūlier Sēgēstāna (Ver. iv. 26).

Lāmpēa, æ, f. the highest summit of the range of Erymānthus, in Arcādia, in which the river of this name originates (Paus. viii. 24). See Lāmpia.

Lāmpēdō, e. Lāmpidō, ūs, f. a queen of the Amazons, who boasted that Mārs was her father (Just. ii. 4).—2. A Lacedemonian, who was the daughter, sister, wife, and mother, of a king (Plut. in Ages. Plin. ii. 63).

Lāmpētīē, es, e. Lāmpētīa, æ, f. a daughter of Apōllo and Nēara, who fed her father's cattle, which it was deemed impious to touch. Ulyssēs and his companions, disregarding their being sacred to that god, slew some of them; but their flesh on the spit bellowed, and filled the country with terrific noise. Besides this prodigy, as an additional punishment, Apōllo, on the complaint of Lāmpētīē and her sister, caused the skins of the oxen to walk, on which the Greeks embarked in great trepidation. The anger of Jūpiter followed them for this act of sacrilege, and he raised a storm, in which all, except Ulyssēs, perished. To this Prōpērtius alludes (iii. 12. 29). Ovidius makes Lāmpētīē a sister of Phācethon, and adds, that, after his death, she was changed into a poplar-tree (Met. ii. 349); but perhaps a different person.

Lāmpia, æ, m. a mountain of Arcādia, sacred to Pan. In it Erymānthus had its sources (Stat. Th. iv. 290).

Lāmpōn, ōnis, m. a Grecian, who had two sons victorious at the Isthmian games (Pin. Isth. vi. 3 seq.).

Lāmpōn, ōnis, m. the horse of Cýrnus, which ran in the chariot-race, on Scipio Africānus bringing to a conclusion the war in Spain (Sil. Ital. xvi. 334).

Lāmpōnium, i, n. a town of the Troad (Herod. v. 26). Pīnius calls it Lāmpōnēa, as does also Stēphānus.

Lāmpōnius, i, m. an officer in the interest of Mārius, sent with Cārinus against L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, and fought a very bloody battle with him at Cōlina pōrta. Their force consisted of seventy thousand men, of whom twelve thousand deserted to Sūlla, and the rest fell either in battle, or in flight, to allay the insatiable rage of the conqueror. The readings are doubtful (Eutrop. v. 8. Flor. iii. 21).—2. An Athenian, sent with a fleet to Sicily, in 428 B. C., under the pretence of assisting the Catinians against the Syracusans; but, in reality, to obtain the government of the island (Just. iv. 3).

M. Lämpönius, M. Lämpöni, m. attacked Licinius Crassus, of whose troops he killed eight hundred (Ap. Bel. Civ. 377).

Lämpsius, e. Lämpsäcos, i. f. et. Lämpsäcium, i. n. Lämpshus, a town of Mysia, on the coast of Hællæspontus, the Dardanelles, near its northern extremity at Pröpöntis, the Sea of Marmora. Priäpus, reckoned by some the founder of Lämpsäcos, was said to have been king of that town, though banished for his lasciviousness, received from the inhabitants divine honours after his death, and was the chief object of their adoration. His temple was a den of the utmost impurity and lewdness, probably originating in his own practice. The modern town consists of a few houses and windmills; its wine, so celebrated by the ancients, has lost its fame, and ceased to be in repute. Inh. Lämpsäceni, orum (Sing. Lämpsäcenus, i.), m. from the nature of their worship were strangers both to mental and corporeal purity. Notwithstanding their vices, they possessed some military courage, and steady adherence to their treaties with other states. They revolted from Persëus, to whose dominion and that of his father they had formerly been subject, in 172 B. C., sent a golden crown of eighty pounds' weight to Jupiter, and requested the Romans to admit them into alliance, begging they would protect them against Persëus, on the return of peace. The senate granted their request, and instructed the prætor to enrol them as allies (Liv. xliii. 6). Adj. Lämpsäcius, et. Lämpsäcenus, a. um. Lämpsäcius përus, obscene poetry (Mart. xi. 17). Lämpsäcendärks (Val. Max. vii. 3).

Lämpus, i. m. a musician, commended by Cönnellus Nëpos (Epam. 2), and by Plütarchus (de Musicä). et. Lämpus, i. m. a fortress of Thëssälia, which surrendered to Amynänder, king of the Athämänes, in 200 B. C., after Gömpfi had fallen into his hands (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Lämpüta, orum, a. that part of the town Phöcea, where it is most contracted, being only fourteen hundred paces broad, and seems the part nearest to the main land (Liv. xxxviii. 31).

Lämpus, i. m. a Thëban, who obeyed the order of Etëocles, by lying in ambuscade to murder Tydëus, as he was returning from an embassy, at the court of that monarch, to Argos. He fell by the bravery of Tydëus, who killed the whole party, consisting of fifty men, except Mæon (Stat. Th. ii. 623).—2. A man, who attempted to injure Mäntö, daughter of Tirësiäs, for which Apölo deprived him of life, when he was driving the chariot of Amphiaräus (Stat. Th. vii. 759).—3. A man of great merit, son of Lämëdon, and father of Dölöps. Lämëdöntiades, a. m. Lämpus, from his father, Lämëdon (Hom. Il. xv. 527).

Lämpus, i. m. a horse of Hëctor (Hom. Il. viii. 185).—2. One of the two horses of Auröra. Phäethon was the name of the other (Hom. Od. xxiii. 246).

Lämpus, i. m. a man killed by Nisus (Virg. Æn. ix. 384). He was a son of Hërcüles, by Omphälë, queen of Lydia, hence Ovidius calls him Lydus Lämpus; and makes Dëläura, the wife of Hërcüles, complain that she had become a stepmother, by the adultery of her husband (Ov. Ep. Her. ix. 54).—2. Son of Nëptünus, who was king of the Læstrygönes, and, in the opinion of some, founder of Förmia, Mola, which Ovidius calls the ancient city of Lämpus, the Læstrygonian (Met. xiv. 233). To him Silius Italicus alludes (viii. 529), and from him Höratius derives Lämia, a surname of the Ælii, a plebeian clan (Od. iii. 17. 1). Adj. Lämpianus, a. um.—3. A man of elegant form in the army of Etëocles, killed by Pärthënopäus (Stat. Th. ix. 764 seq.).—4. One of the competitors for the prize in the foot-race, given by Scipio Africanus, on driving the Carthaginians out of Spain, 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 475).

Lämpyrus, i. m. a man killed by Nisus (Virg. Æn. ix. 384).

Länassa, e. f. daughter of Clëodäus, son of Hýllus, whose father was Hërcüles, consequently great-grand-daughter of that hero. Justinus has neptis, instead of proneptis. She was the priestess in the temple of Jüpiter, at Dödöna, afterwards the wife of Pýrrhus, son of Achilles, by whom she had eight children (Just. xvii. 3).

Länclia, e. f. a town of Astüria, supposed by some to be now called Mansilla (Flor. iv. 12).

Längia, e. f. a slow-running river of Pëlöponnësus, the Morea, which, some maintain, had its rise in the Nemean grove, and, running northward, fell into Cörinthiäcus Sinus, the Gulf of Lepanto. Pigra Längia (Stat. Th. iv. 51).

Längöbärdi, a. Längöbärdi, orum, a. a German nation of great bravery in war, who joined Arminius in the year 17. When their name first occurs in the writings of Tacitus, they appear to have occupied part of the territory between Albis, the Elbe, and Viadrus, the Oder. During the reign of Augustus, they are supposed to have lived on the west of the Elbe, inhabiting the country now called Lauenbourg and Magdebourg, having been compelled to cross that river. Common opinion reckons the Lombards, who flourished in the north of Italy, until Charlemagne conquered them in the year 784, the same with the Längöbärdi, although there seems good reason to doubt their identity. Etymologists have given various derivations of the name, and all appear somewhat doubtful (Tac. Ann. ii. 45 seq.). Velleius Pätërcülus says they were ferocious, even beyond German ferocity (ii. 106).

Länüvium, i. n. Citta Lavina, a town of Lätium, famous as being the place of exile of M. Völscius Fictor, who bore false evidence against Kæso Quincius, for which he was banished (Liv. iii. 29). Inh. Länüvini, orum (Sing. Länüvinus, i.), m. Adj. Länüvinus, a. um. Länüvinus ager (Hor. Od. iii. 27. 3).

Läocöon, öntis, m. son of Pärthäon, brother of Cëneüs, and a native of Cälýdon, is reckoned among the Argonauts.—2. A Trojan, priest of Nëptünus, who dissuaded, with great earnestness, his countrymen from admitting within the walls of Troy the wooden horse which the Greeks had built, pretending it was an offering to Minërya, because they had profaned her temple, by carrying away the image of the goddess. Suspecting the stratagem of the Greeks, Läocöon hurled his spear against it, and, soon after, two serpents of enormous size swam across the sea from Ténédos, made a direct attack upon his two sons, whom they killed, and afterwards himself, as he went to their relief. His countrymen rashly and unjustly concluded that this was a merited punishment for his having violated this image, sacred to the goddess, and immediately made a breach in the wall, by which they received it into the city. Sinon q. v., a perjured Greek, who had procured the protection of the Trojans, and was then in Troy, opened the horse, from which issued the armed men with whom it was filled, unbarred the gates during the night, and admitted his countrymen, who took the town (Virg. Æn. ii. 41 seq.). The elegant description of Virgilius suggested to the Rhodian sculptors, Agésander, Pólydorus, and Athénodorus, the idea of representing in marble the death of Lāoöon and his two sons, and their work is considered as the most admirable piece of sculpture which has ever been executed. This was the opinion of Plinius, in which every judge of that art, since his time, has acquiesced. This naturalist says, that the statue is of one stone; but, on close inspection, it is found to consist of five different pieces of marble, so dexterously united, that it is difficult to discover the joints. It was discovered in the palace of Titus, in Rome, in the year 1506, and is now in the Vatican. One of the arms of Lāoöon, and two of the arms of his sons, are lost.

Lāodamas, antis, m. an eminent son of Antenor, commanded the infantry in the Trojan war, and was killed by Ajax Telamônus (Hom. Il. xv. 516).—2. Son of Alcúon, king of Phaeacia. He was the most beautiful and handsome of all the Phaeacians, and gained the prize in boxing (Hom. Od. vii. 170 seq.).—3. Son of Etócles, who dedicated a tripod to Apóllo at Thēbe (Herod. v. 61).

Lāodamia, æ, f. wife of Protésilaus, was daughter of Aenetus, a Thessalian king, and Lāodóthea, others say Astydámia, hence Ovidius calls her Haemonis Lāodamia (Ep. Her. xlii. 2). On the death of her husband, she requested of the gods to be allowed to converse with him for three hours, which was granted, and she afterwards made a statue of him in brass, which she placed secretly in her bedchamber, under a religious pretence, and began to worship it. A man-servant, who had brought her fruit in the morning for the offering, through a chink saw her embracing and kissing the statue, which he told to her father, Acástus, supposing her guilty of immoral conduct. On rushing into her room, Acástus saw the statue, which, with the sacred things, he ordered to be burned on a funeral pile, upon which, from excessive grief, Lāodamia threw herself, and was consumed (Hyg. 104).—2. A daughter of Belléröphon and Phylónöe, who was the mother of Sarpédon by Júpiter, according to Hómérus (Il. vi. 198); but Apóllodorus makes Euröpa the mother of Sarpédon (iii. 1). From the father of epic poetry, it appears that Lāodamia was the sister of Hippólöchus and Isándrus (ib.).—3. Daughter of Pýrrhus II., king of Epirus, murdered by Milo, about 219 B. C. (Just. xxviii. 3). Her name is variously written.

Lāodice, æ, f. one of the three daughters of Agamémnon, of whom, with her two sisters, her father allowed Achilles to make choice, if he returned to the Trojan war (Hom. Il. ix. 145).—2. The wife of Antiöchus, and mother of Seléucus. She lived about 300 B. C. (Just. xv. 4). Some copies read Laidice.—3. Wife of Antiöchus, king of Syria, and mother of Seléucus Callinicus. At her suggestion, her son commenced his reign with the murder of his stepmother, Bérénice, sister of Ptolémæus, king of Egypt, and her infant son, his own paternal brother (Just. xxvii. 1).—4. Queen of Syria, killed by Ammönus, in 150 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 50).—5. The wife of Ariaräthes, king of Cappadöcia, to whom she bore six male children. On the death of her husband, she cut off five of them by poison, the sixth was saved by his relations, and succeeded to the crown. The Cappadocians, for her cruelty, put Lāodice to death (Just. xxxvii. 1).—6. The sister and wife of Mithridätes q. v., whom she attempted to deprive of life (Just. xxxvii. 3).—7. Sister of Mithridätes, and wife of Ariaräthes, king of Cappadöcia. After her husband had been murdered by Górdius q. v., she married Nicómædes (Just. xxxviii. 1).

Lāodicea, æ, f. Ladikie, Ladiche, or, Eski-hissar, a town of Phrygia, frequently written Lāodicea ad Lycum, to distinguish it from other cities of the same name. Lah. Lāodicieni, orum (Sing. Lāodiceus, i, m.) were among the auxiliaries of the Rhödi, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18).—2. Latakia, a maritime town of Syria, commonly called Lāodicea ad Märë (Tac. Ann. ii. 79). The other cities called Lāodicea were of less note, and do not require to be described.

Lāodöcus, i, m. a brave warrior, son of Antenor, and friend of Antilöchus (Hom. Il. iv. 87 seq.).—2. One of the Argonauts, brother of Aröus, and son of Përus, according to Orphëus, others say of Bias (Orph. 149).

Lāögönnus, i, m. son of Onétör, priest of Jüpiter on Ida, killed by Mériönes (Hom. Il. xvi. 604).—2. Son of Bias, who, with his brother Dardänus, lost his life by Achilles (Hom. Il. xx. 460).

Lāömëdon, ontis, m. fifth king of Troy, was the son of Ilus, and father of Priämus and Antigönë. He is said to have bargained with Nêptünus and Apóllo, for surrounding Troy with a wall, and, after they had executed the work, defrauded them of the promised reward, which Hörätius relates (Od. iii. 3. 22), and to which Virgilius alludes (G. i. 502). In consequence of this breach of faith, these gods became the enemies of the Trojans. This fiction has been attempted to be explained, by supposing that Lāömëdon took, from the temples of Nêptünus and Apóllo, the money with which he built the Trojan walls. To Hércüles, Lāömëdon promised his horses, on condition that he delivered his sister Hésiónë q. v., and the hero intrusted them to his keeping until he returned from Cölchis, but the Trojan king imprisoned the ambassadors whom that hero sent for them, and formed a plan to cut off all the Argonauts. All on board the Argos then landed, advanced against the city, easily defeated the Trojans, and Hércüles killed Lāömëdon with his own hand. He carried Troy at the first assault, bestowed the kingdom on Priämus, because he, from a principle of justice, resisted the whole of his father's conduct, and put all the other sons of Lāōmēdon to death. Hērēcles, having formed a treaty of friendship with the young monarch, set sail for Greece. Lāōmēdoniades, m. m. Priāmus (Virg. Æn. viii. 158). Lāōmēdoniades, arum, m. the Trojans (Virg. Æn. iii. 248); the Romans (Sil. Ital. x. 629). Adj. Lāōmēdonēus, et. Lāōmēdoniūs, a, um, of Lāōmēdon, Trojan. Lāōmēdonēa Troja, Troy of which Lāōmēdon was king (Virg. G. i. 502). Lāōmēdonēa gens, the Trojan nation (Virg. Æn. iv. 542). Lāōmēdoniūs hēros, Enēas (Virg. Æn. viii. 18). Lāōmēdonēa arva, Trojan territories (Ov. Met. xi. 196).—2. A Mitylenian, who served under Alexander the Great, in Asia, and, at his death, received Syria as his part of that monarch's dominions (Just. xiii. 4). Cūrtius adds Phoenicia (x. 10).

Lāōthōē, es, f. the mother of Lēcāon and Pōlydōrus, whom she bore to Priāmus (Hōm. Il. xxii. 48).—2. Daughter of Mēretus, and mother of Eurētus and Echion by Mercury (Orph. 134).

Lāpāthus, i, m. a fort in Thēssālīa, near which Pēscūs, king of Mācēdōnīa, had a garrison, when the Roman consul Q. Mārcius Philippus invaded Mācēdōnīa, 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 2—6).

Lāpīcīni, orum, m. a people of Līgūrīa, who lived on the west side of the Apennines (Liv. xli. 19).

Lāpīthae, arum, m. a people of Thēssālīa, who seem to have inhabited Pindus, Metzova, Othrys, Kata Vothri, and Pellon, Platid. Ancient authors describe them as savage and ferocious. Their battle with the Centauri has been sung by Hēsiodus, in his Scutum Hērēcles; by Hōrātius (Od. i. 18. 8); by Virgilius, in the Georgics; and by Ovid, in the twelfth book of the Metamorphoses. They are said to have been the first who broke horses, and to have excelled in horsemanship. Adj. Lāpīthaeus, et. Lāpīthēus, a, um. Lāpīthēa gens (Ov. Met. xii. 530). Lāpīthēa praelia (Ov. Met. xiv. 670).

Lāpīthas, v. Lāpītha, v, m. a mountain of Arcādīa, from which issues a spring of an offensive smell, and so unwholesome that no fish lives in it (Paus. v. 5). See Acidas.

Lāpīthōnīa, in Stat. Th. vii. 297, ought perhaps to be written Lāpīthōnīa, the accusative of Lāpīthōn. If this reading were accurate, Lāpīthōn would be the father of Alāthreūs by Dircētis, or Lāpīthōn may have been her father's name.

Lar, v. Lārs Pōrsēna. See Pōrsēna.

Lārānda, orum, n. Larendeth, a town of Lēcāōnīa (Amm. Mar. xiv. 2).

Lāres, um (Sing. Lar, aris), m. household gods, whose images and proper place were at the hearth in the hall (Liv. xxiv. 26). The poets use Lar to denote a house. See Penātes.

P. Lārgus Cēcīna, P. Lārgi Cēcīnae, m. a man who had considerable influence with the emperor Claudius (Tac. Ann. xi. 33).

Lārīdes, m, m. a Rutulian, son of Daucus, and twin-brother of Thymber, whose right hand Pallas cut off. They were so like that their parents could not distinguish the one from the other (Virg. Æn. x. 391).

Lārīna, ae, f. one of the three favourite attendants of Cāmīlla. The other two were Tulla and Tūpeia (Virg. Æn. xi. 655).

Lārīnum, v. Lārīnātum, i, n. Larino, a town in the district of the Frēntīni, south of Tifērnus, the Tiferno, a river of Italy, which runs into the Gulf of Venice. Ich. Lārīnātes, ium, v. um (Sing. Lārīnas, ātis), m. Adj. Lārīnas, as, as; ātis. Lārīnātia signa (Sil. Ital. xii. 174).

Lārīssa, v. f. Lerissa (Greeks), and Yeniseri, or, Genishehir (by the Turks), a city of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, on the right bank of Pēscūs, the Salampria. On the day after the battle of Pharsālia, Pōmpeius entered this city, and was respectfully welcomed by the inhabitants (Val. Max. iv. 5). It is still the capital of Thessaly, as it was in ancient times. Probable population, twenty thousand Mahometans. Pēscūs now flows through the town, of a muddy colour, with a surface as smooth as oil. On all the coins the town is written with a single s. It is sunk in the hollow of the plain. There is another city of the same name, towards the south of Thessaly, on Sinus Mākēus, the Strait of Negropont, to which the word Crēmāstē, i. e. hanging, from the declivity of its situation, to prevent confounding the two towns, is generally added (Liv. xxxi. 46).—2. A city of Aēōlis.—3. A town of Arābīa.—4. Another, in the Troad (Plin. i. 428 seq.).—5. Another, in Syria.—6. A hill which overhangs the city Argos, on which there appears to have been a fort. Philōcles, a general of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, took possession of this hill, and the town was afterwards betrayed into his hand (Liv. xxxii. 25). Ich. Lārīssēi, orum, et. Lārīssēnses, ium, m. Adj. Lārīssēus, a, um, of Lārīssa, Thessalian. Lārīssēus Achīllēs, Thessalian Achilles (Virg. Æn. ii. 197), for Lārīssa was not subject to Achilles, during the Trojan war, and he was a native of Pēlla. Lārīssēus āpex, the citadel or fort of Argos (Stat. Th. i. 382), called by that poet Lārīssēus vērtēx (id. iv. 5).

Lārīsus, i, m. the Riso, a river which separates the territory of Elis from that of Dymae, and flows from Skollis, according to Strābo, or, as Hōmērus calls it, Olēnīa pētra. On the banks of this stream, the Elēi and Aēōlī fought against the Achaei commanded by Philōpēmen, who killed Dēmōphānes, commander-in-chief, and completely routed the combined army.

Lārīus, i, m. (lācus), the Lake of Como, is thirty miles in length, including the Lake of Chiavenna, which is five miles long, has a winding direction, and, at Como, it is a mile in breadth, but at its greatest breadth it is two English miles. Addūa, the Adda, flows through this lake, and falls into Pādus, the Po (Plin. i. 249).

Lārōnīa, ae, f. a woman of considerable abilities, into whose mouth Jūvēnālīs puts a speech at once witty and sarcastic (Sat. ii. 36—65). Mārtiālīs mentions a rich, childless, aged widow of this name (ii. 32).

Lārōnīus, i, m. a Roman who had boarded the ship of Crāntor, a Carthaginian, with which that of Pēscūs had grappled, and killed a Cēlōps named Pōlyphēmus. This engagement took place off the coast of Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 534).

Sp. Lārītius, Sp. Lārītī, m. a Roman of noble birth, who assisted Hōrātius Cōcēs in defending Pōns Sūbīcius (Liv. ii. 10—18).

T. Lārītius, T. Lārītī, m. the first Roman dictator in the opinion of the ancient historians, with whom Lāvīus seems to agree.

He named Sp. Cassius master of the horse. Both were of consular dignity, and T. Lartius was again elected consul in 498 B. C. In the consular calendar he is called T. Lartius Flavius (Liv. ii. 18-21). In the common editions of Eutrapius, he is improperly called Lartius (l. 12).

Larus, i, m. a Cantabrian of prodigious strength and uncommon bravery. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, during his command in Spain, cut off the right hand of Larus (Sil. Ital. xvi. 47 seq.).—2. A man in the army of Hannibal, killed by the Roman consul Scipio at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 234).

Las, ños, f. Macroboini, a maritime village of Lacedonia, which the Lacedæmonians attempted to recover, in 191 B. C., as they were then without a seaport. The Achæi considered this as a pretext for war, which ended in levelling the walls of Lacedæmon, and abolishing the laws and institutions of Lycurgus, in the same year (Liv. xxxviii. 30, 31).

Læsthènes, is, m. a commander of the Cydonians, whom Q. Cæcilius Metellus Creticus conquered (Flor. iii. 7).

Lætius, i, m. a man killed by Mæzentius (Virg. Æn. x. 697).—2. A native of Cölchia, slain by Dærius (Val. Flacc. vi. 572).

Lætiniastus, i, m. a Cretan, who commanded his countrymen under Philopomen, in Greece, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 29).

Lætianus, i, m. a Roman, wounded during the second Punic war by Syrticus (Sil. Ital. v. 229).—2. A man enriched by the emperor Septimius Sævus (Aur. Vic. Ep. 20).—3. &c. See Plantius.

Lætinius Lætarius, Lætini Lætarius, m. a man of prætorian dignity, who had obtained that rank through the interest of Scjænus, and who took an active part in the condemnation of Titus Sabinus. At a future period, Tiberius doomed him to the punishment which his conduct deserved (Tac. Ann. iv. 68).

Lætinius Pændus, Lætini Pændi, m. prætor of Mœsia, where he died in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 66).

Lætius, i, m. son of Faunus and the Laurentian nymph Mærica, was the grandson of Pæus, and great-grandson of Sætürnus. Justinus says he was a son of Hærcules by a daughter of Faunus (xliii. 1). When Æneas landed in Italy, Lætius was king of Lætium, then inhabited by the Aborigines (Dion. Hal. i. 44. Aur. Vic. Orig. 13). He married Amata, sister of Vênilla, wife of Daunus, king of the Rutuli, by whom he had a son who died in infancy, and a daughter, Lavinia, who was betrothed to her cousin Tûrnus, son of Daunus and Vênilla, before the arrival of the Trojan prince. Tûrnus persisted in the fulfilment of the engagement, in which he was supported by Amata, but Lætius encouraged the pretensions of Æneas, preferring him for his son-in-law. This gave rise to the war between the rival princes, in which the Trojan, supported by the Latins, or Aborigines, was victorious, and his bravery was rewarded by receiving Lavinia in marriage, with the kingdom of Lætium as her dowry. Livius states, that Lætius was killed in the first engagement with the Rutuli under Tûrnus (l. 2). The character of Lætius, in the Æneid, is that of a mild, calm, and interesting old man, whose life had been embittered by the loss of all his children except Lavinia, and whose declining years witnessed the suicide of his wife, who saw Æneas prevailing against her nephew, and from grief hanged herself. He acts no distinguished part in the Æneid, yet the reader is pleased to meet with him, and what he says is gentle and cautious, calculated to excite attention and respect.—2. Son of Æneas Silvius, and father of Alba, v. Albus, the third king of Alba Lônga according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Eusebius; but the fourth according to Livius (l. 3), and to Ovidius (Fast. iv. 43). By him the Roman colonies were planted, called Prisci Lætini.—3. A Roman who killed Cirta in the Carthaginian army, when P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus commanded the Roman forces in Spain (Sil. Ital. xv. 447).—4. A mimic, who told the emperor Dômianus what he had seen happen to the body of Asclepius q. v. (Suet. Dom. 15).

Lætium, i, n. a small country of Hælia, Italy, on the south bank of Tyber, the Tevere, where it falls into that part of the Mediterranean, anciently called Mære Tuscum, v. Tyrrhenum, quod et Inferum, the Tuscan sea (not in use). Virgilius (Æn. viii. 322) derives the name from the verb latere, to lurk, because Sætürnus concealed himself there, when he fled from Cræta, Candia, to escape the fury of his son Jüpiter; and others, from Lætium, a king of that country. Lætium was admitted to the privileges of Rome, in 92 B. C., by Lex Julla (Gel. iv. 4). Latini, Latini, orum (Sing. Lætius, i), m. whom Livius calls Aborigines (l. 2). The Latins built Rome, by degrees extended their territories, at first exceedingly small, and gradually subjected to their power the different states of Italy. They next carried their arms against foreign nations, after many years' war, subdued their rivals the Carthaginians, and, at the commencement of the Christian era, gave laws to the known world. The hardy Romans returned from their Asiatic conquests, subdued by the luxury of the people whom they had vanquished. From that period, corruption, effeminacy, and indolence, vices unknown at Rome during the early ages of the state, acquired a gradual ascendancy, destroyed the morals of the people, sapped the foundations of the constitution, and rendered them a prey to the Goths and other northern nations, who began to make incursions upon the empire. Charlemagne, in 800, gave Rome and a considerable tract of the circumjacent country to the Pope. Adj. Lætius, v. Lætus, a, um, Lætialis, Lætarius, et, Lætiniensis, is, e, Latin, Roman. Lætina fidi, the Latin lute, i. e. Latin Lyric poetry (Pers. Sat. vi. 4). Lætium calum, the climate of Lætium (Juv. Sat. vi. 837). Lætia matres (Ov. Fast. iv. 123). Lætialis populus (Ov. Met. xv. 481). Lætarius Jüpiter (Liv. xxi. 63). Adj. Lætialiter, et, Lætine, in Latin, after the manner of the Latins. Lætinae, arum, f. festivals of Lætium in honour of Jüpiter. Lætinitas, utis, f. the Latin language, pure Latin style, in opposition to Pægrinitas, foreign words, or foreign idioms.

Lætius, i, m. Palatchia, a mountain of Lônia, celebrated for the fiction of Lônia falling in love with Endymion. Adj. Lætius, et, Lætius, a, um, Lætius vñator, Euph mon (Val. Placc. viii. 28). Lātūia sūa, the rocks of Palatchia, i. e. the cave in which Eudymon lay (Catul. lxi. 5). Lātūicus sinus, a bay opposite this mountain (Strab. 911).

Latobrogi, orum, m. the Latobrogians, a nation adjoining to the Tulingi, Rauraci, and Helvetii, whose country lay on the bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine, about 90 miles to the W. of Lacus Brigantinus, the Lake of Constance. If they are the people called by Ptolemy, Latōbici, they must have changed their settlements before that geographer wrote, as he includes their territories in Pannonia, near to Noricum; where they could not have been neighbours to the Tulingi, Rauraci, and Helvetii, as stated by Cæsar (B. G. i. 5 seq.).

Lātōnia, æ, f. a name of Diāna, from her mother Lātōnia, on which account she is also called Lātōis, Idos, f. and her brother Apōllo, Lātōides, æ, m. Lātōidia, arum, Apōllo and Diāna (Claud. ci. 61). Lātōnigēna, æ, c. g. Apōllo or, Diāna. Delos has generally been considered the birthplace of Apōllo and Diāna; but some maintain that Lātōnia bore them on Zoster, Cape Vari, a promontory of Attica, whilst others think that she only loosened her zone there; hence the name. Letōis, Idis, f. of Lātōnia, or her children, Apōllo and Diāna; applied to a noun feminine. Adj. Lātōnius, Lātōus, et, Letōius, a, um. Lātōnia Delos, from its being produced for her accommodation (Virg. G. iii. 6). Lātōus pater (Stat. Syl. i. 2. 229). Letōius, i, m. Apōllo; Letōia, æ, f. Diāna.

Lātēus, eos, m. a centaur of prodigious stature, who killed Hālēsus, in the battle with the Lāpithæ at the marriage of Prithōus, and, after a long contest with Cænēus, fell by the bravery of that warrior (Ov. Met. xii. 463–493).

Lātris, is, m. a commander of the Iberians in the Argonautic war (Val. Placc. vi. 121).

Laudia, arum, f. a fort in Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xviii. 7).

Lāvērna, æ, f. the goddess of thieves and robbers, appears to have been the same with Praxidice of the Greeks. She had a temple and a grove on Via Sālaria. Her worship, particularly in prayers and sacrifices, was frequently conjoined with that of Mercūrius. She extended her protection not only to thieves and robbers, but to all who wished to conceal their designs. Hōrātius gives a specimen of the petitions presented to her, from which a just idea of her character may be formed (Epis. i. 16. 60 seq.).

Laufella, æ, f. a woman of vicious practices (Juv. Sat. vi. 319). This name is also written Saufēa q. c.—2. v. Laufēa, a lewd woman, whom Martialis describes in verses of the filthiest kind (iii. 72).

Lāvici. See Lābicum.

Lāvīnia, æ, f. daughter of Lātīnus, king of Lātium, and Amātia. Vēnīlia, her mother's sister, was married to Daunus, king of the Rūtūli, and she herself was betrothed to their only son Tūrnus, before Ænēas landed on the Italian coast. The Trojan prince solicited the hand of Lāvīnia, in which he was encouraged by her father, and keenly opposed by her mother, who wished her daughter united with her nephew, the heir apparent to the kingdom of Ardea, in preference to a foreign exile. The fates decreed against the queen of Lātium, who, in despair, hanged herself, and Lāvīnia became the prize of the conqueror. By Ænēas she had a son whom, after the death of his father, she bore in a wood, to which she had fled for fear of Ascānius, a son of that hero, then on his father's throne. In the history of Victor, the infant was, from the place of his birth, called Silvius. His subjects suspecting that Ascānius had murdered her, threatened to have recourse to violence, and, to allay the odium thus excited, Ascānius made diligent search after her, and regained their affections by bringing her back to the city, in which she appears to have spent the remainder of her life. Livius describes her as a woman of great abilities, and skilled in administration. His account is considerably different from that of Victor, and, from the remote period in which she lived, uncertain and contradictory narratives may be expected. The latter historian makes her the daughter of Anius, priest of Apōllo in Delos (Orig. 9).

Lāvīnium, e. Lāvinum, i, n. a town of Lātium, which Ænēas built, and to which he gave this name in honour of his wife Lāvīnia. Cluvērius says it is now called Patrica. This, however, seems doubtful, as it appears to have been situated on Monte di Lavinio, at a considerable distance from Patrica. It was the metropolis of the Lātīni; at it Tarquinius died, and Titus Tatius was killed. The date of its foundation is uncertain; but Dionysius of Halicarnassus thinks it was in the year 1183 B. C. It was distant from Rome about twenty miles. Inh. Lāvīni, orum, m. whom Philius calls Itionenses, most probably in reference to its first inhabitants. Adj. Lāvīnius, a, um. Lāvīnia littora, the shores of Lāvīnium (Virg. Æn. i. 2). Lāvīnia sedes (Luc. Phar. ix. 991).

Lāvīnius, i, m. a southern branch of Pādus, the Po. On an island in this river, Applianus says the second triumvirate met, and divided the Roman empire among them (Bel. Civ. 589).

Lāvīnium, i, n. a town in Italy near Ticinum, Paria. Lāvīnus, entis, n. the brother of Nūmītor and Lāvīnus, the first excelled in running, the second in form, and the third in size. They each commanded a hundred men in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiii. 195).

Laurēntum, i, n. Paterno, a city of Lātium, near the coast to the south of Tiber, the Tevere. This city derived its name from a laurel tree, preserved with great veneration for many years. It was probably at first the name of the palace of Lātīnus, and afterwards had a more extended signification. Inh. Laurēntes, ium, et, Laurēnti, Laurēnti, e. Laurēntinī, orum, m. by whom Titus Tatius was put to death (Liv. i. 14). Adj. Laurēns, ens, ens, et, Laurēntinus, e. Laurēntius, a, um, of Laurēntum, of Lātium, Lātīn. Laurēns ager, the territory of Laurēntum, Paterno (Juv. Sat. i. 107). Laurēns oper (Mart. x. 45). Laurēntia jugera (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 83). Laurēntia bella (Sil. Ital. viii. 593). Laurēntine paludes, appear to have been marshy land on Nūmicus, mentioned only by Velleius Pāterculus (ii. 19). Laurēntini pēnates (Luc. Phar. vii. 394). Laurēntina via (Gel. x. 2). Laurētānus portus, occurs in Lāvius (xxx. 39); but the reading is doubtful.

Laureolus, i. m. a character in a play of the same name, who, on a false accusation, was crucified. Some ascribe this play to Cæcilius, others to Nævius, and others to Læbrius (Juv. Sat. viii. 187). The reference to A. Gellius (iii. 3) does not prove Nævius to be the author, since the good editions do not read Laureolus, but Hæriolus. To him Martialis alludes (Spec. 7).

Lauriacum, i. n. Lorch, a town of Noricum (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 10).

Laurium, i. n. a mountain in Attica, which contained veins of silver (Herod. vii. 144).

Lauro, v. Lauron, ōnis, f. Leria, a town of Spain to the south of Tūrias, the Guadalquivir. Here Cæsonius killed Cn. Pōmpeius, son of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus (Flor. iv. 2).

Lauro, ōnis, m. a river of Hispania Tarrāconēnsis (Flor. iii. 22).

Laurus, i. m. a Roman, killed by Crēxus in the first engagement with Hannibal on his entering Italy. Picēns shared a similar fate (Sil. Ital. iv. 175).—2. Another Roman, killed by Hannibal in the same engagement (Sil. Ital. iv. 343).

Lausus, i. m. son of Mēzentius, distinguished for the elegance of his form, for his dexterity in horsemanship, and for his skill in hunting, led a thousand Agyllini to the aid of Turnus. Virgilius describes him as endowed with more amiable qualities than his father. He was nearly of the same age with Pallas, possessed great bravery, and performed some gallant acts. His filial affection impelled him rashly to engage Æneas, who had wounded his father, and his life atoned for his temerity (Virg. Æn. x. 775–820).

Laudus Laurentis, from the Tuscans being a colony of Lydians (Stat. Syl. iii. 3. 191).—2. Son of Nūmitor, king of Lātium, killed by his uncle Amūlius to secure the usurped crown to himself and his descendants (Ov. Fast. iv. 55). Dionysius of Halicarnāssus calls the son of Nūmitor, Agēstus.—3. A man to whom Martialis addresses an epigram (vii. 160).

Lautūla, arum, f. a narrow woody pass, at which there was, perhaps, a small town or village, in Lātium, between Anxur and Fūndān. Here part of the Roman army, which had entered into a dangerous conspiracy, in 341 B. C., posted themselves, intercepted all whom the consul dismissed, and compelled T. Quinctius to become their leader. This mutiny terminated without bloodshed (Liv. vii. 39).

Lautūlia, v. Lautūlia, arum, f. a prison at Rome in which criminals were confined. It appears to have been of stone, as dungeons of that kind were either constructed of stone or hewn out of the solid rock; nor was this abode of wretchedness appropriated solely to criminals, forty-three princes of the Ætoli having been brought to Rome and cast into it, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 3).

Lāzarus, i. m. the brother of Mārtha and Mary, raised by our blessed Saviour from the dead, after he had lain four days in the grave. Claudianus (xcix. 11, 12) has described this miracle in the following lines,

Lāzarus e tumulo, Christo inclamante, rēsurgit, Et dūm mōrtis lēx rēsolūta pērit.

Lāzi, arum, m. a people on the borders of the Black Sea, anciently called Cōlchi. Adj.

Lāziens, a. um. Lāzica (rēgio) (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 12).

Leānder, v. Lēandrus, i. m. a native of Abēdos, who, having fallen deeply in love with Hērō of Sēstus, swam across Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, during the darkness, and returned before daylight. She directed his course, by a burning torch displayed from the top of the tower. In this perilous way did the fond lovers obtain nightly interviews, but at last Lēānder perished in a storm. On learning his fate, Hērō, from excessive grief, precipitated herself from the tower into the sea, and, in this manner, terminated her life (Ov. Ep. Her. xviii. and xix). Adj. Lēānder (Mart. xiv. 181). Adj. Lēāndrus, a. um. Lēāndrius Hēllēspōntus (Sil. Ital. viii. 621).

Lēarchus, i. m. a son of Athāmas and Ino, whom his father, on becoming mad, through the agency of one of the furies sent by Jūno to torment him, killed against a wall, supposing his mother to be a lioness, and her sons whelps (Ov. Met. iv. 515). Adj. Lēarchēus, a. um. Lēarchēa umbra (Ov. Fast. vi. 491).

Lēbādēa, v. Livadia, a town of Bēōtia, possessed by Lēbādus, who quitted Athens, and settled there. Neither the name of his father nor the cause of his changing his residence is known. Pausanias says, that he married Nicē, which is all that is recorded of her history. From Lēbādus the town was called Lēbādēa, before that period it was known by the name of Mīdēa, from the mother of Asplēdon. Here was a temple of Jūpiter Trōphōnius. From its buildings, situation, and other advantages, Lēbādēa ranked amongst the most flourishing cities in Greece. It anciently occupied the hill on which the modern castle now stands, and afterwards extended over part of the adjoining plain. The modern city scarcely retains any sculpture or architectural ornaments. From some ancient inscriptions lately discovered there, the inhabitants appear to have written the name differently, Lēbādēa and Lēbādēia. Cōpāis is now sometimes called the Lake of Livadia. Stāsius mentions Lēbādēa (Th. vii. 345).

Lēbaa, v. Lēba, a town of Mācedōnia (Herod. viii. 187).

Lēbēdus, i. f. a town of Iōnia, on the coast, which was nearly deserted when Hōrātius wrote. Scenic exhibitions, in honour of Bāechus, used to be performed here annually (Hor. Epis. i. 11. 6).

Lēbēynthus, i. f. Levita, one of the Sporades, an island in the southern part of Agēum Mārē, the Archipelago, near Nisyros, Nigari, and Cālymnia, Cabine (Pom. Mel. ii. 7).

Lēcānia, v. Lēcānia, a woman who had artificial teeth, mentioned by Martialis (v. 44).

Lēcānius, i. m. a man supposed by some to have killed the Roman emperor Gālba, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 41). See Cāmārius and Tōrentius.

C. Lēcānius Bāssus, C. Lēcānii Bāssī, m. obtained the consulship, and had for his colleague M. Licinius Crāssus, in the year 64 (Tac. Ann. xv. 33).

Lēcānum, i. n. Pelago, a port of Cōrīnthus, at which all the merchandise from Italy, Sicily, &c., arrived. It was also called Lēcānus portus, and Lēcēa, arum, f. A double wall of about twelve stadia in length connected it with Corinth. Palaemonium Læchæum, from the Isthmian games being instituted in honour of Palaemon (Stat. Th. ii. 381). Adj. Læchius, et. Læchæus, a, um. Læchia (rûpes) (Stat. Syl. iv. 3. 59). Læchæum Mære, that part of Corinthiæus Sinus, the Gulf of Lepanto, adjoining to Læchæum (Plin. i. 260).

Læcisternium, i, n. a spreading of a bed or couch. This ceremony was first introduced into Rome in 393 B. C., in consequence of a sickly summer being followed by a severe winter, and the prevalence of a pestilence. The duumviri for religious matters, according to the books of the Sibyl, spread three couches with the greatest possible magnificence, on which were laid the statues of Lætina, Apollô, and Diâna; Hærcules, Mærcurius, and Nèptûnus. On the altars were placed the most costly dishes, and, during eight days, the people implored the favour of these deities. It is said, that through the whole city, the doors being thrown open, all things were used in common, that strangers, known and unknown, were invited to their houses, that people at variance conversed with kindness and complaisance, refraining from quarrelling and contention, that chains were removed from the fettered during those days, and that a regard for religion prevented them from again binding those to whom the gods had brought deliverance. Recourse was had to this religious rite chiefly on account of pestilence; but, in later times, that honour was conferred on individuals, as on Cicero, for crushing the conspiracy of Câtulina, and sometimes at extraordinary solemnities. That sacred rite was performed by private persons, and by the senators; but the ordinary ministers of this rite were the Sèptemviri epulônium. The statues of the goddesses were laid on Sellisterna, never those of the gods; but those of the goddesses were frequently laid on Læcisterna. Pulvinaria conveyed the idea of both these words (Liv. v. 15. Cie. Cit. iii. 6. Dio. Cas. xxxvii. 36. Val. Max. ii. 1).

Læcius, i, m. a Roman, who directed at public exhibitions, funeral processions, &c. His office seems to have nearly coincided with that of the Master of revels in Scotland. He had the power of removing from the seats allotted to the knights, any one whose property fell beneath the sum fixed by law (Mart. v. 26).

Læctoria, e, f. the wife of Lygdus, who seems to have married to avoid the penalty of Julia lex (Mart. vi. 45).

M. Læctorius, M. Læctorii, m. a Roman senator, and one of the twelve who were declared enemies, from the part which they took in exciting sedition at Rome in the war between Sulla and Marius (Ap. Bel. Civ. 388).

Læctum, i, n. Cape Raba, a promontory of Trôas (Liv. xxxvii. 37).

Leda, e, f. daughter of Thestius, was wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. Jupiter, having assumed the form of a swan on the banks of Eurôtas, the Paripotamo, violated this queen. To the king of the gods she bore Pollux and Hèlène; and to her husband, Cæstor and Clytemnestra. According to some authors, Leda produced two eggs, from the one of which sprang Pollux and Hèlène, and from the other Cæstor and Clytemnestra, to which Hôrâtius alludes (Art. Poet. 147). In this fable, as it is narrated by the different mythologists, there is much uncertainty and contradiction. Adj. Lædeus, a, um, of Læda; of a swan, from Jupiter's transformation; of Læcædæmon, Lacedæmonian. Lædea (âlia), Hèlène (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 1). Lædea sidéra, the constellation Gëmini, i. e. Cæstor and Pollux (Luc. Phæar. iv. 526); which Martialis calls Lædæum astrum (viii. 21). Lædeus apex, a plume of swan feathers (Stat. Th. iv. 236). Lædei frâtres, Cæstor and Pollux (Stat. Th. xi. 133). Lædeus Phalantus (Mart. viii. 28).—2. A slave purchased by Milichus, for whom he paid an hundred sesteria, which was the full amount of all his money (Mart. ii. 63).

Lægatus, i, m. a lieutenant-general, who was appointed by the consul, or commander-in-chief, under whose orders he acted. The number of these officers varied in proportion to the greatness or importance of the war. Each legion had at least one, often two. When separated from the main army, sent into winter quarters, &c., the lieutenant-general, being the deputy of the commander, had the honour to be the highest officer. At their first institution, the Lægati were counsellors to the governors of provinces, and decided all causes of minor importance; but held no military rank. Hence the word primarily denoted an ambassador. Their admission into the army naturally resulted from that place of intimacy and confidence. Among the Romans, the person of an ambassador was held sacred. The ediles, Q. Fäblius and Cn. Aprônus, in a quarrel, struck the ambassadors from Apollônia, of which outrage the senate was no sooner informed, than a decree was passed, giving up, through the feciales, the ediles to the ambassadors (Val. Max. vi. 6). Under the emperors, the term Lægatus became a common appellation for all invested with the highest military command in foreign countries. and W.

Læges. See Lex.

Légio, ônis, f. a legion, or body of soldiers consisting of different numbers at different times. In the early part of the reign of Rômulus, the legion contained 3,000 foot, and 300 horse, which he, on the increase of the citizens, by the admission of the Sabines, raised to 4,000. To that number 1,000 was added during the war which Hännibal carried on in Itälia, Italy, about 216 years B. C.; but a reduction of 500 had taken place before of the time Polybius wrote his history. Livy states that the legion consisted of 5,000 foot, and Vegetius, of 6,000 foot, which agrees with the statement of A. Gellius, that there are sixty hundreds in a legion, thirty maniples, and ten cohorts (xvi. 4). It cannot be doubted that these historians recorded the exact number, which constituted a complete legion in their respective times. These are most probably not the only changes the legion underwent; but they have not been transmitted, from few of the writers of antiquity taking any notice of the precise number and regulations of the legion. Perhaps no part of Roman antiquities is involved in greater uncertainty than the constitution of the legion; and the limits necessarily prescribed to a work of this kind do not admit of a full investigation of this very important and interesting subject. Modern writers on the Roman army have, in general, implicitly adopted the idea of Jüstus Lipsius, that the legion consisted of 10 cohorts, each cohort of 3 maniples, and each manipulus of 2 centuries; and that, in the order of battle, the troops were drawn up in three lines, first, the Hastati; second, the Principes; and third, the Triarii. At one period that account was probably correct, although it does not exactly correspond with the facts mentioned by Caesar, and subsequent writers. Those who formed the first line were called Hastati, from their fighting with Hasta, a long spear; and were the flower of the Roman youth. The second line consisted of the same number of maniples, but of men more advanced in life, and of greater military experience, who were called Principes, probably from their being, at one time, the first line. Their arms were heavy. The Triarii made up the third line, and seem to have been a body of reserve. They were frequently, from Pilum, a javelin, called Pilani, and the Hastati and Principes, Antepilani, from being stationed before them. The Vélites generally skirmished before the lines, sometimes between them, and appear to have been what the moderns call Irregulars, or light Infantry. They had light armour, hence called expediti, levis armatura, &c. Livius refers the formation of this body to the first Punic war. The archers and slingers were attached to it. According to that historian, 20 Vélites seem to have belonged to each manipulus. They were, in battle, not formed into cohorts, or maniples, but fought in such parties, and in such places, as the commander judged most advantageous. In the early ages of the Roman state, their army in battle-order was drawn up, like the Macedonian phalanx, in a continued line. This fact rests on the authority of Livius. The disposition into three lines, and arranging in maniples at some distance from each other, seem an improvement of later times. When the Hastati yielded to the superior force or bravery of the enemy, they fell back to the Principes, who filled up the spaces between the maniples, and with them they renewed the charge. If both were forced to give way, the Triarii came up, and a third attack was made on the enemy. Hence, ad Triarios ventum est, it is come to the last push; matters are in the utmost danger. The cavalry fought on the wings, but their exact form or position is not certainly known. It probably did not differ very much from the practice of the moderns. If, after the whole force was brought into action, the enemy still prevailed, they, of necessity, submitted to a defeat.

Of the constitution of the legion when Livius wrote, the following short account will convey an idea perhaps not far from the truth. In each company (ordo), were 60 rank and file, 2 centuries, probably he means the centurion, and his substitute (Optio, Livius, Succenturiatus), and 1 ensign-bearer. A manipulus contained twice that number, or 126. The 15 maniples of the Hastati, and the same number of the Principes, of course, amounted to

How long this constitution of the legion remained, Roman history gives no precise information. Caesar and the historians after him are silent respecting it. Hence it may justly be inferred, that it had ceased before the period in which he wrote. It was probably discontinued about the time when Marius tyrannised over the commonwealth. The Romans continued to draw up the troops for battle in three lines, but in Caesar we find the third frequently performing the lowest offices, quite unsuited to the dignity of the Triarii, and incompatible with the immunities which they enjoyed.

All the cohorts of the legion were manifestly on an equal footing in the army of that general, and no preference seems to have been either acknowledged, or claimed, more than by the different battalions of the same brigade in the British army. The only vestige of the ancient division was the officers retaining their former appellations, as Primus hastatus, Primus pilus, &c. Caesar frequently kept the third line as a body of reserve. See his account of his engagement with the Helvēti, and of the battle of Pharsalia against Pompeius, where his success was the first mortal blow at Roman independence.

For fuller information respecting the Roman legion, the reader is referred to Polybius, Livius, Vegetius, Salmasius, and Jüstus Lipsius. The last of these writers has been followed, with little, if any, variation, by Cantelius, Cnippingius, Rosinus, Kennet, and Dr. Adam, late Rector of the High School of Edinburgh, whose accurate treatise on Roman Antiquities forms one of the most useful school-books which has ever issued from the press. Légioncula, a, f, a little legion. Adj. Légiônarius, a, um, of a legion, legionary.

Laiōdes, is, m, one of the best hearted of the suitors of Penelope (Hom. Od. xli. 144-166).

Lætus, i, m, a prince of Boeotia, son of Alcetron, who killed Phylæus, and was wounded by Hector (Hom. Il. ii. 494 seq.).

Lélēges, um (Sing. Lélēx, egis), m, a race of Nomades or wanderers, who appear in the neighbourhood of Caria, according to Ovidius. People of this name, however, were to be found in various places. Lélēgis, idis, f, applied to females or nouns feminine (Ov. Met. ix. 651). Adj. Lélēgius, a, um.

Lélēx, egis, m, an Egyptian, who came to Mēgāra. During his reign the natives were called Lélēges (Paus. i. 39). Adj. Lélēgius, a, um. Lélēgēta mania, the walls of Mēgāra (Ov. Met. vii. 443).—2. A native of Læconia, who was the first king of that country. Polycæon, his younger son, succeeded him, to the prejudice of his elder brother, Miles (Paus. iii. 1).—3. A native of Narycia, one of the hunters of the Calydonian bear (Ov. Met. viii. 312).

Lēli, orum, m, a ferocious people, mentioned among other rude and savage nations in the Argonautic expedition (Orph. 1071).

Lēmānus (Lacus), the Lake of Geneva, is a most beautiful expanse of water, in the form of a crescent, the concave side of which is upwards of fifty-four miles long. Its hollow side is towards Switzerland, and its greatest breadth measures about twelve miles. This lake is twelve hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea. Rhodanus, the Rhone, descending from the Alps, traverses the whole length of the lake, and renders the water at its entrance turbid, on account of the quantity of earth and mud brought down from these steep mountains. Like the other waters and lakes of Switzerland, for nearly an hour in the evening, after the sun is hidden behind mount Jura, it shines with a splendour resembling burnished gold, by the reflection of the solar rays from the Glaciers. Even in the severest winters it never wholly freezes; and rises about 10 feet in summer, by the melting of the snow on the Alps. There is no island in the lake of Geneva, but near the town of that name, there is a small rocky eminence, called the Stone of Neptune (Pierre à Neptune). Forty streams besides the Rhone, run into the Lake of Geneva, of which the waters appear of a greenish colour, on issuing out at its western extremity. Cuvius Lémnus (Luc. Phar. i. 396).

Lēmbus, i, m. a short little ship used in fishing; a fishing-boat (Liv. xxiii. 34.)

Lēmnus, i, f. now Lemnos, or, Lemni, or, Stalimen, an island in Mare Ægeum, the Archipelago, about 35 miles west of the entrance into Hellēspōntus, the Dardanelles, and nearly at the same distance east of Athos, Monte Santo, or, Agionīros, as it is called by the Greek peasants. Plinius erroneously estimates the distance between Athos and Lemnos at 87 miles, and adds that Athos, Monte Santo, or, Agionīros, projected its shade at the Solstice into the Forum of this island. This extravagant assertion it is not necessary to refute. See Athos. The circumference of Lēmnus is about 112 miles.

The capital, Castro, is built in the form of a crescent, along the top and sides of a small semicircular bay, and has a pleasant appearance. The island consists of that species of rock which mineralogists consider as produced by the agency of fire. Vulcānus, having, in consequence of his deformity, been thrown down from heaven, is said to have fallen on this island, on which account it was sacred to that god, from whom it was called Vulcānta Lēmnus. The place which he first touched produces a kind of earth (terra Lēmnia), which the ancients believed to have the virtue of curing the bite of serpents: the Turks and many other nations have still the same opinion of its efficacy. It is a reddish yellow argillaceous earth, and is dug up with great pomp only on one particular day of the year; and the Signior's seal being affixed, is sent to different countries, where people are found sufficiently credulous to ascribe to it the virtues, which, on experiment, it is found not to possess. At one period Lēmnus was in the possession of the Cæres (Cor. Nep. Milt. 2). In Lēmnus was a famous labyrinth reported to surpass those of Egypt and Candia. From the women of this island, at one time, murdering all their husbands, and the men, at another, putting all the children by Athenian women to death, Lemnian actions came to signify actions of the greatest cruelty.

Lēmnus, i, m. Vulcānus. Lēmnecola, m. Erichonius, son of Vulcānus. Lēmnias, iādos, f. of Lēmnus, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Lēmnīades (mulieres) (Ov. Ep. Her. vi. 53). Lēmnias (i. e. Hypsipyle) orsa refert. (Stat. Th. v. 29). Inh. Lēmnii, orum, m. (Cor. Nep.

Milt. 1). Adj. Lēmnīacus, et, Lēmnius, a. um. Lēmnīaca cātēna, the Lemnian chains, i. e. the chains fabricated in Lēmnus, with which Vulcānus bound Mars and Vēnus detected in adultery (Mart. v. 7). Lēmnīaca antra, the caverns in that island, which were the workshops of Vulcānus (Stat. Syl. iii. 1. 132). Lēmnius pater, Vulcānus (Virg. Æn. viii. 454).

Lēmōvices, um, m. a people of Gallia Cēltica, between Gārūnna, the Garonne, and Ligēris, the Loire. Their name is recognised in Limoges, formerly Augustōrium. There appear to have been more than one tribe or state of this name (Cæs. B. G. vii. 4).

Lēmōvii, orum, m. the Lemovians, a German nation adjoining to the Rugii, who lived on the coast of Suevicum Mare, the Baltic Sea, near Dantzic (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Lēmūres, um, the spirits of the dead, also ghosts, or hobgoblins. From the description of Ovidius, the Lēmūres appear to have excited terror and, therefore, were regarded as evil spirits. The Romans entertained many foolish notions respecting them, and adopted solemnities to prevent their alarming or haunting their relations, who were alive. Lēmūria, orum, v. ium, n. festivals instituted in honour of the Lēmūres, which the Romans celebrated in the month of May, during which the temples of the other gods were shut, and no marriage solemnized. This solemnity was anciently called Rēmūria, from Rēmus (Pers. v. 185).

Lēneus, i, m. a name of Bacchus, derived from the Greek word λενος, a wine-press (Virg. G. ii. 529). Adj. Lēneus, n, um. Lēneus dōna (Stat. Syl. iv. 6. 80).—2. A freedman of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and attendant in almost all his expeditions. After the death of his patron and that of his sons, he supported himself by his school. His affection for that family did not expire with their lives, he cherished the memory of Pompeius, and wrote a most severe and sarcastic poem against the historian Sallustius, for a reflection upon the character of that illustrious Roman. It is reported, that he was stolen from Athens when a boy, that he effected his escape to his native city, where he learned the liberal sciences, and returned to his master with the price which he had paid for him. The latter declined receiving any sum from him, but granted him his liberty in consideration of his genius and learning (Suet. II. Gram. 15).

Lēns, tis, f. a district bordering on Rhetia. Inh. Lēntienses, ium, m. Adj. Lēntiēnsis, is, e. Lēntiēnsis pagus (Amm. Mar. xv. 4).

Lēntinus, i, m. a man ridiculed by Martialis, because he complained of continued fever, the consequence of his own luxury (Mart. xii. 17).

Lēntulus, i, m. a surname of gens Cornēlia, which Juvēnalis uses for the name of any nobleman (Sat. vi. 80).

Lēntulus, i, m. the friend of Läterianus. See Cn. Cornēlius Lēntulus.—2. A Roman prætor, whose camp the Slaves carried in the Servile war (Flor. iii. 19).—3. A questor in Cæsar's army during the civil war (Cæs. B. C. iii. 62).

Lēo, ōnis, m. the fifth sign of the Zodiac. The Nemean lion, which Hercules killed, was changed into this constellation. The destruction of that terrible animal was one of the 12 labours of that renowned hero.

Lēo, ōnis, m. a lion; a hunt of lions and panthers, was first exhibited at Rome, by M. Fulvius Nobilior, in 188 B. C. In the war with the Ætoli, he vowed games if he conquered that nation; and, in fulfilment of his vow, he entertained the public with shows and spectacles during ten days. Of these games this new kind of hunting formed a part (Liv. xxxix. 22).

Lēocritus, i, m. a man in the Grecian army killed by Æneas. He was the son of Aristas, and companion of Lycōmēdes (Hom. Il. xvii. 344).—2. Son of Evēnor, killed by Telēmāchus (Hom. Od. ii. 242 seq.).

Lēodocus, i, m. son of Bias, and brother of Arctus and Tālus, was one of the Argonauts, although his name is not mentioned by Apollodorus and Hyginus (Val. Flacc. i. 358).

Lēon, ōntis, m. son of Eurycrātides, and grandfather of Lēonidas, joint sovereign of Sparta with Hēgēsicles (Herod. vii. 204).—2. Son of Teesias, one of the Athenian ambassadors who went to Rome, to mediate for the Ætoli, in 191 B. C. He had previously accused Apollodorus of inducing the Athenians to revolt. He appears to have been a man of great eloquence (Liv. xxxv. 50 seq.).

Lēon, ōntis, m. a place in Sicily, at the distance of five miles from Hexapylum, on which Claudius Mārcellus fortified a camp, in which he erected huts, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 39).

Lēonātus, i, m. a prefect in the Macedonian army, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Lēoniceus, i, m. an active friend of Mithridates who was taken in a naval engagement by the Rhodians. To obtain his release, that monarch exchanged the whole prisoners of the enemy (Val. Max. v. 2).

Lēonidas, x, m. a king of Sparta, sent by his countrymen with a small body of men to oppose the advancement of Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with an immense armament. Justinus makes the troops of Lēonidas amount to four thousand; Hērodōtus, five thousand two hundred; and Diodorus, seven thousand four hundred. Of these, only three hundred were Spartans. He posted himself at Thermopylæ, Thermo, which he defended with the three hundred Spartans against the whole combined army of Asia, for three successive days. Many of the enemy had fallen by these gallant heroes, who might have ultimately succeeded in repelling that powerful army, had not Ephialtes, a name devoted to infamy, by birth a Trachinian, conducted up the mountain by a secret path, a detachment of the Persians, who, attacking from the heights and in the rear, the warriors whom they were unable to resist on level ground and in the front, soon crushed them to death. Only one escaped to tell the fate of his companions, and his countrymen insulted him with the bitterest reproaches, for having fled from that pass which would immortalize the Spartan name. The Greeks, taught by the example of Lēonidas, placed their security in their own bravery, and despised the countless numbers of the Persian monarch. The Spartans erected temples in honour of Lēonidas, to commemorate his heroism, and trained their youth to admiration of valour, by celebrating his virtues. Valerius Maximus states, that, being left alone with his countrymen, Lēonidas desired his soldiers to take their dinners quickly, adding, "We shall sup with Pluto." On purpose to procure intimidation, and, of consequence, a surrender, one of the Trachinians told him, that the Persian darts, from their number, would intercept the solar rays. "Then," said Lēonidas, "we shall fight in the shade" (Val. Max. iii. 2).—2. Son of Cleomēnes, and brother of the Spartan king (Just. xix. 1).—3. An officer in the army of Alexander, to whom that monarch gave the command of the troops which beheaded the death of Parmenion, after they had been separated from the rest of the army, in 329 B. C. (Curt. vii. 2).

Lēonides, m, m. a noble youth of Hēraclea in Pōntus, who, with the assistance of Chion, put the tyrant Clearchus to death. These brave young men were the scholars of Plato, and showed to their countrymen the virtues which they had learned from their instructor (Just. xvi. 5).—2. A Lacedemonian officer under Persēs, king of Mācedōnia, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Lēonnātus, r, Lēonātus, i, m. one of the generals of Alexander the Great, whose bravery saved the life of that monarch in battle. Ambitious of dominion, and not satisfied with Phrygia Minor (to which Curtius adds Hēlēspōntus, x. 10), allotted to him after the death of his prince, he aspired at the kingdom of Mācedōnia, and endeavoured, by every possible means, to obtain the concurrence of Eumēnes. The latter, steadfast in his fidelity to the family of Alexander, opposed his designs, which he would have resisted with the sword. To assist Antipater against the Athenians, he left his own country, crossed the Archipelago, and fell in battle soon after his arrival in Greece. Curtius describes him as of royal descent (iii. 12 seq.).

Lēonōrius, i, m. a Gallic chieftain, who with Lūtarius, conducted a number of their countrymen into Asia Minor, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 16). See Gallia.

Lēontēus, ōs, m. a man in the army of Etēocles, whom Stātilius describes as cowardly and cruel. Hippomedon cut off his hand, with which he had insulted the dead body of Tydēus (Stat. Th. ix. 133).—2. A Thessalian, the son of Cērōnus, one of the warriors against Troy (Hom. Il. ii. 745 seq.).

Lēontini, ōrum, m. (Sometimes written Lēontium, i, n.) Lēntini, a town on the eastern part of Sicily, Sicily, near which, according to Plinius, the Laestrygones lived. The name has been derived from the Greek word leō, a lion, from their coins having been stamped with the figure of that animal. According to Thucydides, Thēocles, with a colony from Chalcis in Euboea, built this town seven years after the foundation of Syracuse, Saragossa. It is now in ruins. It was taken by M. Claudius Mārcellus, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 30). Inh. Lēontini, ōrum (Sing. Lēontinus, i), m. Adj. Lēontinus, a, um. Lēontinus, ager, a, cōmuns (Sil. Ital. xiv. 125), a plain of astonishing fertility, which lies to the north of the town, on the river Terias, the St. Leonard.

Lēontiscus, i, m. a son of Pithagoras Lāgus, king of Egypt, taken prisoner by Demetrius, son of Antigonus, in 312 B. C. (Just. xv. 2).

Lēontōdāmē, es, f. (lion-tamer), one of Diana's attendants (Claud. xxiv. 249).
Lēophron, ōnis, m. the tyrant of the Rhēgini, who made war on the Lōcrēans (Just. xli. 3).

Lēoprēpis, is, m. the father of Simōnides, a native of Cos, Lango, and an excellent poet. Lēoprēpides, is, m. a patronymic of Simōnides (Ov. Ib. 512).

Lēosthēnes, is, m. the commander of the Athenians, in the war against Antipater, in which he was killed, in 323 B.C. (Just. xlii. 5).

Lēotychides, is, m. son of Agis and Timaea, and nephew of Agēsilaus, with whom he disputed respecting the sovereignty. This contention originated in Agis not acknowledging him as his son, until he was on his deathbed; therefore, doubts were entertained respecting his legitimacy. From these circumstances, the Lacedemonians refused his claim, and appointed his uncle, Agēsilaus, king (Cor. Nep. Ages. 1). Plūtarchus informs us, that Agis considered Alcibiades as the father of Lēotychides, and, therefore, openly disavowed him during his whole life, and, only on his deathbed, yielding to the entreaties of the youth and of his other friends, avowed that he was his son.—2. Son of Mēnēres, a Spartan, who obtained the crown, carried on several wars, commanded the Grecian fleet against Mardōnīus, but, accepting a bribe in the Thessalian war, he was banished, and died in exile at Tēgēa (Herod. viii. 131 seq.).

Lēpida, is, f. daughter of Jūnius Silānus and Emilia Lēpida, was the wife of C. Cāsīus, governor of Syria. The informers preferred groundless accusations against her, and the matter was reserved to the emperor, whose decision Tāctus does not mention (Ann. xvi. 8 seq.).—2. Wife of the emperor Gālbā, by whom he had two sons, both of whom died in infancy. It appears that she did not live long after their marriage, and he continued a widower during the remainder of his life (Suet. Gal. 5).

Lēpīdus. See Emilius.

Lēpōnticus, i, m. a brave warrior, killed as he attacked the Roman consul Scipio, in the battle with Hānnibāl, at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 235).

Lēpōntii, orum, m. a people of the Alps, near the source of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, on the south of that river (Cæs. B. G. iv. 10). The road by St. Gothard comes from the lake of Lucern to Bellinzona and Lugano, passes along the Val Leventina by the side of the Ticino, which flows along Val Leventina into the head of the lake Maggiore. It is manifest Leventina is an alteration of Lēpōntii. Adj. Lēpōnticus, is, m.

Lēprūm, i, n. a town of the Minyæ. Inh. Lēpræte, arum, m. (Herod. ix. 28).

Lēptāsta, is, m. a king of Mauritānia (Sal. Frag. 2).

Lēptines, is, m. a mathematician, who, according to some authors, discovered the cause of that complaint which seemed to be destroying the life of Antiochus (Val. Max. v. 7). See Stratonicē.—2. The murderer of Cn. Octavius, at the Syrian court (Ap. Bel. Syr. 117).

Lēptis, is, acc. im. f. Lebeda, a maritime town of Africa, between the Syrtēs, built, according to Sallustius, by a colony of Sido-nians (Jug. 78). The emperor Sēptimius Sēvērus was a native of this town; and the only African who obtained the purple (Eutrop. viii. 18). There is another town in Byzācium, Tunis, of this name, now Zemta, near Adrūmētum, which appears to have been founded at a later period. Hence the former was called Mājor, and the latter Minor. Asia Lēptis, inaccessible Lebeda, from its situation between the Syrtēs (Stat. Syl. iv. 5. 30). Tēpida Lēptis (Luc. Phar. ix. 524). Inh. Lēptitāni, orum (Sing. Lēptitānus, i), v. Lēptini (Tac. Ann. iii. 74), orum, m. Adj. Lēptitānus, et, Lēpticus, is, um. Lēptitānus ager (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 6). Lēptica (ostrēa) (Plin. iv. 850).

Lēros, i, f. an island in the Archipelago (Herod. v. 125).

Lērna, is, f. a grove and lake of Argolis. The lake is now called the Lake of Molini. It is a small, marshy pool, overgrown with reeds and other aquatic plants. The stream which issues from it turns some mills, on which account it is called Mææ. Some consider Lērna and Alcēon as the same lake. Pausanias and Pompōnius Mela mention a city of this name, which probably stood near the lake, at which the sons of Ægyptus were murdered, and their heads cut off. Some gave to the serpent of Lērna nine heads, others fifty, and some an hundred. Dodwell never saw it portrayed with more than nine. The overflowing of the lake probably formed the Hydra of Lērna, which still occurs occasionally in the winter months; but Pallas-phātus explains the fiction, by asserting that Lērnas was king of the town Hydra, and that he made war upon Mycēnæ. Adj. Lērnæus, is, um. Lērnæus Anguis, Pestis Lērnæa, Bellica Lērnæa, &c., the Hydra, a monstrous serpent which Hēracles killed. This act formed one of his twelve labours. Lērnæum vēnenum, the poison of the Lērnæan serpent, in which Hēracles dipped the arrow with which he killed Nessus (Ov. Met. ix. 130).

Lēsbia, is, f. probably a fictitious name (Prop. ii. 34. 88).—2. A girl beloved by Cātullus, to whom he addresses several of his poems. He describes her as a perfect beauty (lxxxvi. 5).—3. An ugly, lewd woman, with whom Martialis appears to have been acquainted (vi. 23). To this depraved woman, the same poet addresses several odes equally dishonourable to the mind of the writer, whence such pollution emanated, and to the female whose character was rendered detestable by such defilement as Martialis has described.

Lēsbos, i, v. Lēsbia, is, f. Mitylenē, a large and celebrated island in Mææ Egæum, the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia, about 30 miles south of Tēnedos, Tenedo, according to Strābo, nearly sixty miles long, and 170 in circumference. The capital, Mitylēnē, was built by a colony from Æolia, in Natolia; hence the adjective Æolicus, is, um, signified of Mitylēnē, of Lēsbos, Lesbian. This city was remarkable for the elegance of its buildings, the learning of its inhabitants, and the fertility of the adjacent country. The Lyric poets Alcæus, Sapphō, Terpander, and many other characters illustrious in Grecian history, were natives of Mitylenē. Lēsbis, idos, et, Lēsbias, idos, f. a Lesbian woman; also applied to nouns feminine. Lēsbides, Les- biau girls (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 16). Lēsbias, adis, f. a Lesbian gem. Adj. Lēsbīacus, Lēsbios, et, Lēsbōus, a, um. Lēsbia rina (Hor. Epod. ix. 34). Lēsbius pes, lyric measure.

Lēthaea, a, f. a woman changed into stone, on mount Ida (Ov. Met. x. 70).

Lēthē, es, f. a river of the Infernal Regions, the waters of which produced forgetfulness. Adj. Lēthaeus, a, um. Lēthaea rātis, the boat of Chāron (Tib. iii. 5. 24).—2. c. Oblivio, Līmaeus, Līmaeus, Līmaea, Līmaeus, the Lima, a river of Portugal, which the Roman soldiers, under Dēcius Jūnius Brūtus, refused to pass, in 139 B. C., because, like Lēthē in the Infernal Regions, it was supposed to cause a total forgetfulness of one's native country and of past occurrences. The commander himself lifted the standard, and crossed it first (Liv. Ep. 55. Flor. ii. 17).—3. A fountain in Beōtia, which an earthquake joined with Mnēmōsynē; and their united stream pours its waters into Hērēynna.

Lēthus, i, m. a Pelasgian, father of Hippōthōus (Hom. Il. xvii. 288).

Lētus, i, m. a mountain of Līgūria. On it and Bālīsta the Līgūres encamped, in 178 B. C., after they had been driven from the level lands by C. Claudius Pūlcher, and in the dislodging of them the Roman consul, Q. Pētīlius Spūrinus was killed (Liv. xli. 18).

Lēvāci, orum, m. a people in the northern part of Gallia Belgica, on Scāldis, the Scheldt, between the Nērvii and Grūdii. The Cēntrōnes, Grūdii, Lēvāci, Pleumōsīi, and Gōrdūni, were vassals of the Nērvii (Cæs. B. G. v. 39).

Lēuca, a, f. Lēuca, orum, a, a small town on Lāpīgium promōntōrium, Capo di Leuca, eighty stādia from Tārēntum, Taranto (Luc. Phar. v. 376).

Lēucādia, a, f. a woman whose praises Varro Atticus sounds (Prop. ii. 34. 86).

Lēucādia, a, f. Santa Maūra, in ancient times a peninsula, afterwards an island, by cutting an artificial canal across the isthmus which connected it with Acārnānia, Karili. Some derive the name from Lēucas, a companion of Ulysses, others, with more probability, from the white rocks which form the Lover's leap. With respect to the canal, it is uncertain at what period and by what people it was made; but Līvius states that it was artificial, although some have maintained that the isthmus was destroyed by an irruption of the sea. It is of no great depth, is fordable in calm weather, but is very dangerous, from being infested with pirates. The island, of which the greater part is mountainous and rocky, may be estimated in circuit about forty miles, and the population at eighteen thousand. Lēucātes, a, Lēucāta, a, m, et, Lēucātē, es, f. Cape Duonto, the promontory of Lēucādia, the celebrated Lover's leap of antiquity, on which Apōllo had a temple (Virg. Æn. iii. 274). Lēucas, adis, f. Leucadu, the capital of Santa Maūra, distant about sixty-four miles from the chief city of Corfu, contains about five thousand inhabitants, whose commerce is inconsiderable. The town is ill-built, and the island has only about eight or ten villages. Adj. Lēucādīus, e. Lēucādīus, a, um. Lēucādīus, Apōllo, from the temple already mentioned; for a similar reason, he is called Actius Apōllo (Prop. iii. 11. 69). Lēucōdīcus, ēēdēx (Luc. Phar. v. 638).

Lēucē, arum, f. Finiki, a town of Lēcōnia, in the vicinity of Acērie, both of which were commanded by Boē (Liv. xxxv. 27). Strābo mentions a small town of this name near Smyrna (926).

Lēucāspis, is, m. a companion of Enēas, who was drowned with Orōntēs, who commanded the Lycian fleet. Enēas saw both their shades among those on the banks of the Styx, who were without the honour of burial, and therefore could not be allowed to cross that river for a hundred years (Virg. Æn. vi. 334).

Lēucāta, a. See Lēucādia.

Lēucē, es, f. a place in Chersōnēsus Taurica, the Crimea, dedicated to Achilles. It had its name probably from the white birds; resembling halcyons, which bred there (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Lēucē Actē (i. e. white shore), a place in Thrācia (Herod. vii. 25).

Lēuci, orum (Sing. Lēucus, i), m. the Leucians, a Belgic nation who lived between Mōsa, the Meuse, and Mōsella, the Moselle, near the source of the latter (Cæs. B. G. 40). Their country is now part of Lorraine.

Lēucippus, i, m. son of Pēricēs and Gōrgōphōnē. He married Philōdicē, daughter of Ināchus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilāira and Phēbē. Lēucippis, idis, f. Phēbē, daughter of Lēucippus (Prop. i. 2. 15). Gōmīna Lēucippides, the two daughters of Lēucippus, i. e. Phēbē and Hilāira (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 327).—2. A son of Hērēules, by Eurytēlē (Apol. ii. 7. 8).—3. One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 306).

Lēucon, ōnis, m. (White), one of Acteion's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 218).

Lēucōnōē, es, f. one of the daughters of Minyas, who relates the loves of Sol (Ov. Met. iv. 168—270).

Lēucōpētra, a, f. Cape Piattaro, the southern termination of the Apennines (Ap. Bel. Civ. 734).

Lēucōphrēnē, e. Lēucōphrēnē, es, f. a surname of Diāna, as worshipped by the Mag-nesiens. The Roman commanders, in compliment to the fidelity of that people, declared the temple of Lēucōphrēnē a sanctuary (Tac. Ann. iii. 62).

Lēucōsā, a, f. Licosā, a small island on the western coast of Italy, south of Naples (Ov. Met. xv. 708).

Lēucōsyrī, orum, m. (i. e. white Syrians), a name originally given to the inhabitants of the northern part of Cilicia and the southern part of Cāppādōcia (Plin. i. 653).

Lēucōthēē, es, e. Lēucōthēn, a, f. a name given to Inō, by the Greeks, after she was changed into a sea goddess (Ov. Met. iv. 541). She brought assistance to Ulysses, at the time Nēptūnus raised a storm against him, before he reached the island of the Phæacēs. The fiction introduced here, to support the spirits of Ulysses, is short and interesting (Hom. Od. v. 334).—The name of several other women; from Diōdōrus, it appears to have been a title of every female of distinction, who lost her life in the sea.

Lēuctra, a, f. Lēuctra, orum, n. Lefthā, a town of Beōtia, near which Epāmīondas obtained a brilliant victory over the Spartans, and rescued Greece from the tyranny of that warlike people. From the ancient foundations; it appears to have been of an oval form; the present insignificant village consists only of five houses. Leuctridæ, arum, f. daughters of Scœdæus, who hospitably entertained some Spartans, and they, in violation of the laws of hospitality, as well as of moral obligation, deprived his daughters of innocence, on which, despising life, they laid violent hands on themselves, and were buried there.

The father in vain demanded justice on the perpetrators of that crime, and, therefore, killed himself on the tomb of his daughters. From that time, many prophecies and oracles forewarned the Spartans to beware of the vengeance of Leuctra, Lefha, which predictions the bravery of Epaminondas many years after amply fulfilled.—2. A town of Lacœonic ager, mentioned by Plinius (i. 416).

Leucus, i, m. a friend of Ulysses, whom Antiphon, a son of Præmæ, killed (Hom. II. iv. 492).

Leucymma, Lefhino, a cape in Corfu.

Lœsis, v. Lœsin, inis, f. a place in Egypt, four miles distant from Alexandria. Here, in 170 B. C., the Roman ambassadors C. Pœpilius Lœnas, C. Dœlmaus, and C. Hœstilius met Antiochus, king of Syria, to whom they had been sent, by an order of the senate, to forbid his making war on Egypt (Liv. xlv. 12).

Lœstus, i, m. a Cretan, who came with Atheneus to Cn. Mænius Vulsus, in 191 B. C., on his march against the Gallœgræci (Liv. xxxviii. 13).

Lœx, legis, f. a law. From the excellence of the Roman constitution, at its first formation by Rœmulus, it may be justly inferred, that the laws which he enacted, gave proofs of a mind endowed with a wonderful degree of political knowledge, considering the barbarous age in which he was born. His successor, Numa Pœmpilius, ranked still higher as a legislator, and it is deeply to be regretted, that the whole of his writings have not been transmitted to modern times. See L. Pœtilius. Of the code framed from the constitution of the Grecian states, known by the name of The Laws of the Twelve Tables, only a few fragments now remain. It is not necessary here to enumerate the laws passed from that period, as they will be found under the names of the individuals by whom they were proposed and carried.

Lexæor, ōris, m. a Scythian commander in the war against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 630).

Lexœvil, oram, m. a people of Gallia Cœlica, whose country was bounded on the N. by Sequnæ, the Seine, and on the W. by Frêtum Gællæum, v. Britannicæum, the English Channel (Cæs. B. G. iii. 9 seq.). Their country now forms part of the province of Normandy.

Libæus, i, m. (Lebanon, in Scripture), Libanus, the highest mountain in Jûdia, according to Thætus, covered with verdant groves, unless towards the summit, which even in the heat of summer, is never free from snow (Hist. v. 6). Adj. Libæus, a, um, Libæna cœdrus.

Libery, ōri, m. a name of Bacchus, from the adjective liber, free; because wine frees from care (Ov. Met. iii. 520 seq.).—2. Maternal uncle of Arrius (Catul. lxxiv. 5).—3. A son of Cœres, whose temple at Rome was conjoined with that of his sister Libera q. v. M. Acilius Glæbrio, and C. Lælius plebeian ediles, set up a brazen statue to each of them in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 25).

Libœrni, æ, f. the daughter of Cœres, the same as Prœsœrpina q. v. (Liv. xxxiii. 25). This name is not of frequent occurrence in Roman authors.

Libœrti, orum, m. freedmen, or enfranchised slaves, who, under the emperor Claudius, rose to equestrian rank, and, as the Equites q. v. possessed the judicial authority by the decree of that prince, the freedmen became armed with the power of the laws, and thus placed on a level with the monarch. Augustus empowered the knights, who ruled in Egypt, to hear and determine causes with the same authority as the magistrates of Rome. This rule was afterwards extended to the other provinces, and although many of the governors had been born in slavery, yet, their decisions had the same weight as those of the Roman magistrates, or of the emperor. In Britain the rank of the freedmen scarcely exceeded that of the slave. Tacitus considers this Roman practice a proof of public liberty, since they rose above freeborn men and even surpassed the nobles in despotic governments (Ann. xii. 60 seq. Mor. Ger. 25). Such changes seldom, if at all, take place in settled and well regulated governments.

Libœrtini, orum, m. the sons of freedmen, who, in 170 B. C., had been enrolled at Rome, in the four city tribes, except those who had a son above five years of age. The censors, this year, ordered, that all should be surveyed in the place where they had been at the last cœnus, and those who had a farm or farms, in the country. All of more value than thirty thousand sesterces to be included in the country tribes. C. Claudius Pûlcher maintained, notwithstanding of the reservation, that a censor had not the power of depriving any man, much less a whole class of men, of their power of voting, that he could remove a man from his tribe, but he could not exclude him from all the thirty-five tribes, for this exclusion would deprive him of all the rights of citizenship, since he could not be comprehended in the survey. At last the two censors agreed, that they should publicly select by lot one of the city tribes, in which all who had ever been in slavery should be enrolled. The lot fell on Tribus Esquiline, and Tib. Sœmprœnulus Græchus ordered all the Libœrtini to be surveyed in that tribe, a measure which gave great satisfaction to the senate (Liv. xlv. 15). The Libœrtini were for the first time received into the Roman army in 91 B. C., during the Social war (Liv. Ep. 74).

Libœthra, æ, f. v. Libœthrus, i, m. et, Libœthrum, i, n. a fountain in Mægnœsia.—2. Another, in Pieria (Pom. Mel. ii. 3).—3. A cave in Hælicon, Zagarevœnsi. Libœthrides, um, f. the muses, so called either from the fountain or cave in Hælicon. The former appears to have been the opinion of Heyne (Virg. B. vii. 21).

Libœthrus, i, m. a mountain about forty stadia from Côrœnœ. On it were statues of the muses and nymphs; hence, says Pausanias, the former were called Libœthrides. Libœthris, idis, f. a fountain in Libœthrus (Paus. ix. 34).

Libœthrum, i, n. a town of Thessalia, between which and Hæracœum the Roman consul Q. Mærcius Philippus encamped, 171

B. C., on his march to Mæcædonia (Liv. xlv. 5).

Libitina, m. f. the goddess who presided over funerals, considered by some the same with Proserpina. At Rome, she had a temple, in which every thing necessary for burials was sold, and a register of deaths kept. The poets frequently use Libitina as synonymous with Mors. Vt ubi Libitina, shall escape Libitina, i. e. death (Hor. Od. iii. 30. 7).

Libitinaus, i. m. a man who attended in the temple of Libitina, and conducted funerals; an undertaker.

Libo, onis, m. a surname of Scribonia gens (Prop. iv. 11. 31).

Libo, onis, m. a worthless man, whom Cæcilius ridicules (liv. 3).

Libo Drusus, Libonis Drusi, m. of the Scribonian family, allowed himself to be duped by Firmus Catus, who accused him to the emperor Tiberius. The latter brought him to trial on very trivial pretences, and he put himself to death. Vanity, rather than crime, appears to have been his fault; and his wild imagination formed a powerful engine for his destruction, in the hand of his deceitful friend Firmus Catus (Tac. Ann. ii. 27—31).

Librarius, i. m. a slave who copied books, or manuscripts, among the Romans (Cic. Nep. Att. 18).

Libi, orum (Liv.), Libici, orum (Plin. Nat. Hist. x. 10). m. a Gallie nation, who possessed the country round Brixia and Verona, of which it is probable they were dispossessed by the Gauls under Bellövesus. According to Livius, had Hannibal passed Peninum or Crémò, he would have gone through the country of the Salsati to the Libi Galli. The Boii plundered the Libi in 193 B. C., but the Roman consuls recovered the spoil, and did not allow a single man of the Boii to escape (Liv. v. 85 seq.).

Liburna, m. f. considered by Florus the same with Libricum, a considerable tract of land which lay on the east coast and towards the top of Mæcædonia, the Gulf of Venice. Inh. Liburni, orum (Sing. Liburnus, i. m. a savage nation, who seem to have been chiefly pirates, hence Lucanus, Liburni pugnaces mari (Phar. iv. 530). Horridus Liburnus (Mart. i. 50). Intima regna Liburnorum, the inmost realms of the Liburni, i. e. the most inland part of the territory or kingdom of Liburna (Virg. Æn. i. 244).

Liburnis, idis, f. of Liburna, applied to females or nouns feminine. Adj. Liburnus, et, Liburnicus, a, um. Liburna terra (Luc. Phar. viii. 38). Liburna navis, a small and very fast-sailing galley, generally of two banks of oars (Sil. Ital. xii. 240 seq.). Sæva Liburna (naves), cruel or hostile Liburnian ships (Hor. Od. ii. 37. 30). At the battle of Actium, Augustus obtained the victory over Antonius chiefly by means of the Liburnian galleys (Dio). The emperor Caligula built, after the Liburnian manner, two ships of cedar wood, of ten banks of oars, decked their sterns with jewels, gave them sails of different colours, furnished them with large baths, porticoes and rooms of entertainment, besides having in them a great variety of vines and other fruit trees. In these he sailed along the coast of Cæmpânia (Suet. Cal. 37). Liburnica (insule) (Plin. i. 387). Strabo makes the number of these islands forty.

Liburnus, 4, gen. the name of a slave or chamberlain. The Liburni were tall and strong, on which account most of the carriers of litters came from Liburna (Juv. Sat. iii. 240; vi. 477).

Libya, m. f. Libyæ, es, f. a country of Africa, to the W. of Ægyptus, Egypt, corresponding to Barca, part of Tripoli, and of the desert of Zahara. Its boundaries are not exactly defined by ancient geographers. In the writings of the Greeks, Libyæ most commonly denotes the whole of Africa except Egypt. According to Apollodorus, Libya was the daughter of Epaphus and Memphis, who gave her name to the district adjacent to her native country, which, among the Greeks, became the general appellation of Africa. She had to Neptuneus two sons, Agenor and Belus. The former settled in Phenicia, and reigned over that country; the latter succeeded to the crown of Egypt, and married Anchinoë, a daughter of Nilus, the Nile, by whom he had two sons, Ægyptus and Danaus, so celebrated in the writings of the Greeks. In Libya, there was a scarcity of rain and spring water (Curt. iv. 7).

Libyæ, um (Sing. Libys, os), m. Libyssa, æ, et Libyssis, v. Libystis, idis, f. Libyan or African, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Libycus, Libyssinus, et, Libystinus, a, um. Libyan, Carthaginian, African. Libycus deus, Ivory (Mart. xiv. 3). Libyci triumph, African triumphs, i. e. of C. Marius over Jugurtha (Luc. Phar. ii. 69). Libycæ urbs, Carthage (Virg. Æn. iv. 348). Libycæ pectus, an ivory quill. Scaliger understands it of the citron or lote tree, but improperly (Virg. Cir. 179). De Libycis arvis, from the Libyan threshing floors, i. e. the whole grain of Libya or Africa (Hor. A. l. 10). Libycum Mæcæ (Flor. iii. 6). Libycus mons, the boundary of Egypt on the west (Herod. ii. 8). Libycus sol, a vertical sun.

Libya, m. f. a ship captured by the Romans, in an engagement with the Carthaginians off Sicily, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 577).

Libyphenices, um, m. a people of Byzantium, of whom little is known. Their name occurs in Livius (xxi. 22 seq.).

Libys, os, m. one of the sailors who carried off Bacchus from Naxos, v. Naia, Naxia, and were turned into seamsters (Ov. Met. iii. 617).

Libyssa, æ, f. a village of Bithynia, at which Hannibal was buried (Aurel. Vic. Vir. II. 42). From Appianus there appears to have been a district in Bithynia called Libyssa terra from the river Libyssa q. v. (Ap. Bel. Syr. 92).

Libyssa, i. m. a river of Bithynia, which ran in a southern direction and fell into Propontis, the Sea of Marmora (Ap. Bel. Syr. 92).

Lichas, æ, m. the servant of Hercules, by whom Deianira sent to that hero the poisoned robe which occasioned his death. As soon as his person took fire, Hercules, enraged at Lichas, lifted him up, whirled him several times round, and cast him into the Euboean sea. In his fall, Lichas was changed into a rock which retains his name. From the nature of the business on which he was sent, Martialis calls him fallax Lichas (lx. 67).—2. A native of Thise, a town of Boeotia, killed by Hippomedon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 291).

Licinius, v. Licinianus, i. m. a native of Bithynia, a town of Hispania, Spain, to whom Martialis addresses one of his epigrams (l. 50).

Licinia, æ, f. a woman of noble rank in Rome, who was tried, and, after giving surety, was, by her relations, put to death for poisoning her husband Claudius Asellus, 154 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 48).—2. A vestal virgin who, with Emilia and Marcia, was condemned for incest in 116 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 63).—3. Sister of Licinius Varro Murena, and wife of Mæcenas (Hor. Od. ii. 12. 13). She is more frequently called Terentia.

Licinius, i. m. was the countryman and friend of the Roman emperor Galerius, to whom he bore a strong resemblance both in his military and general character. The cruelties and vices which form so considerable a part of his history need excite no surprise; although his inhumanity to the wife and son of his benefactor, can produce nothing in the mind of the reader but abhorrence. Galerius raised him at once to the rank of Augustus, and dying, recommended to his protection his wife and son. After the decease of that emperor, he remained master of most of the territories which had belonged to Galerius, and he married Constantia, sister of Constantinus. These two published an edict in favour of the Christians, and concerted measures for their mutual advantage. Licinius afterwards prosecuted the widow and son of his benefactor Galerius, besides in a few years he caused both to be put to death. After he had defeated Maximianus, a war broke out between him and Constantinus, which ended in a treaty of peace that lasted for eight years. The cruelty of his disposition again appeared in another persecution of the Christians, and, in a second war with Constantinus, the bravery of his opponent was crowned with a decisive victory, yet he granted to Licinius his life, fixing his residence at Thessalonica, Saloniki; but only a few months had elapsed when, in violation of his oath, he sent an order for his execution, and he was immediately strangled, about the year 325 (Entrop. x. 4—6).—2. A freedman of the emperor Augustus, who was to trade a barber, and by the sovereign appointed to an honourable station. To him Juvénalis is supposed to allude (Sat. i. 24), and Persius (Sat. ii. 36).

Licinius Cæcina, Licinii Cæcinæ, m. a man of senatorian dignity, who had a violent dispute with Epius Mæcellus q. c. (Tac. Hist. ii. 53).

Licinius Gábilius, Licinii Gábili, m. a man of prætorian rank, whom the revengeful spirit of Agrippina had driven into banishment, and whom her son Néro recalled after her death (Tac. Ann. xiv. 12).

Licinius Mæcer, Licinii Mæceri, m. a Roman historian, mentioned by Livius, whose writings, except a few fragments, are lost (iv. 7. ix. 46).

Licinius Mucianus, Licinii Muciani, m. a noble Roman, who had powerful friends, and a large fortune which he ruined in courting the favour of the great; on that account he gladly accepted a commission in the army then in Syria, both to obtain the means of subsistence, and to be removed from the capital, where he dreaded the anger of the emperor Claudius. Here he prevailed on the legions to swear allegiance to Vitellius whom he afterwards deserted, and entered into secret negotiations with Vespasianus. In concerting measures, he greatly surpassed Vespasianus, to whom he was much inferior as a soldier. Fond of magnificence, he oppressed the provinces where he commanded, and obtained an influence, which induced Vespasianus, after he became emperor, to treat him almost like an equal. On returning to Rome, he became sole arbiter, and, by his skill in negotiation, both thwarted his rivals, and overawed his enemies. He died before the emperor, after he had been thrice consul. He collected and published all the information which could be obtained, respecting the learning and eloquence of the most distinguished Romans towards the end of the republic. Plinius frequently mentions his observations on the history and geography of the east. All his writings have perished (Tac. Hist. i. 10 seq.).

Licinius Procilius, Licinii Procili, m. an intimate friend of the Roman emperor Otho, who reposed the greatest confidence in his fidelity. In time of peace, he discharged the duty of præfect of the prætorians with sufficient ability, but he had no experience in war, and, therefore, was unfit for the conquest of the Péninsule or Cottian Alps, to which command Otho appointed him in the year 69. Tacitus says he had talents for mischief, of which he gave sufficient proof at that period. His fidelity ranked with his military skill, for after being defeated he fled, and confessed that he had betrayed Otho (Tac. Hist. i. 40 seq.).

Licinius Sura, Licinii Sura, m. a friend of Martialis, whom he congratulates on regaining health, after a dangerous disease. From Plinius (Epis. iv. 30), as well as Martialis (vii. 46), he appears to have been a man of very great erudition.

Licinius Varro Murena, Licinii Varro Murena, m. was adopted by L. Terentius Varro, hence he assumed that name. He was the brother of Procilius, and Terentia, wife of Mæcenas. His turbulent and factious spirit stimulated him to oppose the measures of Augustus, and the admonitions of Horatius (Od. ii. 10) dissuading him from inordinate ambition, and hopeless despondency, proved ineffectual, for he entered into a conspiracy with Fannius Cæpio which, on being discovered, cost both their lives. He lost his whole property in the civil war; but the generosity of Procilius supplied to him and another brother the means of living happily, and respectably, had he been contented with a moderate, and not aspired at an immense fortune. He is supposed to be the same person whom Horatius mentions (Od. iii. 19. 11, and Sat. i. 5. 38). Adj. Licinius, et Licinianus, a, um.

A. Licinius Archias, A. Licinii Archias, m. a native of Antiochia, Antakie, who, after he had been presented with the freedom of several states in Greece, came to Sicily, which he left with L. Licinius Lucullus, accompanied him to Héraclea, and, through his influence, obtained the freedom of that city, on which he took the name of A. Licinius. Why he assumed the prænomen of Aulus, no ancient author states. Archias, his original name, he retained for his cognomen, a frequent practice with foreigners.

who obtained the rights of Roman citizens. His citizenship having been questioned, Cicero, formerly his pupil, and afterwards his intimate friend, defended him in a beautiful oration still extant. None of his poetical writings have been transmitted (Tac. Orat. 37).

A. Licinius Nerva, A. Licinii Nervæ, m. a tribune of the Roman people, in 180 B. C. After being sent a commissioner into Macedonia, he obtained the prætorship in 168 B. C. (Liv. xli. 6 seq.).

A. Licinius Nerva Silvanus, A. Licinii Nervæ Silvânî, m. son of P. Silius, was adopted into gens Licinia. In the year 7 he was consul. The historian, Velleius Paterculus, has expressed a very high opinion of his merits (ii. 116).

C. Licinius, C. Licinii, m. a tribune of the people, in 493 B. C., when the commons revolted, and a reconciliation between them and the patricians was effected by Mænius Agrippa q. r. Licinius and his colleague, L. Albinus, elected other three, and from this period the tribunes of the people were invested with inviolable privileges (Liv. ii. 33).—2. A tribune of the soldiers with consular power, in 377 B. C. P. Mænius, dictator, ten years after, appointed him master of the horse, and he was the first plebeian who held that office (Liv. vi. 31—39).—3. A Roman ambassador sent to Carthage, in 220 B. C., to inquire whether Hannibal had attacked Saguntum of his own accord, or by order of the senate. Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus was the chief of that embassy (Liv. xxi. 18).

C. Licinius Calvus, C. Licinii Calvi, m. a Roman poet of great elegance, taste, and genius, who lived in friendship with the poet Catullus. Nor did he only excel in poetry, since both Quintilianus and Seneca assert, that he disputed the palm of eloquence with Cicero. The last commends his iambics. Against Caesar and Pompeius he wrote with severity; nor can it be denied that the characters of both furnished too many subjects for the pen of the satirist. His writings are lost (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 49. Hor. Sat. i. 10. 19).

C. Licinius Crassus, C. Licinii Crassi, m. obtained the office of city prætor, in 175 B. C., when he repaired the fleet by order of the senate, and enlisted Roman citizens to man some of the ships for the Macedonian war. In the battle at Callinicus, P. Licinius Crassus, consul, his brother, gave him the command of the right wing, which consisted of the whole Italian cavalry, intermixed with light infantry. In 170 B. C., he obtained the consulship, when Gallia fell to his lot, where he performed nothing memorable, which superstition would impute to his having neglected the auspices; yet the senate continued him in command. His public character terminated with his being appointed one of the ten commissioners to regulate the affairs of Macedonia, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 9 seq.).

C. Licinius Hæpelmæchus, C. Licinii Hæpelmæchî, m. obtained an interdict from the prætor to prevent his father from spending part of his property; and, soon after, became penniless (Val. Max. viii. 6).

C. Licinius Lucullus, C. Licinii Lucullî, m. a tribune who proposed the law for the creation of triumphal epulones q. r. and himself was in the first election. With another he dedicated a temple to Juvénitas, the goddess of youth, in the great circus, 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).

C. Licinius Mæcer, C. Licinii Mæcri, m. a Roman of prætorian rank, who was accused of extortion, and put himself to death, about 69 B. C. (Val. Max. ix. 12).

C. Licinius Murenæ, C. Licinii Murenæ, m. held the office of deputy-governor of Gallia, France, at the time Cætilina attempted the execution of his plot for the subversion of the government of Rome, and secured a number of the rebels whom, after convicting, agreeably to a decree of the senate, he imprisoned (Sal. Cat. 42).

C. Licinius Nerva, C. Licinii Nervæ, m. an ambassador appointed to carry the intelligence to Rome, that the Illyrians had been defeated, and their king, Gentius, taken prisoner, in 170 B. C. Licinius afterwards obtained the command of the garrisons in Rhizæ and Olcinium q. r. When prætor, he obtained the south of Spain for his province. In 169 B. C. Licinius, with Quinctius Flamininus and M. Cæcilius Ræbilus, was appointed to conduct the Thracian ambassadors to their native country (Liv. xlv. 3—42).

C. Licinius Sacerdos, C. Licinii Sacerdotis, m. a knight whom Africanus the younger, when censor, charged with perjury, and offered to bear evidence to that effect. On no person appealing to prosecute, Africanus ordered him to take his horse, lest he should seem to have performed the triple office of accuser, witness, and judge (Val. Max. iv. 1).

C. Licinius Stolo, C. Licinii Stolonis, m. a plebeian of considerable eminence, who married the younger daughter of M. Fabius Ambustus, who was mortified at becoming the wife of a man into whose house neither honour nor influence could enter. To lessen her uneasiness, her father promised that, in a short time, she should see in her own house the honours which at present she saw in that of her sister, the wife of Ser. Sulpicius. The period seemed favourable for innovations, on account of the immense burden of debt. The plebeians had gained one important step, the election of tribunes, an office which Licinius easily obtained as a preparatory measure for procuring a law, that plebeians should be eligible to the consulship. Accordingly Licinius, with the aid of his colleague, L. Sextius, proposed several laws advantageous to the plebeians, but injurious to the patricians. One enacted, that whatever sum had been paid as interest should be deducted from the principal, and that the remainder should be discharged in three years at three equal instalments. A second enacted, that no one should possess more than five hundred acres of land; and a third, that there should be no more military tribunes, and that one of the consuls must of necessity be a plebeian. The patricians refused to pass these laws, at which the plebeians, offended, re-elected for five successive years the same two tribunes, who prevented the election of all the curule magistrates. At last the patricians yielded, and Licinius obtained the consulship in 363 B. C., the first plebeian who held that office. Three years after, he was re-elected, but this honour, which he no doubt considered a triumph over the patricians, was sullied by his being condemned upon his own law, for holding more than five hundred acres of land, and for attempting to evade that law by manumitting his son (Liv. vi. 34 seq.). In con. cal., his name is written C. Licinius Cælius Stolo.

L. Licinius, L. Licinii, m. a prætor who led out from the senatehouse C. Valerius Flaccus, flamen of Jupiter, who claimed a seat in the senatehouse as an ancient privilege of his priesthood, in 211 B. C. The senate afterwards assented to the claim of the flamen (Liv. xxvii. 8).

L. Licinius Crassus, L. Licinii Crassi, m. when censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, in 95 B. C., formed a regulation against Latin rhetoricians, considering that that kind of instruction had an injurious effect upon the youth (Gel. xv. 11).

L. Licinius Lucullus, L. Licinii Luculli, m. a curule edile in 204 B. C. To Licinius blame was attached from some of the inferior officers of the ediles having stolen money from the treasury (Liv. xxx. 39).—2. Consul and his colleague, A. Postumius Albinus, were thrown into prison by the tribunes of the people, 153 B. C., because they would not exempt from warfare some of their friends at their request. The Roman arms, under Licinius, compelled to subjection the Væceci, Cântabri, and other nations previously unknown. He took by storm Intercatia (Liv. Ep. 43).—3. A Roman of uncommon abilities, great military knowledge, and an ardent love of literature, but of excessive luxury. He excelled in eloquence, philosophy, and all the liberal arts. In the Marsian war, the success of his enterprises not only attracted the notice, but commanded the admiration, of L. Cornélius Sûlla, from whom he received both honour and distinction. When questor in Asia, and prætor in Africa, he secured the love and esteem of all with whom he had intercourse, by his justice, kindness, and prudence. In 76 B. C., he obtained the consulship with M. Aurelius Cotta, and having been appointed commander against Mithridates, he relieved his colleague whom the enemy had pent up in Chalcædônia. On the banks of Granicus, the Onstrola, he defeated the forces of Mithridates, whom he compelled to quit his kingdom, conquered Bithynia, and gained important victories at sea. Anticipating the flight of that monarch to his father-in-law Tigranes, king of Arménia, Licinius, by forced marches, crossed the Euphrates before Mithridates came up, overpowered the numerous forces of the Armenian king, and took his capital Tigranocerta, by which the greater part of the royal treasures fell into his hands. The sternness of his command, added to the haughtiness of his deportment, lost him the favour of the army, and the senate appointed Cn. Pompeius Magnus to succeed him. The triumph which his military success more than merited, was with difficulty obtained. Received with coldness by his fellow-citizens, and probably disgusted at their ingratitude, he retired to the country, where, banishing from his mind all care of public matters, he spent his time in study, and in conversation with the learned. According to Aurélius Victor, the powers of his mind became impaired, so that he required to be under the management of another, and was committed to the charge of his brother Marcus (Vir. Il. 74.). He had a most extensive and valuable library, accessible to the inspection of all who wished either to examine or peruse the numerous writings which it contained. His unbounded extravagance and immoderate luxury, have been censured with merited severity by Roman authors, and cannot be referred to without deep regret, when attached to the character of a man, whose splendid talents might have placed him on a level with the first characters of the Roman state.

Besides being a perfect master of his native tongue, he had a thorough knowledge of the Greek language, in which he wrote a history of the Mærsi in Hexameter verse, a work now lost. Cicero, in whose writings his name often occurs, has extolled his merit and transactions with his usual felicity of language, and elegance of description. He was married to a sister of Mætelus Numidicus, and died at the age of sixty-seven. His remains were privately interred by his brother in his own lands at Tusculum, in opposition to the wish of the people, who honoured his memory, by offering to bury him magnificently in Cæmpus Martius. Archias sang his praises, and those of his relations, in a Greek poem, of which no fragment now remains. To him Phædrus refers (ii. 5), Atq. Lucullæus, Lucullianus, et, Lucullianus, a. um. Lucullæum marmor, black marble with white or coloured spots. Plinius says it was found on an island in the Nile (v. 289). Luculliani horti (Tac. Ann. xi. 32). Lucullana cæcina.

L. Licinius Murena, L. Licinii Murenæ, m. was the colleague of D. Junius Sullus, in the consulship, 64 B. C. (Eutrop. vi. 16). When lieutenant-general, he defeated the Mærsi, and afterwards renewed the war against Mithridates (Liv. Ep. 76 seq.).

L. Licinius Pöllio, L. Licinii Pöllionis, m. one of the three deputies appointed by the Roman senate to wait on the consul Quintus Crispinus, who had been wounded in an engagement with Hannibal, and could not go to Rome to hold the elections, 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 29).

M. Licinius, M. Licinii, m. a military tribune, killed in an engagement with Hannibal, in which M. Claudius Mærcellus, consul, fell, in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 12).

M. Licinius Crassus, M. Licinii Crassi, m. a Roman who would not permit an aqueduct to be brought through his grounds, in 181 B. C. (Liv. xl. 51).—2. Surnamed Dives, on account of his prodigious wealth, was, in early life, very poor, but, by trafficking in slaves, and by other dishonourable practices, soon acquired great riches. To escape the cruelties of Cinna, he fled to Spain, where he had formerly passed some years with his father, when governor of that country; and remained eight months concealed in a cave. On hearing of Cinna's death, he raised 2,500 men, for whom he procured shipping, sailed to Africa, and attached himself to Mætelus Pius. The friendship of Crassus with Mætelus was not of long continuance. He then formed an alliance with Sûlla, and was of great service to him in the civil war. The military talents of Crassus were greatly inferior to those of Pompeius, who, on that account, necessarily stood higher in the favour of Sulla. Hence the enmity of these two powerful citizens, which all the address and eloquence of Caesar could scarcely subdue. The great object of Crassus seems to have been the accumulation of wealth. Besides buying the estates of the proscribed, he had recourse to other base and scandalous means in order to increase his overgrown fortune. Crassus was not, however, destitute of bravery or generosity. He was honoured with an ovation for putting an end to hostilities with Spartacus by a decisive engagement, in which 12,000 of the slaves were killed. In that war, for cowardice, he decimated the legions, and four thousand were thus put to death (Ap. Bel. Civ. 425). It was not unusual with him to lend money to his friends without interest. After entertaining the populace at 10,000 tables, giving to every citizen corn to support him for three months, and consecrating the tenth part of his property to Hercules, he was worth 7,100 talents. He used to say that no man, who could not maintain an army, ought to be called rich. His slaves, whom he had ingenuity enough to employ so profitably that they not only defrayed their own expenses, but added greatly to the wealth of their master, were in number equal to an army. With the view of making himself perpetual dictator, he entered with C. Julius Caesar, into a conspiracy, to which the consuls elect became parties. As many of the senators were to be massacred as was necessary to give them the complete command of the government. Compunction on the part of Crassus prevented the execution of this design (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 9). A reconciliation between Crassus and Pompeius was, at last, effected by Caesar. The iniquitous combination of these three men to destroy the liberties of their fellow-citizens, was called the first triumvirate. Less solicitous for honour than riches, Crassus, in this division of the empire, chose Syria for his province, in expectation of making large additions to his fortune. Without the authority of the senate, he crossed the Euphrates, the El-Frat, and advanced against Parthia. But he was deceived by Artabanus, an Arabian, defeated by the Parthians, and his army nearly annihilated. He then fled with a small number of his soldiers to Carræ, a town of Mesopotamia, Jezirah, and was prevailed on to meet Surêna, on pretence of negotiating a peace, where he was treacherously put to death. Eutropius says nothing of treachery, but states that he fought against both the omens and auspices, and having been conquered by the commander of the forces of Orôdes, was killed with his son, a very distinguished and excellent youth. The Parthians cut off his head and right hand in 56 B. C. and, in contempt of his avarice, poured melted gold into his mouth. It appears that part of his army settled in that country, married Parthian wives and joined their armies, on which account Horace considered them unworthy of being restored to their country. The bond of union between Pompeius and Caesar, which had been greatly weakened by the death of Julia, was finally dissolved by that of Crassus. They had now recourse to arms, and their struggles for the superiority terminated in the final extinction of Roman liberty. By Crassus, Juvénalis means M. Licinius Crassus and his son, P. Licinius Crassus, who both fell in the Parthian war, which the former had excited (Sat. xi. 108). To him Sallustius alludes (Cat. 17). Adj. Crassianus, a. m. Crassiana clades (Flor. iv. 4).—3. Carried on war against the Bactria, Media, and Thræces (Liv. Ep. 134, 135).—4. The colleague of L. Culpurnius Piso in the consulship, in the year 27 (Tac. Ann. iv. 62).—5. A Roman consul who had for his colleague C. Licinius Bassus in the year 64 (Tac. Ann. xv. 33). In con. cal. he is surnamed Frugi.—6. Husband of Seribônia, and father of P. Licinius. Tacitus writes M. Crassus (Hist. i. 14).

M. Licinius Lucullus, M. Licinii Luculli, m. prætor pægrinus, in 188 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 6—8).—2. Cousin, according to Eutropius, of L. Licinius Lucullus, who was consul in 76 B. C., and carried on war against Mithridates with success. To M. Licinius Lucullus, the government of Macedonia was given that year, and he marched against the Thracians as far as Tanais, the Don, and Palus Marotis, the Sea of Azoph, which Florus considers as the boundary of that nation on the east. According to this historian, he acted with the greatest cruelty, and made those nations suffer all the severity of fire and sword, which he aggravated by cutting off the hands of the people, so that they remained monuments of his barbarity, and of Roman vengeance (liv. 4).—3. Son of L. Licinius Lucullus, joined the republican forces under Brutus and Cassius, for which reason M. Antonius put him to death (Vol. Max. iv. 7).

M. Licinius Strabo, M. Licinii Strabonis, m. a military tribune of the third legion, who fell in battle with the Istri, in 180 B. C. (Liv. xli. 2). See A. Mianlus.

P. Licinius Calvus, P. Licinii Calvi, m. was elected a military tribune with consular authority in 399 B. C., when an old man, and also an old senator. He was the first plebeian who obtained that office, in which he conducted himself peacefully; and had the honour of being chosen a second time without being candidate; but he declined accepting, and his countrymen complied with his request, by conferring the appointment on his son, who was of the same name (Liv. v. 12—20).

P. Licinius Crassus, P. Licinii Crassi, m. stood candidate for the office of pontifex maximus when very young, and gained it over M. Fulvius Flaccus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, both men of great eminence, and had twice held the consulship. For a hundred and twenty years, no person had been appointed pontifex maximus, who had not sat in a curule chair, except P. Cornelius Cælus. At the request of the senate, M. Claudius Marcællus named Q. Fulvius Flaccus, then besieging Cæpæ, dictator, and he named C. Licinius Crassus, pontifex maximus, master of the horse. Both of these nominations were in obedience to an order of the people. Licinius next was made censor, afterwards foreign prætor, and consul in 207 B. C., when he obtained the territory of the Bruttii as his province, without having recourse to the lots. Here, a severe disease rendered the army unfit for service, and he did not escape the disorder himself. The senate continued him in command, and he united his forces with those of the consul, after which they engaged in battle with Hannibal, routed his army, killing upwards of four thousand, and putting the rest to flight. His opinions and conduct had great influence with his countrymen, from the former indicating a strong judgment, and the latter proceeding from rectitude of principle. He died in 185 B. C., having retained the office of pontifex maximus to the end of life. From nature and fortune he enjoyed, says Livius, every advantage; the descendant of a noble family, of great wealth, of uncommon personal beauty, and bodily strength. His eloquence was prompt and forcible, which enabled him either to oppose or support with singular effect. To the consulship he was indebted for the acquisition of military fame, and his knowledge of the pontifical law entitled him to prescribe every kind of observance without opposition. To the people, a largess of flesh was distributed at his funeral, a hundred and twenty gladiators fought, funeral games were celebrated during three days, and, after the games, was a public feast. In his room were chosen C. Servilius Geminus, pontifex maximus, and M. Semprius Tuditanus, pontifex; hence it appears, that he held two offices (Liv. xxv. 5 seq.).—2. Was elected praetor in 179 B. C., and the south of Spain next year became his province; but he gave a solemn oath in the public assembly, that certain annual sacrifices prevented his going from home, the only excuse which the Roman law could have sustained for not performing the duties of his office. Six years after, he obtained the consulship, when the war against Persæus fell to his lot. After having performed the usual solemnities in the capital, he set out for Greece, not without anxious reflections on the nature of the war, which he was to conduct; or on the talents and resources of the prince, against whom he had to contend. After overcoming the difficulties of a long march through a rough and mountainous tract, where the enemy might have easily obstructed, or, at least, annoyed him in his passage, he arrived on Peneus, the Salampria, where he received auxiliaries from all the states of Greece, besides a strong force under Eumenes and his brother Attalus. Persæus soon brought on a general action, in which the Romans were routed, and the war might have been terminated, had the Macedonian king followed up the advantage which he had gained. In place of pursuing the routed enemy, he sounded a retreat, nor did he even attempt the day following, to prevent the Romans crossing the river, by which he might have repaired his former error. Next morning he became sensible of the opportunities which he had lost, which induced him to yield to the advice of his friends, who recommended his suing for peace. The consul refused to treat with him except on this condition, that he should refer both himself and his country to the determination of the senate. The severity of the terms, added to the inflexibility of Licinius, impressed the king's mind with considerable dejection, believing that the answer proceeded from a consciousness of Roman strength. This idea excited him to renew his application with greater earnestness, and he offered a large sum of money to the consul, which the latter refused with disdain. Persæus then formed the design of burning the Roman camp, which he might have easily accomplished, had not information been communicated to the commander-in-chief, who adopted measures by which the execution was rendered impracticable. The success of Persæus against a large foraging party, raised the spirits of the Macedonian troops; but the timely arrival of a reinforcement from the Roman camp produced an opposite effect, by gaining an important advantage, after which he retired to his winter quarters in deep dejection. The conduct of Licinius, as well as that of the praetor C. Lucrætius Gællus, was marked with uncommon cruelty and avarice; yet it does not appear, from the pages of Livius, that the senate or people instituted any inquiry into the general behaviour of Licinius whilst he was commander-in-chief in Greece. On the contrary, he was appointed, four years after, an ambassador to mediate a peace between Eumenes and the Gallægræci (Liv. xli. 14—xlv. 34). The narrative of Eutropius agrees, in substance, with that of Livius (iv. 6). Justinus has by mistake Sulpicius (xxxiii. 1).—3. (Surnamed in con. cal. Dives Mucianus), was elected consul with L. Valerius Flaccus, in 133 B. C., marched against Aristonicus, a reputed son of Eumenes, king of Asia. At that time, Licinius held the office of pontifex maximus, and was the first pontifex maximus who went beyond the boundaries of Italy. Several kings supplied him with auxiliary troops, notwithstanding of which that usurper defeated him, and he was killed in the battle. The consul's head was carried to the conqueror, and his body interred at Smyrna (Eutrop. iv. 20. Liv. Ep. 59). Florus says Aristonicus made him prisoner, and put him in confinement; but that, mindful of his family and the Roman name, Licinius wished to die, and accomplished his own destruction by depriving his keeper of sight with a rod, which so enraged the barbarian that he slew him (ii. 20).—4. A Roman who, in the civil war, transfixed himself with his own sword, after L. Cornélius Cinna, and C. Marius had slain his son by the cavalry of C. Flavius Fimbria, that he might not suffer any thing unbecoming his character (Liv. Ep. 80).

P. Licinius Gællienus. See Gællienus.

P. Licinius Lucullus, P. Licinia Luculli, m. a tribune of the people, who, with L. Annius, formed the design of continuing in office beyond the time limited by law, and persisted in this encroachment, in opposition to their colleagues. During the contest, which continued for a whole year, no assembly was held for the election of magistrates (Sak. Jug. 37).

P. Licinius Tégula, P. Licinii Tégula, m. composed a hymn to be sung through Rome, by thrice nine virgins, by order of the decenvirs, in consequence of the many monstrous births, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 12).

P. Licinius Valerianus, P. Licinii Valeriani, m. succeeded to the Roman empire, in the year 253, having, like most of his successors, as well as many of his predecessors, previously held a high command in the army. He was a man of noble birth, whose excellence of character procured him universal respect. His accession to the throne was hailed with the sincere congratulations of all orders of the state. Every office which he held added to his fame, by the able and conscientious manner in which he discharged its duties. Nor did the splendour of imperial authority, or the applause of the nation, inspire him with a single sentiment either of vanity or pride. The reader of his life regrets to find that the qualities of his head fell so far beneath the qualities of his heart. Had moral excellence, right intention, and benevolent dispositions constituted a great prince, perhaps few, if any, of the Roman emperors, would have stood higher than Vălerianus. Dominions of so great extent, assailed by numerous and powerful foreign enemies, and often embroiled by internal commotions, required firmness of courage, activity of execution, a knowledge of the human heart, and a prudent distrust of the stratagems of the insidious, qualities which Vălerianus did not possess. On the contrary, to a feeble judgment he added a wavering unsteadiness, defects which, in the head of a great empire, would most probably have occasioned misfortunes and disasters, unless in very peaceful and settled times. At this deplorable period, the whole northern boundary was assailed by Germans, Goths, and Scythians, whilst the Persians had made inroads on the provinces of the east. Against the last, Vălerianus marched, having created his son, Găllienus, Augustus, and invested him with equal authority, whom he sent against the Gauls. Having repaired the city Antiochia, he advanced to relieve Odessa, which Săpor then besieged, and, crossing Euphrates, El-Frat, he came to an engagement with that monarch, and experienced a severe defeat. Intimidated by the unsuccessful result of this battle, Vălerianus sued for peace, which Săpor refused, unless on a personal interview with the emperor. Săpor's intention was to get Vălerianus in his power, which the credulity of the monarch rendered not only practicable, but easy. In their first interview, Săpor made him prisoner, loaded him with chains, as a proof of his servitude, arrayed him in imperial purple, to attract the gaze of the multitude, and aggravated the misery of Vălerianus, by compelling him to stoop, that he might use his neck in mounting his horse. To this degradation Săpor added insulting language, carried him constantly in his retinue, and took every opportunity of embittering his sufferings. Vălerianus fell into the hands of his enemy in the year 260, and lingered three, others say nine, years in miserable captivity. After death had freed him from insult and slavery, Săpor ordered his body to be flayed, and his skin, which he painted red, stuffed so as to preserve the human form, and hung it up in a temple, as a monument of his victory over the Romans. Găllienus made no effort to rescue his father, to whom this want of filial affection must have been nearly as distressing as the contemptuous rudeness of Săpor. In behalf of the captive emperor, only a single appeal was made to Săpor, and that too by a foreigner, Odénathus q. v. (Eutrop. ix. 7).

P. Licinius Vărus, P. Licinij Vări, m. a curule edile, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6).

Sextus Licinius, Sexti Licinij, m. a Roman senator thrown from the Tarpeian rock, in 89 B. C., by order of Mărtius, the very day on which he entered on his seventh consulship (Liv. Ep. 80). Velleius Păterculus mentions one of this name, who had been a tribune of the people, and next year was thrown from the Tarpeian rock, by the agency of P. Păpillus Lănas (ii. 24).

Sp. Licinius, Sp. Licinij, m. a tribune of the people, in 481 B. C., who undertook to obstruct the preparations for war, unless the patricians agreed to the Agrarian law. The odium excited by this turbulent tribune recoiled on himself, nor did the consuls unite their efforts against him with greater zeal, than did his own colleagues, by whose assistance the levies were completed (Liv. ii. 43).

Lictor, ōris, m. a lictor. Rômulus, the first king of Rome, appointed twelve lictors who constantly attended him. According to some, he made choice of that number from the birds which portended to him the kingdom being twelve; Lăvius is of opinion that he imitated the Etrusci, whose king was jointly chosen by twelve states, and each state gave him one lictor. The dăcuviri had twelve lictors each, hence the historian says they filled the forum with their lictors. The consuls had the same number of attendants, and it appears from Lăvius, that they preceded the consul, walking singly behind each other. The first was called prămus lictor, and the last prăximus lictor, i. e. prăximus consilij lictor. He was sometimes designated postrămus, or, summus, lictor. The last epithet indicated his office, that he received and executed the commands of the magistrate. The lictors are supposed to have derived their name from the verb ligăre, because they bound the hands and legs of criminals, before they scourged or beat them with rods. On their shoulders they carried rods tied together with a thong, called făsces, and in the middle of this bundle an axe, hence făsces et secures. As attendants on the chief magistrates, their duty was to remove the crowd, or any incumbrance, which might obstruct the consul, and when they arrived at his house, or that of any other person, a lictor knocked at the door with his rod. To this circumstance, inconsiderable in itself, the eligibility of a plebeian to the consulship must be referred. The removal of the crowd or other hinderance implied that the lictors observed, if the proper marks of respect were paid to the supreme magistrates. See Cōsules. The execution of the sentence, pronounced by the consul, fell to the lot of the lictors, whether it was scourging, beheading, or hanging. This part of their duty would necessarily prevent people of respectability, however poor, from accepting the office. In general they were either the lowest of the common people, or freedmen (Liv. i. 8 seq.).

Licymola, ae, f. a slave who became the mother of Hălenor by a king of Măconia (Virg. Aen. ix. 546).

Licymnius, i, m. brother of Alcmenă, whom Hămărus calls a branch of Mars (Il. ii. 663). His name likewise occurs in the odes of Pindărus.

Lida, ae, m. a mountain of Căria (Herod. i. 175).

Ligănus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, who cut off the left hand of Quirinus in the battle between Hănnibal and the Romans at the foot of the Alps. From his name, he appears to have been a Gaul (Să. Ital. iv. 206).

Ligus, i, m. a Cretan, son of Iqlis, and father of a child called by the same name, who was born a girl and afterwards changed by Isis into a man. His anxiety for a son induced his wife Telchusa to practise this deception. See Iphis and Telchusa.

Ligēa, æ, f. a nymph, one of the attendants of Cyrene (Virg. G. iv. 336). Her name has been derived from lyra, melodious.

Liger, ēris, m. a man by whom Emathion was killed (Virg. Æn. ix. 571).—2. The brother of Lucius, both of whom fell by the hand of Æneas (Virg. Æn. x. 576 seq.).—3. An augur in the Roman army, who foretold, on Hannibal's crossing the Alps, that he would tyrannise in Italy for sixteen years (Sil. Ital. iv. 120).

Ligeris, is, r. Liger, ēris, acc. in, abl. i., m. the Loire, a large river of Gallia, France, which takes its rise in the country of the Helvi, in Cevenna, Cevennes, runs N. N. W., and, after a course of 540 miles, falls into Oceanus Cantabricus, the Bay of Biscay. According to the division of that country, made by Augustus, the Loire was the northern boundary of Aquitania. Placida unda Ligeris (Luc. Phar. i. 439). Tibullus calls the water of this river carulæa, sea green, from its forming an estuary at its mouth (i. 7. 12).

Ligii, v. Ligii, orum, m. the Ligians, a numerous people of Germany, who seem to have occupied part of the country now called Poland, and Silesia (Tac. Ann. xii. 29).

Liguria, æ, f. formerly Lombardy, now Genoa, Piedmont, Parma, &c., a country of Italy, between the rivers Varus, the Var, and Macra, the Magra, in Gallia Cispadana, which formed the one part of Gallia Citerior, Cisalpina, v. Togata, as Gallia Transpadana did the other. Iah, Ligures, um (Sing. Ligus, v. Ligur, ūris), m. (Luc. Phar. i. 442), excelled in running; Pernix Ligus (Sil. Ital. viii. 605). They were called Ligyes, by the Greeks. Of the Ligurians there were various tribes, as Alpini Ligures, Apuani Ligures, Ingauni Ligures, Ilvates Ligurum. Ligustis, idos, f. Ligurian, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Ligustinus, Liguscus, Ligurnus, Ligustinus, et, Ligusticus, a, um. Stius Ligusticus, the Gulf of Genoa. Ligustinus oger (Liv. xlii. 4). Ligustica saxa, marble (Juv. Sat. iii. 257). Ligusticum scutum, appears to have differed from the Roman shield (Liv. xlii. 35).

Ligurius, i, m. a man mentioned by Horatius (Od. iv. 1. 33). The same poet addresses to him one of his odes (iv. 10); but nothing further of his history is known.—2. A poet whom every person shunned, from perpetually repeating his own verses. Martialis ridicules him in three of his epigrams (iii. 44 seq.).

Ligurius, i, m. a man mentioned by Cæcilius (xvii. 19). The meaning of this word has been disputed.

Ligurra, æ, m. a man who pretended to be afraid lest Martialis should write epigrams against him; but the poet assures him that he is unworthy of his notice (xii. 62).

Ligus, ūris, m. a man drowned in Trebia, the Trebia (Sil. Ital. iv. 591).

Sp. Ligustinus, Sp. Ligustini, m. a Roman, who made a very judicious speech, related his own origin, history, and character, recommended obedience on the part of the soldiers to the orders of the senate and consul, and his advice had the effect of inducing the centurions to enlist without hesitation. For the propriety and merit of his behaviour, the military tribunes appointed him first centurion of the first legion (Liv. xlii. 34. 35).

Lilæa, æ, f. one of the Nais, the daughter of Cephissus, the Macroeris (Paus. x. 33).

Lilæa, æ, f. a city of Phœcis, near the sources of Cephissus, the Macroeris, which, according to Pausanias, had its name from Lilæa, a daughter of that river. It appears to have been a very considerable town at the period when the author above-mentioned wrote (x. 33). Homærus mentions this city (Il. ii. 523), and Statius (Th. vii. 348).

Lilæus, i, m. a man whose hands were cut off as he attempted to hold the ship of Mircellus, in a naval engagement off Sicily, between the Carthaginians and Romans, during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiv. 489).

Lilybæum, v. Lilybæum, i, n. Marsalia, a town of Sicily, Sicily, on a promontory of the same name, the Cape of Marsalia, likewise called Cape Boeo, a supposed corruption of the ancient name, the most westerly point of that island. It was taken from the Carthaginians by the Romans in 250 B. C. (Flor. ii. 2). The legs of the giant Typhoeus were, according to Ovidius, buried below this promontory (Met. v. 351). Nobilis Lilybæum (Sil. Ital. xiv. 75). Adj. Lilybæus, Lilybæus, et, Lilybætinus, a, um. Dura Lilybæa ræda, the dangerous shoals of Cape Boeo. These rocks extend three miles into the sea, and are only covered by four feet and a half of water, hence Virgil calls them dura, i. e. periculosa (Æn. iv. 706). Lilybæum litus (Luc. Phar. iv. 588).

Limeas, v. Limeas, et, Limeæ. See Obliet.

Limigantes, ium, m. a Sarmatian nation, originally slaves, who expelled their masters, and took possession of the country which was of difficult access. After they had been conquered by the Romans, enraged at their perfidy and rebellion, Constantius put them all to the sword (Amm. Mar. xvii. 13 seq.).

Limnea, æ, f. Loutrachi, a town of Thessaly, which was attacked by Philippos, king of Mæcedonia, in 193 B. C., but surrendered on the arrival of the Roman consul Mælius Acilius Glabrio (Liv. xxxvi. 13 seq.).

Limnæte, es, f. a daughter of the river Ganges, said to have been mother of Atys (Ov. Met. v. 48).

Limnætis, idis, f. a surname of Diana worshipped under this appellation by the Lacedæmonians and Messenians. The derivation of this term is uncertain; it has been referred to her presiding over roads and gates, to Limnea, a village, otherwise called Amycle, and to a marsh (Limnæ) (Tac. Ann. iv. 43).

Limnœa, æ, f. one of the Nereids (Homer. Il. xviii. 41).

Limon, ōnis, m. the name of a farm or estate of Pöllio Felix (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 82).

Limonium, i, n. afterwards Pictōnes, now Poitiers, the capital of the Pictōnes.

Limyra. See Lymira.

Lindus, i, f. Lindo, a town of Rhodus, built, according to Silius Italicus, by Tlepölemus, a son of Hércules (iii. 364). In ancient times Rhodus had three very celebrated towns, Lindus, Ialysus, Neocastro, and Camirus, Camiro, hence it was called Tripolis. Clëobulus, one of the seven wise men, was a native of Lindus. Inh. Lindil, orūm (Sing. Lindius, i). m. Adj. Lindius, a, um. Lindus Clēdūlus (Auson. eccl. 16).

Lingōes, um (Sing. Lingon, ōnis), m. a people of Gallia, France, whose territories included Vogēsus, Vange, consequently the sources of the rivers Mōsa, the Meuse, and Mātrōna, the Marne. Their chief town was Andōmadūnum, v. Andōmatūnum, afterwards Lingōes, now Langres (Cæs. B. G. i. 26 seq.). They were a warlike nation, and fought with painted arms, hence Lūcānus, Pūgnāces pictis cōhibebant Līngōnas armis (Phar. i. 398). Mārtiālis frequently mentions their making of woollen stuffs (xi. 57 gc.). Adj. Lingōnicus, a, um. Lingōnicō comitē (Claud. xxiv. 94).—2. A people in the north of Italy, who crossed the Alps by the Penine pass, in conjunction with the Līgūres went over the Po in rafts, and expelled the Etrurians and Umbrians, of whose country they took possession, but confined themselves within the Apennines (Liv. v. 35).

Lingos, i, m. Popingo, a ridge of mountains which belonged to Epīrus, and which separated between Mācēdōnia and Thēssālīa (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Linus, i, m. son of Apōllō and the muse Urānia (Hyg. 161); Apōllōdōrus makes him the brother of Orphēus, says that he taught Hērclēs to play upon the harp, and that, using his privilege as a preceptor, he had whipt the hero, who, enraged at the indignity, killed him with his own harp. According to Pausānias, the wrath of Hērclēs was excited by Linus ridiculing the awkward manner in which he held the musical instrument. Both these authors agree as to the fact, that the teacher was killed by the scholar. The latter mentions two of this name, one a son of Apōllō, a poet of great antiquity; another, son of Amphīlārus and Urānia, who excelled all in music, and who was killed by Apōllō, because he considered himself as a superior musician to that god. He adds, that the Thebans assert, that there was another Linus, born at a later period, the son of Ismēnus. According to this people, the last was the preceptor of Hērclēs, and fell by his hand. The Theban Linus, some say, invented several of the letters (Tac. Ann. xi. 14). From Pausānias we learn, that Linus the second had a statue on Hēlicon, to which certain rites were annually paid, before sacrifice was offered to the muses.—2. A man in the army of Adrastus, whom Hypseus slew in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 254).—3. A man of prodigious size, and proportionate strength, who could carry seven or eight boys on each arm (Mart. v. 12). Perhaps he is the person mentioned by the same poet; but giving his character in a different point of view (xii. 49). It is, however, more probable, that the latter was a different man, as there is no point in which the one resembles the other.

Lipārē, es, v. Lipārā, es, et, Lipārē, arum, f. Lipari, the largest of that cluster of islands which lie between Itālīa, Italy, and Sicīlīa, Sicily. They were anciently called Æolīe islands, and now, from this island, the Lipari, or Liparēan islands. On Lipari is a small town of the same name, situated on a rock, and defended by a fort. Claudīanus describes it thus, Ignipūstaque gemit Lipārē fumōsa cavernis (vii. 196). Nine of the Carthaginian quinquerēmes arrived here in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 49). Inh. Lipārēnses, ion (Sing. Lipārēnsis, is), et, Lipārītāni, orūm, m. In the early ages they seem to have been pirates. From Pausānias it appears the Liparēans were a colony from Gnidus, that they first built a town on Pāchynus q. v., from which they were expelled by the Elīmī and Phoenices, and then settled on these barren islands (x. 11). They took the ship which carried the Roman commissioners with the golden bowl for Apōllō at Dēlphī, Castri, in 893 B. C. (Liv. v. 28). Adj. Lipārēnsis, is, e, Lipārēus, v. Lipārēus, et, Lipārītānus, a, um. Lipārēnsis ager (Cic. Ver. iii. 37). Lipārēus Hēbrus (Hor. Od. iii. 12. 6). Lipārēa tēbēna, Liparēan shop, i. e. the smithy or forge of Vulcan (Juv. Sat. xiii. 45).

Līrīōpē, es, f. one of the Ocēanīdes, who, by the river Cēphīsus, was the mother of Nārcissus (Ov. Met. iii. 342).

Līris, is, m. a Trojan whom Cāmilla killed (Virg. Æn. xi. 670).

Līris, is, m. the Gargiliano, a river of Italy, which divides Lātium from Cāmpānia. Cluvērius says, it was anciently called Glānis and Glānis. It is broad towards the lower part, and winding under the shade of poplars through a beautiful valley, glides gently on to the sea. Claudīanus, in place of the poplars in modern times, has groves of oak (i. 260). Silius Itālicus gives a beautiful description of this river (iv. 348 seq.). Sulphūreus Līris, either from sulphur being found in its vicinity, or from the whitish colour of its waters (Sil. Ital. viii. 399). Carūlus Līris (Mart. xiii. 83).

Līseus, i, m. the supreme magistrate of the Ædūi, who, along with Divitiācus and other chiefs of that nation, was in Cæsar's camp in the Gallie war, and informed him of the conduct and plans of Dumnōrix (Cæs. B. G. i. 16 seq.). See Vergīthretus.

Lisīnē, arum, f. a fort of Thessaly (Liv. xxxii. 14).

Lissus, i, m. Alexo, a town on the western coast of Greece, between the rivers Drīlūm Nigrum, the Black Drīno, and Drīlūm Album, the White Drīno, at their junction (Cæs. B. C. iii. 26). According to Strābo, Lissus, Alexo, was the boundary between Illyricum and Mācēdōnia. It is, in modern times, a bishop's see, and a place of some note.

Lissus, i, m. a river of Thracīa, to the W. of Hēbrus, the Marīca; and, like that stream, falls into the Archipelago. The water of Lissus was not sufficient to supply the troops of Xērxes (Herod. vii. 108). To this Jūvenālis alludes.

Litābrum, i, n. Buitrago, a strong and wealthy town of Spain, taken after a siege, in 194 B. C., by C. Flāminius, who made Cōrrībilo, a noble chieftain, prisoner (Liv. xxxv. 22).

Litāna, a, f. a wood in the north of Italy, in the territory of the Bolī, remarkable for the destruction of L. Pōstūmīus Albīnus q. v., consul-elect, and his whole army. Livius mentions several bloody battles at this wood (xxiii. 24 seq.).

Litavicus, i, m. a nobleman of great influence and authority among the Ædūi. Some time after Cōnfectōnīus had been appointed, by Cæsar, the supreme magistrate of that state, he persuaded them to revolt, and so join the Gallic standard against the Romans. In order to carry the plan secretly into execution, Litavius received the command of 10,000 foot who were to join Caesar. But when he was within 30 miles of the Roman camp, he made an artful speech to the troops, which induced them to a man to rebel (Cæs. B. G. vii. 37 seq.).

Liternum, v. Linternum, i. n. Torre di Patria, a town of C  mp  nia, between C  nn   and V  lt  r  us, the Volturno. Here H  n  bal having been effectually pent up in 219 B. C., the Romans expected he would be obliged to winter among the rocks of F  rm  ia, Mola, the sands of Liternum, Torre di Patria, and the horrible stagnant marshes. From this difficult situation he extricated himself, by tying dried twigs to the horns of oxen, which he set on fire, after night had come on, and drove them over the passes kept by Roman guards. During the terror excited by this stratagem, he led his whole army in safety through the defiles, and pitched his camp in the territory of Allife. P. C  rn  lius Sc  pio Afric  nus chose this town for his residence, when he went into voluntary banishment (Liv. xxii. 16, 17). Adj. Liternus, et, Liternulus, a. um. Lit  rna p  lis, Lago di Patria (Sil. Ital. vii. 278). Lit  r  num rus (Plin. iii. 123).

Lit  r  us, i. m. the L'Agno, a river of C  mp  nia, at the mouth of which stood Liternum, Torre di Patria. This river is also called Cl  n  us q. v.

Lith  nos p  rgos, a village of the S  cie, mentioned by Aram  anus M  rc  llinus (xxiii. 6); but by no other ancient author. From him it appears to have been a place of some trade.

Lith  b  lia,   . f. a festival celebrated by the Tr  zenians, in commemoration of their having stoned to death some Cretan virgins, who had fled to their city (Paus. ii. 32).

Lit  rius, i. m. a man of prodigious stature and strength, said by D  m  st  es to have lived three hundred years (Val. Max. viii. 13).

Lit  bium, i. n. a town of the Lig  res, which surrendered to the Roman consul, Q. Min  cius R  fus, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 29).

Lit  us, i. m. an augur's staff, crooked at the upper end, but without a knot, and had its name from its resemblance to the musical instrument called lit  us (Liv. i. 18. Cic. de Div. i. 17).

Livia, v. L  villa,   . f. daughter of N  ro Claudius Dr  sus (Velleius P  ter  cius writes Dr  sus. Claudianus, ii. 71, 75), by his wife Ant  nia the younger, was the sister of G  rmanicus, and also of the emperor Claudius. Her first husband was C. Caesar, son of Agrippa, after whose death she became the wife of Dr  sus Caesar, to whom she bare twin sons soon after the death of G  rmanicus. To gratify an inordinate ambition, she violated her conjugal fidelity with S  janus, and indulged the hope of rising to imperial dignity along with her flagitious adulterer. S  janus wished to destroy all the relations of Augustus, in order to remove every obstacle which stood in his way to the imperial sovereignty, and easily induced her to conspire against her husband. For this murder she afterwards suffered the punishment of death, by order of the emperor Tiberius, and the senate passed a decree commanding her pictures and statues to be destroyed, and her memory branded with infamy (Tac. Ann. vi. 2 seq.).

Livia Dr  silla, Livia Dr  silla, f. daughter of L. Dr  sus C  lidianus, was married to Tiberius Claudius N  ro, by whom she had two sons, Tib. Claudius Dr  sus Caesar, the third Roman emperor, and Dr  sus, surnamed G  rmanicus. She possessed great abilities, an insinuating address, and inflexible resolution, by which she executed whatever plans she had formed, with perfect indifference to the interests and lives of others. Augustus, in whose character we discover a mixture of strength and weakness, of liberality and meanness, of cruelty and benevolence, not often united in the same person, formed an attachment to Livia Dr  silla, when pregnant to her husband, who had embraced the interest of Ant  nius, and, having divorced his own wife Scri  bonia, married her. To the emperor she had no child, and, therefore, availing herself of her unbounded ascendancy over him, she procured the adoption of her children by her former husband. To ensure the imperial dignity to her eldest son, she devised means to destroy the whole male descendants of Augustus by his daughter J  lia, the wife of Agrippa. The calm, resolute, but bloody policy which she adopted, can only be equalled by the steady, unwearied perseverance with which she executed her plans. The eldest grandson of Augustus she cut off by the agency of M. L  llius, the second, after being banished to C  mp  nia, was assassinated, and the youngest, P  stinus Agrippa, shared the same fate. Augustus seems to have entertained no suspicion of C. Caesar Agrippa being murdered, and it may be inferred, that Livia and Tiberius, who had procured the banishment of the other two on fictitious pretences, would carefully conceal, from their grandfather, their assassination. To Livia has been imputed much of the dissolute conduct of J  lia, the emperor's daughter, and to render her an object of aversion both to her father and the public, would naturally form a part of the horrible system which she had adopted. It can hardly be disputed, that she cut off Augustus by poison, to accelerate her son's accession to the government of the Roman empire. By this act she introduced among the Romans the horrible practice of domestic murder, which descended to succeeding ages, in violation of every principle both of humanity and morality. On the accession of Tiberius to the empire, some of the senate proposed giving her the title of J  lia Augusta, some of PARENT, others, MOTHER OF HER COUNTRY, and several suggested the propriety of adding to the appellation emperor, SON OF JULIA, all of which Tiberius prevented, as well as a licitor to attend her, and the erection of an altar, in consequence of her adoption into the Julian family, on which she took the name of J  lia (Tac. Ann. i. 14 seq.). Retributive justice overtook this ambitious and unprincipled woman before her death, in the ingratitude of her son, a natural consequence of the crimes to which she had familiarized him; nor was his want of respect confined to her when alive, for, so completely had her conduct destroyed all affection and esteem, that he neglected her funeral, and prohibited all honours, both public and private, from being paid to her memory. Following out this order, he would not allow the senate to decree her divine honours; but her grandson enrolled her among the objects of religious veneration, hence Claudianus, venerabilis Livia (x. 13). Adj. Līvius, a, um. Livia porticus (Ov. Art. Am. i. 72).

Livia Mēdullina Cāmilla, Līvīe Mēdullinae Cāmilla, f. a descendant from M. Fūrius Cāmillus, who died on the day fixed for her nuptials with the emperor Claudius (Suet. Claud. 26).

Livia Orēstilla, Līvīa Orēstilla, f. on the night of her marriage with C. Piso was carried off by the emperor Cālgūla, divorced in a few days, and afterwards banished (Suet. Cal. 25).

Livia Osēllina, Līvīe Osēllinae, f. second wife of Gālla, the father of the emperor (Suet. Gal. 3).

Livīnēus Rēgulus, Livīnēi Rēgūli, m. one of the three appointed to defend Cn. Cālpurnius Piso, the murderer of Gērmānēus. At a future period, Tācītus mentions him as expelled from the senate; and, for being one of the ringleaders in a bloody fray between the inhabitants of Nūcēria, Nocera, and Pōmpēii, he was banished in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. iii. 11 seq.).

Līvius, i, m. See L. Līvius Andrōnīcus.

C. Līvius Sālinātor, C. Līvīi Sālinātoris, m. obtained first the office of pontiff, next that of curule edile, and in 205 B. C. he was elected praetor, where Līvius gives him his full name. In his province, which was the territory of the Brūtīi, he performed nothing worthy of being recorded; but in a battle with the Boii several years after, he commanded the allied cavalry, when his bravery and talents contributed, in an eminent degree, to the defeat of the enemy, who lost in killed and prisoners, upwards of fifteen thousand men. The same year he stood candidate for the consulship, probably calculating on his merits in that battle, yet success did not crown his efforts, and it does not appear that he ever after canvassed for that office. He died, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 23 seq.).—2. Obtained the praetorship and the command of a fleet, in 193 B. C., with which he sailed for Greece, and, after a prosperous voyage, arrived at Piræus, Porto Leone, where he was joined by the fleet, which had been for some time in the Archipelago. On Eumēnes, king of Asia, coming up with his squadron, the combined fleet consisted of a hundred and five decked ships, and a hundred open ones. After an engagement with Pōlyxēnidas, who commanded the ships of Antiochus, king of Syria, in which he claimed the victory, Līvius cruised amongst the islands, and, on the approach of winter, he proceeded to Cāna, where he hauled the ships ashore, and surrounded them with a rampart and a trench. Strengthened by some ships from Eumēnes, he sailed for Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, on purpose to convey over the Roman army, then on their march against Antiochus, king of Syria. After taking Sēstos and Abýdos, visiting different states, giving audiences to ambassadors, and transacting much political business, he sailed to Sinas, where he gave up the fleet to L. Emīlius Rēgillus, who succeeded him in command. Some time after, he was ordered against Pātara, Potari, where his attack failed; on this he crossed to Greece, in which he met P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus, and his brother Lūcius, the consul, with the army which was to invade the Syrian kingdom. The senate afterwards sent him ambassador to Prūsas, king of Bithynia, on whom he prevailed not to join Antiochus. In 190 B. C., Līvius was consul with M. Vālērius Mēssāla, when Gāllia became his province (Liv. xxxv. 24 seq.).

L. Līvius, L. Līvī, m. a tribune of the people, in 320 B. C., who, with Q. Mānius, another tribune, opposed Sp. Pōstūmīus Albinus, the consul, being given up to the Sānnītes, but without effect (Liv. ix. 8).

L. Līvius Andrōnīcus, L. Līvī Andrōnīci, m. the freedman of Līvius Sālinātor, who lived, according to Gēllius, not long after the first Punic war. Līvius has the merit of being the first who formed any thing like regular plays at Rome. Cicero considered them not worthy of a second reading. He translated the Odyssey into Latin verse. The orator informs us, that he published his first play in the year of Rome 514, or the year before the birth of Ennius; this is disputed. Only fragments of his writings now remain. The universal practice, at that period, was, that the author acted his own plays. Having been called upon too often to repeat, his voice failed, and he requested the audience to permit a boy to sing, and he would accompany him with the proper looks and gestures. Freed from all anxiety with respect to the modulation of his voice, his acting had greater freedom and animation, which the audience had discernment and justice both to see and applaud, hence it became usual; and to it pantomime may be referred (Liv. vii. 2 seq.). Adj. Līvīānus, a, um. Līvīāna fābūla (Cic. Brut. 18).

M. Līvius, M. Līvī, m. a Roman, who successfully defended the citadel of Tārēntum, Taranto, against Hānnībal, after the town had been betrayed into the hands of that general, by Phīlēmēnus and Nico. His whole dependance for supplies was on Sicily, and, the Roman fleet under D. Quīnctius having been completely destroyed, the garrison was in the greatest want of provisions, and had frequently the mortification to see vessels, laden with grain for their relief, taken in sight. Ever on the alert, he attacked and cut off a foraging party of nearly four thousand men, which occasioned a similar disappointment to the Tārēntini. For five years he retained possession of the citadel, until relieved by the retaking of the town, when the senate debated whether he should be censured for his indolence in allowing the town to be betrayed, or applauded for his bravery in keeping possession of the citadel. His conduct was at last referred to the censors, whose judgment Līvius has not recorded (xxiv. 20 seq.).

M. Līvius Dēnter, M. Līvī Dēntis, m. was consul, in 303 B. C., and one of the first plebeians who obtained the office of pontiff. He prescribed the words which P. Dēcius Mūs was to repeat, when he devoted himself for the safety of the Roman army. To Līvius, Dēcius transferred his lectors, with orders to act as proprætor, in 297 B. C. (Liv. x. 1—29).

M. Līvius Drūsus, M. Līvī Drūsi, m. was the great grandson of the first of the Līvian clan, who obtained this surname from having killed a general of the enemy called Drusus, which the Romans changed into Drusus. In his consulship, 114 B. C., he defeated the Scordisci, a Thracian nation, descended from the Gauls (Liv. Ep. 63).—2. Son of the former, a man of great eloquence, and of the strictest integrity, whose disposition and talents were superior to his fortune. The senate applied to him, in his tribuneship, 93 B. C., to procure from the knights part of the jurisdiction which they possessed by the Sempronian law. The partiality which that order exhibited in the administration of justice, imperiously demanded a reformation, which Drusus undertook to accomplish; but Græchus, one of his colleagues in the tribuneship, opposed him, and the two parties often appeared in the streets like two hostile armies, and sometimes proceeded to open violence. Recourse was now had to every species of corruption, and every act of political intrigue, in contempt of moral rectitude and even of common decency. From certain regulations respecting the Agrarian law, Drusus hoped to consolidate the interests of all parties in the state, which, perhaps, he might have done; had not the senate distrusted his sincerity, and objected to his law, which enacted that they should be placed on a level with the knights, on condition that three hundred of the latter should be admitted into the senate. The knights, too, considered the loss of their judicatory, and the emoluments which flowed from it, as poorly compensated, by a part of their order being raised to senatorian rank. In favour now with neither party, Drusus expected to overpower both, by a proposal, that all the Italian states should be made citizens of Rome, a measure which he knew would secure their overwhelming aid. In a tumultuous assembly, the prodigious multitudes which had thronged into the city, carried the law of Drusus, who did not long enjoy the pleasure of his triumph. On that very same day he was assassinated, in the court-yard of his own house, although surrounded by numerous friends and dependants. A knife was thrust privately into his side, and allowed to remain. Thus fell Drusus, in 93 B. C. The commission of the horrid outrage has been generally ascribed to Q. Varius. A difference of opinion respecting the murder of this great man prevailed in ancient times. Livius states that the perpetrator was unknown. This historian mentions, that he had promised the Italian states the freedom of the city, on purpose to obtain their support, and, having failed to procure them this advantage, tumults ensued, the senate withdrew their favour, and opposed his plans, from considering him the cause of these commotions. It will be readily allowed, that the Social war necessarily resulted from the line of conduct which Drusus had latterly pursued. However pure his intentions may have been at first, it cannot be doubted, that the measures which he afterwards attempted, under the name of patriotism, had, for their object, private aggrandizement rather than public utility, for he boasted that he had recourse to every method of corruption, and that he left nothing for any one to divide, except dirt, or the atmosphere. Velleius Paterculus has drawn the character of this eminent Roman (li. 13 seq.). Adj. Livius, et, Drusianus, a, urn. Lilia Eyes, the laws of M. Livius Drusus, which the senate abolished at his death (Cic. de Leg. ii. 6). Drusiana cedes (Flor. ii. 19).

M. Livius Macatus, M. Livii Macati, m, a kinsman of M. Livius Sallinator, for whom the latter made a speech to the senate, in 210 B. C., when brought to trial, of which the result is not stated. This speech had the effect of producing a change of public opinion with respect to the speaker, M. Livius Sallinator, and procured him the consulship (Liv. xxvii. 34).

M. Livius, M. Livii, m, afterwards surnamed Sallinator, was one of the ambassadors sent to Carthage in 220 B. C., to inquire whether the taking of Saguntum had been the result of an order of the state, or solely the measure of Hannibal. At the expiry of his consulship, the Commons had condemned Livius, whose spirit the disgrace depressed so deeply, that he retired to the country, avoided all society, wore a squalid dress, and allowed his hair and beard to grow. M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Laevinus brought him back to the city, and the censors compelled him to shave his beard, to lay aside his sordid dress, to attend the meetings of the senate, and to perform other public duties. A keen sensibility of the disgrace, which had been inflicted on him, continued to sink his spirits until his relation M. Livius Macatus was brought to trial, when he delivered a speech to which the senate paid great attention. The public, now convinced that he had been treated with injustice, and that the state had suffered by being deprived of the counsels and services of so great a man, resolved to re-elect him to the consulship, a proposal to which he only objected, charging them with levity and inconstancy, in formerly refusing him compassion when he appeared as a defendant, and now heaping upon him honours unsolicited. To the public opinion he at last yielded, and accepted the consulship with C. Claudius Nero, against whom he avowed his enmity, because he had treated him with disrespect during his misfortunes. At the solicitation of the senate, the consuls laid aside their animosities, and conducted the administration of the state with justice and unanimity. The war against Hannibal in the north of Italy fell to the lot of Livius. Here he was joined by his colleague, and, by their united exertions, Hannibal himself was killed, besides his army was almost wholly cut off. In the opinion of Livius, his army might be withdrawn from that country, and the senate ordered both consuls to return to the city. Between themselves they agreed that they should enter Rome at the same time, and, at their request, after hearing a recital of their transactions in the temple of Bellona, the senate granted a triumph, when Livius rode in a chariot drawn by four horses, attended by his troops as they had been withdrawn from the north of Italy, and Claudius rode on horseback without troops, yet he attracted the greatest notice from his well-known superiority. By his colleague Livius was created dictator for holding the elections, which he had no sooner finished than he went into his province Etruria, Tuscany, and Umbria, to inquire into the states which seemed inclined to favour Hannibal. This command was continued to him for the two following years. During his censorship with C. Claudius Nero in 206 B. C., he established a new duty on salt. The people referred this measure, which bore heaviest on the tribes by whose influence he had been unjustly condemned, to resentment for his condemnation, and, therefore, surnamed him Saltator. The censors behaved to one another in a scandalous and resentful manner. Claudius ordered Livius, who belonged to Pöllia tribus, to sell his horse, because he had been condemned by the people; then he ordered Claudius to sell his horse, because he had borne false witness against him, and had not been sincere in his reconciliation. At the treasury, Claudius gave in his colleague as disfranchised, and Livius gave in the whole of the Roman tribes, except Mælia tribus, as disfranchised, because they had condemned him when innocent, and had elected him under that sentence, first consul, then censor. Either the condemnation, or the elections must have been a fault. Mælia tribus had neither concurred in his condemnation nor election. Cn. Babius, a tribune of the people, summoned the two censors to trial before the Commons; but the senate interfered, that the censorship might not in future be subject to the caprice of the populace. By Livius and his colleague a contract was entered into, for building a temple to Cybele, which, thirteen years after, M. Junius Brutus dedicated (Liv. xxi. 18 seq.). To Saltator, Silius Italicus alludes (xv. 1593), and Mælius (i. 789).

Livius, T. Livius, T. Livii, m. was born in the year 58 B. C. at Patavium, Padua; hence Statius calls him Alumnus Tiberi (Syl. iv. 7. 56). His life, like that of most other learned men, past in study and retirement, furnishes little for biographical narrative. Very few particulars respecting his private character have been transmitted, and equally scanty is the information respecting his education and course of study. History does not inform us in what year he removed to Rome, how long he continued there, or when he fixed his residence at Naples. It has been stated, on what authority we know not, that he became acquainted with Augustus by some historical and philosophical writings which he had dedicated to him. Seneca mentions the work, but says nothing of the dedication; which renders the assertion very doubtful. Quintilian has praised his treatise on rhetoric written for his son. Rome possessed many advantages for the historian, from the records kept in certain temples, or in the possession of individuals, either from office or hereditary succession. These inducements probably drew Livius from his native city to the capital, for it does not appear that he either liked the bustle of the city, or had the smallest wish for political preferment. Had ambition influenced his conduct, he might have improved his connexion with the emperor, afforded by the appointment of preceptor to his grandson Claudius, afterwards emperor. Absorbed in his great undertaking, the history of Rome, his mind would revolt at the drudgery of teaching, and he sought the delight of tranquillity in the town, or vicinity, of Naples. Here he enjoyed undisturbed ease and quiet, continued his labours, and finished his work, consisting of one hundred and forty-two books, commencing with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, and ending with the death of Drusus in 10 B. C. After he had completed that arduous undertaking, he returned to spend the rest of his days in his native country, where he died at the age of seventy-five, in the year 17. Besides his son already mentioned, he had a daughter married to L. Mægius; but whether they outlived, or predeceased, their father, or whether he had more than these two children, we have no means of ascertaining. Of the hundred and forty-two books, thirty-five only have been transmitted to modern times, and of these, some are imperfect. We have entire the first ten books, and from the twenty-first to the forty-fifth inclusive. Portions of the forty-third and forty-fourth have been lost. A few fragments of the books wanting, viz., from the eleventh to the twentieth inclusive, and all after the forty-fifth, have been preserved, and are annexed to every complete edition of our author. The contents of the whole have come down to us entire, according to some, from the pen of Livius himself, and, according to others, from that of L. Annaeus Florus, author of a Roman history. These summaries, while they furnish some important facts, excite deep regret at the irretrievable loss of so great and interesting a portion of this valuable work. The first ten books contain a rapid sketch from the foundation of Rome, till 461 B. C. Here the reader finds a number of curious statements written with great elegance and liveliness of style. Of the records to which Livius had access, and of the traditional narrations, he made the very best use, still candour must acknowledge, that these pages contain much that is uncertain, much that is marvellous, and much that is fictitious. The next ten books contained among other occurrences the first Punic war, and comprised a period of seventy-five years. The second Punic war occupies the greater part of the next ten books, and from the minuteness of the detail embraces only a period of sixteen years. The next ten, or fourth decad, record the wars with Philip, king of Macedonia, and Antiochus, king of Syria, comprising a space of twenty-three years. Of the fifth decad, only the first five remain, and these imperfect. They give, however, an account of two important wars, one with Persius, king of Macedonia, who, after gaining many advantages over the Romans, was at last conquered, and his kingdom reduced to the form of a Roman province; the other with the Carthaginians, commonly called the third Punic war, which continued only for five years, and ended with Carthage being levelled with the ground. For the scantiness of his materials in the first five books, Livius makes an apology at the opening of the sixth, from their great antiquity, from letters being then little or rarely known, and from the destruction of the commentaries of the pontiffs and other public and private records by the burning of the city. From its second foundation he promises to give its history with more precision and minuteness. That he has redeemed his pledge, no attentive or impartial reader can deny. Every page of this author's writings which time has destroyed, the literary world have agreed in regretting as a general loss. Much valuable information must have been contained in the second decal, when the Roman state, having emerged from barbarity, began to be distinguished for military prowess, and salutary laws. How incomparably greater the injury sustained by the loss of the last ninety-seven books when, during the period which they record, Rome became the seat of universal government! We cannot doubt the excellence of their execution, when we consider how much more interesting and copious his materials must have been, obtained in personal conversation with some of the principal actors in the great transactions, which he narrates, without mentioning the memoirs of L. Cornélius Sulla, C. Julius Caesar, and many others. The outlines sketched by such writers must have formed an admirable picture, finished by the able hand of Livius. Contemporary writers inform us of the high estimation in which the work of Livius was held, not only by his countrymen but by foreigners. Plinius the younger states, that an inhabitant of Cadiz travelled to Rome, for no other purpose than to see the great genius who had produced a work of such extraordinary merit, and that he had no sooner gratified his curiosity by an interview with Livius, than he returned home (ii. 3). The emperor Cælius ordered his books from his library, because, as a historian, he was verbose and careless (Suet. Cal. 34). Tacitus gives the character of Livius in the following words: "Titus Livius of the most eminent distinction for eloquence and fidelity, extolled Cn. Pompeius with so great praises, that Augustus called him a Pompeian, nor had this idea the least effect upon their friendship" (Ann. iv. 34). The merit of this great historian brought against him a host of detractors, whose censure resolved itself chiefly into charging him with Patavinity. No ancient author has defined what the term distinctly implied. Some suppose it expressed his attachment to Pompey, others, that it denoted hatred to the Gauls, whilst many consider it symbolical of a fault or peculiarity which they either did not know, or did not choose to explain. Critics latterly seem agreed in referring it to the use of provincial words, or expressions. Without attempting to decide the controversy, on which much has been written, the last seems the more probable opinion. That the Patavinity of Livius was of little consequence, may be inferred from Quintilianus mentioning it without saying in what it consisted, which he unquestionably would have done, had the fault either been important, or of frequent occurrence. Charges of a more serious nature might have been preferred against this author. He sometimes mentions the proposal of a law, without saying whether the senate passed or rejected it. As an instance, C. Licinius Calvus Stolo brought in a bill prohibiting any one from possessing more than five hundred acres of land (vi. 35), and nothing further is said respecting it, till Licinius himself was condemned on his own law (vii. 16). In general, he states the number of times a man held any particular office; but sometimes omits one or two of them, as in the instance of C. Marcus Rutilius, whose first and third consulship he notices, passing by the second (Liv. vii. 16-28). Instances very frequently occur, in which he gives only a part of a name, as near the beginning of the twenty-second chapter of the seventh book, we find C. Sulpicius an interrex, and a few lines below C. Sulpicius Peticus, a consul, although the same person is meant. This inaccuracy frequently perplexes the reader. It is not unusual with him to speak of a thing as known, of which he had not previously taken any notice, such as the temple of Victory (x. 33). Several of the offices of the Roman state do not find a place in the pages of Livius, for years after their first appointment, and to ascertain their date, the inquirer must apply to other authors. Other defects might be enumerated, were the exposure of great consequence; but candour refuses to dwell on trivial inaccuracies, when numerous opportunities are afforded for unqualified approbation.

Lixus, i. f. L'Aræe, or, Larache, a town of Tingitania, a district of Mauritania, bordering on Mære Atlanticum, the Atlantic Ocean (Sil. Ital. iii. 258).

Löcha, m. f. a town of Africa, taken by Scipio the elder. Inh. Löchenses, ium, m. barbarously put to the sword, after they had surrendered to that general (Ap. Bel. Pun. 9).

Löcri, orum, m. surnamed Epizephyrii, Lerace, a town of the Bruttii, founded by the Löcri, from Greece; but it is uncertain whether by the Löcri Ozöle or Epicnemidii. Virgilius seems to refer its origin to the latter, on which account he has Naryclæ posuerunt mœnia Löcri, i. e. Naryclæ, from Naryx, v. Naryclæ, which was one of the chief towns of the Löcri Epicnemidii (Æn. iii. 399). Strabo says it was founded soon after Cröton and Syracuse, by the Löcri Ozöle, and adds that Epizephyrii was derived from the promontory Zephyrium, which was so called from having a harbour exposed to the west wind (372). Inh. Löcri, orum (Sing. Löcras, i.), et, Löcrenses, ium, m. were called Hesperii from their westerly situation with respect to Greece, and Strabo says their public seal was the evening star. Adj. Löcrænsis, is, e. Löcrænsis (ager) (Plin. ii. 524).

Löcris, idis, f. a district of Græcia Propria. At the conclusion of the war with Philippus, king of Mæcedonia, in 197 B. C., Löcris and Phöcis were annexed to the territory of the Ætolii, because these districts had formerly belonged to them (Liv. xxxiii. 34). Inh. Löcri, orum, et, Löcrenses, ium, m. were divided into three parties, and had an additional appellation to distinguish them from each other; Löcri Ozöle, Löcri Opuntii, and Löcri Epicnemidii. Ozöle being a term of reproach, cannot be traced to any authentic source. Næssus, according to some, gave the name of Ozöle to Löcri, from the smell of his wound; but Dodwell was assured that a fetid stream rises at the foot of the mountains Chalcis and Taphlæssos, which falls into the Gulf of Lepanto. To this stream the name may, with more propriety, be referred. Opuntii is a derivative of Opus, their chief city, and Epicnemidii must be referred to Cnemis, the name of a hill in the district which they possessed. These three distinctions did not obtain in the days of Hómærus, since he alludes only to the last two, and writes that the Locrians sent forty ships against Troy, under the command of Ajax, son of Oileus. The Löcri discharged their weapons backwards (Il. ii. 527: xlii. 721).

Löcūsta, æ, f. a woman who had great skill in poisons, and dexterity in their application. Sentence of condemnation had been passed against her for her murderous practices, yet her very vices preserved her life, as a fit instrument of state to accomplish the purposes of guilty ambition. Agrippina employed her to cut off the emperor Claudius, and she prepared a new compound, by which she expected to deprive him of reason, without causing death. Its effect was less powerful than the sorceress intended, but Xēnophon, the emperor's physician, completed the murder, and, no doubt, received the reward. Nēro employed Jūlius Pōllio to cut off Brītiannicus q. v., and he, having Löcūsta in his power, called in her skill in poisons to accomplish the wish of the emperor. The first potion failed of effect, and Nēro threatened the tribune, and had nearly put the sorceress to death, when they promised that they would administer a draught as certain and fatal as the sword of an assassin. To their perpetual infamy, they fulfilled their promise (Tac. Ann. xii. 66 seq.). For this murder, Nēro rewarded Löcūsta with a large estate, and placed others under her to learn the infamous art, which has immortalized her name. After the armies had declared against him, Nēro himself received from her a quantity of poison, which he had not courage to swallow (Suet. Ner. 33—47. Juv. Sat. i. 71).

Löllia, æ, f. the wife of A. Gābius, corrupted by Jūlius Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 50).

Löllia Paulina, Löllia Paulina, f. daughter of M. Löllius Paullinus, was first married to C. Mēmmius Rēgulus, and afterwards to Cālgūla, who took her from her husband, and soon afterwards parted with her. She was one of the three who aspired at the honour of being empress on the death of Mēssalina, in the year 48. The freedman Callistus supported her claims, alleging that, having never been a mother, Brītiannicus and his sister Octāvia would engross the whole of her tenderness and affections; but the emperor preferred Agrippina, who, next year, ordered her to put an end to her days (Tac. Ann. xii. 1—22).

Löllianus Avitus, Löllian Aviti, m. a Roman of consular dignity, through whose interest Pērtinax, afterwards Roman emperor, obtained a commission in the army, and whose kindness he gratefully recollected, considering him the author of his fortune.

Löllius Gēntianus, Löllii Gēntiani, m. the patron of the emperor Pērtinax, on whose lands that emperor, a man of mean parentage, was born (Aur. Vic. Ep. 18).

M. Löllius, M. Löllii, m. was consul with Q. Æmilius Lēpidus, in 22 B. C. In Germany he was defeated, lost the eagle of the fifth legion, and this disaster obliged Augustus to set out for Gāllia. Hörātius addresses to him one of his odes, in which he praises him for virtues which, after the death of the poet, he gave proof that he did not possess (Od. iv. 9). Augustus, believing that he exhibited his real character, sent him with C. Cæsar, his intended heir, on an expedition against the Parthians, in which his rapacity and sordid love of gain rendered him the scourge and robber of the eastern princes. Suetonius writes, that the heir-apparent fell by his hands. The emperor at last saw him in his true colours, and dismissed him from court, on which he terminated his life by poison. The account of Vellēus Pāterculus is somewhat different (ii. 97, 102). Estrōpius mentions him as governor of Gāllia, with the title of proprætor (vii. 10). Adj. Löllianus, a, um. Lölliana clādes, the defeat of Löllius in Germany (Tac. Ann. i. 10).

M. Löllius Paullinus, M. Löllii Paullini, m. a man of consular dignity, whose son, of the same name, was the father of Löllia Paullina q. v.

Lōndīnum, i, n. London, a place, says Tacitus, not dignified with the name of a colony, but very celebrated for the number of its merchants and commerce. From that date (the year 61), it has continued to increase, and is at last become the greatest city, not only in Britāia, of which it is the capital, but in the whole world, for trade, population, and wealth. It stands on the banks of Tāmēsis, the Thames, one of the principal rivers in England. The circumference of London may be estimated at sixteen miles, and the population at one million and a half (Tac. Ann. xiv. 33). Ammianus Mārcellinus states that Lōndīnum was an old town, to which after ages gave the name of Augustā (xxvii. 8).

Lōngārus, i, m. king of the Dārdāni, was the father of Bāto, who offered assistance to the Roman consul, P. Sulpicius Gālba, in 202 B. C., against Philippus, king of Mācedōnia. Lōngārus had, in his own name, carried on war with Dēmētrius, the father of Philippus (Liv. xxxi. 28).

Lōnginus. See Cāssius.

Lōnginus, i, m. an officer of distinction in the army of the Roman emperor Trājānus, who sent him to treat with Dēcēbālus, king of Dācia. Disregarding the law of nations, Dēcēbālus put Lōnginus in prison, and endeavoured to extort from him the plans of his master, which the other refused to divulge, preferring death by poison.

Lōngōbārdi. See Lāngōbārdi.

Lōngūla, æ, f. a town of the Volsi, which Cōrdiānus took from the Romans in 491 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).

Lōngūstica, æ, f. a city of Spain, near to Hōnōsca, mentioned by Lārtius (xxii. 20).

Lōracina, æ, f. the Macchione, a river of Lātium, from which C. Lūcrētius Gāllus, prætor, was bringing water into Antium, in 172 B. C., when he was arraigned for avarice and cruelty in Greece, during the preceding year (Liv. xliii. 4). The town Cēna stood on this stream.

Lōrium, i, n. v. Lōrii, orum, f. a villa on Via Aurēlia, at which the father of the emperor Aurēlius Antōnius died (Aur. Vic. Cæs. 16).

Lōrnē, es, f. a fort in Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xix. 9).

Lōryma, orum, n. a port of Cāria, opposite Rhōdus, and distant from it about twenty miles (Liv. xxxvii. 17 seq.).

Lōtis, idis, f. a nymph who, flying from the advances of Priāpus, was changed into a tree called from her, lōtus (Ov. Met. ix. 347). Lōtus is often used to denote a musical instrument.

Lōtōphāgi, orum, m. a people of Lībā, whose manners Hōmērus describes (Od. ix. 84—97). Some suppose they lived in Sicily, contrary to the authority of Hērōdōtus (liv. 177 seq.), and of Hōmērus, who mentions that, quitting the Lösöphagi, they sailed to the land of the Cyclopes (Od. ix. 105).

Lūa, m. f. a daughter of Sātūrnus, to whom the arms and spoils of the enemy used to be burnt, as well as to Mārs and Minērvā. The name has been derived from the verb laere, to expiate, and considered by some a surname of Dīāna, in which case, Lūa must be a corruption of Lūna. The name is generally written Lūa māter, and Livius conjoins her with Mārs and Minērvā (xlv. 33).

Lūca, m. f. Luca, an ancient town of Etruria, Tuscany, built by the Etrusci, and taken from them by the Ligurians. To it the Romans sent a colony of two thousand citizens, in 179 B. C., when each received fifty-one acres and a half (Liv. xli. 13). Here the common editions of Livius by mistake have Lūna, and also of Lucan's Pharsalia, in the line part of which is quoted below. At Lūca, the first triumvirate had an interview, which excited great interest among the citizens of Rome, and induced many, both of the senate and nobility, to repair thither. This iniquitous combination gave a celebrity to this town, not otherwise entitled to great distinction. Luca is about three miles in circumference, well built, and encompassed by a rampart beautifully planted all around. Its territory extends to about forty-five miles in length, and sixteen in breadth. Dēserta Lūca (Luc. Phar. i. 596). Inh. Lūcēnses, im. m. Adj. Lūcēnsis, is, e.

Lūcūgus, i. m. brother of Liger, both of whom were killed by Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 575 seq.).

Lūcānla, m. f. a district in the southern part of Italy, bounded by Sinus Tūrentinus, the Gulf of Taranto, Apūlia, Sānnitum, Mārē Tūscum, Tyrhēnum, quod et Infērum, the Tuscan Sea, and the country of the Brūtii. Inh. Lūcāni, orum (Sing. Lūcānus, i. m.). At first they brought up their children in the Spartan manner, rendered them hardy by going naked, living on what they took in hunting, and sleeping on the bare ground (Just. xxiii. 1). After frequently taking up arms and as often submitting to the Romans, they became a part of that state in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 15). In Lūcānis, among the Lūcāni, i. e. in Lūcānla (Cor. Nep. Hann. 5). Adj. Lūcānicus, et, Lūcānus, a. um. Lūcāna pascua, pastures of Lūcānla, which were excellent (Hor. Epod. i. 23), as were also its wines (Plin. iii. 134).

Lūcānus ager, the territory of the Lūcāni (Plin. i. 334). Lūcānus ursus (Mart. Spec. 8).

Q. Lūcānius, Q. Lūcānū, m. a centurion of the first rank, who was killed in attempting to rescue his son when surrounded by some of the troops of Ambliorix, after that king had treacherously persuaded L. Aurunculeus Cotta, and Q. Titurius Sabinus, lieutenant-generals, with the army which they commanded, consisting of one legion and five cohorts, to leave their winter-quarters among the Eburones (Cæs. B. G. v. 35).

Lūcānus, i. m. the brother of Tullus. From Martialis, they appear to have lived most affectionately, and mutually vied in contributing to the comfort of one another (i. 37 seq.).

Lūcar, āris, n. the money expended on plays and players at Rome. It had this name because it arose from the annual produce of woods (lūci) in the neighbourhood of the city (Tac. Ann. i. 77). Adj. Lūcāris, is, e. Lūcāris pēcūnia, the money above-mentioned. Lūcūria (sacra, e. festa), festivals celebrated in the wood between Via Salaria, and Tiber; because the Romans, on being overcome by the Gauls, concealed themselves there.

Lūcas, e. Lycas, m. a Rutulian, who fought in the van under Turnus, and fled from Ænēas (Virg. Æn. x. 561).—2. The eldest of the six sons of Crista, whom, with four of his brothers, Hannibal killed at the battle of Cānna (Sil. Ital. x. 139).

L. Lūccius, L. Lūccius, m. a Roman who, with C. Cōscōnius, conquered the Sānnites in battle, killed Mārius Egnātius, the most noble general of the enemy, and received the surrender of many of their towns, in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 75).—2. One of the three intimate confidential friends of Pompey, whom that general used to consult on the most important affairs. Scribonius Libo and Thēophānus were the other two (Cæs. B. C. iii. 18). Lūccius wrote the history of the Marsic war, and of the civil war between Mārius and Sūlla. His talents as an historian were so highly valued by Cicero, that he requested him to record the transactions of his consulship. The world has to regret that the civil wars prevented the historian from complying with the request of the orator, as well as the loss of his two histories above-mentioned. Of his composition, a single letter only has been transmitted to modern times.

Lūccius Albinius, Lūccius Albini, m. governor of Mauritania, Morocco and Fes, killed, together with his wife who attempted to oppose the assassins, because on the death of Gālba, he had declared in favour of Otho, and the Moors had embraced the interest of Vitellius (Tac. Hist. ii. 58 seq.).

Lūccres, um, m. See Lūccrus.

Lūcēria, m. f. Lucera, a town of Apūlia, a district in the south of Italia, Italy, about thirty miles distant from the coast of Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. Cn. Pompeius Māgnus chose Lūcēria for the seat of war, when Cæsar raised the standard of rebellion against the Roman government (Cæs. B. C. i. 24). Inh. Lūcērii, orum, m. were faithful allies of the Romans. False information which soldiers, disguised like shepherds, and sent by C. Pōntius, the general of the Sānnites, with whom the Romans were then at war, gave to the consuls T. Vētricius Cālvinus, and Sp. Pōstūmius, induced them to march to the relief of the Lūcērii, to enter Furellæ Caudinæ, in which they were surrounded by the Sānnites, and purchased their liberation by passing under the yoke, in 321 B. C. L. Pāpius Cūrsor soon retaliated this disgrace of the Romans upon the Sānnites, by obliging them to leave their arms and baggage within Lūcēria, and to pass under the yoke with only one garment. Besides much spoil, he recovered the standards and arms lost at Caudium, and the six hundred hostages given in terms of that treaty. At a future period, the Romans retook the garrison of that town, betrayed to the Sānnites, and put every man of the Lūcērii and Sānnites to the sword. A colony of two thousand five hundred was then established at Lūcēria, to secure it against the enemy, after several senators had voted that it should be destroyed (Liv. ix. 2 seq.). Appianus mentions that on surrendering to Hannibal, who promised them protection and safety, he suffocated the senate in a bath (Bel. Pœn. 33). Adj. Lūcērinus, a, um. Lūcērinus finis (Liv. x. 35).

Lūcērus, i, m. a king of Ardea, who assisted Rōmulus against T. Tātius, king of the Sabines. Lūcēres, um, v. Lūcērenses, *i*um, m. one of the three tribes of the Roman people, according to the division of Rōmulus and T. Tātius, so called from Lūcērus; also one of the centuries of horsemen or knights. Some derive this appellation from Lūcimo, a Tuscan, who assisted Rōmulus, and others from lucus, the grove, which he opened as an asylum for the reception of fugitives, in order to increase the number of his subjects. The first derivation seems most probable; but the matter must remain doubtful, since it was so in the days of Līvius (Liv. i. 13).

Lūcētus, i, m. a Rutullan whom Ilioneus laid flat with a great stone, as he advanced to set fire to the gate of the capital of Lātinius (Virg. Æn. ix. 570).

Lūcifer, eri, m. the morning star. The planet Venus, the second in the solar system, has this name when seen in the morning, and is called Hesperus when it sets after the sun, from its situation being westerly. Venus is in each of these positions alternately, for 299 successive days.

Lūcilla, as, f. wife of Cn. Pōmpēius Strābo, and mother of Cn. Pōmpēius Magnū. From Velleius Pāterculus, she appears to have been of noble birth, of great dignity, firmness and propriety of conduct, suited to her rank, and maintained to the end of life (ii. 29).

Lūcillus Bāssus, Lūcilli Bāssi, m. a prefect of the fleet, to which command Vitellius had raised him. Disappointment in not being made prefect of the pretorian bands, excited him to perjury against his benefactor, and he joined Vespasianus with all his ships. The defection of the army followed that of the fleet, and Vitellius soon became inferior to his rival (Tac. Hist. ii. 100 seq.).

Lūcillus Cāpito, Lūcilli Cāpitōnis, m. collector of the government taxes in Asia, whom the province prosecuted, and procured sentence of banishment against him, in the year 22 (Tac. Ann. iv. 15. Dio Cas. lvii. 23).

Lūcillus Lōngus, Lūcilli Lōngi, m. an intimate friend and faithful companion of the emperor Tiberius, who attended him to the island Rhodus, and in all scenes, either of prosperity or adversity. The emperor bewailed his death which happened in the year 23 (Tac. Ann. iv. 15).

C. Lūcillus, C. Lūcili, m. a Roman knight, was born at Suessa Aurunca, Sessa, in 440 B. C. He enjoyed the intimate friendship of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus, the younger, of C. Lælius, M. Licinius Crassus, and many eminent men of that age. Of his military talents, history has transmitted no account, and subsequent writers have mentioned him only as a poet. He possessed a vigorous mind, and a sarcastic severity, qualities requisite for writing of satire, a species of composition wholly Roman, and of which his countrymen considered him the father. Quintilianus praises him for his knowledge of the Latin language, which had not attained that elegance and purity, which distinguished the writings of the Augustan age.

Hōrātius censures him for the negligence of his verses, but allows him wit, and seems to commend the freedom with which he branded, by name, the vicious. The age in which he lived, excuses, if it do not justify, the liberty which he assumed in holding up to ridicule or detestation, the openly vicious. As Roman manners refined, the Satirists used greater delicacy, and described the characters which they lampooned, without exposing by name. This is a refinement unknown in the rude states of society. Although Lūcilius wrote satire with harshness and severity, we have the authority of Cicero for considering him a man of great politeness, as well as of great learning. Of all his writings a few fragments of his Satires only now remain. He died at Nēapōlis, Naples, in the forty-sixth year of his age. To him Mārtialis alludes (xi. 91: xii. 96). Adj. Lūciliānus, a, um. Sine illo Lūciliāno, without the satirical severity of Lūcilius (Cic. Att. xvi. 11).

Lūcillus, i, m. a centurion in the Roman army, killed in the year 14. The soldiers humorously nicknamed him Cedo alteram, i. e. da alteram vitam, because, in punishing the soldiers, when a stick broke, he cried, "Give me another, and then another" (Tac. Ann. i. 23).

Lūcina, as, f. the goddess of childbirth, said, by some, to be Dīana, by others, Jūno. She had this name, either because lucem nascentibus dare credebatur, or, a lucio in quo ades ei sacrata. Adj. Lūcīnus, a, um. Lūcina Jūno, Dīana; whence it is manifest, that Cātullus considered Dīana, not Jūno, the goddess of childbirth (xxxiv. 14).

Lūcius, i, m. a Spanish poet, of great celebrity, who flourished in the reign of the Roman emperor, Dōmītiānus (Mart. iv. 65).—2. A Roman knight (Mart. v. 14).

Lūcio, v. Lūcimo, ōnis, m. a Tuscan, who brought assistance to Rōmulus, against the Sabines, and from whom some derive the word Lūcēres. Gūlterius Lūcio, from his wearing gūlterus, a kind of cap, made of the skin of a wolf, which, according to Sārvius, formed part of the dress of the Tuscan peasantry. Lūcio, in the Tuscan language, signifies a king, or, prince (Prop. iv. 1. 29). By some writers, this man is mistaken for Tāquīnius Priscus.

Lūcōmēdus, i, m. supposed, by some, to be the same with Lūcio q. v., and, by others, to have a plural signification, including all the troops who marched under the standard of Lūcio, to join Rōmulus (Prop. iv. 2. 51).

Lūcīna, as, f. daughter of Sp. Lūcrētius Triclitipitnus, was married to L. Tāquīnius Cōllatīnus, who, in a dispute which arose among some of the young nobles of Rome, particularly those of the royal family, respecting the merits of their wives, proposed, that matters should be brought immediately to the test, by taking their horses, as they were then in the camp at Ardea, hastening to the capital, and personally inspecting the behaviour of their wives. This proof, he maintained, would be unquestionable, as their arrival was unexpected. The suggestion was approved by the whole, who, in a short time, reached the city; after visiting the matrons of the different families they proceeded to Cōllatīna, where they found Lúcrétia, not, like the rest, wasting her time in luxurious entertainments, with those of her own rank, but sitting in the midst of her house, busily employed, though at a late hour, with her wool, and her maids at work around her. The honour of superiority was unanimously adjudged to Lúcrétia, who kindly received her husband, and the Tárquinii. Her beauty and modesty excited, in the breast of Séxtus Tárquinius, desires equally repugnant to purity and innocence. Returning a few days afterwards to the same place, inflamed with a criminal passion, the chaste Lúcrétia, unapprehensive of his iniquitous purpose, received him with kindness as the kinsman of her husband. Soon after the family had retired to rest, the wretch entered the room of Lúcrétia, whose purity and peace of mind his brutality destroyed. She immediately sent for her husband and father, whom she informed of her dishonour, urged them to revenge the indignity she had suffered, and then thrust a poniard into her bosom, on which she instantly expired, in 509 B. C. (Liv. i. 57, 58).

Lúcrétius, is, m. Monte Libretti, a most beautiful mountain in the territory of the Sábini, rising in a gentle but irregular swell, forming several hills of different shapes in its ascent, and leading the eye by several easy gradations to its summit. Near it Hórátius had a villa, in place of which he gives the name of the mountain. Mutat amicum Lúcrétilem Lúceum, changes Lúceus for pleasant Lúcrétius (Od. i. 17. 1).

Lúcrétius, i, m. the name of a Roman tribe or clan.

Lúcrétius Véspillo, Lúcrétii Véspillónis, m. He and Minúcius Rúfus had, by an order of Lælius, the command of eighteen ships at Oricum, Ric, in the civil war (Cæs. B. C. iii. 7).

C. Lúcrétius, C. Lúcrétii, m. appointed with C. Matienus to command the fleet, in 183 B. C., after the Ingauni Lígúres had attacked the camp of L. Æmilius Paulus (Liv. xl. 26).

C. Lúcrétius Gállus, C. Lúcrétii Gállí, m. was elected prætor in 174 B. C. To him the fleet was assigned, with which he sailed to Céphallénia, where he had given orders to his brother, M. Lúcrétius Gállus, to join him, after he had collected the ships due by the allies. In five days he reached that place, and in the Grecian war his conduct was marked by uncommon avarice and cruelty. It would have been better for the states to have shut their gates against him; since the calamities of war would not have equalled the rapacity of this commander. For numerous acts of enormous avarice and great severity, the tribunes of the people brought him to trial, pronounced him guilty by the whole tribes, and sentenced him to pay a fine of one million asses, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 28 seq.).

Hósti Lúcrétius Tricipitinus, Hósti Lúcrétii Tricipitini, m. elected consul in 429 B. C., with L. Sérgius Fidénas (2) (Liv. iv. 30).

L. Lúcrétius, L. Lúcrétii, m. a military tribune with consular authority, in 332 B. C. (Liv. vi. 21).—2. A Roman questor, whom the Lígúres seized by treachery, and delivered up to Hannibal, in 220 B. C., together with two military tribunes, and five persons of equestrian rank (Liv. xxi. 59).

L. Lúcrétius Flávus, L. Lúcrétii Fláví, m. held the consulship in 392 B. C., when he marched against the Æqui, who had made themselves masters of Vitéllia, a Roman colony in their territory, defeated them, and returned to Rome to join the patricians in a more arduous contest, a violent opposition to the tribunes of the people. Two years after, he was elected a military tribune with consular power, when, with C. Æmilius, he carried on a successful war against the Volsiníenses, whom they defeated in the first engagement, and compelled to sue for a truce, after they had been deprived of a great part of their property (Liv. v. 29—32).

L. Lúcrétius Tricipitinus, L. Lúcrétii Tricipitini, m. was elected consul, and entered on his office before the third day of the Ides of Séxtilis, in 462 B. C. He routed a prodigious multitude of the Volsi, by which that nation was almost utterly extinguished, returned with immense plunder to Rome, and triumphed over the Volsi and Æqui, for they had united the fragments of their forces, yet afforded an easy conquest to the Roman troops (Liv. iii. 8—10).—2. Obtained three times the office of a military tribune with consular authority (Liv. vi. 4—22).

M. Lúcrétius, M. Lúcrétii, m. a tribune of the people, who consulted respecting the nomination of a dictator. The senate decreed, that the consul should desire the people to name the person whom they wished to hold that office, and that the consul should nominate the man of their choice. If the consul should refuse, application should be made to the prætor, and if he likewise objected, the tribunes should lay the matter before the commons. The consul claimed the nomination as his right, on that account declined to comply with the will of the senate; besides, he forbade the prætor; it, therefore, only remained for the tribune to consult the commons, who ordered Q. Fúlvius Flaccus to be nominated dictator; and P. Licinius Crassus, pónífex máximus, to be master of the horse. With this order of the people the other consul complied, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 5).—2. Brother of C. Lúcrétius Gállus, a tribune of the people, who sent him with one ship of five banks of oars, in 173 B. C., to collect ships from the allies, and to meet him at Céphallénia. From the Rhéginí he received one of three banks of oars, from the Lócri two, from the Ufítes four, and at Dýrráchiúm he found ten barques belonging to the Dýrráchiini, twelve to the Issæi, and fifty-four to Géntius q. v. which he added to his fleet, pretending that he believed that they had come hither for the use of the Romans. With this large armament he touched at Céphallénia, then proceeded to Chálcis, where other ships from the allies arrived, but, having no enemy, he excused them from service. On land his operations are scarcely worthy of notice (Liv. xlii. 19—56).

P. Lúcrétius, P. Lúcrétii, m. was præfect of Rome, in 459 B. C., and appears to have been a man of prudence and judgment, from the manner in which he overcame, or at least impeded, the violence of the plebeian tribunes (Liv. iii. 24).

P. Lúcrétius Tricipitinus, P. Lúcrétii Tricipitini, m. was elected consul in 507 B.

C., the year in which Porsena made his last application to the senate in behalf of the Tarquins (Liv. ii. 15). The consular calendar differs from Livius.—2. Was elected a military tribune, with consular power, in 418 B. C., and two years after he was re-elected to the same office (Liv. iv. 44 seq.).

Q. Lúcrētius Ofēllā, Q. Lúcrētii Ofēllae, m. a commander under L. Cōrnēlius Sūllā, who besieged C. Mārius the younger, in Prenēstē, 84 B. C., and, by preventing his escape, caused him to kill himself. At a future period, Sūllā deprived Lúcrētius of life, merely because he had offered himself a candidate for the consulship without his permission (Liv. Ep. 88, 89), contrary to the laws, which he had newly enacted, respecting the order in which the higher offices could be obtained (Ap. Bel. Civ. 413).

Q. Lúcrētius Vēspillo, Q. Lúcrētii Vēspillōnis, m. a senator, who, with Attius Pēlignus, and the troops which they commanded, attempted to prevent the inhabitants of Sūlmo, Sulmona, from submitting to Cæsar. On the Sūlmōnēses surrendering to that general, Q. Lúcrētius, from an aversion to fall into the hands of his enemy, threw himself from the wall of the city, on purpose to effect his escape, but without success (Cæs. B. C. i. 18). When proscribed, his wife Thūria concealed him so artfully in his own house, that his life was preserved (Val. Max. vi. 7). He is often mentioned in Cicero's letters to Atticus.

Sp. Lúcrētius, Sp. Lúcrētii, m. after being edile, was elected prætor in 207 B. C., when Gallia became his province, in which he was continued during the following year, that he might rebuild the city of Gēnūa, Genoa, which had been demolished by Māgo, a Carthaginian. He was one of the three ambassadors sent, four years after, to Carthage, to remonstrate against the proceedings of Hāmīlcar (Liv. xxviii. 38 seq.).—2. A prætor sent by the consul Q. Mārcius Philippus, to take possession of the forts about Tēmpē, which the Macedonians had deserted in 171 B. C. In them Lúcrētius found plenty of grain and other necessities, which were of great service to the Roman army (Liv. xlii. 9 seq.).

Sp. Lúcrētius Tricēpitīnus, Sp. Lúcrētii Tricēpitini, m. was præfect of Rome at the time his daughter Lúcrētia, wife of L. Tārcūtiū Cōllātinus, suffered violation from Sēxtus Tārcūtiū, son of L. Tārcūtiū, surnamed Sūpērbus, the Roman monarch. After his son-in-law had retired from the territory of Rome, and L. Jūnius Brūtus had fallen in battle, he was elected consul in 509 B. C., and died in office. M. Hōrātius Pūlvillus was elected in his stead, so that there were five consuls in the first year after the expulsion of the Tārcūtiī (Liv. i. 58).

T. Lúcrētius Cārus, T. Lúcrētii Cāri, m. was born at Rome in 95 B. C. In early life his parents sent him to Athens, where he studied for some time under Zēno and Phēdrus, and embraced the doctrines of Epicūrus. The tenets of that sect he has embodied in a poem, "De Natūrā rerum," consisting of six books, of which the poetry claims higher praise than either the imagination or philosophy of its author. He maintains the eternity of matter, and the materiality of the soul, denying the existence of a supreme Being, and a state of rewards and punishments, which he doubtless considered legitimate conclusions from the former premises. These notions, degrading to man, and subversive of his best interests and highest consolations, he has prosecuted with considerable ingenuity, considering his ignorance of the physical system of the universe, and his inaccurate knowledge of legitimate metaphysical discussion. His style is, in general, elevated, his versification harmonious; but the diction is not always chaste, and often obscure. Abstract reasoning seems repugnant to poetry, and logical precision unattainable in verse, hence few have excelled in didactic poetry, where the writer has only to lay down rules, or communicate information, a task of comparative facility in relation to the subject of Lúcrētius. He has not only to relate the doctrines of his sect, but has these doctrines to justify by abstract reasoning, besides his arguments must be subjected to the laws of metrical composition. To these difficulties, add, that the writer composed the greater part of his poem in the lucid intervals of mental derangement, and therefore his work must be considered a splendid testimony of human genius. It contains many grand and a few sublime passages, although as a whole it is not without great faults, and, as the bulwark of atheism, cannot be held in too great abhorrence. Soon after Lúcrētius had finished this poem, he put an end to his life, for which different reasons have been assigned, and of which the true cause may, perhaps, be found in the doctrine which he espoused, incompatible with fortitude and resignation. Cicero is said to have revised his work, which must be understood as applying solely to the language, for the opinions of the orator were very different in many instances from those of the poet. His ideas of the merits of that work will be found in Epis. ad Quint. frat. ii. 11. "Lúcrētii poemā, ut scribis, ita sent; non multis luminibus ingenii, multae tamen artis. Sed quum veneris, virum te putabo, si Sallustii Empēdōclēa legeris; hominem non putabo." Cōrnēlius Nēpos considers Lúcrētius and Cātūllus the most elegant poets of their age (Att. 12). Ovidius allows him elegance, acuteness, and sublimity, but complains of his obscurity (Amor. i. 15. 23 &c.).

T. Lúcrētius Tricēpitīnus, T. Lúcrētii Tricēpitini, m. was elected consul in 508 B. C., when he aided his colleague in a successful attack on the Etruscī. Four years after, he was re-elected consul with P. Vībērius Pūblīcōla, with whom he had formerly borne the same office (Liv. ii. 8—16).

Lúcrinus, a, um, et, Lúcrinēnsis, is, e. Lúcrinus lācus, the Lake of Licola, a lake of Cāmpānia, Campania, adjoining to that of Avērnus, the Lake of Averno. Strābo says, that it extended to Baie, that the sea was excluded by a mole or rampart, the work of Hērclēs, eight stādīa long, and so broad that a chariot could drive along, that after this rampart had been partly washed away by the storms, Agrippa repaired it so that it admitted ships of no great burden. According to some authors, this lake was also called Achērūsiā. Suetōnius states, that Augustus formed a harbour at Baie, to which he gave the name of Portus Jūlius, in honour of his grand-uncle, C. Jūlius Cæsar, by letting the sea into this lake and that of Avēnus. In this harbour during the whole winter, he trained to the use of the oar twenty thousand slaves whom he had manumitted (Aug. 16). This explains Virgilius (G. ii. 161–164). The lake was famous for oysters (Juv. Sat. iv. 141). It was nearly filled up by an earthquake in the year 1538. Lucrina ostræa (Plin. ii. 259). Lucrinenses res (Civ. Att. iv. 10).

Lucterius, i. m. one of the nation of the Cadurci, hence called Cadureus, a man of great intrepidity, whom Caesar sent against the Ruteni (Ces. B. G. vii. 5 seq.).

Lucumo, anis, m. son of Damārius, a Corinthian, and husband of Tanāquil, who, on removing from Tarquinii to Rome, took the name of L. Tarquinius Priscus q. v.—2. A native of Clustum, Chiusi, a young man of great fortune, who corrupted the wife of Aruns his guardian (Liv. v. 33). See Aruns.

Lucus, i. f. Luc, a free town of the Vōcontii, which Vālēns would have burned in the year 69, had they not ransomed their city by a considerable sum, and by other means which history blushes to name (Tac. Hist. i. 66).—2. Asturum, Oviedo, a town in the N. of Spain.—3. Augusta, Lugo, another town of Spain, in the province of Gallicia.

Lugdunum, anciently Lugudunum, i. m. Lyons, a large and ancient town of Gallia, France, at the junction of Rhōdānus, the Rhone, and Arar, the Saone. The houses are high, and well built, the population amounts to two hundred and thirty thousand, and the inhabitants excel in manufacturing silk. There is a stone bridge over the Rhone at Lyons, where the river is nearly a thousand feet broad, and, although rapid, it is sometimes frozen over. Here was a temple dedicated to Augustus, and a celebrated altar, frequently mentioned by Roman authors, on the point at the junction of the Rhone and Saone, called Atanacum, the Point of Aims. The emperor Cārācālla was born at Lugdunum, Lyons (Aur. Vic. Ep. 21), as was also Claudius (Suet. Claud. 2). Near this town, the emperor L. Septimius Sēverus gained a decisive victory over Dēcimius Clōdus Albinus, a rival competitor for the empire, in the year 197. Adj. Lugdunensis, is. e. Lugdunensis ora, the altar at Lyons (Juv. Sat. i. 44), at which the emperor Cālgūla appointed a contest for pre-eminence in Grecian and Roman oratory. Those who excelled received rewards from those who failed, and the latter were compelled to write speeches in their praise. The regulations obliged the worst speakers to blot out with a sponge, or their tongue, what they had written, unless they preferred being chastised with rods, or plunged into the nearest river (Suet. Cal. 20). Lugdunensis Gallia, a district of Gaul, of which Lugdunum, Lyons, was the capital (Tac. Hist. ii. 59).

Lugōtorix, Igis, m. an officer of high rank and noble birth, taken prisoner in the attack which the British made on Caesar's naval camp (Ces. B. G. v. 22).

Luna, e. f. Erixi, a town, harbour, and promontory of Etruria, Tuscany, on Mæra, the Magra. Inh. Lunenses, ium, m. Adj. Lunensis, is. e. Lunensis ager, the territory belonging to Luna (Liv. xxxiv. 56). Lunæ (marmor) (Plin. v. 288).

Lupercus, i. m. a name given by the Romans to Pan, probably derived from Lycus, a wolf (following the idea of the Greeks with respect to Lycæus); and erectus, driving away, as he was supposed to protect the flocks from the wolves. His statue was covered with a goat's skin (Just. xliii. 4). Lupercal, alis, n. a large dark cave, at the bottom of mōns Palātīnus, called by the Greeks Lycæum, from a temple built there, by Evander to Lycæus (Pan), whose worship he established in Italy, whence it is manifest that the worship of Pan in Arcadia, and at mōns Palātīnus, was originally the same. The name seems to be derived from Lycæus, or Luceus, properly speaking an adjective (belonging to a wolf), and ought to be so understood, whether applied to the mountain or to Pan, the noun in both cases being often suppressed, but sometimes not, as Lycæus Pan (Virg. Æn. viii. 344). Ovidius derives it from Lūpa, in reference to the fiction of Rōmulus and Rēmus being suckled by a wolf (Fast. ii. 267 seq.). This seems also to be the opinion of Plūtarchus. In it, or its immediate vicinity, were several small fountains. Luperci, orum (Sing. Lupercus, i), n. the priests of Pan, or Faunus. Lupercalia (sacra), festivals in honour of Pan or Faunus, celebrated on the third day after the Ides of February, and repeated on the Nones of December, under the name of Fauālia, when the worshippers were clothed with goatskins (Just. xliii. 1).

Lupercus, i. m. a man to whom Martialis addresses several odes.

Lūppia, e. m. the Lippe, a river of Germany, one of the branches of the Rhine (Tac. Ann. i. 60).

Lūrda, e. m. a river which has its source in mount Taurus (Sal. Frag. 2).

M. Lūlius, M. Lūrii, m. a commander under Augustus, whom he appointed governor of Sardinia. From Vellēus Pāterculus he appears to have had a command in the naval engagement at Actium, with M. Antonius (ii. 85).

Lūscinla, e. f. a nightingale. Ictu this bird, Philōmēla, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, was changed, after she and her sister, Prōcnē, had served up to Tērēus, king of Thracia, the body of his son Ity, in revenge for the injury which that monarch had done to Philōmēla (Ov. Met. vi. 424 seq.).

Lūscinus, i. m. a prince in the south of Spain, who appears to have had great interest, for he was joined by the two principal cities, Bārdo and Cārdo, with the design of taking up arms against the Romans, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 21).

C. Lūscius, C. Lūsell, m. a sister's son of C. Mārtius, and a tribune of the soldiers, killed by C. Plōtius q. v. (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Lūsi, orum, m. Suthend, a town of Arcadia (Paus. viii. 18).

Lūsitānia, e. f. Portugal, anciently a part of Spain, the boundaries of which were different at different times. It received this name from the Lūsitāni, the most powerful tribe who inhabited that country at the time it was invaded by the Romans. At one period, Lūsitānia seems to have extended nearly from Prōmōntōrium Sacerum, Capē St. Vincent, to Prōmōntōrium Trifūcium, Capē Oringat, including all the western part of the Peninsula of Spain. Its limits on the E.

were not precisely ascertained. By a later division, Lusitania was bounded on the W. and S. by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the N. by the river Durius, the Douro. It then corresponded nearly to modern Portugal, only it included part of the provinces of Leon and Extremadura, which now belong to Spain. Portugal contains 27,280 square miles, and the population is supposed to exceed two millions. Inh. Lusitani, orum (Sing. Lusitanus, i), m. the Portuguese, were, in ancient times, a brave people, and did not tamely submit to the domination of Rome. Yet, in 186 B. C., C. Calpurnius Piso, praetor, triumphed over them and the Celtiberians, and, six years after, L. Postumius Albinus, for his victory over the Lusitani, had the same honour (Liv. xxxix. 42 seq.). Adj. Lusitanus, a, um.

Lusius Geta, Lusii Getae, m. a commander of the praetorian bands, under the emperor Claudius, in the year 48, an office of which he was deprived three years after, through the influence of Agrippina (Tac. Ann. xi. 31 seq.).

Lusius Satrius, Lusii Satrii, m. a man whose death formed one of the charges against P. Scyllus (Tac. Ann. xlii. 43).

Lusones, um, m. a people of Spain, to the south of Iberus, the Ebro (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 278).

Lutricus Brutianus, Lutrici Brutiani, m. a Roman poet, who flourished in the reign of Trajanus, highly praised by Martialis (iv. 23), and commended by Plinius the younger, for his integrity, which he proved by the evidence of Montanus Atticus, who had accused him to the emperor (vi. 22).

Lustrum, i, n. a purification, or expiatory sacrifice, at the conclusion of the census, by Sacrosanctia (q. v.). Of this term various derivations are given, one from lustrum, because the victims, before they were sacrificed, were led round the people, which appears to have been the original meaning of the verb, afterwards it signified to encompass, to survey; another from lucro, which is supported by Varro, because the taxes were then paid. Candere lustrum, to finish the purification, or the census; seldom perficere lustrum. From its being held at the end of every fifth year, lustrum came to signify a period of five years (Liv. i. 28; Hor. Od. ii. 4. 24). The Romans purified their fleets in this manner. Altars were placed on the extremity of the shore, the ships, with their entire crews, were drawn up in order, in the deepest silence; they sacrificed victims standing in the sea, afterwards they carried the symbols of expiation thrice around the fleet in boats, the commanders sailing along with them, and praying that all unlucky omens might be averted from the fleet to these expiations. Afterwards they divided the bowels of the victims, threw part into the sea, burned part upon the altars, the whole belonging to the fleet supplicating earnestly for success (Ap. Bel. Civ. 727).

Lutarius, i, m. a Gallic chieftain, who, with Leodorus, conducted a number of their countrymen into Asia Minor, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 16). See Gallia.

Lutatus, a, um. Lutitia gens, a Roman clan, of which the most distinguished branch was that of the Catuli (Val. Max. ix. 2). Lutitia (uobilitas, v. domus) (Tac. Hist. i. 15).

Lutatus Daphnis, Lutati Daphnides, m. a man of talents, and some distinction among grammarians, was born a slave, and purchased by Q. Catulus, who gave him his liberty (Suet. II. Gram. 3).

C. Lutatius, C. Lutatii, m. appointed a commissioner, along with C. Servilius and T. Annius, for settling a colony at Placentia, Placenza, in 220 B. C. He was seized by the Boii, and rescued, with C. Servilius, from slavery, by the Roman consul, C. Servilius Geminus, the son of the latter, after a lapse of fifteen years (Liv. xxi. 25 seq.).

C. Lutatius Catulus, C. Lutatii Catuli, m. held the office of consul with A. Postumius Albinus, in 244 B. C. At the island Ægates, he gained a complete victory over the Carthaginian fleet, which, with their former defeats, obliged that nation to make peace with the Romans. This was the conclusion of the first Punic war. Lutatius appears to have formed a treaty with the Carthaginians, which the Romans declared invalid, although he was then consul, because it was unsanctioned either by the senate or the people; for that reason, a new treaty was concluded. Livius says, that the former entered into by Lutatius was conditional, and consequently not obligatory (Liv. Ep. 19 seq.). To him, and to his destruction of the Carthaginian fleet, Claudius alludes (xviii. 455), and Silius Italicus (vi. 687).

Cn. Lutatius Cereus, Cn. Lutatii Cereonis, m. consul in 243 B. C., the year after the first Punic war terminated, and in which a treaty of peace was confirmed (Liv. xxx. 44).—2. One of five ambassadors sent by the senate to Macedonia, to examine the state of affairs in that country, in 175 B. C. They afterwards proceeded to Alexandria, where they renewed a treaty of friendship with Ptolemy (Liv. xlii. 6).

Q. Lutatius Catulus, Q. Lutatii Catuli, m. was consul with C. Marius (4), in 104 B. C. When proconsul, the Cimbri drove him from the Alps, where he had possessed himself of the narrow passes, had crested a castle on Athēsis, the Adige, and had left it. He then joined his forces with those of C. Marius, and their united army obtained a decisive victory over the Cimbri, killing a hundred and sixty thousand, and making sixty thousand prisoners (Liv. Ep. 68). Eutropius makes the number of the slain two hundred thousand, and that of the prisoners eighty thousand, adding that their general Teutobodus was amongst the slain, and that for this victory Marius was made consul, the fifth time. According to this author, Q. Lutatius Catulus was then consul, and not proconsul, as stated in the epitome of Livius. From the Cimbrian spoils, Lutatius built a portico on the site of the house of M. Fulvius Flaccus, who fell with C. Sempronius Gracchus, which Cicero calls Monumentum Catuli. In the war between L. Cornélius Sulla and C. Marius, he embraced the interest of the former, and the latter had no sooner obtained the ascendancy, than he doomed Catulus to death. The savage cruelty of Marius repulsed the numerous intreaties made by the friends of Lutatius for his life, and Florus states, that he delivered himself from the mockery of his enemies by swallowing fire. This brave Roman shut himself up in a newly plastered room, and kindled a large fire, which extracted the moisture, and the pestilential vapour soon proved fatal (Flor. iii. 21). Perhaps this historian meant, that the inhalation of the noxious air was nearly the same in effect as the fire which caused it would have been in the stomach. From the writings of Cicero, Lutatius appears to have been an elegant scholar, and an author of considerable merit (Brut. 35 &c.).—2. Son of Q. Lutatius Catulus, a Roman of great distinction, who merited, by his love of country and virtuous conduct, the approbation of his fellow-citizens. He held the consulship (80 B. C.) with M. Aemilius Lepidus, whom he drove out of Italy, because he excited a new war in attempting to rescind the acts of L. Cornilius Sulla. Ten years after, he rebuilt the temple of Jupiter, in the capitol, which had been consumed by fire (Liv. Ep. 90, 98). Florus commends him for the moderation with which he and Cn. Pompeius acted, on quelling these disturbances, and adds, that they were satisfied with having restored peace. Of this excellent man, it ought to be recorded to his honour, that he was the last Prince of the senate, a high dignity suppressed first by the Triumviri and afterwards by the emperors. Aristocratic in his politics, he opposed, with all the influence in his power, the measures of C. Julius Caesar, who prevailed against him in his canvass for the office of Pontifex Maximus. Nor is this wonderful. His heart despised deceit and stratagem, and his patriotism abhorred aggrandizement to the injury of the state. A stranger to flattery and adulation, he reprov'd, with equal openness, the levity of the multitude, and the misconduct of the senate. With him all was subservient to the advantage of the state, and the promotion of virtue. He opposed investing Cn. Pompeius with extraordinary power for the suppression of the Sicilian pirates, because he considered it greater than the safety of the republic permitted. Although the intimate friend of that great man, he harangued the people on that topic, and, finding them deaf to the interest of the republic, he advised them not to expose a man of so great valour to so many dangers, adding, "Should he lose his life at sea, where can you find such another?" THEE, O CATULUS! exclaimed the whole assembly, on which he retired. The commonwealth enjoyed the benefit of his counsel, and example of his virtuous life, during a long period. In the judgment of M. Tullius Cicero, he was one of the wisest and most excellent of the Romans. His speeches discovered considerable elegance, learning, and judgment, yet Cicero does not reckon him among the number of orators. By him was Tullius saluted with the title of FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, and the Orator introduces him as one of the speakers in his Academies. The traitor, Catilina, wrote to Lutatius after he had reared the standard of rebellion, and Sallustius has preserved a copy of that letter (Cat. 34, 35). To him Tacitus alludes (Hist. iii. 72).

Q. Lutatius Cereus, Q. Lutatii Cereonis, m. was elected consul in 243 B. C. with A. Manlius Torquatus q. v. (Eutrop. ii. 28).

Lutetia, æ, f. L. Lutetia Parisiorum, Paris, now the capital of France, was originally a fortress on a small island in Sequana, the Seine; but it had become a town, before Cæsar's invasion of that country (Cæs. B. G. vi. 3 seq.). There are other two islands in the Seine at Paris covered with buildings, and connected with each other and the town, by means of bridges. It is situated in a plain on both sides of the Seine, of a circular form, and upwards of eleven miles in circumference. The population is not certainly known. By some the inhabitants are computed to amount to 600,000, and by others, not to exceed 400,000.

Lütia, æ, f. a rich town in Spain, about three hundred stadia from Numania (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 308).

C. Lütorius Priscus, C. Lütörli Prisel, m. a Roman knight, who wrote an excellent poem on the death of Germanicus, for which he received a reward from the emperor Tiberius. His tragical fate exhibits a fearful state of society at Rome, at that period. Drusus had been taken ill, and Lütorius wrote another elegy from which he expected to derive similar or greater emolument, if the prince died. This poem formed the ground of a charge against him, and Haterius Agrippa, consul elect, proposed that the poet should suffer death. Two senators only moved, that he should be banished; all the rest assented to the motion of Agrippa, and the poet having been hurried away was immediately strangled in prison (Tac. Ann. iii. 49 seq.).

Lýceus, i, m. a Greek name of Bæchus, equivalent in signification to Liber q. v. Adj. Lýceus, a, um (Virg. En. i. 686).

Lýcæbas, æ, m. an Assyrian killed by Perseus (Ov. Met. v. 69).—2. A man who had been banished from Tuscany for murder. He was the intimate friend of Atys, and one of the sailors whom Bæchus, for refusing to fulfil their promise, changed into dolphins (Ov. Met. iii. 673).—3. A centaur, who was for some time present in the battle with the Læpithæ, but afterwards sought safety in flight (Ov. Met. xii. 302).

Lýcæbessos, i, m. a mountain of Attica, fertile in olives (Stat. Th. xii. 621).

Lýceus, v. Lýceus, i, m. Tetragi, or, Diæforti, was sometimes called Olympus, Kotylion, Elaion, and Nomia; a mountain in Arcadia, an inland district in Peloponnesus, the Morea, in which was a grove sacred to Pan, who is hence called Lýceus. The name is derived from the Greek word signifying a wolf. Avërsa a völe (loca) gelidi Lýcei, the parts of cold Lýceus turned away from the sun, i. e. the sunless parts of cold Tetragi (Stat. Th. iv. 250). Adj. Lýceus, a, um, of Lýceus, of Arcadia, Arcadian. Lýceus deus, Pan. Terror Lýcei dei, a panic (Val. Flacc. vi. 533). Lýceus collis (Ov. Met. i. 698). Lýceia (sacra), games celebrated on this mountain in honour of Pan, which the Romans called Lupercalia q. v.

Lýcambes, æ, m. father of Nébülë, who promised her in marriage to the poet Archilochus, but afterwards violated his promise, and gave her to a wealthier lover. Indignant at his perfidy, Archilochus wrote a poem against him in a strain of such cutting sarcastic wit, that both father and daughter hanged themselves in despair. To this Hëratius alludes, and calls Archilochus genet, from his being the betrothed husband of Nébülë (Epid. vi. 13). Adj. Lýcambes, a, um. Si qua tell' mädent Lýcambes sanguine, if any weapons are wet with the blood of Lýcambes, i. e. if any lines are written with such severity, as to impel the subject of them to suicide (Mart. vii. 11).

Lýcaon, ónis, m. son of Pelásgus, an impious king of Arcádia, an inland district of Peloponnesus, the Morea, whom Jupiter turned into a wolf, for having murdered one of his hostages, and served up his flesh to him when his guest, in order to prove his divinity. Arcádoe Tyranni, of the Arcadian king, i. e. of Lýcaon (Ov. Met. i. 218). Lýcaónis, idos, f. Callistó, the daughter of Lýcaon. Adj. Lýcaónius, a. um. Lýcaónia Arctos, the Ursa Major, into which Callistó, daughter of Lýcaon, was changed after her death (Ov. Fast. iii. 793), called Lýcaónia ursa (Stat. Th. iv. 304).—2. A son of Príamus by Láothoe, a concubine, whose thorax Páris wore in the battle with Ménélaus. Achilles took him captive to Lémnus where the son of Iáson ransomed him, sent him to Aríada, whence he escaped, returned to his father's house, and, after spending there eleven days, on the twelfth fell again into the hands of Achilles who put him to death (Hom. Il. iii. 333 seq.).—3. A prince of Lýcia, and father of Pándarus (Hom. Il. iv. 89).

Lýcaónia, m. f. part of Karamania, of which the capital was Íconium, Konieh. Strictly speaking, Lýcaónia was included in Phrygia, and formed the southeast part of that district. It was given by the Romans to Euménès, king of Asia, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). The district is now called Kunyah. Inh. Lýcaónes, um. m. Adj. Lýcaónius, a. um. Lýcaónius Erýcetes, Erýcetes, a native of Lýcaónia (Virg. Æn. x. 749).

Lýcas, ádis, f. a woman mentioned by Márcialis (l. 72).

Lýcaste, es. f. a Cretan nymph, one of Diana's attendants, whose name appears to have been derived from her hunting wolves (Claud. xxiv. 252).—2. A woman of Lémnus, who killed her brother *Cýdimo*s with great ferocity and barbarity. To this horrid act her mother forced her, after she had slain her husband. To her, or, at least, to one of her name, Hýpsípýle gave her twin sons by Iáson to be brought up (Stat. Th. v. 226 seq.).

Lýcastus, i. f. a city of Créta, so called from Lýcastus, a son of *Míno*s, its founder (Hom. Il. ii. 647).—2. A river of Póntus.

Lýcē, es. f. an Amazon, wounded in the war betwixt the Argonauts and Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 574).—2. A woman of Tuscan parentage, to whom Hóratius addresses Ode iii. 10 and iv. 13. The latter ode does more credit to the animation and elegance of the poet, than to the feelings and dispositions of the man. From these poems, Lýcē does not appear in a very respectable point of view. The latter indeed goes to prove that she was a woman of abandoned character, and of vicious habits.

Lýces. See Lýcus.

Lýcētus, i. m. a man killed by Pérsēs at his nuptial feast. He was the son of Spércheius, the Agriónela, hence called Spércheiônides, a. m. (Ov. Met. x. 86).

Lýceum, i. m. one of the three principal gymnasias appropriated to the education of the youth at Athens. It stood on the banks of Iáusus, and received its name from Apóllō (Διογενὲς τῷ Ἀπολλωνί), to whom it was dedicated, and whose statue was placed at the entrance. Beautiful paintings ornamented the walls, and the gardens were laid out with great elegance. Uncertainty with respect to the builder must be admitted, probably a consequence of its having been enlarged and embellished at different periods. Philippus, king of Macedónia, burned it to the ground in 202 B. C. At the same time he destroyed Cýnosarges, another of the gymnasias, and whatever was beautiful about Athens (Liv. xxxi. 24).

Lýcheus, i. m. a man in the Carthaginian army, who caused the death of Cýdnus (Sil. Ital. xiv. 434).

Lýchnidus, i. f. Larida, a village of the Dassáretili, a people of Illyricum, which was taken in 210 B. C. by Erópus, who had bribed the commander of the garrison and citadel (Liv. xxvii. 32).

Lýcia, a. f. anciently Milyas, a country of Asia Minor, bounded by Cária on the W., Phrygia on the N., Pamphylia on the E., and the Mediterranean on the S. There was also a Lýcia in Phrygia. The Roman nobility purchased slaves from this country, and Phrygia, from their being elegant and handsome (Juv. Sat. xi. 147). Inh. Lýcii, orum (Sing. Lýcius, i.), m. ordered by the Romans to be free, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 15). Adj. Lýcius, a. um. of Lýcia, Trojan. Lýcii Sarpédonis, of the Lycian Sarpédon, i. e. of Sarpédon, king of Lýcia (Ov. Met. xiii. 255). Lýcium mare (Tac. Hist. ii. 60).

Lýcidas, a. m. a lovely youth (Virg. B. vii. 67).—2. A boy of great beauty (Hor. Od. i. 4. 19).—3. A centaur, killed in the battle with the Lapithæ, by Drýas (Ov. Met. xii. 310).—4. A man killed by a grappling hook, in the naval engagement between the fleets of C. Julius Cæsar and the inhabitants of Marseilles. Lýcinius has beautifully described his death (Phar. iii. 635—646). The poet is said to have died repeating these lines, after he had opened his veins, to procure his own death, in obedience to the order of the Roman emperor Néro.

Lýcimnius, i. m. a son of Elctryon and Mídea, who, having been preserved when his brothers were killed, went to Théba, Thera, with Amphitrýon, whose sister, Périmède, he married. By her he had three sons, Geópus, Argéus, and Mélas. Tlepólemus unintentionally killed him by throwing at his servant a stick, which missed him, and struck Lýcimnius. Adj. Lýcimnius, et. Lýcimnius, a. um. Lýcimnia arx, a citadel, or fort, in Argolis, about twelve stádja distant from Nauplia, so called from Lýcimnius (Strab. 541). Lýcimnium stagnum, a lake of Argolis (Stat. Th. iv. 734).

Lýciána, a. f. a girl to whom Propertius formed a very early attachment (iii. 15. 6).

Lýcisca, a. f. a woman of lewd practices (Mart. iv. 17).—2. An abandoned woman (Juv. Sat. vi. 123).

Lýcisca, a. f. a dog's name, either a wolf dog, or a mongrel, between a dog and a wolf (Virg. B. iii. 18).

Lýciscē, es. f. (Wolf), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 220).

Lýciscus, i. m. a praetor of the Ætolii, who, with Tisippus, put five hundred and fifty of the chief of the Ætolians to death (Liv. xlv. 28).—2. A youth who boasted that he surpassed girls in effeminacy (Hor. Epod. xl. 24).

Lýclus, i. m. the guide who conducted Alexander the Great into Persia, and whose services he rewarded with a present of thirty talents (Curt. v. 7).

Lýco, ónis, m. an Achaean, who commanded the Ætolians and Boeotians in the army of Përsëus in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 51).

Lýcônêdes, is, m. king of Scýros, Sciro, an island in Marc' Egëum, the Archipelago, at whose court Achilles was brought up disguised in a female dress, to prevent his being known, and, by this deception, to save his life; because his mother knew, that, if he joined the Grecian army, he would inevitably fall at Troy (Stat. Ach. i. 207).—2. Son of Crëon, a Grecian nobleman, the friend of Lëocrítus (Hom. Il. ix. 84 seq.).—3. Son of Æschreás, a Greek of great bravery, and the first who boarded an enemy's ship in the battle off Artëmisíum (Herod. viii. 11).

Lýcon, ónis, f. a town of Spain, in the country of the Västëñani, at which six thousand of the Romans were killed, in 192 B. C., under L. Æmilius, proconsul (Liv. xxxvii. 46).

Lýcôphon, ônitis, m. a Boeotian killed by Týdëus. He was one of the fifty commanded by Etëocles to murder that hero, as he returned from Theca to Argos (Stat. Th. ii. 610).

Lýcôphônites, æ, m. a noble Theban, son of Antôphônus (Hom. Il. iv. 395).—2. A Trojan, who fell by the hand of Téucer (Hom. Il. viii. 275 seq.).

Lýcôphron, ónis, m. a Greek poet, who was born at Châlëis, Egripo, a town of Eubœa, Negropont. He wrote tragedies, which Ovidius has forcibly expressed in one word, Côthurnatus. All his dramatic compositions are lost; but a poem called Cássandra has been transmitted, which Státius censures for its obscurity (Syl. v. 3. 157). According to Ovidius, he lost his life by an arrow from the bow of an opponent, when he had engaged in a contest for the superiority among ancient poets (Ibis 531).—2. Son of Mästör, killed by Héctor, Mästörídes, æ, m. Lýcôphron (Hom. Il. xxv. 430 seq.).

Lýcôreus, ëos, m. a priest of Apóllo, unintentionally killed by Amphílaräus (Stat. Th. vii. 715).

Lýcôrias, ädis, f. a sea nymph, one of Cyrene's train (Virg. G. iv. 339).

Lýcôris, ädis, f. a woman to whom C. Cornélius Gallus was much attached. She appears to have slighted him, and to have preferred another (Virg. B. x. 2).—2. Another, distinguished for her small forehead, which the ancients esteemed beautiful. She was ardently in love with Cýrus (Hor. Od. I. 33. 5).

Lýcôrmas, æ, m. a man who killed Pëttäus at the marriage feast of Përsëus, by a piece of wood torn from the door post (Ov. Met. v. 119).—2. A Saguntine, twin-brother of Earýmëdon, to whom he bore a very striking resemblance. Both killed themselves rather than surrender to Hannibal, when their native city fell into his hands (Sil. Ital. ii. 637 seq.).

Lýcôrmas, æ, m. a river of Ætöña, the banks of which were of a golden colour, hence, Ælëma Lýcôrmas (Val. Flacc. iii. 544). It was afterwards called Evënus, the Phidari, from a king of that name, who threw himself into it, and was drowned. Cëntaurëus Lý- côrmas, from Nëssus, a centaur, who was ferryman of that river (Stat. Th. iv. 836).

Lýcôrtas, æ, m. a native of Mëgälopölis, who commanded the cavalry in a battle which Philöpeemen, prætor of the Achæi, fought with Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, in 194 B. C. From Livius, Lýcôrtas must have been a man both of influence and distinction; but his name has been rendered more remarkable, by his being the father of the historian Pölybius. The pages of Livius record some favourable specimens of his oratory, integrity, and political knowledge (Liv. xxxv. 29 seq.).

Lýcôtas, æ, m. husband of Arëthüsa, to whom Pröpertius, in her name, writes a beautiful epistle (iv. 3).—2. A centaur, whom Thëseus stretched on the ground by a blow with an oaken stick (Ov. Met. xii. 350).

Lýctus, i. f. Lassiti, or, Licto, an inland town of Crëta, Candia, taken along with many other cities in that island, by Q. Cæcilius Métëllus, proconsul, 69 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 99). Stëphänus says it was so called from Lýctas, a son of Lýcäon; but others call it Lýttos, from its elevated situation. Lýctëis, Idis, f. of Lýctus, applied to females, or to nouns feminine. Adj. Lýctius, a, um, of Lýctus, Cretan. Lýctius Idömönëus, Cretan Idömönëus, from his being a native, and king, of that island (Virg. En. iii. 401).

Lýcürgus, i. m. the famous legislator, was the son of Eunömus, king of Spärta, and younger brother of Pölydëctes, whom he succeeded in the throne. On learning afterwards that his brother's widow was pregnant, he resigned the crown, and acted merely as tutor to the unborn heir. His integrity refused, with contempt, the offer made him by his brother's widow, that she would procure an abortion, on condition that he married her. During the minority of his nephew, whose name was Chärläus, he conducted the administration with the utmost propriety and faithfulness, which, however, did not exempt him from misrepresentation and reproach, excited, most probably, by the resentment of the slighted widow. Yielding to the unjust calumny of his countrymen, he quitted his native city, travelled into foreign countries, where he obtained such extensive information and celebrity of character, that the Spartans invited him to return. To rectify the numerous abuses which had crept into the administration during his absence, he consulted the Delphian oracle, and the sanction of the priestess enabled him to accomplish the reformation of the state. He established the strictest temperance, united with the most correct discipline which had ever been known, and enacted a number of laws, admirably calculated to produce the effect which he intended. After his death, the Lacedæmonians built a temple to him, as to a god (Paus. iii. 16). If Livius be correct in his dates, the code of Lýcürgus must have been formed, 891 B. C. Seven hundred years after that date, the laws of Lýcürgus were abolished by Philöpeemen, prætor of the Achæi, who had compelled the Lacedæmonians to submission, and obliged them to adopt the laws and institutions of the Achæi, their conquerors. Fortis Lýcürgus (Mänil. i. 771).—2. A king of part of Thräcia, Romania, son of Drýas, whom Bæchus put to death for violating his rites, hence called Sacrilégus. This does not appear to have been precisely the idea of Hómērus, who, in a highly poetic description, makes him destroy the vines, and put Bāchus to flight, who, in great trepidation, goes under the waves, and is received by Thētis. By the latter idea, Hómērus probably meant that he was the first who mixed water with wine, and thus rendered it less injurious to his subjects. The gods were enraged at his conduct towards Bāchus, and Jūpiter first deprived him of sight, and then put him to death (Hom. II. vi. 130 seq.). From his cutting the vines with an axe, Ovídius calls him Bipēnnifer (Met. iv. 22).—3. An Arcadian, the father of Ancēus and Cēphēus. Lŷcūrgēs, æ, m. a patronymic of Ancēus (Ov. Ibis 503).—4. A son of Phēres, and brother of Admētus, who dwelt near Nēmēa, and married Eurydicē, or, according to others, Amphithēa, by whom he had a son, Ophētes. Isūchius Lŷcūrgus, to distinguish him from others of that name, particularly the Thracian Lŷcūrgus (Stat. Th. iv. 742).—5. A son of Hērclēs by Hēsichēe.—6. A son of Alēus and Nēera, who was the father of Ancēus, Epōchus, Amphidāmas, and Ideus, by Clēōphīlē, or, Eurymōnē.—7. Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, who drove out Agēsīpōlis, the heir of the crown, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 26). From Jūstinus, the date appears to have been earlier (xxix. 1).

Lŷcus, i, m. son of Hŷrīōus, and the nymph Clōnia, who, with his brother Nŷctēus, having killed Phlēgŷas, fled to Hŷria, and afterwards deprived Lālus of the kingdom of Thēba, Theba. At a future period, he killed Epōpēus, and carried off his wife, Antiōpē, whose treatment her sons Zēthus and Amphion avenged, by putting Lŷcus to death.—2. Son of Dāscŷlus, a native of Mŷsīa, whom Hērclēs assisted, and whose territory that hero enlarged. In gratitude for these good offices, he called the country Hōrāclēa.—3. King of the Māriāndŷni, and brother of Otreus, who treated the Argonauts kindly and hospitably. His name occurs frequently in the poem of Valērius Flācŷus (iv. 173 seq.).—4. A centaur, killed by Pīrithōus in the battle with the Lāpithæ (Ov. Met. xii. 332).—5. A companion of Diōmēdes, who was changed into a bird (Ov. Met. xiv. 504).—6. A companion of Ānēas, whose fate he laments (Virg. Ān. i. 222).—7. Another Trojan in the army of Ānēas, who, with the aged Hēlēnor, escaped from a turret which Turnus had set on fire, and who, soon after, fell by the hand of that hero (Virg. Ān. ix. 545—566).—8. Son of Nēptūnus and Cēlēnō, whom his father carried to the Islands of the Happy.—9. A son of Pāndion, and brother of Āgēus, Pallas, and Nisus. From him the Lŷciāns derived their name.—10. A brave man, who fought in the army of Etēocles, in the Theban war, and attacked Hippōmēdon as he attempted to carry off the dead body of Tŷdēus. He and Mōges had the charge of the watch, during the night preceding which Hippōmēdon and Pārthēnōpēus had fallen (Stat. Th. ix. 106 seq.).—11. A Saguntine, killed by Asbŷtē during the siege of his native town (Sil. Ital. ii. 177).—12. An old man mentioned by Hōrātius, who was probably an unpleasant neighbour (Od. iii. 19. 24).

Lŷcus, i, f. a city of the Hŷrīā, in the country of the Dāssāretī, which had been under the dominion of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, and was given to Plēurātēs at the conclusion of the war with Philippus, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 34). Some consider it the same with Lŷchnīdus q. v.

Lŷcus, i, m. the Kolci-hisar, a river of Pōntus, which joins Iris, the Jezil-Erneh (i. e. the green river), which falls into the gulf Lēuco-sŷrōrum Æon, i. e. The crech of the white Syrians. Valērius Flācŷus calls it Flāvus Lŷces (iv. 719).—2. A river of Phŷrgia, which runs between Lāōdicēa, Eskihissar, and Hērāpōlis, Taluk Kolisi, afterwards falls into Mæander, the Meinder, below Colōssa, Chonos (Curt. iii. 1).—3. A river of Armēnia, now called the Bing-gheul, one of the branches of Euphrātes, El-Frat (Virg. G. iv. 367).—4. The Nahr Kelb (i. e. the river of the dog), a river of Sŷria, which is lost in the Mediterranean Sea, about thirty-three miles below Sidon, Saida.—5. The Greater Zab, a river of Assŷria, which D'Anville says the Greeks called Lŷcus, or the Wolf. It is the same river which is denominated by Xēnōphon, Zabātus, is one of the branches of Tigris, and is nearly as large as that river at their junction. Darius threw a bridge over this river (Curt. iv. 9).

Lŷdē, es, f. a woman of vicious morals (Hōr. Od. ii. 11. 23).—2. A seller of a particular drug which she pretended cured barrenness. The illiterate among the Greeks and Romans believed, that a spider shut up in a box, and carried in the bosom, rendered wives, naturally barren, prolific (Juv. Sat. ii. 141).—3. A woman mentioned by Mārŷtālīs (i. 72).

Lŷdia, æ, f. a woman with whom Hōrātius was in love, and who does not appear to have been one of the most respectable of her sex. Her name occurs frequently in his writings, and his attachment to her furnishes no proof either of the delicacy of his taste, or of his regard for female purity (Od. i. 8).—2. A silly woman mentioned by Mārŷtālīs (xi. 103). The poet addresses an epigram to a female of this name, who unquestionably was of the most vicious habits (xi. 22).

Lŷdia, æ, f. known also by the name of Mæōnia, a maritime district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the north by Mŷsīa; on the east by Phŷrgia; and on the south by Cāria. Cræsus, so famed for his riches, was king of Lŷdia, at whose death it fell under the power of Rōme. The Ionians took possession of the coast of this district, and, from their celebrity, the tract which they inhabited was called Ionīa. Plinius considers the latter as a separate district (i. 539). The chief city of Lŷdia was Sārdes, Sart, on the side of the mountain Tmolus, Buzdagh, from which the river Pactōlus flows. The Romans gave Lŷdia to Eumēnes, king of Asia, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Ion. Lŷdi, orum (Sing. Lŷdus, i, m. the Lydians. According to Hērōdōtus, the one half of the Lŷdi quitted their native country under the command of Tŷrrhēnus, their king's son, settled in Umbria, and from him were called Tŷrrhēni (i. 94). Livius says, that the Tūsci settled first in Tuscany, and afterwards possessed the shore of the Gulf of Venice towards the Alps, by sending out colonies. Their possessions were then very extensive, and their power must have been very great (v. 33). A late writer has rendered it probable, if not certain, that the Týrrhēni, or Týsci, were a Celtic nation, and that they migrated from the Alps into the more fertile parts of Italy. The Asiatic Lydians were of very vicious morals, and, in proof of this assertion, it is only necessary to refer to the manner in which their daughters procure their dowries (Herod. i. 93). According to Appianus, they introduced a kind of play called from them Ludio (Bel. Pun. 35). Adj. Lýdus, et, Lýdus, a, um, of Lýdia, or the Lýdi, also Etrurian or Tuscan. Lýdius Tibris, the Tuscan Tevere (Virg. Æn. ii. 781). Lýdius amnis, Páctolus (Tibul. iii. 3. 29). Lýdia pēna, Lydian tasks, i. e. the tasks imposed on Hērēdēs by Omphālē, queen of Lýdia (Mart. ix. 67). Lýdia urbes (Ov. Met. vi. 11). Lýdia gaza (Stat. Syl. v. 1. 60).

Lýdias, m, a branch of the Hálliacon (Herod. vii. 127).

Lýdus, i, m, son of Atys and Callithēa, and brother of Týrrhēnus, who reigned in Lýdia, and from whom that country had its name. See Maōnia.

Lýgdāmis, is, m, the father of Artēmisia (Herod. vii. 99).

Lýgdāmus, i, m, the servant of Cýnthia, to whom Prōpērtius addresses an elegy, and whose name occurs frequently in the writings of that poet (iii. 6).—2. A fictitious name, which occurs in Tibullus, considered by Heynius as equivalent to Albū (iii. 2. 29).—3. A slinger, who deprived Týrrhēnus of both his eyes at a single throw (Luc. Phar. iii. 710 seq.).

Lýgdos, i, f, a place in mount Taurus, from which marble of uncommon whiteness was obtained. Candida Lýgdos (Mart. vi. 13). Adj. Lýgdinus, a, um.

Lýgdus, i, m, a priest in the army of Etēōcles, wounded by Páthēnōpeus, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 764).—2. A man killed by Hannibal at the siege of Saguntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. i. 438).—3. A man mentioned several times by Mártiālis (xi. 42 &c.).—4. A eunuch, who, by order of Sējanus, administered poison to Drusus, which occasioned his death. From Tacitus, he appears to have been one of the worst of men, and confessed his guilt with respect to Drusus on the rack, after Apicāta, the widow of Sējanus, had brought the tragical event to light (Tac. Ann. iv. 8—11).

Lýmīra, es, f, Lýmīrē, es, f, Phineka, a town of Lýdia, which, from Strābo, appears to have stood on the river Lýmýrus. Here, says Velleius Pátērciūlus, C. Caesar, grandson of Augūstus, died (ii. 102).

Lýncēus, es, v, ēi, m, a man whose head Túrns cut off at a single blow (Virg. Æn. ix. 763 seq.).—2. Son of Aphāreus and Arēnē, the daughter of Gēbūlus, a man of remarkably quick sight, who was said to see whatever was concealed in the earth, and that darkness had no effect on his sight; but others maintained, that he did not see during the night. Hyginus explains the fiction of his eye penetrating the bowels of the earth, by stating, that he knew where metals were to be found. To his remarkable strength of vision, Hōrātius alludes (Epis. i. 1. 28). He was one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 304), and one of the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. l. 463).—3. A son of Egýptus, and husband of Hýpērcēnēstra. He was the grandfather of Prōtus and Arisius (Pin. Nem. x. 2).

Lýncēides, a, m, a man who killed Hýpēscūs, at the marriage of Pērsēus and Andrōmēda (Ov. Met. v. 99).

Lýncus, i, m, a Scythian king, who received into his house, and treated with kindness, Triptolēmus, whom Cēres had sent over the world to teach mankind the art of agriculture. This monarch, after he had received what information Triptolēmus had to communicate, anxious to secure to himself the honour of the invention, perfidiously attempted to murder his guest in his bed. Cēres interfered to preserve her favourite, arrested the hand of Lýncus, when lifted to perpetrate the crime, and punished his treachery by changing him into a lýnx (Ov. Met. v. 650 seq.).

Lýncus, i, f, the capital of Lýncēstis, a district of Mácedōnia, which received that name from Lýncēus, by whom it was built. Lýncēstis, Idis, f, of Lýncus, applied to females or nouns feminine. Lýncēstis aqua, which was acid to the taste, and when drunk in considerable quantities, intoxicated like wine (Plin. i. 253). Inh. Lýncēstae, arum, m. Adj. Lýncēstius, a, um. Lýncēstius amnis, Erigōnus, the Kutchuk Carasu (Ov. Met. xv. 329).

Lýrcēus, i, m, a fountain and mountain of Arcādia, or, according to Stēphānus, of Argōlis, in which Ināchus the Planizza had its rise. Adj. Lýrcēus, v. Lýrcēus, et, Lýrcēlus, a, um. Lýrcēa arva (Ov. Met. i. 598).

Lýrnēssus, i, f, a city of Mýsia, a district of Asia Minor, Natolia. The beautiful captive Briseis, who fell to the share of Achilles, in the division of the spoils obtained by the sacking of that city during the Trojan war, was a native of it, from which she is called Lýrnēssis, Idis, f. Adj. Lýrnēssius, a, um. Lýrnēssia maxia (Ov. Met. xii. 1083).

Lýsānder, dri, m, a Lacedæmonian general, son of Aristōclitus, or Aristōcritus, who owed his celebrity more to his good fortune than his merit. He brought the Peloponnesian war to a termination, after it had been carried on for twenty-six years, and that victory appears to have been a consequence of the insubordination of the Athenian forces, not of his generalship, or the valour of his troops. After he had taken the Athenian fleet at Ægos Pótamos, his ambition displayed itself in his attempt to retain all the states under his own authority, whilst he pretended, that he did it on account of the Lacedæmonians. With this view, he changed their form of government, and appointed ten men in each state, to govern, admitting none into that number, from whom he had not received assurance, that they would be entirely at his devotion. His countrymen set aside the Decemviral authority. Enraged at this measure, he formed the design of taking away the Lacedæmonian king, and of usurping the royal authority. For the success of this scheme, he knew that the assistance of the gods was necessary, and, therefore, attempted to bribe, first the oracle at Dēlphi, Castri, next that of Dōdōna, and, afterwards, that of Júpiter Ammon in Affrica. The priests of all these oracles not only refused his bribe, but those of Júpiter Ammon sent ambassadors to Lacedæmon, Mistræ, to accuse him of offering such an insult to the priests of the temple. 1. The judges acquitted him, on which he was sent to the assistance of the Orchomenians, and was killed in battle with the Boeotians at Haliartus, Mikrobura, by Nēchōrus, in 394 B. C. Cōrnēlius Nēpos describes him as a man of great cruelty, avarice, and perfidy, nor does the opinion of Plūtarchus seem more favourable, since he forms a comparison between him and Sōlla. That he possessed a powerful mind, great knowledge of politics, and considerable activity, admits of no doubt, since he obtained an influence over the Grecian states, beyond whatever had been enjoyed by any of his countrymen. Although he disregarded honour, virtue, and the obligation of an oath, yet the Greeks erected altars to this tyrant, and paid him divine honours. From the appointment of Agēsilāus, he sunk both in dignity and consequence, and, when the whole merits of his life are considered, the feeling mind must regret, that he ever attained such distinction, which he sullied by avowed treachery and remorseless cruelty. —2. A man in the Trojan army, wounded by Ajāx, at the time the latter rescued Ulysses (Hom. II. xi. 491 seq.).

Lysias, es. m. tutor of Antiochus, infant son of Antiochus Epiphānes, who, together with his ward, was murdered by Dēmētrius, son of Sēlēucus, in 164 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 46). —2. An orator of Athens, Jūstinus says of Sýracūse, frequently mentioned in the writings of Cicero. Of the numerous orations which he left at his death, only a few have been transmitted to modern times. The learning and virtue of Sōcrātes commanded his esteem, and he wrote an oration for that great man, when he stood before his judges; but the latter declined using it. Before this time, it is probable, that the Greeks had the same idea of oratory as of poetry, since he was the first who maintained that it was an art. He excelled in description. Of the extent and variety of his information, an accurate opinion cannot be formed from the few orations now extant (Cic. Brut. 9 ge. Just. v. 9). Fāvōrius writes, that if any change be judiciously made in the writings of Plāto, his elegance only is injured; but the sentiment in Lysias (Gel. ii. 5).

Lysimachia, es. f. Hexamili, a town of Thracian Chersōnēsus, built by Lysimachus, one of the successors of Alexander the Great. It had also the name of Hēxāmiliūm, in consequence of the Isthmus being there six stadia broad. From the Grecian states frequently contending for possession of this city, it must have been deemed a place of considerable importance. Stēphānus makes Cārdia the ancient name of Lysimachia, in which he stands opposed both to Strābo and Ptolēmaeus; these geographers mention three cities of some note in that peninsula, Cārdia on Sinus Mēlas; Pāctyē on Prōpōntis; and Lysimachia, inland. —2. Koukistra, a town of Etrōlia, on a branch of Evēnus, the Fidari. Inh. Lysimachiēnses, iun. m. (Liv. xxxii. 33 seq.).

Lysimachus, i. m. son of Agathōcles a Macedonian nobleman. In mental greatness, philosophical knowledge, and bodily strength, he surpassed all the conquerors of the east. He incurred the displeasure of Alexander the Great, by giving poison to Callisthēnes, a philosopher, from whom he had received instructions respecting the nature of virtue, to shorten his life after that monarch had, by maiming, rendered him a shocking spectacle, on suspicion of his being accessory to the plot formed against him by the Persians. Not satisfied with dooming this brave general to death for so trivial an offence, Alexander ordered him to be thrown into the den of a very fierce lion, which made a furious attack on him; but, wrapping his cloak round his hand, he thrust it into the lion's mouth, seized his tongue which he pulled out, and killed him. When this act of resolute bravery was reported to the king, his admiration pacified his wrath, and he ever afterwards held Lysimachus dearer for the greatness of his fortitude. A perfect reconciliation on both sides ensued. Long after, Lysimachus accompanied the king pursuing his routed enemies in India, when his own life guards had fallen behind. Had he harboured the least resentment, he would not have let slip this opportunity of retaliating, since the king, greatly his inferior in strength, was wholly in his power. After the death of Alexander, Thrācia and the countries bordering on the Black Sea, were assigned to him, in consequence of his superior bravery. He built a town on Chersōnēsus Thrācia, Gallipoli, which from his own name he called Lysimachia, Hexamili. His success against that warlike nation did not satisfy his ambition; for he expelled Pýrrhus from Mācedōnia, and took possession of the kingdom. The noble and wealthy, detesting his cruelties, quitted that country, and took refuge under Sēlēucus, whom they prompted to make war on Lysimachus, although he had formerly united with him and Cāssānder, against Antiochus and Dēmētrius. In that war he lost fifteen children, and was added, says Jūstinus, the last leap to the ruin of his own house, in 282 B. C., and the seventy-fourth year of his age. From this author, he appears to have been a man of enormous cruelty, having cut off by poison his son Agathōcles q. v. In this unnatural murder, he employed the agency of his wife Arsinoē, the stepmother of the gallant youth (xlii. 4 seq.). —2. Son of the former, killed by his maternal uncle Ptolēmaeus Cēramus (Just. xxiv. 3). —3. Father of Aristides, a noble Athenian (Cov. Nep. Arist. 1). —4. A friend of Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, whom he invited to be present at the dispute between his sons Pērsēs and Dēmētrius, in 184 B. C. (Liv. xl. 8).

Lysinoē, es. f. a city of Pisidia, from which ambassadors came, in 191 B. C., delivering it up to the Roman consul Cn. Mānius Vūlso, as he marched against the Gallōgræci (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Lysippus, i. m. an excellent Grecian statuarian. Alexander the Great forbade any one except Lysippus to form statues of him (Hor. Epis. ii. 1. 240). In order to animate his men to bravery, Alexander commanded Lysippus to make statues of all the horsemen who had fallen at the crossing of Grānēus, the Oostroba. On Mācedōnia being conquered by the Romans, L. Cæcilius Mētēllus Mācedōnicus sent these equestrian statues to Rome, where they were placed in the portico of Octāvia, and formed, says Vellēus Pātēr-cūlus, the greatest ornament of the place (i. 11). He made a famous statue of Hērēcles, which he presented to Alexander the Great, and on which Martialis has written two epigrams (ix. 44, 45).

Lysis, is, m. a native of Tarentum; Taranto, who adopted the opinions of Pythagoras, and instructed Epaminondas in that philosophy. He is mentioned with great respect by Cicero, as the preceptor of that eminent Boeotian, and as teacher of philosophy (Orat. iii. 34. Offic. i. 44).

Mæca, arum (Sing. Mæces, e), m. a people of Africa, neighbours of the Asbystæ, on the western shore of Syrtis Major, the Gulf of Zadic, between the Nāsāmōnes on the east, and Lōtōphāgi on the west (Plin. i. 543). Herodotus describes their manner of wearing their hair, which appears to have been very particular, and adds, that their country was watered by Cinyps, the Wadi-quaham (iv. 175).—2. A people of Arabiā Felix, whose territory bordered on the Persian Gulf.

Mæcar, aris, m. a Lesbian prince, probably of great wealth (Hom. Il. xxiv. 544).

Mæcæus, ēs, m. a centaur, who, in the battle with the Læpithæ at the marriage of Pirithōus, slew Erygdius (Ov. Met. xii. 452).—2. A native of Ithāca, Theaki, whom Ovidius calls Neritius, probably from his having been born on or near Neritus, a mountain of that island. He followed Ulysses to Troy, and, after the destruction of that city, accompanied him to the western coast of Italy, where, deserting his companions, he settled at Caieta (3 syl.), Gaëta, and attached himself to Ennius (Ov. Met. xiv. 159 seq.).—3. The son of Jūpiter and Cērē, a native of Lesbos, and father of Issē. Mæcæus, idis, f. a patronymic of Issē (Ov. Met. vi. 124).—4. zi Mæcar, āros, m. the son of Æolus, and brother of Cānācē, whom he injured, and afterwards, having heard of her fate, killed himself (Hyg. 242).

Mæcæria, æ, f. a fountain at the foot of the hill of Pānus, at the foot of the mountain of Pindus, once possessed by the Hellenians, who afterwards migrated to Peloponnesus, the Morea, where they were known by the name of Dorians (Herod. i. 56).

Mæcēdōnia, æ, f. (the Latin poets lengthen the second syllable making Mæcēdōnia, as does also Dionysius in his Periëgēsis), an extensive country to the north of Greece, having Mārē Egæum, the Archipelago, and Thraciā, Romania, on the east; Mœsia, Dardānia, and Illyricum on the north; Mārē Adriaticum, the Gulf of Venice, on the west; and Epirus and Thessaliā, Thessaly, on the south. It was anciently called Hæmōnia, æ, et, Æmāthia, æ, f. Some, however, have maintained, that a part only of Mæcēdōnia was called by this name, which the poets more frequently employ to denote Thessaly. Respecting the boundaries and the exact geography of Mæcēdōnia and Thessaliā, great uncertainty prevails, in consequence of the scanty information transmitted by the writers of antiquity with regard to these districts. Much, if not the whole, of this deficiency, would have been supplied, Lysis, is, m. a river of Iōniā, the sources of which the Roman consul, Cn. Mānius Vūlso, passed on his march from Ephesus, Aionius, against the Gāllogræci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Lýstra, æ, f. a town of Lycōnia. Iak. Lýstrini, orum, m. (Plin. i. 627).

Lýxus, i, m. a youth in the Carthaginian army, killed by Mōpsus (Sil. Ital. ii. 112).

had the writings of Strābo been transmitted entire. Mæcēdōnia sometimes included both Illyricum and Epirus, hence towns, mountains, and rivers which, strictly speaking, belonged to these countries, are, by some authors, reckoned in Mæcēdōnia. It was conquered by the Romans in 170 B. C., and divided into four districts, of which Livius has given a description (xlv. 30). From Cārānus till the conquest of Persēs were thirty kings, who reigned in Mæcēdōnia, 923 years (Just. xxxiii. 2). Others write, from Cārānus to Alēxānder twenty kings, and from Cāsānder to Persēs sixteen, in all thirty-six. Vellēus Pātērcūlus makes the years 649. From such variety of statements, certainty is unattainable. The population in modern times is seven hundred thousand. Mæcēdo, e, Mæcēdon, ōnis, sometimes Mæcētes, e, Mæcēta, æ, m. a native of Mæcēdōnia; a Macedonian; Plur. Mæcēta, arum, frequently contracted Mæcētū, particularly by the poets: Mæcēta sua gēna citent, the Macedonians throw their javelins (Stat. Ach. ii. 418). Subjēct Mæcēdo Pēreen, the Macedonian (i. e. Alexander the Great) conquered the Persian (Claud. xxiv. 165). Adj. Mæcēdōnius, Mæcēdōnicus, a, um, et, Mæcēdōnēnsis, is, e, Mæcēdōnia strissa, a Macedonian spear (Ov. Met. xli. 406). Mæcēdōnicum bellum (Sal. Cat. 51). Mæcēdōnicum Mārē, that part of the Archipelago, which washes the shores of Mæcēdōnia and Thraciā (Liv. xlv. 11). Mæcēdōniū fines (Amm. Mar. xvii. 5).

Macēlla, æ, f. Caltā Busanar, an inland town in the western part of Sicily, which revolted from the Romans, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 21). Polybius mentions, that the Romans took it by storm (i. 24).

Mæcēlli fundus, a village or fort in Cāppādoēia, at which Gāllus and his brother Jūliānus were brought up (Amm. Mar. xvi. 2).

Mæcēpræta, rect. Mæcēcē q. e. Mæces, e, Mæcēra, et, Mæcēta, æ, f. Ros Fillam, a promontory opposite to Hærmōzon in Cārmanīa (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Mæchēra, æ, m. a public erler at Rome, who notified sales by auction (Juv. Sat. vii. 9).

Mæcēriānus, i, m. a man killed during an entertainment, by Bōxus, at the suggestion of Bicon, both men of bad dispositions, and both suffered a violent death (Curt. ix. 7).

Mæchānidas, æ, m. a king of the Lacedæmonians, who harassed the Achæi, in 210 B. C., on which account Philippus, king of Mæcēdōnia, brought them assistance. Dread of that king prevented him from attacking the Elæi, as they were preparing to celebrate the Olympic games, a measure on which he had previously resolved (Liv. xxvii. 29 seq.).

Mächon, ōnis, m. son of Æsculapius and Epione (of Córōnis, Hyg. 97), was one of the suitors of Hēlēna (Apol. iii. 10). In the Trojan war, he and his brother Pódāli-rius, being skilled in medicine, cured the wounds of the Greeks. According to Virgil-ius, he was the first who descended from the Trojan horse (Æn. ii. 263). Mārtiālīs uses Mächon as synonymous with Mēdicus. Dimitte Mächōnas omnes, dismiss all physicians (Mart. ii. 16). Adj. Mächōnius, a, um. Mächōniæ artes (Ov. Ep. Pont. i. 3. 5).

Mächāres, is, m. son of Mithridātes, king of Bōsphōrus, received in friendship with the Roman people by L. Licinius Lucullus, in 72 B. C., to whom he had given a golden crown. At that time, Licinius was making war against his father (Liv. Ep. 98). The conduct of Mächāres enraged his father, whose cruelty he dreaded, and therefore attempted to escape. To prevent pursuit, Mächāres burned the ships at Chērsōnēsus Pōntica, on which the implacable Mithridātes sent another fleet after him, and, rather than fall into his hands, the noble youth deprived himself of life (Ap. Bel. Mith. 227-241).

Māchlyes, um, m. an African nation, on the east side of the lake and river Tritōnis (Herod. iv. 178).

Mācra, æ, m. the Magra, a river in the north of Italy, originally the boundary of Ligūria on the one side, and Vārus, the Vara, on the other. The consul, M. Sēmprōnius Tūdītānus, ravaged the lands, burned the villages and forts, and opened the country of the Ligūres as far as this river, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 32).

Mācra Cōmē, Mācræ Cōmēs, f. (i. e. long village), a town of Thēssālīa, the ground round which the Ætōli ravaged, in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Mācri Cāmpi, Mācrōrum Cāmpōrum, m. a town in Gallia Cisalpina, according to Strābo, and plains between Pārma and Mūtina, according to Columella. From the latter, Mācri Cāmpi included the whole tract between these towns, and afforded excellent pasture for sheep (Liv. xli. 18. Colum. R. R. vii. 2. Strab. 305 seq.).

Mācrinus, i, m. (called by Eutrōpius M. Opilius Mācrinus), a man of low birth, who obtained the rank of a prætorian præfect under Cāricālla, against whom he conspired, and obtained the purple by the murder of his sovereign, in the year 217. He assumed the name of Sēvērus, on purpose to conceal the obscurity of his origin, and the senate added the surnames of Plus and Fēlix, of which he accepted the latter, and declined the former. On his son Mādāmēnus, whom he named Antōnius, he conferred the title of Cæsar. Advēntus, the colleague of Mācrinus, in the commission of prætorian præfect, alleged the empire belonged to him; from his being an older officer, and the emperor, though he had little apprehensions of his rivalry, judged it prudent to appoint him præfect of Rome. Among the excellencies of Mācrinus may be mentioned, his respect for the laws, abolishing several enormous taxes of Cāricālla, and refusing to give up a list of the informers, in order to prevent the unnecessary shedding of human blood. Timidity marked his conduct as a soldier, and he purchased peace from the Parthians at a sum exceeding one million sterling. The relations of Hēhōgābātus, encouraged by the luxury of Mācrinus at Antiōchia, Antakiē, set up for the empire, and both Mācrinus and Diādāmēnus his son, lost their lives, the former in his fifty-fourth year, and the latter in the tenth year of his age. His reign continued only fourteen months. In comparison of Cāricālla, Mācrinus deserved to be loved, although some acts of iniquitous rigour exposed him to merited hatred. His wife, whose name was Nōnia Cēisa, had the title of Augūsta, and does not appear to have been recommended by strictness of morals, or propriety of conduct.

Mācris, is, f. Nicaria, commonly called Icāria q. v., an island in the Ægean Sea, opposite the promontory Mýonnēsus (Liv. xxxvii. 28).

Mācro, ōnis, m. See Nevius Scrtōrius Mācro.

Mācrōbii, orum, m. (i. e. long-lived), E-thiopiāns, who inhabited that part of Africa which lies towards the Southern Ocean. Hērōdōtus places them to the west of the Straits of Babelmandeb (iii. 17).

Mācrōchir, iris, m. (longhand) a surname of Artāxerxes q. v.

Mācrōnes, um, m. a people of Asia Mīnor, Natolia, whom Hērōdōtus makes neighbours to the Syrians, who lived on Thērmodōn, the Termē, adding that they learned the rite of circumcision from the Colchians (ii. 104). Plinius fixes their residence on the river Ab-sīrus (i. 665). From Vālerius Flācus, their country appears to have been elevated (v. 152). Their name originally seems to have been Sānni, and were probably the people called by the Greeks Mācrōcēphālī (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Mācrōntichos, i, f. a fort in Chērsōnēsus Thrācia, Gallipoli, which had this name from the long wall built by Mūtlādes across that peninsula. Some editions of Cōrnēlius Nēpos read Nēōntichos (Alcibid. 7). Plinius writes Mācron Tichos (i. 440).

Māctōriūm, i, n. a town in the south of Sicily, between the rivers Gēla and Himēra (Herod. vii. 153). Inh. Māctōriī, orum, m.

Mācūlōnus, i, m. a rich man, who willingly patronised the learned, when it cost him nothing; but barred his doors, and denied admission to poor authors (Juv. Sat. vii. 40).

Mādātes, is, m. a Persian nobleman, brother-in-law of a sister of Sisygambis, whose daughter he had married (Curt. v. 3).

Mādātēni, orum, m. one of the nations of Thrācia, which, with the Astli, Cæni, and Corēli, attacked the Roman army under Cn. Mānlius Vālbō, in 190 B. C., returning home from Asia, and carried off a considerable part of the booty, killing a number of them (Liv. xxxviii. 40).

Madytos, i, f. a town in Thracian Chērsō-nēsus, taken by Philippus, king of Mācēdō-nia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 16).

Mæandros, e, Mæandrus (Sil. Ital. vii. 139), et, Mæander (Luc. Phar. vi. 475), drī, m. the Mæander, a very considerable and celebrated river of Asia Minor, Natolia, which has its source in Phrygia, runs in a westerly direction, receives a number of streams on both banks, and, after a course of 250 miles, falls into Mārē Ægeum, the Archipelago.

considerably to the south of the island Sâmos. Six miles, says a late traveller, are added to the mouth of the river since Strabo's time by the alluvion. It is said to have no less than six hundred windings, which are supposed to have suggested to Dædalus the first idea of the Cretan labyrinth. Adj. Mæandrius, a, um. Mæandrius Juvénis, Caunus, the son of Miletus and Cyânée, the daughter of Mæander (Ov. Met. ix. 573).

Mæcenas. See Cilnius.

Mæcenas, ætis, m. a descendant from the kings of Tuscany, killed in the battle at Cannæ (Sil. Ital. x. 40).

P. Mæcilius, P. Mæcili, m. a tribune of the people in Rome, in 471 B. C. This was the first election of the tribunes at Comitia Tributa (Liv. ii. 58).

Sp. Mæcilius, Sp. Mæcili, m. a tribune of the people for the fourth time, in 415 B. C. Both he and Sp. Mætilius appear to have been men of very turbulent dispositions, anxious to excite violent contentions between the two orders of the state (Liv. iv. 48).

Mæcium, i, n. (Castrum), a place near Lânúvium, in Italy. Adj. Mæcius, a, um. Mæcia tribus (Liv. vi. 2).

Mædi, orum, m. a Thracian nation, who were in the practice of making inroads into Mæcedônia (Liv. xxvi. 25). Adj. Mædius, a, um. Mædia regio, the country of the Mædi, at the mountain Pangeus, west of Nêstus, the Mesto.

P. Mælius, P. Mæli, m. a Roman, who held the office of military tribune, with consular authority, in 399 B. C., and again in 395 B. C. (Liv. v. 12 seq.).

Q. Mælius, Q. Mæli, m. a tribune of the people, in 320 B. C. See L. Livius.

Sp. Mælius, Sp. Mæli, m. a Roman of equestrian rank, of great riches, and inordinate ambition. During a famine, he bestowed largesses of grain on the people, a thing in itself laudable; reprehensible only from the motive of the giver. The consulship was not sufficient to satisfy his love of power, therefore he aspired at the sovereignty of Rome. The great multitude which accompanied him, rendered it necessary to elect a dictator, and the choice having fallen on T. Quinctius Cincinnatus, he sent Servilius Ahala, master of the horse, to bring Mælius before him. The ambitious Mælius refused to obey the summons of the dictator, on which Ahala instantly put him to death, and Cincinnatus applauded his conduct. The house of Mælius was then levelled with the ground, and the site of it, by a decree of the senate, remained unoccupied, as a monument of his treasonable design having been frustrated. It had the name of Æquimælium. Adj. Mælianus, a, um. Mælianum frumentum, the grain collected by Mælius (Liv. iv. 16). Mæliana eades, the violent death of Mælius (Liv. iv. 13—16).

Mænâlus, i, m. a noble Myrmidon, the father of Pisander. Mænâides, æ, m. Pisander (Hom. Il. xvi. 194).

Mænâlus, i, m. a son of Lycæon, king of Arcædia (Apol. iii. 8).

Mænâlus, i, f. a celebrated city of Arcædia, built by Mænâlus, son of Lycæon, hence its name. Its site has not been discovered in modern times, probably from its having been so long in ruins.

Mænâlus, i, m. Plur. Mænâla, orum, n.

Rôino (Aidin, Leake), a mountain in Arcædia, of considerable height, which, from the excellence of its pastures, was sacred to Pan. It is diversified with glens and rivulets, watered by numerous brooks, and adorned with woody scenery. All its loftiest summits are, says a late traveller, covered with large pines. According to some, it had the name of Mænâlus, from the son of Lycæon. Mænâlis, idis, f. of Mænâlus, applied to females or nouns feminine. Mænâlis ursa, the Arcadian bear, i. e. Callisto, or, Ursa Major (Ov. Trist. iii. 11. 8). Mænâlis ora (Ov. Fast. iii. 84). Adj. Mænâlius, a, um, of, or belonging to, Mount Mænâlus; Arcadian; pastoral. Mænâlius deus, Pan (Ov. Fast. iv. 650).

Mænas, ædis, f. a worshipper of Bæchus, a name derived from the infuriated manner in which they worshipped that god (ære ou pavnôbai) (Catul. lxiii. 23 seq.). Jivênâlis calls the Roman matrons sacrificing to Bona dea Mænâdes Priâpi, a concise description of the shocking worship of that goddess (Sat. vi. 316).

C. Mænîus, C. Mænî, m. was one of the Roman consuls in 337 B. C., and obtained a victory over the Aricini, Lârinii, and Vêlîterni. By his activity, and that of his colleague, L. Furius Câmillus, the whole of Lâtium was subjected to the dominion of the Romans. To the honour of a triumph, their countrymen added equestrian statues, a compliment very uncommon in that age. In consequence of a conspiracy at Cápua, Mænîus was nominated dictator, and appointed M. Fôsius master of the horse. He maintained that his power was unlimited, called some of the nobility to account, and thus excited against himself the aversion of that order, who maintained that such a charge did not lie against them, but against the new men, among whom were the dictator and master of the horse, and threatened a prosecution at the expiry of their office, on which they both abdicated. None of the charges against them having been proved, they were most honourably acquitted (Liv. viii. 13 seq.).—2. A prætor in 182 B. C., appointed to the government of Sardinia, and to preside at the investigation concerning the practice of poisoning, at places at a greater distance than ten miles from Rome. After he had passed sentence on three thousand persons, he informed the senate, by letter, that discoveries increased so rapidly, that he must either give up his province, or discontinue the inquiries. Such was the state of Roman morals at this period (Liv. xl. 35 seq.).

Fâbius Mænîus Pântolâbus, Fâbi Mænî Pântolâbi, m. a Roman who, by his extravagance and vices, ruined his fortune, and at last necessity compelled him to sell his paternal estate (Hor. Sat. i. l. 101). Horâtius introduces him again as a backbiter (Sat. i. 3. 21), and in Epist. i. 13. 37, he unites both with gormandizing, acting the parasite, a character into which a ruined prodigal and glutton naturally falls. Adj. Mænîanus, a, um. Mænîanus (lôcus), the courts of law, so called from having once been the property of Mænîus (Val. Max. ix. 12).

L. Mænîus, L. Mænî, m. a tribune of the people, who aided M. Dôllus q. v. in fixing the rate of interest at Rome (Liv. vii. 16).

M. Mænîus, M. Mænî, m. a tribune of the people, in 409 B. C., who revived the Agrarian law, against which his colleagues protested, as they did likewise against his attempt to hinder the levies (Liv. iv. 53). —2. A tribune of the people, in 383 B. C., who joined his colleague, Q. Publilius, in bringing to trial M. Manlius Capitolinus q. v. (Liv. vi. 19, 20). —3. A tribune of the soldiers, who was killed in the battle with Mago, a Carthaginian, in 205 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 18).

P. Mænius, P. Mæni, m. a Roman patrician, who twice held the office of military tribune with consular power; first in 399 B. C., and afterwards in 396 B. C. (Liv. v. 12—18). —2. A Roman, who put one of his freedmen to death, because he had kissed his full-grown daughter, not from bad intention, but from thoughtlessness (Val. Max. vi. 1).

Q. Mænius, Q. Mæni, m. a prætor at Rome, in 172 B. C., whom the senate ordered to publish their decree respecting the Abdræte (Liv. xliii. 4). Adj. Mænius, a, um. Mæniatrum (Liv. xxxix. 44).

T. Mænius, T. Mæni, m. obtained the office of city prætor, in 188 B. C., and was afterwards a military tribune under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, in the north of Spain, by whom he was sent with L. Minucius and L. Tereñtius Massa, to inform the senate of his victories in that country (Liv. xxxix. 6 seq.).

Mæon, ðnis, m. a Rutulian killed by Æneās (Virg. Æn. x. 337). —2. Son of Hæmon, a Theban, whom alone of all the fifty who lay in ambush to cut off Tydeus, that gallant warrior spared, and sent back to Thebes, Thera, to inform Etæocles of the fate of his companions. He possessed the gift of prophecy, which he appears to have received from Apollo; but neither the sanctity of his character, nor the wisdom which he possessed, would have protected him against the cruelty of the king, for two of his ruffians started up to deprive him of life. Mæon smiled at the ferocity of the king, and slew himself in his presence, who, enraged at the success of Tydeus, the prophecies of Mæon, and this act of contempt, prohibited his relations from performing the rites of interment. Stælius has given a beautiful picture of moral excellence, in describing the character of Mæon, and the regard paid to his remains, and to the spot on which he lay, by ravenous animals. From his father he is called Hæmonides (Stat. Th. ii. 692 seq.).

Mæonia, æ, f. afterwards Lydia, æ, f. a country of Asia Minor, Natolia, the boundaries of which were not always the same. It was situated to the west of Phrygia Magna, and had Caria on the south, and Mysia on the north. It had its name from Mæon, a king of that country (Claud. xx. 245). From Lydus, brother of Tyrrhæus, it took the name of Lydia (Vel. Pat. l. 1). Inh. Mæones, um (Sing. Mæon, ðnis), m. Mæonides, arum, m. the inhabitants of Etruria, Tuscany, and Umbria; the latter, according to Hærodôtus (i. 94); and the former, according to Livius (v. 33), was originally peopled by a colony from Mæonia. Mæonis, idis, f. applied to females or nouns feminine; Omphale (Ov. Fast. ii. 310—351 &c.). Mæonides, æ, m. Hæmæus, from Mæonia being one of the countries which claimed the honour of giving birth to that immortal poet; also Ennius, a Roman poet, who dreamed that Hæmæus informed him his soul passed into a peacock, and afterwards animated the body of Ennius (Per. Sat. vi. 11). This is a disputed passage, some considering Quintus the prænomen of Ennius, others the numeral adjective. See Ennius. Adj. Mæonius, a, um. Mæonius Senex, Hæmæus. Mæonium Cæmen, the poetry of Homer (Hor. Od. i. 6. 2). Mæonios Nantos, the Tuscan pirates (Ov. Met. iv. 423). Mæonius rex, Midas (Claud. iii. 166). Mæonium vadium, Pæctolus (Sil. Ital. l. 157). Mæonice heroides, women celebrated by Hæmæus (Prop. ii. 28. 29). Mæonius pes, the Mæonian foot, i. e. Hexameter verse, in which Hæmæus wrote (Ov. Rem. Am. 373).

Mæotis, idis, f. a sea nymph, or goddess, from whom Pælus Mæotis, the Sea of Asoph, had its name. Vælerius Flaccus introduces her bewailing the death of her son Pæuæron q. v. (vi. 565).

Mæotis, idis, f. the Sea of Asoph, Azoph, or, Azof, a sea of considerable extent, into which Tanaïs, the Don, flows, and which communicates with the Black Sea, by Cimærius Bosphorus, the Strait of Caffa. In Hærodôtus, Pælus Mæotis is called the mouth of Pontus Euxinus (iv. 86). The modern name must be referred to Asoph, a town of Coban Tartary, at the mouth of Tanaïs, the Don, which was ceded by the Turks to the Russians, in 1774. Mæotis, idis, f. applied to nouns feminine. Mæotis ripa, the shore of the Sea of Asoph (Claud. xv. 243). Mæotis hîms, a long and severe winter (Ov. Trist. iii. 12. 2). Mæotis lacus (Flor. iii. 4). Mæotis, arum, m. a people near the mouth of Tanaïs, the Don, from whom the lake had its name, according to Plineus (i. 471). Adj. Mæoticus, et, Mæoticus, a, um. Mæotia tælus, the country adjoining to the Sea of Asoph (Virg. Æn. vi. 800). Mæotia unda, the Sea of Asoph (Virg. G. iii. 349). Mæotica glacies (Juv. Sat. iv. 42).

Mæra, æ, f. daughter of Prætus and Antæa, remarkable for her beauty (Hom. Od. xi. 325 seq.).

Mæra, æ, f. the dog of Icarus, which remained by the body of his master, after he had been murdered, and, by howling, directed his daughter Erigônê to the spot, where his body remained unburied. This affectionate animal was afterwards changed into the constellation Canicula (Hyg. 130). —2. A dog mentioned by Ovidius, into which, according to some, a girl was transformed, and, according to others, Hæcuba q. v. (Ov. Met. vii. 362).

Mæsla, æ, f. (Silva), a wood which lay between Rome and the sea, taken from the Veientes by Ancus Mærcius (Liv. i. 33).

Mæsius Rûfus, Mæsi Rûfi, m. a man appointed governor of Egypt by the emperor Dômitianus (Suet. Dom. 4).

Mævla, æ, f. a woman whom Juvénalis describes as violating female delicacy, both by unnecessary exposure, and by masculine exercises (Sat. i. 22). Some of the names mentioned by this satirist, seem intended to denote a class of persons rather than individuals. Perhaps Mævla is of this description.

Mævlus, i, m. a mean poet, who, like Bævlus, appears to have been envious and scurrilous; otherwise Virgilius would not have treated them with such severity (B. iii. 90). Hörātius has shown his hatred to him in Epod. xth, where he calls him ōlēmtem, probably in allusion to the he-goats and foxes mentioned by Virgilius in the lines where these poetasters are held up to ridicule and contempt. He wishes that the ship in which Mævius was to sail to Athens might be wrecked, in return for which he promised a sacrifice to the Tempests, which had a temple at Rome. Hörātius probably intended that Epod. as a counterpart, or contrast, to Od. i. 3, in which he showed his friendship and affection for Virgilius, by praying for a prosperous voyage to waft him to Athens. The sarcastic lines of Virgilius have rendered the dullness and malignity of Mævius and Bāvius proverbial, and immortalized their names only to their infamy.—2. A lewd character, on whom Mārtiālis writes a poem of equal pollution (xi. 47).

Mævius Pūdcēs, Mævī Pūdcētis, m. a relation of Sofonius Tigellinus, a fit instrument for any purpose which required a dark, cunning, and resolute agent (Tac. Hist. i. 24 seq.).

Mägāba, örüm, n. a mountain of Gällögracia, to which the Tectōsügi fled in 191 B. C., when the Roman consul, Cn. Mānilius Vūlso, marched against the Gällögraci (Liv. xxxviii. 19).

Mägādātes, m. commanded the Syrian army under Tigrānes (Ap. Bel. Syr. 119).

Mägālus, i. m. a petty prince of the Boii, who came to promise Hännlbal the assistance of his countrymen, and to conduct him over the Alps, in 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 29).

Magus (Justinus writes Agas, but inaccurately), m. a king of Cýrēnē, and brother of Ptolēmaeus, king of Egypt, to whose son he had betrothed his only daughter Bērēnicē. His wife, Arsīnōē, objected to the marriage, after the death of her husband; but her plans failed (Just. xxvi. 3).

Mägōdūs, i. f. a town on the confines of Egypt and Syria (Herod. ii. 159).

Magetōbria, m. f. a city of Gällia, France, at which Ariōvistus defeated the combined forces of the Gauls. This victory put the country under his dominion (Ces. B. G. i. 31). Even the site of Magetōbria is disputed in modern times. Some have, from a passage in Ansonius, supposed to refer to that battle, conjectured that it was afterwards called Binga, a city at the junction of the Nava with the Rhine. But this is very doubtful, and it were better to adopt the idea of late writers, that the modern village Pont-tailleur occupies part of the site of Magetōbria.

Mägli, örüm (Sing. Mägus, i.), m. a celebrated sect in Asia, particularly in Persia, who despised idolatry, or worship of images, and therefore paid their homage to the Supreme Being by fire, which they considered as the best symbol of the good principle, and consequently darkness as the truest representation of the evil principle. They denominated the former Oromāsdes, and the latter, Arimānus. The mixture of good and evil, of happiness and misery, in the lot of man, would suggest the idea of these two opposite principles, whom they considered subordinate to the One God. In this manner they accounted for the vicissitudes in human life, by ascribing whatever happiness we enjoy to the ascendancy of the good principle, or order of angels, and the calamities of life, to the superiority of the wicked principle, the two maintaining a perpetual contention, to terminate only at the end of the world, when the good angel and his followers shall enjoy perpetual felicity in the realms of light, and the bad angel and his disciples shall be tormented in perpetual darkness. Pausānias reckons them the first who taught the immortality of the soul. In that belief they were followed by the Chaldeans, from whom the Egyptians and Greeks most probably received their ideas on that subject (Paus. iv. 32). Zoroaster has been considered, if not the founder, at least the reformer of this sect, the priests of which surpassed, in a knowledge of mathematics and philosophy, all their contemporaries. Their science appeared so wonderful to the common people, that they considered it preternatural, or obtained from invisible beings. The perversion of this knowledge brought into contempt the term Mägi, at first equivalent to learned men, and now denoting deception, or a pretence of supernatural knowledge wholly without foundation. The sect, denominated Mägi, still exists in Persia, but now called Gaurs. When Claudianus wrote, they pretended to a knowledge of futurity. Te Persa cecinerit Mägi (Claud. viii. 144). The Mägi at Rome appear to have practised jugglery, or sorcery (Tac. Ann. ii. 27).

Mägister equitum, the master of the horse; was next in command to the dictator, by whom he was chosen, for several centuries. Q. Minucius Rāfus was the first who was nominated by a decree of the Commons, and his appointment took place in 219 B. C. (Val. Max. v. 2).

Mägus, i. m. the name of a Roman tribe. Mägus Cæciliānus, Mägli Cæciliāni, m. a prætor, accused of treason falsely by Cöndidius Equus and Cælius Cursor, for which they were punished by a decree of the senate at the instigation of Drusus, in the year 21 (Tac. Ann. iii. 37).

Mägus Celer Velleianus, Mägli Celeris Velleiani, m. brother of the historian C. Velleius Pāterculus, held the office of lieutenant-general under Tiberius in the Dalmatian and Pannonian wars, where his achievements merited applause, and he was honoured with gifts in the triumph of his commander, who, supported by Augustus, recommended him to the prætorship (Vel. Pat. ii. 115 seq.).

Cn. Mägus, Cn. Mägli, m. a native of Crēnōna, Pompey's commander of artificers, or chief engineer (Præfectus Fabrum), who was taken on his way to Bründisium, Brindisi, and brought before Caesar, who sent him back to Pompeius with proposals for an interview; but he continued with the latter, and did not return to Caesar (Ces. B. C. i. 24 seq.).

Cn. Mägus Atellānus, Cn. Mägli Atellāni, m. chief magistrate of Cāpua, in 216 B. C., who armed both the populace and the slaves, with the intention of attacking the Roman camp. His plan did not succeed (Liv. xxiv. 19).

Cn. Mägus Cilo, Cn. Mägli Cilōnis, m. the man who killed M. Claudius Mārcellus, of consular dignity, who was his own patron. He committed this crime at Athens, in 48 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 115). Valērius Māximus, who calls him Mägus Chilo, describes the manner in which he perpetrated the crime (ix. 11).

Declus Māgūs. See Declus.

Māgnētūs, i, m. a man of mean origin, who had risen to the most important station in the imperial camp, under the emperor Cōnstantūs, and, by the friendship and activity of Mārcellinus, obtained the titles of Augustus, and Emperor, from the soldiers. This usurpation was followed by the murder of Cōnstantūs. Italy, France, and Africa, acknowledged his authority, on which he endeavoured, by oppressive exactions, to accumulate treasures sufficient for a civil war. Vētrānō, a general of great age and experience, instead of supporting the house of Cōnstantinus the Great, formed an alliance with Māgnētūs, and they sent ambassadors to the emperor Cōnstantius, offering terms, which he rejected with disdain, on which the emperor prepared to meet the usurpers in the field of battle, and he came to a decisive engagement with Māgnētūs, at Mūrā, Essek, on the Dravē. The latter displayed, during the engagement, the talents of an able general, and the bravery of an intrepid soldier, until the troops of Cōnstantius gained possession of his camp, after which, laying aside his imperial robes, he fled, and was pursued to the foot of the Julian Alps. To no purpose did his succeeding misfortunes compel him to sue for peace, for Cōnstantius was resolved to punish the murderer of his brother. To prevent falling into the hands of the emperor, he fell on his own sword. According to Zonārus, he first murdered with his own hand his mother, then his brother Dēsiderius. On learning the fate of the latter, his brother Dēcētius strangled himself (Eutrop. x. 9—12).

Adj. Māgnētianus, et, Māgnētīlācus, a, um. Māgnētīāni dūces (Eutrop. x. 11). Māgnētīlāca lēgīōnes (Amm. Mar. xix. 5).

Māgnēs, ētis, m. the magnet, or loadstone; an iron-coloured stone, harder and heavier than the ore of iron, possessing various properties, of which the most remarkable is the attraction of iron, pointing to the poles of the world, and, in some circumstances, dipping to a point below the horizon directly under the pole. It possesses the wonderful power of communicating these properties to iron, merely by a touch. Modern ingenuity has, on these qualities, constructed the mariner's needles of every kind, by which the seaman steers his course over the face of the deep. The ancients reckoned five kinds of magnet, knew its attractive power, but not its polarity; and used it almost wholly as a medicine, particularly for diseases in the eye. The precise period at which it was first employed for the purposes of navigation, and the person who made the discovery, are not certainly known. It seems generally agreed on, that it was about the middle of the thirteenth century, before it was much spoken of; although there is reason to believe, it was used at sea before that period. Some ascribe the invention to a Venetian, others to a Genoese; the French claim it, because the north is marked by a fleur de lis, and the British, because it is known in all countries by the name of compass, which is an English word. The absurdity of the last two arguments needs not to be pointed out (Lucret. vi. 908).

Adj. Māgnēticus, a, um. Māgnētīca gēmma (Claud. xlviii. 26).

Māgnēsīa, ae, f. a district of Thēssālīa; Thēssaly, on Sīnus Pēlāgicus, the Gulf of Volo. It had a cognominal town, built by Dēlōps, hence Dēlōpīa būstis, the tomb of Dēlōps, who was buried at Māgnēsīa (Val. Flacc. ii. 10).

Inh. Māgnētes, um (Sing. Māgnēs, ētis), m. were declared free at the end of the war with Phīlippus, king of Mācedōnīa, in 198 B.C. (Liv. xxxiii. 32 seq.). Māgnēsīa, ae, f. a woman of Māgnēsīa. Māgnētis, et, Māgnēsīs, idis, f. of Māgnēsīa, applied to nouns feminine. Māgnētārchēs, ae, m. the chief magistrate of the inhabitants of Māgnēsīa. Adj. Māgnēsīus, et, Māgnēsūs, a, um. Māgnēsīa flūmīna, the rivers of Māgnēsīa (Lucret. vi. 1062).

Māgnēsīa Hippolytē, Hippolytē, wife of Acēstus, king of Māgnēsīa (Hor. Od. iii. 7. 18).—2. Guzel-hissar (the beautiful castle), a town of Lýdia, on Mæander, the Meander, which had this name from the settlers there being a colony from Māgnēsīa Thēssālīca. It was distant from Ephēsus, Aiozoluc, about fifteen miles (Plin. i. 602).

After the battle of Thyātīra, Ak-hissar (i. e. the white castle), in 192 B.C., the town of Māgnēsīa voluntarily surrendered to the Roman consul L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio (Liv. xxxvii. 45).—3. Māgnēsīa ad Sīpylum, Magnissa, another town of Lýdia, which stood on the river Hýllus, or, Phrygius, near the mountain Sīpylum, hence the addition, to distinguish it from other towns of the same name.

When Antiochus sent his fleet, under Pōlyxēnidas, to fight that of the Romans in the Archipelago, in 193 B.C., he retired to this place on purpose to collect land forces. After the defeat of that monarch at Thyātīra, this city surrendered to L. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, and continued faithful to the Romans, when all the rest of Asia Mīnor revolted to Mithridātes (Liv. xxxvi. 43 seq.).

Of both these cities, the inhabitants had the same name with those of Thessalian Māgnēsīa (Ov. Met. xi. 408). In the opinion of some authors, the loadstone was called Māgnēs, from being found in the territory of the Māgnētes, and, in that of others, from having been discovered by a man called Māgnēs. Lūcrētius has adopted the former opinion (vi. 908).

Māgnus, i, m. a brother of Piso Frūgi Licīnīanus, whom Gālba adopted as his successor. The emperor Claudius put Māgnus to death, as Nērō did his brother Crassus (Tac. Hist. i. 48).

Māgo, ōnis, m. a commander of the Carthaginians, sent with a hundred and twenty ships to the aid of the Romans against Pyrrius, king of Epirus, about 280 B.C.; assigning as a reason, that since the Romans had been attacked by one foreign state, they should be supported by another. The senate expressed their gratitude for the offer, of which they declined to accept, and Māgo, after a private interview with Pyrrius, to obtain information respecting his plans and operations, with regard to Sicily, quitted Italy. From Justinus he appears to have been an able politician, as well as a successful warrior (Just. xviii. 2).—2. An eminent Carthaginian commander, who enlarged the boundaries of the empire, and obtained great fame for his warlike bravery. He was the father of Hāsdrūbal and Hānnībal (Just. xviii. 7; xix. 1).—3. A brother of Hānnībal, under whom he commanded the cavalry in the second Punic war. His bravery contributed to the defeat of the Romans at Trébia, and to the more bloody battle at Cānnae, after which he was sent to Carthage to announce the victory. The pompous description which he gave of the Carthaginian success in Italy, induced his countrymen to send fresh reinforcements, and further supplies of money. From Livius, he appears to have given an exaggerated account of the loss on the part of the Romans, which did not altogether escape detection, for Hānno extorted from him some reluctant confessions, which considerably diminished the advantage of the victory. The senate of Carthage empowered the dictator and Māgo, to enlist troops in Spain for the war in Italy; but, when they were on the eve of setting out, accounts were received that the Carthaginian forces in Spain had been routed, and that almost all the states in that country had revolted to the Romans. He then set sail with troops for Spain, where Cn. and P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, brothers, defeated him, Hāsdrūbal, and Hāmīlecar at Illitūrgi, Andujar, and took their camps in one day. Even after the defeat at Munda, 216 B. C., where Cn. Cōrnēlius cut off a great number of the Carthaginian army, Māgo levied soldiers with such rapidity, that, in a few days, they again met the Romans in the field, and again experienced a severe loss. After the death of the two Roman commanders, Cn. and P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio, he exerted himself, at the head of a considerable force, to annoy the Romans, or to recover the states which had revolted to them; but at last he was obliged to take refuge in Gādes, Cádiz, where he collected some ships from the adjoining ocean, and brought others across the strait from Africa with supplies. He plundered not only the houses, but the temples of the Gādītāni, then sailed for Carthāgo Nōva, Carthage, which he made an unsuccessful attempt to retake, afterwards returned to Cádiz, where he found the gates shut against him, and landed at Cymbis, a place not far from Cádiz, where, having enticed to his presence the chief magistrate and treasurer, he put them to death by crucifixion. After this barbarous action, he crossed to Pityūsa, Ivica, inhabited by Carthaginians, from whom he received provisions and reinforcements. Repulsed by the inhabitants of Majorca, he steered for Minorca, where he spent the winter, and enlisted two thousand auxiliaries, which he sent to Carthage; and next spring with thirty ships of war and a great number of transports, having twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse on board, he landed at Genoa, Genoa, which he took, and tried to raise commotions on that coast. After various plans to raise troops, and to induce the inhabitants to revolt, he was defeated in 205 B. C., by P. Quinctilius Vārus, praetor, and M. Cōrnēlius Cēthēgus, who killed five thousand of his men, and took twenty-two military standards. A wound, which he received in the thigh, and rendered him incapable of remaining on horseback, contributed greatly to the defeat. Recalled by the senate to Carthage, he went on board a ship, and died of his wound soon after he had passed Sārdīnia (Liv. xxi. 47 seq.).—4. An ambassador sent by Hānñibal to Philip, king of Macedonia, in 217 B. C., to ratify the treaty which his embassy, at the head of which was Xēnōphānes, had concluded with that general in Italy (Liv. xxiii. 34).—5. A noble Carthaginian of the Barcine family, and a near relation of Hānñibal, taken by the Romans in Sārdīnia, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 41).—6. A Carthaginian general, who had the command of Carthāgo Nōva, Carthage, in 212 B. C., when P. Cōrnēlius Scīpio Africānus carried that city by assault in one day. Neither he nor his troops seemed deficient in bravery, but the superior knowledge and personal intrepidity of the Roman commander, conjoined with the natural fortitude of the Romans, overwhelmed the Carthaginians, and obliged Māgo, after the town was taken, to surrender the citadel and garrison. He was sent prisoner to Rome with fifteen senators of old Carthage, who were taken in Carthāgo Nōva, under C. Laelius (Liv. xxvi. 44—51).

Māgūla, æ, f. a worthless character described by Martiālis (xii. 93).

Māgūla, æ, m. a Mauritanian prince, who fled from that country, as the king had him at ill-will. For a bribe, M. Livius Drusus delivered him up to Bōccus his sovereign, who exposed him to an elephant (Aur. Vic. Vir. II. 66).

Māgus, i, m. a Rutulian killed by Ænēas, although he earnestly begged for his life, and offered the Trojan hero a great reward, if he would save him (Virg. Æn. x. 521).

Māhālcēs, is, m. a Carthaginian killed by Q. Fabius Māximus, at the time Hānñibal had surrounded the troops of M. Minūcius Rūfus, who held the joint dictatorship with Fabius (Sil. Ital. vii. 599).

Māhārbal, ālis, m. son of Hāmīleco, to whom Hānñibal gave the command of the forces employed against Sāgūntum, Murriedro, when he marched to check an intended insurrection of the Cārpētāni, and Orētāni. That general sent him, after crossing the Alps, to desolate the lands of the allies of the Romans; but to save those of the Gauls as much as possible, and to endeavour to gain their chiefs over to his interest. To him about six thousand of the van-guard surrendered themselves on the day following the battle at Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia, to whom he pledged his faith, that he would allow them to depart with single garments. Hānñibal threw them all into chains. Māhārbal commanded the right in the battle at Cānnae, and advised Hānñibal, on gaining that brilliant and complete victory, to march directly to Rome. On the commander-in-chief replying that such a measure required time for consideration, he remarked, "That the gods did not bestow every quality on the same person. You know to conquer, Hānñibal; but you know not how to use your victory" (Liv. xxi. 12 seq.). He continued in the Carthaginian army after that event so honourable to the Carthaginians, but he does not appear to have distinguished himself by superior bravery or any military achievements; since the historian of Rome, who has gone into such minute detail of Hānñibal's operations in Italy, would not have failed to have recorded it. Silius Itālicus calls him Savvus, an epithet which, when applied to a soldier, did not convey an unfavourable idea to a Roman mind (iv. 562).

Maina, æ, f. the eldest of the seven daughters of Atlas and Plēiōnē. They were born on Cylēnē, a mountain of Arcādia, and, from their mother, were called Plēiādes. By Jū-pitier, who offered her violence in a cave on that mountain, Maia became the mother of Mercúrius, who is hence called Natus Maia, Génitrix Maia, &c. She was the most beautiful of the Pleiades (Ov. Fast. v. 85). According to some, the fifth month in the year was called Maia in honour of this daughter of Atlas.

Maia, as, f. the fifth month of the year, so called, according to some authors, from Maia, the mother of Mercúrius; and, according to others, in honour of the aged (majores). Adj. Maius, a, um. Mains mēsis, the month of May (Ov. Fast. v. 1).

Málaga, as, f. Malaga, a seaport town of Spain, to the northeast of Gibraltar (Hirt. Bel. Al. 64). It stands at the bottom of a craggy mountain, and is said to have been founded by the Phœnicians, most probably on account of its excellent harbour. The modern town is populous, neatly built, and a place of considerable trade. Its chief exports are raisins and wine. It is defended by two castles. Malaga is the see of a bishop. Near Cape Malaga, Sir George Rooke, who commanded the English squadron, with the assistance of ten Dutch ships, obtained a signal victory over the French in August, 1704. Since that period, France has not disputed the empire of the seas with Great Britain.

Mālchion, ōnis, m. an effeminate man; probably a fictitious character (Mart. iii. 82).

Mālca, as, f. Cape St. Angelo, or Malio, a promontory of Lacedæmonia (Virg. Æn. v. 193). Curca Mālca (Ov. Amor. ii. 16. 24). Adj. Mālceus, et, Mālceus, a, um. Mālceum jugum, et, Mālceus sinus, more commonly Lacedæmonius sinus, the Gulf of Calchythia (Flor. ii. 9: iii. 6). Mālca Doris (Luc. Phœ. ix. 36). Mālceus aque (Luc. Phœ. vi. 367). Mālceus sinus, the Gulf of Zeiton (Liv. xxvii. 30 seq.).

Mālēventum, i, n. the ancient name of Beneventum q. v. (Liv. xxix. 27 seq.).

Mālceus, i, m. (perhaps the proper reading is Mālceus, or Mālceus) a Carthaginian commander, who, after some success in Sicily, was defeated in battle, on which account, his countrymen banished him. The soldiers under him resented this act of injustice, by returning to their native city and taking it by storm. Mālceus put ten of the senators to death, then placed it under the government of the laws, and resigned his authority. He was the father of Cartāgo (Just. xviii. 7). At a future period, his countrymen preferred against him an accusation for aspiring at the sovereignty (ibid.).

Mālca, as, f. perhaps a town in that part of Thessaly called Phthiotis. Inh. Mālceenses, ium, m. Adj. Mālceus, is, e. Mālceus ager (Liv. xlii. 40).—2. A town of Spain, not far from Numantia. Inh. Mālceenses, ium, m. cut off the guard of the Numantini, who held that town, and surrendered it to Q. Pōmpēius Atulus (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 298).

Mālōnā Silva, a wood in the country of the Sabines, the situation of which is unknown (Liv. i. 30).

Mālī, orum, m. a powerful Indian nation on the river Acētes. It is probable that their capital is now Mol-Tun. In battle with them and the Oxydræ, Alexander the Great received a severe wound, which nearly cost him his life. At last, however, these nations surrendered themselves to the victorious monarch (Curt. ix. 4 seq.).

Mālīus Pāntolābus, Mālī Pāntolābi, m. a man of notorious profligacy, who destroyed his patrimony, and did not even leave as much as would bury him, on which account his remains were deposited in the ground assigned for the poor (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 11).

Māllea, as, f. a town of Perrhæbia, taken by Mēnippus, a general of Antiōchus, king of Syria, in 193 B. C., afterwards by Philippus, king of Mæcēdonia, and then by the Romans (Liv. xxxvi. 10 seq.).

Māllos, i, f. a town of Cilicia, near the river Pýramus (Curt. iii. 7).

Mālōbāthrum, i, n. an ointment extracted from the leaves of a tree which grew in the marshes in India, and also in Syria. Plinius adds, that the Indian was of a superior quality to the Syrian. Horātius has Syrium Mālōbāthrum, Syrian perfume (Od. ii. 7. 8). The poet, by Syrian, probably did not mean that it was produced there, but that from Syria it came to Rome. Still it ought to be always kept in mind, that the Roman poets often err in the geography of the inland countries of Asia.

Mālōrix, igis, m. a commander of the Frisii. Tacitus calls him a sovereign prince, if sovereignty could be said to exist in Germany. He and Verritus headed an emigration of their countrymen, to lands which Vibius Avitus threatened to force them to give up, unless they obtained leave from the emperor, upon which two chieftains set out for Rome, and exhibited, at all they saw, the gaze and indifference of uncultivated men. Néro bestowed on both the privilege of Roman citizens, but ordered them to quit the territory of which they had taken possession. The Frisians refused submission, until a number of them were slain (Tac. Ann. xiii. 54).

Mālōvēndus, i, m. a commander of the Mārsi, a German nation, who submitted to the Romans, and informed them where the eagle of one of the legions, commanded by Vāros, would be found (Tac. Ann. ii. 25).

Mālthīnus, v. Mālchīnus, i, m. a man whom Horātius ridicules for his effeminacy. It would require stronger evidence than has yet been produced, to persuade any one to believe, that Horātius ridiculed his patron, Mæcenas, under this name, on account of his effeminacy, deriving the appellation from Malta, soft, effeminate. Absurd as it is, such an idea has been advanced by commentators on this poet (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 25).

Māmērcus, v. Māmērcinus, i, m. a surname of the Æmili. Juvēnalis uses this word in the plural, as an instance of the descendants of great men debasing themselves, and sinking into contempt (Sat. viii. 192).

Māmērcus, i, m. a Roman, who, at Trāsmēnus, the Lake of Perugia, killed a Lusitanian standard-bearer, and carried off the standard. On completing this act of bravery, he made a vigorous attempt to stop his flying countrymen, by whom he was transfixed with numerous darts (Sil. Ital. v. 333).—2. An Italian commander, a warlike and powerful man, who had gone into Sicily to support the tyrants, and was defeated by Timolēon at the battle on the river Abōlus, according to Plutarchus. This unsuccessful engagement obliged the Carthaginians to sue for peace, &c.

such terms as Timoleon chose to grant. Mamerceus, by the conditions of the treaty, being reduced to despair, sailed for Italy to bring the Lucanians against Timoleon and the Syracusans. The crews of the galleys tacked about, returned to Sicily, and delivered up Catana, Catana, on which Mamerceus fled to Hippon, king of Messene. The latter, on the town being invested, attempted, without success, to escape, and Mamerceus surrendered to Timoleon, on condition that he should not be his accuser before the Syracusans. When put on his trial, Mamerceus endeavoured to deliver a long speech in his own behalf, but the assembly received it with groans and hisses, and, therefore, he ran through the theatre, and, to kill himself, dashed his head upon the steps. The Syracusans seized him, stunned but not killed, and afterwards inflicted on him the punishment of thieves and robbers. Neither Cornelius Nepos nor Plutarch says, that he was tyrant of Catana, an assertion introduced probably by the carelessness of his biographer.—3. A bad poet, against whom Martialis writes an epigram (li. 88). The same poet has another epigram, addressed to Mamerceus greatly addicted to slander; but it is not certain whether they both refer to the same individual or not (v. 29).

Mamertum, c. Mamertium, i. n. a town of Italy, which some place near the river Silius, others in the country of the Sabines, and Cluverius, between Ciminara and Apenninus, near the town Oppido. Inh. Mamertini, orum (Sing. Mamertinus, i.), m. a people who, when first mentioned in history, lived in Campania. Addicted to war, they served, as mercenaries, under any state or prince who hired them. Agathocles, king of Syracuse, took them into his pay, but afterwards, with difficulty, got clear of them. They claimed the right of Syracusan citizens, and took up arms to support their pretensions. Having been prevailed on to desist, and to quit that city, they prepared to return to Italy, and, having been admitted as allies by the inhabitants of Messana, they soon obtained possession of the city, either by expelling or massacring the very people, by whom they had been so kindly received. Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, after leaving Italy, defeated them, and obliged them to seek protection within their walls. When distressed by the Syracusan king, aided by the Carthaginians, they applied to the Romans for assistance. The latter, considering them too insignificant for allies, and anxious to enlarge their conquest, declared war against the Carthaginians, which, in history, is known by the name of the first Punic war, 264 B. C. Adj. Mamertinus, a. um. Mamertina amphora (Mart. xiii. 117).

C. Mamilius Limetanus, C. Mamili Limetani, m. a tribune of the people, who moved that a decree pass, ordaining that an inquiry be instituted into the conduct of the persons who had received bribes from Jugurtha, king of Numidia, had restored to him his elephants and deserters, and had advised him to disregard the authority of the senate. He further proposed to call to account all who had concluded treaties, either of peace or war, with the enemy, without the sanction of the senate. The people with the greatest zeal and energy carried this measure, not from regard to the public, but from hatred of the nobility against whom it was levelled. Adj. Mamilius, a. um. Mamilla rigilla, the law above-mentioned (Sal. Jug. 40).

C. Mamilius Vitulus, C. Mamili Vitelli, m. a plebeian, and the first of that class who obtained the office of Censor Maximus. On his being elected praetor, in 209 B. C., Sicily fell to his lot. At a future period, he was one of three ambassadors sent to the Macedonian king, to demand reparation for the injuries he had committed on the allied cities of Greece. He died of a pestilence, in 176 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 8 seq.).

L. Mamilius, L. Mamili, m. dictator of Tusculum, who induced his countrymen to send assistance to the Romans, in 460 B. C. For his good offices, the privileges of the city were conferred on him two years after (Liv. iii. 18, 29).

Q. Mamilius Turrinus, Q. Mamili Turrini, m. was a plebeian edile, in 209 B. C. Next year he was elected praetor, and obtained the foreign jurisdiction, which he transferred to his colleague, and took the command in the north of Italy (Liv. xxvii. 36 seq.).

Mamurius, i. m. a man to whom Martialis writes an epigram, alike discreditable to its author and the person to whom it was sent (Mart. i. 93).

Mamurius Veturinus, Mamuri Veturi, m. the name of the man who, in workmanship, surpassed all whom Numa Pompilius had employed to make eleven shields so exactly like the one which had fallen from the sky, that it would be impossible to discover the slightest difference. As the reward of his labour, he only asked that the Salli should in their songs repeat his name. To this Ovidius refers. The poet has embellished the historical tradition respecting these shields, although, in point of fact, he differs little from the account transmitted by writers in prose (Fast. iii. 259—292).

Mamurra, m. m. prefect of the artists in Caesar's army in Gallia, France, and stood high in the favour of that commander, for a reason too revolting to be named, and for which Catullus has branded both with merited infamy (xxix). He was a Roman knight, a native of Formiae, Mola; hence Horatius uses Mamurra, most probably, to denote the place of his birth. His great wealth and extravagant luxury are described by Plinius (v. 288), and Cicero (Epist. ad Att. vii. 7). Cornelius Nepos says that his house contained whatever had been in Gallia Comata, and that he was the first who had the whole columns of his house of solid marble.—2. A man who concealed his poverty by attending sales, and looking at valuable articles, as if intending to purchase them, on which account Martialis ridicules him (ix. 60).

Mancius, i. m. a governor of Tigranocerta (Ap. Bel. Mith. 223).

Mancinus, i. m. son of Satrius, who fell on the night before the battle at Cannas (Sil. Ital. ix. 13).—2. A man whom Martialis ridicules for his meanness and avarice (l. 44).—3. Another, who boasted of his wealth (Mart. iv. 61).

L. Mancinus, L. Mancini, m. a lieutenant-general, who took part of Carthage, in 149 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 51).

Mandane, es. f. the only daughter of As-týages, and wife of Cambyses, a Persian, by whom she became the mother of Cyrus q. v. (Val. Max. i. 7).

Mändöla, v. f. Bardela, a village which stands on a hill partly well cultivated, and partly woody. Höräklus mentions it as being very cold, the natural effect of its high situation (Epis. i. 18. 105).

Mändöulus, i. m. a Spaniard, brother of Indibilis, whom Livius makes the two first men in that country, was chieftain of the Ilērgētes. His wife who, with many Spanish ladies, fell into the hands of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, at the taking of Carthāgo Nōva, appears to have had a very delicate sense of female honour. In her speech to that eminent Roman, she discovers the greatest purity of mind, and anxiety for the protection of the young women against injury or insult. Her husband and his brother made frequent efforts to rouse their countrymen against the Romans; but every engagement proved the futility of their plans. At last, they deserted the Carthaginian commander, Hāsdrūbal, and joined Scipio, on which their wives and children were restored to them. On the defeat of the Carthaginians, these chieftains expected to govern the country, and mortified at the disappointment, they again took up arms, and experienced a severe defeat. Seeing no security, but in the clemency of the conqueror, they begged forgiveness, which was granted. In a short time after, they had again recourse to arms, were again defeated, Indibilis was killed in battle, and Mändöulus given up to the Romans for punishment (Liv. xxii. 21. seq.).

Mändöpölis, is. f. a town of Phrygia, at which the Roman consul Cn. Mānlius Vūlso halted, as he marched from Ephēsus against the Gallōgræci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Mändūbīl, orum, m. a people of Gālīa, France, whose country lay near the source of Sequāna, the Seine. Their chief town was Alētia, Alise (Cæs. B. G. vii. 68. seq.).

Mändūbrātius, i. m. one of the nation of the Trinobāntes, who, on his father being killed by Cassivēlannus, fled from Britain to Cæsar, then in Gālīa, France, who took him and the state under his protection (Cæs. B. G. v. 20).

Mändūria, v. f. Casalnuovo, or, Mandula, a city of Cālābria, in the territory of the Sallēntini, on the lake Andoria, which the Roman consul, Q. Fābius Māximus, took by assault, in 211 B. C., on his way to storm Tārentum (Liv. xxvii. 15). Is. h. Mändūri, orum, m.

Mānes, ium, v. Dii Mānes, Deōrum Mānium, m. ghosts of the dead, to which the ancients ascribed great power, as is evident from the writings of their poets (Hor. Epod. v).

Manicius, i. m. was prætor of the Prænēstini, in 218 B. C., and most nobly defended Cāpillinum against Hānnibal. He had formerly been a notary, and, after the siege, a statue was erected to him, at the forum in Prænēstē, clad in a coat of mail, and dressed in a gown, with the head covered. Other evidence is produced by the historian to prove, that the garrison surrendered by capitulation, and was not cut down by a body of cavalry, after they had quitted the fortification, as some authors had asserted (Liv. xxiii. 19).

Mānīlia, v. f. a woman of infamous character (Juv. Sat. vi. 242. Val. Max. viii. 3. Gel. iv. 24).

Mānilius, i. m. a Roman prætor, whose camp the slaves carried in the Servile war (Flor. iii. 19).

Mānilius Māncinus, Mānīli Māncini, m. a tribune of the people who, in an assembly, asked whom they wished to carry on the war against Jūgūrtha, and C. Mārius was unanimously named for that command (Sal. Jug. 73).

Mānilius Tūscūlus, Mānīli Tūscūli, m. one of the conspirators against Cassius Lōnginus, proprietor of farther Spain.

C. Mānilius, C. Mānīli, m. a venal tribune of the Roman people, always the tool of a more powerful citizen, who carried a law, though violently opposed by the nobility, and some of his colleagues, that the war against Mithridātes should be committed to Cn. Pōmpeius, 68 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 100). Besides the law already mentioned, he passed another, respecting the votes of freedmen. Vālerius Māximus calls him Mānilius Crispus (vi. 2). Adj. Mānilius, a, um.

L. Mānilius, L. Mānīli, m. a proconsul, who was obliged to flee from Aquitānia, with the loss of all his baggage (Cæs. B. G. iii. 20).

Mānūs Mānilius, Mānī Mānīli, m. a Roman consul with L. Mārcius Cēnsōrinus, in 151 B. C. According to Līvius, these consuls began to besiege Carthage, and Mānilius took several towns in the neighbourhood of that city (Liv. Ep. 50). Hāsdrūbal, commander of the Carthaginians, conducted the war against them, and they received much assistance from Scipio, grandson of P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus, who served in the army as tribune of the soldiers. Phāmēa commanded the Carthaginian cavalry; both he and Hāsdrūbal showed their high opinion of the military talents of young Scipio, by studiously avoiding, in battle, that part of the army which he commanded (Eutrop. iv. 10). Several Roman authors make the prænomen of Mānilius, Mārcus, in opposition to the consular calendar.

P. Mānilius, P. Mānīli, m. one of the Commissioners nominated to regulate the affairs in Illyricum in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

Sēxtus Mānilius, Sēxti Mānīli, m. a Roman who, during the secession of the soldiers to Mōns Avēntinus, Monte Aventino, in 449 B. C., was placed with M. Oppius at the head of their affairs (Liv. iii. 61).

Mānīmi, orum, m. the Manimians, a people of Germany, whose precise situation cannot be ascertained from ancient authors. Some critics place them between Viādrus, the Oder, and Vistūla, the Vistula (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Mānūs, i. m. a man of mean birth, named by Pērsius, ready to be his heir (Sat. vi. 56).—2. A friend of the poet Mārthialis, on whose account he wished to return to Hispania, Spain (Mart. x. 20).

Mānīli Acidi, two eminent young men, the one the son of M. Mānilius, and the other the son of L. Mānilius. Their own prænomina are unknown. They accompanied the consul, P. Licinius, to Mācēdōnia, in 103 B. C., when he went to make war on Pērsēus, king of that country (Liv. xlii. 49).

Mānlius, a. nm. Mānliagēns, the clan of the Mānlii (Liv. vi. 20).

Mānlius, l. m. the paramour of Apūlciā Vāniliā, grand-daughter of a sister of the emperor Augustus, for which immorality the senate banished him from Italy and Africa, in the year 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 50).—2. A man mentioned by Mārtiālis, probably a Spaniard (iv. 55).

Mānlius Māltinus, Mānlii Māltini, m. a lieutenant-general sent against Mithridātes, in 92 B. C. (Just. xxxviii. 3). Here the reading ought unquestionably to be Mānilius Māncinus.

Mānlius Pātrūtiūs, Mānlii Pātrūti, m. a man of senatorian rank, who complained to the senate that the inhabitants of Senensis Colōniā, Sienna, had assaulted, and even struck him, by order of the magistrates. Besides, they buried him in effigy, pronounced a mock oration, carried the images of his family in ludicrous procession, which they compelled him to witness, and to hear a torrent of abuse, both against himself and the senate. For this offence, the guilty suffered punishment (Tac. Hist. iv. 45).

Mānlius Vālēs, Mānlii Vālētis, m. the lieutenant-general of a Roman legion in Britain, who risked a battle, and suffered a defeat, in the year 50 (Tac. Ann. xii. 40 seq.).

Mānlius Vōpiscus, Mānlii Vōpisci, m. a noble Roman, who had a villa at Tibur, Tivoli, which Stātilius describes with such liveliness and precision, as presents the landscape distinctly to the view of his reader (Syl. i. B. 1).

A. Mānlius, A. Mānlii, m. obtained the consulship in 474 B. C., with L. Fūlius, who were both summoned to a trial before the people, because they had opposed an Agrarian law, on which they assumed the dress of suppliants, soliciting the good offices not only of the Commons, but of the younger patricians. During their supplication, the tribune who arraigned them was found dead. In 454 B. C., Mānlius was one of the three commissioners sent to Athens, on purpose to procure copies of the laws of Solon, and to obtain information respecting the customs and laws of the other Grecian States. After their return to Rome, he was appointed one of the decemviri, to reduce the laws into a regular system, and in the meantime to govern the state (Liv. ii. 54 seq.). In the consular calendar, he is called A. Mānlius Vālsō.—2. A tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, first in 404 B. C., and afterwards twice obtained the same office. He was one of the three commissioners sent with a golden bowl to Apōllō at Delphi, Castri, whom the Liparean pirates took, and, afterwards, by order of their chief magistrate, Timāstheūs, conveyed first to Delphi, and then brought back to Rome, in 393 B. C. (Liv. iv. 61 seq.).—3. A tribune of the soldiers, killed in an attack on the Roman army, by the troops under Hānibal, in 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 27).—4. A lieutenant-general in the army of C. Mārius, whom he sent from Rome with military stores to Africa, on his being appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Nūmidia, Algiers. When Bōechus, king of Mauritanā, desired a conference with confidential assistants from Mārius, the latter entrusted

L. Cōrnēlius Sūllā. In age the former surpassed the latter, but was his inferior in eloquence, and therefore gave him the precedence in addressing that prince (Sal. Jug. 86—102). Here some editions read C. Mānlius, undoubtedly a mistake.

A. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus, A. Mānlii Cāpitōlini, m. a tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, appointed first in 388 B. C. to that office, to which he was afterwards elected thrice. When his brother, M. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus, was brought to trial, Aulus did not put on mourning (Liv. vi. 1—36).

A. Mānlius Tōrquātus, A. Mānlii Tōrquāti, m. created consul with C. Sēmprōnius Blaesus (2) in 246 B. C., and three years after with Q. Lātānius Cērcō. In six days these consuls finished a war with the Pāllisci, of whom they killed fifteen thousand, and granted peace to the survivors (Eutrop. ii. 28). In cons. cal. he is called A. Mānlius Tōrquātus Atticus.—2. Elected praetor in 169 B. C., to whose lot Sārdīniā fell as his province, but was detained in the city to preside at some trials (Liv. xlv. 16).—3. Son of L. Mānlius Tōrquātus, school-fellow of T. Pōmpōnius Atticus.—4. A noble Roman, on whose marriage with Jūlia, Cātullus composed Carm. lxi, and to whom he inscribes Carm. lxxviii.

A. Mānlius Vūlsō, A. Mānlii Vūlsōnis, m. elected consul in 180 B. C. with M. Jūnius Brūtus, on which he marched to Istria, and shamefully allowed his camp to be taken and plundered. The Istrians gained no advantage by their success against the Romans, for they intoxicated themselves with wine, fell asleep, were killed, and the camp retaken. Jūnius joined his colleague; but they did not accomplish any thing worthy of notice, incurred the displeasure of the state, when some of the tribunes of the people attempted to bring Mānlius to trial, but others opposed. It does not appear from Livius that Mānlius was called to account for his misconduct (Liv. xl. 59 seq.).

C. Mānlius, C. Mānlii, m. a tribune of the soldiers with consular power in 378 B. C., to whom, with P. Mānlius, the war against the Vōlsci was assigned. From their unskillfulness, the troops would have been cut off, had it not been for their own bravery, and the steadiness with which they acted without a commander (Liv. vi. 30).—2. One of the accomplices of Cātullina, whom that traitor sent to Etrūriā, Tuscany, to levy troops, to take possession of strong stations, and to adopt whatever measures he considered necessary for the success of the conspiracy. Robbers crowded in great numbers to his standard, and the soldiers of L. Cōrnēlius Sūllā, who, having obtained great wealth by plunder and rapine, had squandered it in dissipation, and were overwhelmed with debt. To Q. Mārcius Rex, who had the command at Feslīe, Piezola, he sent a plausible, rather than a satisfactory, defence of his conduct, which having been laid before the senate, that court declared him a public enemy. Of the rebel forces he commanded the right wing in the engagement between them and the troops of the republic, and fell fighting with great bravery in the foremost ranks. He held a commission in the army of L. Cōrnēlius Sūllā, under whom he had acquired considerable experience as an officer, and accumulated prodigious wealth which he soon dissipated in every kind of extravagance, and rejoiced at the prospect of another revolution, expecting to repair his ruined fortune. His vices as a man degraded him in the opinion of his fellow-citizens, who could not fail to commend his intrepidity as a soldier (Sal. Cat. 24-59). Adj. Mānlianus, a, um. Mānliāna castra (Sal. Cat. 32).

Cn. Mānlius, Cn. Mānlii, m. elected consul in 480 B. C. During that year he was killed in battle with the Veientians (Liv. ii. 43-47). In cons. cal. he is called Cn. Mānlius Cincinnātus.—2. Elected consul in 358 B. C., when he gained a victory over the Tibūrtes, who had marched to the very walls of Rome. Two years after, he was re-elected to the same office, on which he marched against the Fālsici; but nothing is recorded respecting his plans or operations in that country. He procured the passing of a law, that the twentieth part of the value of the persons set free should be paid into the treasury. This formed the fund which the Romans called Sānctius Aērarium q. v. He was afterwards an interrex, censor, and master of the horse to L. Fūrius Cāmillus (Liv. vii. 12-28). He had the surname of Cāpitōlinus.—3. Praetor, defeated in 73 B. C. by Spartacus, commander of the fugitive gladiators (Liv. Ep. 96).

Cn. Mānlius Maximus, Cn. Mānlii Māximi, m. held the consulship with P. Rūtillus Rūfus in 107 B. C. He and Q. Sērvilius Cēpio, proconsul, that year commanded two armies in Gallia, France, in order to subdue the Gauls, or, at least, to keep them in check. Whether the Roman generals were deficient in military knowledge, or the barbarians surpassed them in numbers, history does not inform us; but we have the authority of Liviū for stating, that their camps were taken with the loss of eighty thousand soldiers killed, besides forty thousand sutlers and other followers of the camp (Liv. Ep. 67). To this defeat Sallustius alludes (Jug. 114). Eutropius (v. 1) calls him Mānius Mānlius, and makes him consul with Q. Sērvilius Cēpio; both mistakes. They never were colleagues in the consulship. C. Atilius Serranus held that office with Q. Sērvilius Cēpio, the year before P. Rūtillus Rūfus and Cn. Mānlius Māximus obtained the consulship.

Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, Cn. Mānlii Vūlsōnis, m. after holding the offices of curule edile and praetor, obtained the consulship in 191 B. C., when Asia became his province, and he received the troops from L. Cōrnēlius Scipio. He undertook a war against the Gāllogræci, fought with success against the Tōlistōboii, Tectōsagi, and Trōceni. From the first, he took their camp, although it had great natural advantages. Having concluded a peace with Antiochus, he settled the differences between several princes, and contending communities, crossed into Thrācia, where the natives by their bravery took part of his plunder, passed through Thēssālā, and wintered at Apōlōnia. The senate decreed him a triumph for his victory over the Asiatic Gauls, which the ambassadors or plenipotentiaries, who acted along with him, opposed, on the ground that his conduct was dishonourable towards Antiochus, king of Sŷria, that his merits as a soldier did not deserve that honour, and that the Gauls were a corrupted and effeminate people. He rebutted their accusations with considerable ingenuity, to which the favourable opinion of the elder senators gave additional strength, and, the business of the province having been completed, ancient usage prevailed. The luxury, and means of its gratification, which he introduced into Rome, first corrupted the manners of the state, and ultimately contributed to its destruction (Liv. xxxiii. 25 seq.).

L. Mānlius, L. Mānlii, m. a praetor in 230 B. C., for whom the Boii and Insūbres successfully laid an ambuscade, by which he lost a number of his men. In consequence of a mutiny of the soldiers, he vowed a temple to Concord, which was dedicated two years after (Liv. xxi. 17-xxiii. 21).—2. Accused with L. Minūcius Mŷrtilus, of having beaten the Carthaginian ambassadors, for which M. Claudius, praetor of the city, ordered them to be delivered up to the ambassadors, by whom they were carried to Carthage in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 42).—3. Quæstor in 170 B. C., whom the Romans sent to Puteoli, Puzzuolo, to conduct Māsgaba q. v., son of Māsīnissa, to Rome at the public expense, and to bestow upon him distinguished marks of Roman friendship (Liv. xlv. 13).—4. A proconsul whom L. Hērclēus, quæstor under Q. Sērtōrius, defeated with M. Dōmičius, a lieutenant-general, in 79 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 90).—5. A praetor in the interest of Cn. Pōmpeius, who fled from Alba with six cohorts. His troops, seeing at a distance Caesar's cavalry commanded by Bivius Cūrius, deserted him, and joined the enemy (Cæs. B. C. i. 24).

L. Mānlius Acidinus, L. Mānlii Acidini, m. was elected praetor, 213 B. C., and in the year following, when he was sent beyond seas to learn what was going on abroad. Africānus delivered the province of Spain to Mānlius and L. Lēntulus, 208 B. C., where these officers obtained a complete victory over the Spaniards, of which the consequence was submission to very hard terms. After being continued another year in that country, the senate appointed Mānlius an ovation which M. Pōrcius Læca, a tribune of the people, prevented him from celebrating (Liv. xxvi. 23 seq.).—2. Obtained the office of praetor, 190 B. C., when the north of Spain fell to his lot as his province. Over the Celtibēri he gained a decisive victory, and would have conquered that nation, had he not been superseded by the arrival of the new praetor. His transactions in that country entitled him to a triumph, which he demanded, but the senate refused it, because there was no precedent for conferring that honour unless the commander had either brought home his army, or delivered to his successor the province in perfect subjection and tranquillity. He obtained an ovation in which he exhibited a number of golden crowns, besides a great weight of gold and silver. In the senate he declared, that his quæstor was bringing home eighty pounds' weight of gold, and ten thousand pounds' weight of silver. He was elected consul in 181 B. C. with Q. Fūlvius Flāceus (Liv. xxxviii. 35 seq.).

L. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus, L. Mānlii Cāpitōlini, m. elected a military tribune with consular power in 421 B. C. (Liv. iv. 42).

L. Mānlius Censorinus, L. Mānli Censorini, m. a Roman consul with M. Mānlius in 151 B. C., according to Eutropius. In con. cal. he is called L. Mārcius Censorinus q. v.

L. Mānlius Imperiosus, L. Mānli Imperiōsi, m. created a dictator in 362 B. C., to drive a nail into the temple of Jūpiter, on purpose to remove a pestilence. These nails were driven into the right side of that edifice, where the temple of Minerva is. After performing that ceremony, he raised an army against the Hernici, when his great severity excited the hatred of the community, and the tribunes of the people compelled him to resign. His son prevented a prosecution from being raised against him. See T. Mānlius Tōrquātus (Liv. vii. 3-5).

L. Mānlius Tōrquātus, L. Mānli Tōrquāti, m. a lieutenant-general, who was surrounded by a party of Gauls or Umbrians, in 297 B. C., and owed his deliverance to L. Cōruellus Scipio, proprætor (Liv. x. 26).—2. A pontiff who died 204 B. C. (Liv. xxx. 39).—3. A noble Roman, who held the consulship with L. Aurēlius Cotta, in 67 B. C. He was the particular friend of M. Tullius Cicero, who mentions him in terms of high approbation in many of his letters. He obtained Macedonia for his province, with the title of Imperator, at the suggestion of the Orator, who extols his elegance in speaking, prudence in judgment, and the politeness of his manners (Cic. Brut. 68). In the civil commotions, Mānlius probably, like his friends, supported Cn. Pompeius. We have no certain information either on this particular, or respecting the time and manner of his death (Sal. Cat. 18).—4. The grandson of the former, to whom Hōrātius addresses one of his odes. He appears to have been wealthy, and a descendant of T. Mānlius, who had first the surname of Tōrquātus, on which account Hōrātius mentions his noble birth (genus). He excelled in eloquence, and led a virtuous life (Hor. Od. iv. 7). Some consider him the son of the former, and others maintain that this is the same person mentioned in former article; both these opinions seem erroneous.—5. A fellow-student with T. Pōmpōnius Atticus, whose intimacy, formed at school, continued for life (Cor. Nep. Att.).

L. Mānlius Vūlso, L. Mānli Vūlsōnis, m. obtained the consulship at Rome in 258 B. C., and had first for his colleague Q. Cædicius, and next M. Atilius Rēgulus (2). After obtaining a signal victory at sea over Hāmilcar, the Carthaginian commander, the consuls crossed over into Africa, took Clippa, Athibia, and advanced as far as Carthage, desolating wherever they went. Mānlius returned to Rome with twenty-seven thousand prisoners, leaving Atilius in Africa (Eutrop. ii. 21). In con. cal. he is called L. Mānlius Vūlso Longus.—2. The brother of Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, elected prætor in 200 B. C., obtaining Sicily for his province, where he performed nothing memorable (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).

M. Mānlius, M. Mānli, m. a Roman of patrician rank, who was elected a military tribune with consular authority, in 419 B. C. (Liv. iv. 44).—2. (Afterwards surnamed Capitolinus), was consul with L. Vālērius Pōtius, in 392 B. C. These consuls marched against the Æqui, and, for their victory over that nation, the senate decreed to the former an ovation, and to the latter a triumph, because he had continued the pursuit and slaughter with greater earnestness than his colleague. When the capitol was besieged by the Gauls, and one of that nation had reached the top of the walls, whilst the sentinel on that post was asleep, Mānlius having been awakened by the cackling of the sacred geese, and flapping of their wings, snatched up his arms, and, by a stroke of the boss of his shield, tumbled down the first Gaul, whose weight, falling backwards, overthrew those who were next him, and Mānlius slew others who had thrown down their arms, and were clinging to the rock. By this time some of his countrymen came to his assistance, and by their united exertions, the whole Gauls were forced headlong down the steep. For this act of bravery, besides praises and gifts, he received the surname of Capitolinus. Of a temper naturally violent, and proud of his military achievements, he envied the fame of others, and excited discontent among the plebeians, by inveighing against the cruelty and injustice of the patricians. Having failed to prove some of his charges against the nobility, he was imprisoned by A. Cōrnellius Cossus, who had been created dictator in consequence of a war with the Volsi, and the commotions which were raised by this turbulent citizen. On being set at liberty, he continued his inflammatory harangues, and, at last, aspired to the crown, for which he was condemned to be thrown over the Tarpeian rock. Thus the scene of his bravery became the place of his punishment, and the guilt of his crime was expiated by the death of a traitor (Flor. i. 13. Virg. Æn. viii. 652). A decree was passed, that not one of the Manlian clan should afterwards be called M. Mānlius, and the ground on which his house stood was planted with trees (Liv. v. 31 seq.). Adj. Mānlius, it. Mānlianus, a. um. Mānlii gēna (Liv. vi. 20). Mānliānum supplicium (Liv. vi. 20).

P. Mānlius, P. Mānli, m. elected a tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, in 378 B. C. Because he and C. Mānlius were patricians, the Volsians were assigned to them as a province, out of the ordinary course, without casting of lots, or mutual agreement. Their rash and unskilful conduct exposed the army to the most imminent danger. See C. Mānlius. In 367 B. C. he was substituted dictator, in room of M. Furius Cāmillus (Liv. vi. 30, 38).—2. Created a triumvir epulo, in 198 B. C., with C. Licinius Lucullus, and P. Pōrcius Laeca. He afterwards obtained the office of prætor, was sent to the north of Spain, where he assisted the consul, and obtained a victory over the Turdētani. On his re-appointment to that office, in 184 B. C., the south of Spain fell to his lot, in which he fought several successful battles with the Lusitanians, and died in 182 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 42 seq.).

P. Mānlius Vūlso, P. Mānli Vūlsōnis, m. a Roman who, on being elected a prætor, in 212 B. C., obtained Sardinia for his province (Liv. xxvi. 23 seq.).

T. Mānlius, T. Mānli, m. (afterwards surnamed Tōrquātus), the son of L. Mānlius Imperiosus, treated with great cruelty by his father for no crime, but merely because he was not a man of eloquence, or ready utterance. For this and other acts of violence, L. Mānlius was brought to trial by M. Pōmpōnius, a plebeian tribune; but the filial affection of T. Mānlius was not lessened by the barbarous treatment which he had received from his father. He waited on the tribune, and threatened to put him instantly to death, if he would not swear, that he would never hold a meeting of the commons for the purpose of prosecuting his father. The dread of death secured an immediate compliance; thus the affection of the son saved the father from the disgrace of a trial, which would have condemned him either to a fine or banishment. The people rewarded the goodness of his disposition, although they could not commend the propriety of his conduct. Tribunes of the soldiers were, for the first time, appointed by the votes of the people, in 361 B. C., when the second place among six was given to him, without his having obtained public favour, either by civil or military merit. With the permission of the dictator, he engaged, in single combat, a Gaul, who defied the Roman army, killed his antagonist, and stripped him of a chain, hence he was called Torquātus, a surname continued to all the descendants of this line. In consequence of the death of their champion, the Gauls deserted their camp, and the dictator conferred on him a golden crown. The favour of his countrymen procured him the dictatorship twice, and the consulship thrice. In 339 B. C., he and his colleague, after a very bloody engagement, defeated the Latins with great slaughter. Before they joined battle, in consequence of the Latins wearing the same dress with the Romans, Mānlius gave orders, that no one should fight with the enemy but by his appointment. His own son Titus, without waiting for his order, accepted the challenge of Gēmīnius Mētius q. r., on which he ordered him to be beheaded. In another battle, he compelled the Latins under their pretor, Minūcius, to submit unconditionally to the Romans. His bravery and success procured him respect only from the aged, who met him on his return to the city; but the young, for that barbarous act, hated and cursed him during the whole of his life (Liv. vii. 4 seq.). To him Mānilius refers (v. 107), and Eutrōpius (ii. 5). Adj. Mānliānus, a. um. Mānliāna impēria, orders of the greatest strictness or severity (Liv. viii. 7). —2. Elected consul, 301 B. C. To his lot fell the province of Etrūria, Tuscany, which he had just entered, when he was thrown from his horse in exercising the cavalry, and died within three days (Liv. x. 9, 11). —3. Consul with C. Attilius Bālbis, in 237 B. C. The shutting of the temple of Jānus, for the second time from the reign of Rōmulus, distinguished their consulship, and a triumph over the Sardinians (Eutrop. iii. 3). Eleven years after, he was re-elected to that office with Q. Fūlvius Flācus. Livius writes, that, in the judgment of some, he carried primitive strictness to too great a degree of rigour, and his speech against ransoming the prisoners taken at Cānnæ, appears to justify that opinion. At the petition of the Latins to enjoy the rights of Roman citizens, and he admitted members of the senate, he expressed the greatest indignity. His success in arms, particularly against the Sardinians, may have raised in his mind a high idea of the Roman character. Hāsdrūbal gained some advantages over him in Sardinia, retarded his conquest of the island, and acquired military reputation for his success; but Mānlius, at last, in a general engagement, killed upwards of three thousand of his men, and took seven hundred prisoners, among whom were Hāsdrūbal himself, Mānno, the author of the revolt, and Māgo, a near relation of Hānñibal. On reducing the whole island to subjection, he punished the cities according to their degree of demerit, sailed for Rome, and delivered the money, carried from Sardinia, to the quaestors, the corn to the ediles, and the prisoners to the praetors. After an unsuccessful canvass for the highest pontificate, he refused the consulship, and was afterwards appointed dictator, to preside at the elections, and solemnize the games (Liv. xxiii. 22: xxvii. 33). To him Silius Itālicus alludes (xi. 73). —4. Chosen pontiff in place of L. Fōrtius Phīlus, in 172 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 11). —5. Requested and obtained from the senate, that he should investigate the charges against D. Jūnius Silānus, praetor, preferred by Macedonian ambassadors, who accused him of extortion, in 143 B. C. He found the accusation true; condemned his son, and disowned him; nor did he even attend his funeral, when he had terminated his life by strangulation; but transacted business in the ordinary way, as if no such event had happened (Liv. Ep. 54).

Mānnēia, ae. f. a woman described by Mārtiālis as very dirty (i. 84).

Mānnēus, r. Nannēus, i. m. a man who pretended to be a Roman knight, and took his seat amongst them at public exhibitions, but, on being discovered, was expelled from the seats appropriated to that order of citizens (Mart. v. 14).

Mānnus, i. m. a tribune in the army of M. Attilius Rēgulus, who increased the fear of the soldiers at sailing into Africa. The consul drew his axe, and threatened him with instant death, if he did not obey his orders; the dread of personal danger produced immediate compliance (Flor. ii. 2).

Mānnus, i. m. a slave of the Cēlāvli, who informed the senate, that the fires which had been raised in Rome, had been kindled by his masters; and five noble Cāmpāni, in consequence of their parents having been put to death by Q. Fūlvius Flācus, on the taking of Cāpua. For this discovery, he received his liberty and twenty thousand asses; all concerned in the burnings were punished (Liv. xxvi. 27). —2. Son of Tūseo, celebrated by the Germans as one of the founders of their race. He had three sons, from whom the Ingēvōnes, Hērmlōnes, and Istēvōnes were descended, and from whom they derived their names. Mānnus is the German word Man, with a Latin termination (Tac. Ger. 2).

Māntīnēa, ae. f. Milas, anciently Ptōlis, a town of Arcādia, celebrated for the victory obtained there, by Epāmīnōndas, over the Lacedaemonians and Arcadians. A mortal wound, received during the action, terminated the life of that general. The rich plains of Milas, in favourable years, yielded twelve for one. Pausānias refers its foundation to Māntīnēus, a son of Lyeōn. In the walls of Māntīnēa were ten gates, and the direction of the roads leading from each of them may still be ascertained. Inh. Māntīnēsēs, han.

m. Adj. Māntinēnsis, is, e.—2. A town of Argolis, of which no vestige remains (Plin. i. 417).

Māntius, i, m. son of Mēlampus, and brother of Antiphates. Aurora carried him off (Hom. Od. xv. 242).

Māntō, e. Māntbō, ūs, f. daughter of Tirēsis, the prophet, who came into Italy after her father's death, and appears to have lived on the banks of Tiber, the Terere, since she had, by that river, a son whose name was Ocnus. Like her father, she possessed the gift of prophecy, which is indicated by her very name (μαντις, vates) perpetuated in the city Mantua, which was built by her son (Virg. Æn. x. 199 seq.). Stātilius describes her as skilful in necromancy, and aiding her father when he disturbed the ghosts of the dead, at the request of Etēocles, the Theban king (Th. iv. 463 seq.).

Māntūa, æ, f. the mother of Rūllus and Nōrbānus q. e. (Sil. Ital. xvii. 427).

Māntūa, æ, f. Mantua, a celebrated town of Gallia Cisalpina, which stands on a lake with reedy shores, and surrounded by a flat country. The streets are of a proper breadth, and are in straight lines. The town is fortified, has four communications with the land by bridges and causeways, and, from its situation, is capable of holding out against a long siege. Virgilius says it was walled by Ocnus, who called it from his mother's name Māntūa. The poet adds, that it was enriched with noble ancestry, but that the people were of different descent, consisting of three tribes, each of whom governed four provinces, and that Māntūa was the capital (Æn. x. 199 seq.). Virgilius was a native of this neighbourhood, and his account must be taken with some allowance for poetical embellishments. It is still a place of considerable note, and the capital of a Dutchy. Adj. Māntūānus, a, um. Māntūāna fāma, the celebrity of Virgilius (Stat. Syl. iv. 7. 27). Māntūānus vātes, Virgilius (Amm. Mar. xv. 9).

Maōamālcha, orum, n. a large town, surrounded by strong walls, not far from Ctēsiphon (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 4).

Māppa, æ, f. a kind of flag, which the prætor of the Roman games used, as the signal for the starting of the chariots. From Quiniliānus, we learn the Romans borrowed this custom from the Carthaginians (i. 5. 57).

Marāba, e. Baraba, orum, n. the metropolis of the Sābæi, in Arābia Fēlix (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Maracānda, orum, n. Samarcand, a town which stood between Oxus and Iāxartes (Curt. vii. 6).

Mārācus, rather Mārābius, i, m. the Elbuga, a river anciently in the country of the Saurōmātæ (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Mārānga, orum, n. a district of Pērsia (Amm. Mar. xxv. 1).

Mārāthon, ōnis, m. Marathon, a small town or village twenty-one miles from Athens, with an adjoining plain celebrated, in history, for the defeat of the Persians, by the Athenians under Miltiades. The modern village consists of a few wretched cottages, inhabited by Albanians. Adsertus Mārāthon, delivered Marathona, alluding to the famous Marathonian bull killed by Theseus (Stat. Th. v. 431). Mārāthōnis, idis, f. of Mārāthon, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Mārāthōnis quercus (Stat. Th. xii. 730).

Isk. Mārthōnē, orum, m. Adj. Mārthōnēus, a, um. Mārthōnēus orum (Stat. Th. xii. 196). Mārthōnēus taurus (Cic. Tusc. iv. 22), the bull killed by Theseus, to which Ovidius refers (Met. vii. 434).

Mārāthos, i, f. Merakia, a town of Phœnicia, which had been destroyed before Strabo wrote, but has since been rebuilt (Plin. i. 575).

Mārāthus, i, m. a beautiful youth, who fell ardently in love with Phōlēse (Tib. i. 8. 71 seq.).

Mārīxēs, is, m. a Carthaginian commander under Hānnibal. To him Māgo reveals the stratagem formed by their general to effect an escape, at the time when they were shut up in a defile, by Q. Fābius Māximus. Fertile in resources, Hānnibal ordered dried twigs to be tied to the horns of the oxen which were in his camp, to be set on fire, and the cattle driven through the defile. During the agitation thus excited among the Romans, the Carthaginian army passed in safety (Sil. Ital. vii. 324 seq.).

Mārcellānus, i, m. a perfumer (Mart. ii. 29).

Mārcella, æ, f. the wife of Mārtilis, to whom he writes two epigrams in praise of her taste, talents, and disposition (xii. 21; xii. 31).

Mārcellinus, i, m. a Roman whom Mārtilis congratulates on his father's birthday, rendered more remarkable by the youth's having on it, for the first time, shaved his beard (iii. 6). This is one of the quaint and puerile additions, with which the epigrams of Mārtilis too frequently abound. The same poet addresses other odes to Mārcellinus (vi. 25 &c.).

Mārcellus, i, m. the surname of a Roman family, which produced many great and illustrious characters. They were a branch of the Claudian clan (gens Claudia). Different persons of the name of Mārcellus, C. Mārcellus, &c., are mentioned in Caesar, and other Roman authors, of whom it is not necessary to give any particular account. Adj. Mārcellinus, a, um.

Mārcellus Claudius, Mārcellus Claudii, m. a noble Roman, of the same age with T. Pōmpōnius Atticus, who, at his request, wrote the history of the Mārcellii. Cōrnēlius Nēpos commended this tract, and others by the same author, for the elegant and interesting manner in which they are written. Mārcellus Claudii, Mārcellorum, i, e. (rogātū) Mārcellus Claudii (Atticus enumeravit familiam) Mārcellorum (Cor. Nep. Att. 18).

Mārcellus, Cōrnēlius, Mārcellus Cōrnēlii, m. a man of senatorian rank, involved in the prosecution against Lēpida, wife of C. Cāssius, and afterwards murdered in Spain, by the emperor Gāllus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8 seq.).

Mārēla, æ, f. a vestal virgin, who, with Emilia and Licinia, was condemned for incest, in 116 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 63).—2. The wife of M. Atilius Rēgulus (Sil. Ital. vi. 403).—3. The wife of Fābius Māximus, a confidential friend of the emperor Augustus, whom he, according to report, accompanied to Plānēsia, Planesia, on a visit to Agrippa. Fābius unfortunately mentioned the circumstance to his wife, and she to Livia, who dreaded a reconciliation betwixt the emperor and his grandson, on that account, she was supposed to accelerate the death of the former. Fābius soon after that, perhaps by his own hand, died, and Mārēla, in the agony of her grief, blamed herself for being accessory to his death (Tac. Ann. i. 5).

Marcia Furiilla, Marcia Furiilla, f. second wife of the Roman emperor Titus.

Marcianópolis, is. f. Marsenopolis, or, Præbisanus, a town of Mysia, which was so called from the sister of the emperor Trajānus (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Marcii, orum, m. a Roman clan (Mārcia gens). Adj. Mārcius, et. Mārcianus, a, um. Mārcia rogātio (Liv. xlii. 21). Mārcus sal-tus, a forest, from which the Ligūres drove Q. Mārcius Philippus q. v. (Liv. xxxix. 20). Mārcianum fœdus (Cic. pro L. Cor. Balb. 17).

Mārcius, i, m. an ancient soothsayer, who foretold the defeat at Cannæ, and delivered another prophecy involved in greater obscurity, which perplexed the Romans greatly, in 214 B. C. (Liv. xxv. 12). Mārcōbius has quoted from his writings, which extended to two volumes (Sat. i. 17). Cicero makes the number two, and adds that they were brothers, and augurs as well as prophets. Adj. Mārcianus, a, um. Mārciāna cārmina, the prophecies of Mārcius, to which Silius Itālicus alludes (vii. 483); but others refer this line to the Sibylline prophecies.

Mārcius Philippus, Mārcii Philippi, m. a wealthy Roman, who erected the temple of Hērēcles, president of the Muses at Rome, during the reign of Augustus (Suet. Aug. 29). To him Tāctus refers (Ann. iii. 72).

C. Mārcius, C. Mārci, m. a tribune of the people, who brought to trial Q. Fābius, one of the three sons of M. Fābius Ambūstus, because, being sent by the senate an ambassador to negotiate with the Gauls, then besieging Clūsiū, Chiusi, he had fought against them, contrary to the law of nations (Liv. vi. 1).—2. A tribune of the people, who, with L. Ati-lias, carried a law in 311 B. C., that sixteen of the tribunes for the four legions should be elected by the people. Before that time, the nomination had been in the power of the dictators or consuls (Liv. ix. 30).—3. One of the first plebeian augurs (Liv. x. 9).

C. Mārcius, C. Mārci, m. afterwards sur-named Cōrōlānus, was a man of great talents and personal courage, which he first displayed at the siege of Cōrōlli, hence his surname. That the town fell into the hands of the Ro-mans, was more owing to the bravery of Mārcius than to the abilities of the consul, whom he surpassed both in merit and celebrity. An avowed enemy to the power of the tribunes, he endeavoured by every possible means to lessen it, a line of conduct which incensed against him the commons; and was the cause of his banishment. To relieve the famine which pressed hard on the common people in 491 B. C., a quantity of grain arrived from Sicily, which Mārcius proposed should not be distributed until the wrongs of the nobility should be redressed. His speech on that occasion would probably have cost him his life, as the infuriated mob were ready for any act of violence, had not the tribunes of the people fixed a day for his trial. His haughty spirit treated with scorn the threats of the commons, and he told their magistrates, that they were the tribunes of the people, not of the patricians. From the high esteem in which he was held by the nobles, the senators, both individually and collectively, solicited the commons in his behalf, but without success.

In their justice he had no confidence, and he disdained to appear before them, preferring exile to submission. By suppressing his re-sentment, and patiently enduring the injustice of his countrymen, he would have been one of the most illustrious Roman citizens. With Attius Tūllus, the chief of the Volscian name, in whose house he lodged, he formed a plan for exciting war with his countrymen. The success of their scheme, and the victories which Mārcius obtained, are tarnished by the wanton effusion of Roman blood. One army after another yielded to his martial bravery, until the city was at his mercy, and he would probably have levelled it with the ground, had not his mother and wife obtained, by supplication, what neither the courage nor intercession of his countrymen could accom-plish. The complete triumph over his enemies had sufficiently punished their viola-tion of justice, and gratified his pride by additional military fame. Further hostilities against his native country would have sunk the warrior in the barbarian. He, therefore, removed his camp to a greater distance from the city, and afterwards entirely quitted the Roman territory, at which procedure the Vols-ci were so enraged, that they put him to death. In opposition to this statement, Fābius, a very ancient author, says that he lived to a great age, and that the hardships of banishment increased with his years (Liv. ii. 33—40). According to Eutrōpius, sen-tence of condemnation was passed on Cōrō-lānus, in the eighteenth year after the expul-sion of the Tarquins. Valērius Māximus calls him Cnēus, and adds, that he was a descendant of King Ancus (iv. 3).

C. Mārcius Cēnsōrius, C. Mārci Cēnsōrii, m. an eminent Roman, who held the consulship with C. Asinius Gallus in 8 B. C. To him Hōrātius addresses the eighth ode of the fourth Book. Of this name, there were two Romans of great distinction, father and son. It is manifest, that the poet already mentioned, was under obligations to Mārcius, on whom he has bestowed such high encomiums.

C. Mārcius Figūlus, C. Mārci Figūli, m. was prætor at Rome in 171 B. C., and commanded the fleet, with which he sailed up Sinus Cōrinthiācus, the Gulf of Lepanto, where he left the ships and came to a fleet at Chalcis. Having concerted measures with the consul, Q. Mārcius Philippus, he took his leave, intending to appear on the Mac-edonian coast, at the time the consul entered that country. The attack on Thessalōnica failed, on which the prætor sent part of his fleet to winter at Scīathus, and fixed on Orēum as the most suitable station, from which he could send supplies to the armies, both in Macēdōnia and Thessālīa (Liv. xliii. 11 seq.).—2. A noble Roman, who held the consulship (2) with L. Cōrnēlius Lēntūlus Lūpus in 158 B. C. He fought against the Dalmāte with various success (Liv. Ep. 47. Flor. iv. 12).—3. A Roman, who held the consulship with L. Jūlius Cēsar in 66 B. C. During that year L. Sērgius Cātīna form-ed his plan for the subversion of the govern-ment. To his opinion respecting Cātīna and the other conspirators, Cicero alludes (Ep. Att. xii. 21), and this author mentions, that a monument had been raised to his memory at a prodigious expense (Leg. ii. 25).

C. Mārcius Rātillus, C. Mārcii Rātilli, m. obtained the office of consul in 386 B. C., when he led an army against the Privernates, who, from a long continued peace, had acquired great wealth. Having defeated them in battle, and taken their town, he enriched his soldiers with plunder, and returned to Rome in triumph. Next year the dictatorship was conferred on him, an honour heightened by his being the first plebeian who held that office. To mortify the patricians, who disapproved of his nomination, he named C. Plautius, a plebeian, master of the horse. For the advantages which he gained over the whole of the Etrusci, headed by the Tāquinienses and Fāliscei, he had the honour of a triumph, by order of the people, without the authority of the senate. His victory over the nobles acquired additional distinction by his being chosen censor, and the first plebeian raised to that office. In his fourth consulship, Cāmpānia fell to his lot, where he quelled a mutiny of the soldiers, which might have subverted military discipline, had not his sound judgment, matured by age and military practice, suggested an expedient which thwarted the whole design (Liv. vii. 16-39). To him Eutrōpius refers (ii. 5).—2. Was consul in 310 B. C., when he took Allife from the Sāmniēs, and was himself wounded in battle with that nation. In 302 B. C., he was created an augur, and afterwards made censor with P. Cōrnēlius Arvina (Liv. ix. 33 seq.).—3. L. Mārcius Cēnsōrinus, L. Mārcii Cēnsōrini, m. was the colleague, in the consulship, of M. Mānilius in 151 B. C. According to Eutrōpius, who writes L. Mānilius Cēnsōrinus, these consuls went to besiege Carthage in the fifty-first year after the second Punic war (Eutrōp. iv. 10).—4. L. Mārcius Philippus, L. Mārcii Philippi, m. a Roman who, in his first attempt for public distinction, failed, although he only canvassed for the office of tribune of the soldiers. When tribune of the people, he passed an Agrarian law, and in his speeches on that subject, he went too far in courting the favour of the populace, by uttering sentiments inconsistent with true patriotism. Notions of this sort were probably instilled into him in early life by Gēllius, a turbulent and seditious man, who was his stepfather. M. Hērēnnius obtained the consulship in preference to him, but he afterwards succeeded, and held that office with Sēxtus Jūlius Cēsar, in 93 B. C. He favoured the knights, and inveighed against the senate with a violence and keenness which excited severe repression. In his censorship, he expelled from the senate his own maternal uncle. During the usurpation of L. Cōrnēlius Cinnā, he refused to take up arms, a conduct which Cicēro approves (Ep. Att. viii. 3). That author considers Philippus as the greatest orator of his age, except L. Licīnius Crāssus and M. Antonius. His failure in the canvass for the offices of tribune of the soldiers and consul, may be accounted for by his purchasing no votes; for he boasted that he had obtained the highest dignities in the state without a single bribe, which appears wonderful, since, at that period, all state offices and employments were procured by money. Hērātus has mentioned with approbation his talents as a pleader, and described an action of his, which proves he had a turn for humour.—2. Son of the former, married Atia, mother of the emperor Augustus, by her former husband, C. Octāvius. He never saluted his stepson by the name of Cēsar, but by that of Octāvius. He obtained the consulship with Cn. Cōrnēlius Lēntulus Mārcellinus, in 58 B. C., and afterwards, either to show his disapprobation of the overthrow of government, or disdaining to be under obligations to M. Antonius, he refused a province which that triumvir offered him. Cicēro, from whose writings the facts above-mentioned are taken, charges him with having acted in the most scandalous and shameful manner, when deputed by the senate to make certain reports to M. Antonius, then at Mūtina, Modena (Ep. ad Fam. xii. 4). In the fragments of Sallustius, an oration of L. Mārcius Philippus against M. Āmilius Lēpidus, the triumvir, has been preserved.

L. Mārcius Sēptimus, L. Mārcii Sēptimi, m. son of Sēptimus, a Roman knight, was a young man of great spirit and ability, to which he was indebted for the high opinion of the soldiers, who elected him commander of the remains of the two armies, which survived the death of Cn. and P. Cōrnēlius Scipio q. v. Over Hāsdrūbal, son of Gisco, he gained an easy victory, and might have completed the destruction of his forces, had he not checked the impetuosity of his men, and marched back to the camp. This success was only an earnest of greater advantages. At the fourth watch, he attacked the enemy's camp, which he carried, and immediately advanced to a second, which fell almost without resistance into his hands, from its being so carelessly defended. Had the Carthaginians displayed ordinary vigilance, he would not probably have attacked either; but, observing their negligence, he justly thought, that it would be easier to storm their camps, than to secure his own against three armies, one at hand, and two on the point of coming up. The taking of two camps on one night, reflected great credit both on the commander and the troops; yet his countrymen were offended, because, in his letter announcing the victory, he called himself propretor, without either the order of the people, or the authority of the senate. P. Cōrnēlius Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africānus, succeeded to the command in Spain; to whom Mārcius and T. Fontēus resigned their armies. At the battle of Bēcūla, in 211 B. C., Mārcius commanded in the left wing, and when Scipio went to the court of Siphāx, Mārcius and M. Jūnius Silānus commanded the troops. In that country, his services continued to be very useful to his commander, who treated him with great respect, and frequently placed him at the head of the forces sent against particular districts and cities. His fidelity, added to martial knowledge and bravery, raises him high in the list of Roman officers, who fought in Spain. After the subjugation of that country, his name does not occur in Roman history, from which it may be inferred, that assuming the title of propretor, had been a bar to his promotion in the state (Liv. xxx. 37 seq.).—3. M. Mārcius, M. Mārcii, m. rēx sacrōrum, died in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6).—2. A tribune of the second Roman legion, killed in an engagement with the Boli in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 5).

M. Mārcius Rālla, M. Mārci Rāllā, m. obtained the jurisdiction between Roman citizens, in 206 B. C., and, two years after, was sent by Scipio Africānus to Rome, with the Carthaginian ambassadors (Liv. xxix. 11 seq.).

M. Mārcius Sērmo, M. Mārci Sērmoni, m. a tribune of the people, in 174 B. C., who, with Q. Mārcius Sylla, another plebeian tribune, publicly declared that they would raise an action to impose a fine on the consuls, if they did not depart to their provinces (Liv. xlii. 21).

P. Mārcius Rēx, P. Mārci Rēgis, m. one of the three deputies whom the praetor, M. Sulpicius, nominated, in 173 B. C., to carry the message of the senate to the consul, C. Cāssius, that he should engage in no war without their authority (Liv. xlii. 1).

Q. Mārcius, Q. Mārci, m. a tribune of the soldiers in Pompey's army, during the civil war (Hist. B. Hisp. 11).

Q. Mārcius Crispus, Q. Mārci Crispi, m. a Roman of praetorian rank, who obtained the government of Bithynia, from which he went to the assistance of L. Stātilius Mārcus, at the time C. Cāssius Lōnginus came into that country. Such was the influence of this noble Roman, that he, without resistance, obtained the legions under the command of these two officers. Velleius Pātereūlus calls him Crispus Mārcus (ii. 69).

Q. Mārcius Philippius, Q. Mārci Philippi, m. was created praetor, at Rome, in 190 B. C., when he obtained Sicily for his province, and two years after, he rose to the consulship, with Sp. Postūmius Albinus. The senate decreed to both an inquisition respecting clandestine conspiracies. Under pretence of celebrating the mysteries of Bacchus, the most horrible crimes were committed. The activity of the consuls, with the concurrence of the senate and people, disclosed the whole wickedness, and the punishment of the guilty suppressed the association. After this business was completely settled, Mārcius set out for his province, Ligūria, where the Ligures Apūni gained a complete victory over him, killing four thousand, on which he disbanded the rest of the army among their friends, to conceal the greatness of his loss, but without success; for the place of his defeat retains his name, Mārcius saltus q. v. The senate afterwards sent him ambassador into Greece, to learn the state of the country, where old quarrels still subsisted, and, on his return, he delivered a report, which convinced the senate that Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, was preparing for war. After being appointed a dēcēvīr sacrōrum, he went with A. Atilius Serrānus, on an embassy to Persēs, where they had a personal interview with the king, and prevailed on that monarch, who was in complete readiness for war, to delay the commencement of hostilities. At that time he would have taken the Romans at great disadvantage, as they were quite unprepared. On returning to Rome, they boasted of having overreached the Mācedonian king, which the younger senators commended, but the older senators, and those of stricter morals, censured their conduct with severity, as disgraceful to the Roman character. In his second consulship, 171 B. C., he had Cn. Servilius Cēpio for his colleague, and Mācedōnia having fallen to his lot, he sailed over to Actium, marched by land to Thessaly, and received the command of the army from A. Hostilius Māncinus, proconsul. He crossed the mountains with great difficulty, and, had Hippas, who commanded the army of Persēs, displayed either bravery or military skill, Mārcius must have experienced, in these defiles, severe losses, if not the destruction of his troops. His military achievements in that country consist of little more than conducting the forces to the theatre of war. At the end of the year, he was succeeded in command by Aemilius Paullus, who subdued Mācedōnia, and took the king prisoner (Liv. xxxix. 6 seq.). Eutropius merely mentions his name as a consul (iv. 5).—2. Son of the former, who had a command in his father's army, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 3).

Q. Mārcius Rālla, Q. Mārci Rāllā, m. a dēcēvīr, who consecrated the temple to Fortūna Primīgēna, on Mōns Quirinalis, in 196 B. C., and, two years after, he dedicated two temples to Jūpiter, in the capitol, both of which had been vowed by L. Fūrius Pūrpūreo, the one in his praetorship, and the other in his consulship (Liv. xxxiv. 33 seq.).

Q. Mārcius Rēx, Q. Mārci Rēgis, m. a tribune of the people, who, with one of his colleagues, carried, that the sense of the people should be taken with respect to concluding a peace with Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, in 193 B. C. The whole thirty-five tribes voted that there should be peace with that monarch (Liv. xxxiii. 25).—2. A Roman praetor, in 143 B. C., who, by order of the senate, repaired the aqueducts, and built a new one, which was known by his name. Plinius mentions this water as the best in the world, excelling in coolness and salubrity. This author informs us, that it was begun by Aeneas Mārcius, and afterwards repaired by Agrippa (iv. 791, 792).—Adj. Mārcius, a. um.—Mārcia aqua, anciently called Aufēia, had its source in the most distant mountains of the Pēlignī, passed the Mārsi, and Ficius lacus, the Lake of Celano, goes under ground, rises again near Tibur, Tivoli, and is conveyed along arches for nine miles before it reaches Rome (Plin. iv. 791).—Mārcia lympha (Tib. iii. 6. 58).—3. The colleague of M. Pūrcius Cato, in the consulship, 120 B. C., conquered the Stōrii, an Alpine nation, and planted a colony at Nārho, Narbonne (Liv. Ep. 62. Eutrop. iv. 23).—4. Was consul with L. Caelilius Metellus, in 80 B. C. When Cāttilina, five years after, formed a conspiracy for the destruction of the government, Q. Mārcius Rēx was sent to Fesulae, Fiesola, to levy troops, and to adopt whatever measures he might consider necessary for suppressing the rebellion, and preserving the state. C. Mānlius, one of the conspirators, sent a deputation to Q. Mārcius Rēx, stating their reasons for taking up arms, and requesting a restoration of their rights, of which he pretended they had been unjustly deprived. Mārcius returned a short and dignified reply becoming the rank which he held, and the senate under whom he acted. He had just returned from a military command, had demanded a triumph, and met with opposition, for not bribing a few unprincipled voters, which appears then to have been a common practice (Sal. Cat. 30, 34).

Q. Mārcius Sýlla, Q. Mārcii Sýllæ, m. a tribune of the people, in 174 B. C., who joined his colleague, M. Mārcius Sērmō, in threatening to prosecute the consuls, if they did not quit Rome, and repair to their provinces (Liv. xlii. 21).

Q. Mārcius Trēmulus, Q. Mārcii Trēmuli, m. a Roman, who held the consulship with P. Cōrnēlius Arvina, in 307 B. C. Mārcius was sent against the Hērnicī, who, having held a meeting at their capital, Anagnīa, Anagni, the whole of that name, except the Alātrīnātes, Fērentīnātes, and the Vērulāni, declared war against the Romans. He soon conquered them, then joined his colleague against the Sāmnites, of whom they slew upwards of thirty thousand. On returning to Rome, he triumphed over the Hērnicī, when the senate decreed him an equestrian statue in the Fōrum, which was placed before the temple of Cāstor (Liv. ix. 42 seq.).

Mārcōdūrum, i. v. Dura, a village of Gallia Belgica, on the Roer (Tac. Hist. iv. 28).

Mārcōlica, æ. f. a noble city of Spain, taken by M. Claudius Mārcellus, in 170 B. C., who brought thence into the treasury at Rome, ten pounds' weight of gold, and silver to the value of a million of sesterces (Liv. xlv. 4).

Mārcōmāni, orum, m. the Marcomanians, a people of Gērmānia, Germany, whose territories were bounded on the W. by Rhēnus, the Rhine, and on the S. by Dānūbius, the Danube, corresponding to part of the modern Circle of Swabia. They afterwards expelled the Boi, and took possession of their country, now called Bohemia. Adj. Mārcōmānicus, a. um. Mārcōmānicum bellum (Eutrop. viii. 12).

Mārcōmēres, is. r. Mārcōmērus, i. m. a prince of the Gauls, whom, with Sōnno and Genebaudus, Vālēntīniānus had engaged in many battles, but could not conquer. His countrymen at last gave him up to Hōnōrius, by whom he was imprisoned and afterwards banished him into Etrūria, Tuscany (Claud. xxi. 241).

Mārdī, s. Amārdī, orum, m. the Mardians, a people of Mēdia, whose country adjoined to that of the Bāctri. From Plinius, people of this name appear to have lived in different parts of Asia, and if the name be properly derived from the Hebrew, it expresses character rather than any particular nation (i. 675). A tribe of the Mārdī, living on the Caspian Sea, became assassins, and were extirpated by Hulakou. The reading here, in the common editions of Eutrōpius, is Mārcōmēdos, a people altogether unknown. The better editions have Mārdos, Mēdos (viii. 3). Tācitus describes them as a race of freebooters, protected by their mountains (Ann. xiv. 23). Alexander the Great conquered them, as did also Phrāates, king of Pārthia, not long before his death (Just. xii. 3: xli. 5).

Mārdia, æ. f. a town of Mācedōnia. Adj. Mārdiēnsis, is. e. (Amm. Mar. Excer.).

Mārdōniūs, i. m. a Median nobleman, son of Gōhrīas, who married Artōzōstrē, daughter of Dārius. After the defeat of Xēxes, in his descent upon Greece, he received the command of a powerful armament, to reduce the Grecian states under the Persian government. The valour of the freeborn natives repulsed him in every attempt, and he fell in the battle at Plātææ, Cokla, in 479 B. C. Plūtārchus mentions that he was killed by a stone, and Hērōdōtus states, that he displayed great personal bravery in that battle (ix. 63). This agrees with the character given of him by Cōrnēlius Nēpos, that he was amongst the chief of the Persians, both brave in action and full of counsel (Paus. 1). Pausānias mentions a statue of Mārdōniūs at Sparta (iii. 11).

Mārdōntēs, x. m. a Persian commander, who fell in battle at Mýcālē (Herod. ix. 102).

Mārē Nōstrum, the Mediterranean Sea, to which the Romans gave this name, from its bounding their native country, Itālia, Italy, on three sides. By the Greeks it was called Mārē Intērum (a name which likewise occurs in Plinius), and the Atlantic Ocean, Mārē Extērum. In Scripture, the Mediterranean is denominated the GREAT SEA, which, though of narrow limits in reference to the Pacific Ocean, or the Atlantic Ocean, is of prodigious extent, in comparison of the Sea of Tubaria, and the Dead Sea. Of the Red Sea, the Jews probably knew little, if the northern part be excepted; and even in relation to it, the Mediterranean is greatly larger. This sufficiently accounts for the inhabitants of Jūdea calling the Mediterranean the Great Sea. The modern appellation is manifestly derived from its situation being wholly surrounded by land, except the narrow Strait of Gibraltar, which forms a communication with the Atlantic Ocean. It has been affirmed, that there is, perhaps, no part of the shores of the Mediterranean, and the inland seas with which it is connected, which, at some season of the year, is not affected by unwholesome air, and some of them are almost never free of it. The length of the Mediterranean, reckoning from Frētum Gādītānum, v. Hērclēum, the Strait of Gibraltar, to the coast of Sýria, is about 2800 miles, and its breadth varies from 900 to 300 miles. Tides are scarcely known in this sea, unless in Mārē Sūpērum, the Gulf of Venice, and on the coast of Rēgio Sýrtica, afterwards Tripōlis, new Tripoli. There is a constant influx into the Mediterranean, both from the Atlantic and the Black Sea. That part of it which is east of the Archipelago, or of the island Candia, is called the Levant. The principal islands in the Mediterranean are the Bālcāres, Majorca, and Minorca, Sārdīnia, Sardinia, Cōrsica, Corsica, Sicīlia, Sicily, separated from Itālia, Italy, by Frētum Sicūlum, the Strait of Messina, Mēlita, Malta, and Crēta, Candia. In the Levant, besides some other islands of less extent, are Rhōdos, Rhodes, and Cýprus, Cyprus.

Mārēnē, es. f. a district of Thrācia, which belonged to Cōtys, king of the Odrýsæ. Atlēsbis, another prince of Thrācia, seized upon Mārēnē in 173 B. C., when Cōtys was absent assisting Pērcēus, king of Mācedōnia, in making war against the Romans (Liv. xlii. 67).

Mārēōtis, idis. f. Bahēira, or. Birk-Mariout, a lake in Egypt, which is said now to be dry. In the time of Strābo, who calls it Mārēia, it was thirty British miles long, and was about twelve miles west of Ostium Cānōpicum. Mārēōtis, idis. f. of Mārēōtis, applied to nouns feminine. Mārēōtides vites (Virg. G. ii. 91). Adj. Mārēōticus, a. um. of Mārēōtis, Egyptian, Libyan. Mārōticum vinum, a famous wine, produced from grapes which grew in the neighbourhood of Mārōtis. It has been disputed whether this wine was produced in Greece or Egypt, in consequence of Columella mentioning Mārōtica vites among Grecian vines; but this ought to have no weight against the authority of Horatius, Strabo, &c. (Hor. Od. i. 37. 14. Strab. 1134). Columella may have enumerated Mārōtica vites among those of Greece, merely from the Greeks cultivating a vine of that name, brought perhaps originally from this lake, as we name plants from foreign countries, of which they are natives, and which we rear in our own. Mārōtica sistra, Egyptian timbrels (Auson. cecexxiii. 22). Mārōtica ebēna, ought perhaps to be Mērōtica (Luc. Phar. x. 117). Mārōtica cortēx, papyrus (Mart. xiv. 209).

Mārgāna, æ, v. Mārgānē, es, f. a country of Asia, on the east of Hīrcānā, traversed by the river Mārgus, from which the name is probably derived (Plin. i. 674). Ammianus Marcellinus says, that it was surrounded on all sides by hills, barren from scarcity of water, and had only three towns of any note (xxiii. 6). Inh. Mārgāni, orum, m. (Just. xli. 1). Adj. Mārgānus, a, um. Mārgānum ferrum, appears to have taken a fine polish (Ap. Bel. Par. 143).

Mārgūla, æ, f. a town mentioned by Curtius, but by no other writer. Some think the reading should be Ad urbem Mārgāna (vii. 10).

Mārgus, i, f. Kastolatz, a town of Upper Mesia, on a river of the same name, near its junction with Ister, the Danube. Here Diocletianus conquered Carinus, and obtained the undivided sovereignty of the Roman empire, in the year 285 (Eutrop. ix. 20). This word is sometimes written Murgus.

Māria, æ, f. daughter of Stibicho, and one of the wives of Hōnorius. The xth poem of Claudianus is an epithalamium on their marriage.

Māriāndyni, orum, m. a people of Asia Minor, Nadlia, whose country was bounded on the north by Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. Plinius places them in Bithynia, to the east of Sāngarius, the Sakaria, in which D'Anville has followed him. Hērōdotus seems to have supposed their country watered by Hālys, the Kizil-Ermak, and Pōmpōnius Mela places them between the Cōmāgēni and Vēnēti. From this loose statement, no precise idea can be formed, since the Vēnēti, or Hēnēti, were separated from the Cōmāgēni, by nearly the whole breadth of Asia Minor. Pausanias informs us, that Hērōdus desolated their country (v. 26). Adj. Māriāndynus, et, Māriāndicus, a, um. Māriāndynae drēna (Val. Place, iv. 733). Māriāndicus sinus (Herod. iv. 38).

Māriānus, i, m. a man to whom Mārīālis writes some indelicate verses (ii. 31 &c.).

Mārica, æ, f. a Laurentian nymph, the wife of Faunus, by whom she became mother of king Lātīnus. Jūstīnus calls her Fātūa q. v. She was the goddess of the Minturnenses, and her grove on that shore was not unpoetised (Virg. Æn. vii. 47 seq.). Claudianus describes Laris, the Garigliano, as gradually diminishing the oak-grove of Mārica (l. 259). From the grove, Lūcānus calls her Umbrōsa (Phar. ii. 424).

Māricus, i, m. one of the Boii, sprung from the lowest of the people, who presumed to dispute the empire of the world with the Romans. His claim to inspiration deluded the people, and, in spite of the meanness of his birth, he collected an army of eight thousand men, with which he attacked the villages of the Aduans. That nation, armed against him, put the whole fanatics to the rout, and took himself prisoner. The populace were confirmed in their belief of his being supernatural, on their seeing him exposed to wild beasts and yet remain unhurt. Vitellius caused him to be killed in his presence; the death of Māricus put an end to the delusion, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 61).

Maridē, es, f. Mardin, a fort in Mēsōpōtāmīa (Amm. Mar. xix. 9).

Māris, is, m. brother of Atymānus, killed by Thrāsýmēdes. These brothers were men of bravery, and belonged to the troops of Sārpēdon (Hom. Il. xvi. 319).

Māris, is, m. a river of Thrācia, which has its source among the Agāthýrsi, and flows into the Danube (Herod. iv. 49).

Mārius, i, m. the name of a plebeian family at Rome, which produced several eminent characters, of which the most distinguished was C. Mārius q. v.

Mārius, i, m. a man who, in a fit of jealousy, murdered Hellas, with whom he was in love, and in despair threw himself headlong from a rock (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 277).—2. A native of Prænēstē, Pilastrina, killed by Sýnæthus in the battle at Cānna, as he attempted to rescue his friend Cāper q. v. (Sil. Ital. ix. 401).—3. A Roman, slain by Cālēnus during the war with Hānnibal in Italy (Sil. Ital. xiii. 231).—4. A man on whom Mārīālis writes an epigram, respecting the disposal of his property (l. 86). Perhaps to him the poet addresses x. 18.

Mārius Alfius, Mārī Alfii, m. Medixtrileus, i. e. chief magistrate of the Campanians, in 217 B. C. With the treacherous design of overpowering the Cūmāni, he secretly encamped at Hāma q. v., but, in consequence of information from the Cūmāni, the Roman consul, Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchus, attacked him during the night, killed himself, and took thirty-four military standards, besides putting two thousand of his men to death (Liv. xxiii. 35).

Mārius Bosius, Mārī Bosii, m. prætor of Cāpua, in 218 B. C. Friendly to Hānnibal, he obeyed his orders in issuing a proclamation, commanding the inhabitants of that city, with their wives and children, to go out and meet that eminent general, whom the populace, on account of his great military fame, were impatient to see (Liv. xxiii. 7).

Mārius Celsus, Mārī Celsi, m. an officer in the Roman army, who served first under Gālba, then under Otho, and, at last, under Vitellius, who secured to him the consulship for two months in the year 69, which Gālba intended for him (Tac. Ann. xv. 25 seq.).

Mārius Egnātius, Mārī Egnatii, m. the bravest general of the Sāmōites, who was himself killed, and his countrymen routed by C. Cōscōnius and L. Lūccius in 91 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 75).

Mārius Māurus, Mārī Māuri, m. governor of Alpes Mārītima, which he defended against the forces of Otho, thus proving his was the first Archon of that city. Médôn-tides, arum, m. the descendants of Médôn (Vel. Pat. i. 2).—7. A priest of Cylæus, who was engaged in the sacred rites, at the time the Argonauts unexpectedly returned to that city (Val. Flacc. iii. 118).

Médôres, is, m. a Scythian commander, who, with Gêlas, fought against Cæstor, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 211 seq.).

Médôâcus, v. Médôâcus, i, m. the Brenta, a river in the north of Italy, which has its source in Alpes Tridentine, and falls into Sinus Hædræticus, the Gulf of Venice, near the city which gives name to that gulf. Livius only mentions one Médôâcus, although there are two rivers of this name, the one already mentioned Médôâcus Major, and the other Médôâcus Minor, the Bachiglione. Pâduvium, Padua, stands on the left bank of the latter (Liv. x. 2).

Médôâna, v. m. the Mayenne, a river of France, one of the branches of Ligêris, the Loire. Andôcavi, Angers, stands at the junction of these two rivers (Luc. Phar. i. 438).

Médullia, v. f. a town of the Sabines, the situation of which is unknown. It was taken by the Latins, and recovered by Ancus Mæcius, after a war of twenty-four years. Tarquinius Præcius afterwards obtained possession of it (Liv. i. 33 seq.).

Médullina, v. f. an infamous woman (Juv. Sat. vi. 321).

Médullus, i, m. a mountain in Spain, which the Romans encompassed by a ditch of fifteen miles. No sooner was it finished than the natives, who had posted themselves upon it, hastened their death with great ferocity, rather than surrender to the enemy (Flor. iv. 12).

Médus, v. Médus, i, m. son of Ægeus by Médæa, after her separation from læson. After the death of his mother's husband, he built Médæa, and, according to some authors, founded the kingdom of the Medes (Just. ii. 6 : xlii. 3).

Médus, i, m. the Abikuren, a river of Mædia, one of the branches of Araxes, the Khabour. Some suppose Hôrâtius to mean this river, Od. ii. 9. 21; but others, with more propriety, consider Médus in that line an adjective, and by Médus flumen, understand Euphrates, the El-Frat. The Roman poets often confound Parthia, Mædia, Syria, and Persia.

Médusa, v. f. a daughter of Phœreus, v. Phœreus, a sea deity, or a king of Africa, and Cetô, the only one of the three Gurgons who was mortal. Her sisters, Sthênô and Eurýlē, were neither subject to old age, nor to death. She greatly surpassed the other two in elegance of figure and comeliness of face; but in nothing was her superiority more remarkable than in the beauty of her locks. Minerva provoked, either because her temple had been profaned by Médusa, which is the cause assigned by Ovid, or because her personal charms had been slighted by Médusa, who had preferred her own beauty to that of the goddess, turned her fine hair, of which she boasted so greatly, into serpents, and gave to her eyes the power of converting to stone, all at whom she looked, hence Lúcânus calls her Sârifæa (Phar. ix. 670). According to the same poet, her hair might be looked at with safety, and perhaps he also understood the same of the whole body, except the face (Phar. ix. 636). Others say that all the Gurgons were born with serpents in place of hair, that their hands were of brass, their body covered with scales which no weapon could pierce, their wings of a golden colour, and that they had only one eye and tooth which they used alternately. Pausanias states, that Médusa reigned over the inhabitants of the Tritonian marsh, was accustomed to hunting, and commanded an army which Percus defeated, and killed herself. In consequence of her beauty, he cut off her head on purpose to show it to the Greeks, and afterwards buried it in Argolis. This author prefers the account of Præcius, a Carthaginian, who asserted there were savage men and women in Africa, of whom he considered Médusa one. The fiction about Minerva, is explained by the lake Tritonis being sacred to that goddess (Paus. ii. 21). The opinions of the ancients with respect to the daughters of Phœreus are very different and contradictory. Nor is this wonderful, since they are mere creatures of the imagination, which could not possibly have any existence in nature. Percus cut off Médusa's head, by which, from its possessing the quality above-mentioned, he gained many victories, and performed many exploits. The blood which fell from it in his flight over Africa, was supposed to produce the numerous serpents which infest that country, and also the winged horse Pégæus. According to Ovidius, coral was first formed by the head of Médusa touching some twigs, which had grown under the sea, and the an-nymphs sowing the seeds over the bed of the ocean, produced a prodigious quantity of that beautiful marine substance. See Cæcilium. Minerva placed the head of Médusa in her shield, hence Claudius, Tatû Gurgônû, with her whole shield (xxiv. 168). From her father, Médusa was called Phœreus, Idos. Adj. Méduseus, a, um. Médusæ chelæ, the serpents which sprung from the blood of Médusa (Sil. Ital. iii. 316). Méduseus fons, Aganippê, from having risen first out of the earth from a stroke of the foot of the horse Pégæus (Ov. Met. v. 312). Méduseus ignis, Pégæus (Ov. Fast. v. 8). Médusea dæa, Minerva (Mart. vii. 1).

Mégabýzus, v. Mégabýzus, i, m. an officer under Darius, whom he sent, after his dishonourable flight from Scythia, to subdue Thracia, and the countries around (Just. vii. 3).

Mégæra, v. f. one of the Furies. See Erinyes.

Mégâlê, es, f. Mégâlê mâtêr, the Greek name of Cybele. Adj. Mégâlêsis, v. Mégâlêsis, a, um, et, Mégâlêsis, is, e, of Cybele. Mégâlêsis (sacra), festivals in honour of Cybele, in which theatrical performances were introduced, first celebrated at Rome, by the curule ediles C. Attilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, on the Ides of April, 193 B. C., and continued during six days. They afterwards commenced on the day before the Nones of April, probably from the festival of Ceres falling on the day before the Ides. At these games the Roman senate first sat separate from the people (Liv. xxxiv. 54). Mégâlêsis purpura. The praetor clothed in purple used to exhibit Me-gālenses lūdi, in honour of Cýbēlē, at his own expense; hence Mēgālēnsis pūrpūra came to denote the games themselves as in Mārtiālis (x. 41).

Mēgālia, æ, f. v. Mēgāris, is, f. Castel del ovo, an island on the west of Itālia, Italy, between Pausilypus, Pausilypo, and Nēapōlis, Naples (Plin. i. 340).

Mēgālōpōlis, is, f. Leonardi (Palea Arcadia, Leake), a town on the confines of Lācōnīa, built from a number of villages and towns of Arcādīa, at the suggestion of Epaminondas, hence called the great city. It was only partly built up, hence the saying of a poet, "That the great city was a great desert." The valley of Mēgālōpōlis abounds in delightful scenery, diversified by little hills, numerous rivulets, detached copses; and watered by a large stream, which winds its way through the middle. Inh. Mēgālōpōlitae, arum (Liv. xxviii. 8), and Mēgālōpōlitāni, orum, m. (Liv. xxxii. 22).

Mēgāpēnthes, is, m. a reputed son of Mēnēlaos and Tērīdās, or Pēris (Hom. Od. iv. 11. Apol. iii. 11).

Mēgāra, æ, f. daughter of Crēon, king of Thēbe, Theba, and wife of Hērēules, whom Lēus, a son of Nēptūnus, wished to kill, together with her two sons, by that hero, Thērīmāchus and Ophlēs, and to take possession of the kingdom. Hērēules, who had been sent to the infernal regions to bring up Cērbērus, returned in time to frustrate the plan of Lēus, whom he put to death. Jūno, enraged at the conduct of Hērēules, struck him with madness, on which he killed both his wife and his two sons. Mārtiālis alludes to a revolting practice of Hērēules; but the grossness of the poet invalidates his evidence, and he may have invented what tarnishes the character of another, in order to justify, or palliate, his own immoralities (xi. 43).

Mēgāra, æ, f. v. Mēgāra, orum, n. Megara, a town of Græcia Propria, or Hēllas, of considerable note, built by Peloponnesians. Megara is now a miserable town, of which the inhabitants are all Greeks, the houses small, the soil barren, and the climate unhealthy. It stood upon two hills, Karia and Alkathōus, from which walls extended to the harbour. The modern town occupies only one of the hills. Few vestiges of the ancient edifices remain. Inh. Mēgārēnses, ium (Sing. Mēgārēnsis, is), m. in ancient times excelled in naval affairs, were fraudulent and perfidious, and united all the bad qualities of insolent slaves and servile friends. Mēgāris, idis, f. the district of which Mēgāra was the capital. Adj. Mēgārus, Mēgārēus, Mēgārēus, Mēgāricus, a, um, et, Mēgārēnsis, is, e. Mēgārēia area (Stat. Th. xii. 219).—2. A town of Thēssālīa.—3. A town of Pōntus.—4. A town of Illyricum.—5. A town of Mōlōssis.—6. A town of Sicily, taken and plundered by Mārcellus, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 35). Ptolēmæus and Stēphānus state, that this town was first called Hýblē pūrva, from its king Hýblon, and the inhabitants, Hýblēi. Adj. Mēgārus, a, um, v. Mēgārēnsis, is, e. Mēgārus sinus, generally called Mēgārēnsis sinus, Golfo di Augusta (Virg. Æn. iii. 689).—7. A place at Carthage, of which Appiānus gives a description (Bel. Pun. 71, 72).

Mēgārēus, cos, m. son of Onchēstus, and grandson of Nēptūnus, was the father of Hippōmēnes. From Onchēstus, Ovidius calls Mēgārēus Onchēstus (Met. x. 609). Adj. Mēgārēus, a, um. Mēgārēus hēros, Hippōmēnes (Ov. Met. x. 659).—2. A man in the army of Etēocles, who, from the watch tower, espied the Argives advancing, and warned the Thebans to shut their gates, to prevent the entrance of the enemy into the city (Stat. Th. x. 485).

Mēgas, æ, m. a man of rank in the Trojan army, the father of Pērimus. Mēgades, æ, m. Pērimus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).

Mēgasthēnes, is, m. an Athenian, who, with Hippocles, conducted a colony from Chalcis, Egripo, to Italy, and built Cūmē (Vel. Pat. i. 4).

Mēges, ētis, m. a warrior in the army of Etēocles, who, with Lēus, had the command during the night at the siege of Thēbe, Theba, after the Argives had lost four of their commanders, and had particular orders to prevent their secret escape by flight (Stat. x. 19).—2. The son of Phylēus and Cūmēnē, sister of Ulysses. He was a native of Dūmichūm, a man of great bravery, fought under the standard of Ulysses, and killed Pēdēus q. v. Phylides, æ, m. Mēges (Hom. Il. v. 69 æc.).

Mēgālia, æ, f. a native of Opūs, a city of Lōcris, a district of Græce, mentioned by Hōrātius (Od. i. 27. 11), where he alludes to a prevalent custom among the Romans of that period, which was, if any one of the company asked the name of the sweetheart of an individual present, on being told, he was obliged to drink as many cups as there were letters in her name. Mārtiālis writes an epigram on this subject (i. 72).

Mēgistānes, um, m. the grandees of Armēnia (Tac. Ann. xv. 27).

Mēgistē, es, f. an island and town of Lēcia, mentioned by Līvius as a harbour (xxxvii. 22).

Mēhērdātes, is, m. son of Vōnōnes, and grandson of Phrātes, was called to the throne of Parthia in the year 47. From the emperor Claudius he received good advice before he left Rome, where he had lived some time as a hostage. Young and inexperienced, he conducted matters ill, and was made prisoner by Gōtārzes, who cut off his ears, but saved his life (Tac. Ann. xi. 10 seq.).

Mēiacārīrē, is, v. Mēiacārīri, n. a small town and fort of Mēsōpōtāmīa, to which this name was given from the cold springs there (Amm. Mar. xviii. 6 seq.).

Mēla, arum, f. a town of the Cāmpāni, taken by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman consul, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Mēlena, æ, f. an ancient name of Cōrcýra q. v.

Mēlæna, arum, f. a village of Attica, in the tribe of Antiochis, which Stāsius calls verdant (Th. xii. 619).

Mēlenis, is, f. the favourite of the poet Mārsus. Perhaps it is a fictitious name, as Mārtiālis joins it with that of Alexīs (vii. 28).

Mēlāmbium, i, n. a place in Scōtūsseus ager, in Thēssālīa, at which Philippus, king of Mācēdōnīa, encamped immediately before the battle of Cýnōcēphāla, in 199 B. C., when the Roman commander, T. Quinctius Flāminius, was encamped at Thētidium (Liv. xxxiii. 6). Perhaps the reading ought to be Mēlāmplum, i.e. a temple of Mēlāmpus.

Melampus, Odiss., m. son of Amythion and Idmone, daughter of Alas, was eminent for his knowledge of future events, and for his skill in medicine. He offered to Proetus to cure his daughters of madness, on condition that he received the third of his kingdom. Considering the demand immoderate, Proetus refused it, on which account his daughters not only remained longer in a state of derangement, but the other women became infected with the same malady, which induced Proetus to accede to the demand, and to an additional claim, that so much of the kingdom should be given to his brother Bias. On completing the cure, he received one of the daughters in marriage, his brother Bias another, and soon afterwards became the father of Megapenthes. He was one of the Argonauts (Stat. Th. iii. 453). Melampodion, i. n. a species of hellebore, so called from Melampus, with which he cured the daughters of Proetus of madness.—2. Father of Cisseus and Gyas, was the companion of Hercules, whom he followed into Italy, and settled in Latium (Virg. Æn. x. 320).

Melampus, Odiss., m. (Blackfoot), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 206).

Melanchetes, i. n. (Blackhair), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 202).

Melanchlani, orum, m. a tribe of the Sarmatians, who had this name from being clothed in black. Their country was to the north of Palus Maeotis (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Rhenel places them towards the sources of Borythones, the Dniester.

Melanæus, cos, m. (Black), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 222).

Melanippus, i. m. son of Hicetion, who lived in Percotæ, was wounded by Antilochus. Hicetionides, a. m. Melanippus (Hom. Il. xv. 546).—2. A noble Trojan, killed by Patroclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).—3. A Grecian commander (Hom. Il. xix. 240).—4. A man in the Trojan army, who fell by the hand of Teucer (Hom. Il. viii. 276).

Melanthæus, cos, m. a man guilty of the crime of murder, whose widowed mother only knew the place where he had concealed himself. Adj. Melanthæus, a. um. Melanthæa eades (Ov. Ib. 623).

Melanthias, adis, f. a villa at no great distance from Constantinople, belonging to the emperor, hence called Cæsariāna (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 11).

Melanthion, onis, m. the husband of Plötia. Calyx Melanthion (Mart. xi. 67).

Melanthius, i. m. the herdsman of Ulysses, who, with great readiness, supplied the lovers of Pénélope with whatever part of the flock they wanted, hence Pénélope calls him Actor pecoris edendi (Ov. Ep. Her. i. 95). For this disregard of his master's property, Telémachus put him to death by torture (Hom. Od. xxii. 474 seq.).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Eurypylus (Hom. Il. vi. 36).—3. A noble Ithacan, the father of Amphimelon, one of the suitors of Pénélope (Hom. Od. xxiv. 103).

Melanthō, us, f. a daughter of Deucalion, who suffered violence from Neptūnus, in the form of a dolphin, and had by him a son named Delphus (Ov. Met. vi. 120).—2. A beautiful young woman, brought up by Pénélope, to whom she proved unfaithful, for which she afterwards suffered death. She was beloved by Eurymachus, appears to have been of low birth, and was the sister of Melanthius (Hom. Od. xix. 63 seq.).

Melanthus, i. m. one of the Italian pirates, by whom Bæchus was carried off from Naxos, Naxia (Ov. Met. iii. 617).—2. A nobleman of Cyrene, Chizico, brother of Ares, both of whom Telamon killed (Val. Flacc. iii. 263).—3. A king of Athens, and father of Cædus q. r. (Vel. Pat. i. 2).

Melanthus, i. m. a river which flows into Euxinus pōntus, the Black Sea, by a smooth and slow-running current (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 54).

Melas, anis, m. son of Phryxus by Chelclōpē, daughter of Aetes, king of Colchis, and brother of Phrontis, Argus, and Cylsorus (Val. Flacc. v. 462).

Melas, anis, m. called by the modern Greeks Mauro-Nero, i. e. the Black Water. Of this name several rivers occur in the writings of the Greeks and Romans. We find one in Sicily, Sicily; another in Boeotia, sacred to Minerva (hence Palladius Melas, Stat. Th. vii. 273), which Ptolemy says made the wool of the sheep that drank of it black, and Cephissus issuing from the same lake rendered their wool white; a third in Thracia, Romania, between Lysimachia and Cypselia, now called by the Turks Kara-sou; a fourth bounded Pamphylia on the east, now Alara-sou; and a fifth which had its source in Cappadocia, and running eastward fell into the Euphrates, to which the Turks likewise gave the name of Kara-sou. It joins the Mæd in the plain of Moxh. There was a river of Lydia, which some call Melas, but Ptolemy and Strabo, Mæles. This last has generally been thought the one mentioned by Ovidius (Met. ii. 247); although several critics have maintained that the one in Romania must have been the one intended by the poet; others Alara-sou; and not a few Kara-sou, one of the branches of the Euphrates. The adjective seems to point to the Thracian or the Lydian river rather than to the other two. See Mædonia.

Melas sinus, Melānis sinūs, m. a bay opposite to Chersonesus Thracia (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Meldi, orum, m. a people of Gallia Belgica, on the coast to the N. of the Morini. To them Caesar alludes. But of this name was another tribe, whose country was included between the rivers Mætrona, the Mæras, and Siquana, the Seine. Meldæ, Mæras, was their capital. The modern town is of some note, and contains 6,000 inhabitants.

Melæger, v. Melægrus, i. m. son of Ceneus and Althea, who distinguished himself at the hunt of Calydon by killing the wild boar. To Atalanta, for having first wounded that animal, he gave the skin, of which his maternal uncles attempted to deprive her, and Melæger, in revenge, put them to death. His mother, from resentment at the death of her brothers, threw into the fire a piece of wood on which his life depended, and he instantly expired (Hyg. 174). He was one of the Argonauts, and called by Valerius Flaccus, Genides, from his father (iii. 690), and Panthoonides from his grandfather (iii. 705). Melægrides, um (Sing. Melægridis, idis), f. birds into which all the sisters of Melæger except Gorgæ and Deianira, were transformed from grief at his death (Hyg. 174). Adj. Melægrus, a. um. Melægria Pleuron (Stat. Th. iv. 103).—2. A general of Alexander the Great. After the death of that conqueror, he and Perdicas were invested with supreme power, but a mutual hatred arose between them, and Perdicas put him to death (Just. xii. 2—4. Curt. x. 9).

Mēles, ētis, f. Molisi, a town which M. Claudius Marcellus, consul, took from the Samnites in 212 B. C., in which he made three thousand of Hannibal's soldiers prisoners, and obtained a considerable quantity of booty, two hundred and forty thousand mōdii of wheat, and one hundred and ten thousand mōdii of barley (Liv. xxvii. 1). Perhaps this is the same as Mēla mentioned by Livius (xxiv. 20).

Mēles, ētis, m. a very beautiful river of Iōnia, which flows by Smȳrna. Hōmērus, according to some authors, was born on the banks of this stream. Mēles potus tibi verendo fonte, thou hast drunk of Mēles flowing from a venerable spring, i. e. whose waters are rendered venerable from Hōmērus being born on its banks, and who is hence called Mēlestigēnes (Stat. Syl. iii. 3. 61). Adj. Mēlēteus, a, um. Mēlētea charta, the poems of Homer (Tib. iv. 1. 200).—2. Molise, a town of Samnium.

Mēlestas, es, m. a native of Ēgina, celebrated by Pindārus (Ol. viii. 71 seq.).

Mēlēsēs, um, m. a Spanish nation, in whose country Oringis was situated (Liv. xxviii. 3).

Mēlia, ae, f. a daughter of Oceānus, carried off by Apōllo by whom she had Tenārus and Ismēnius. There are other fabulous characters of this name.

Mēlibœa, ae, f. wife of Philōctētes, whom Statius describes, regretting that she had been left in Greece and had not accompanied her husband to the Trojan war (Syl. iii. 5. 48).

Mēlibœa, ae, f. a maritime town of Thessaly, on Thērmāleus sinus, the Gulf of Salonica, to the south of Ossa, Kissavo, where that mountain stretches out into Thēssālia, Thessaly. Its position is advantageous for commanding Dēmētrias. It was taken and plundered by Cn. Octāvius in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 46). Adj. Mēlibœus, a, um. Mēlibœus dūx, Philōctētes (Virg. Ēn. iii. 401). Mēlibœa pūrpūra, purple dyed at Mēlibœa, from the shells which produced that colour being found in its vicinity (Virg. Ēn. v. 251); probably taken from Lūcrētius (ii. 499).—2. An island at the mouth of Orōntēs, the El-asi; to which some refer Mēlibœa pūrpūra (Virg. Ēn. v. 251), which the passage in Lūcrētius (ii. 499) sufficiently disproves.

Mēlibœus, i, m. the name of a shepherd, under whose character Virgilius is supposed to depict the situation of the unhappy natives about Crēmōna and Māntua, who were driven from their paternal possessions to make room for the veterans of Angūstus. His character is delineated with great tenderness and interest, and the effect is heightened by his situation being contrasted with that of his more fortunate friend, Tityrus (Virg. B. i.).

Mēlicēta, v. Mēlicētes, ae, m. a son of Athāmas, king of Thēbae, Thēbae, and Inō. On Athāmas becoming mad and killing Lēāreus, from his supposing Inō a lioness, and her sons whelps, to escape being murdered, she fled with Mēlicēta, and threw herself and him into the sea. Neptūnus turned both into sea deities. The Greeks called him Pālemon, and the Latins, Pōrtūnus. The former gave to Inō the name of Lēucōthōē, and the latter that of Mātūta. But some maintain, that Mēlicēta was, after he had been drowned, brought ashore by a dolphin, that Sisyphus buried him near the town of Crēmȳon, Canetto or Canetto, and that at a future period, an altar was erected on his grave. It is added, that the Isthmian games were instituted in honour of Mēlicēta. These games were called Isthmian, from being celebrated on the Isthmus of Cōrinthus, Cōrinth, at port Schēnūs, Palao-Castro. Inōus Mēlicētes, Mēlicētes, son of Inō (Virg. G. i. 437).

Mēlicē, es, f. a native of Bithȳnia, by whom Neptūnus had a son named Amȳcus, king of the Bēbrȳces. According to Callimāchus, she was a daughter of Oceānus (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 25). Vālerius Flāccus has introduced this nymph in his poem on the Argonautic expedition (iv. 119).

Mēlii, orum, m. a Grecian nation, descendants from the Lacedemonians (Herod. viii. 46).

Mēlissa, ae, f. the first priestess of Cēres, and held in such high esteem, that all the priestesses in future were called by her name (Pin. Pyth. iv. 106).

C. Mēlissus, C. Mēlissi, m. a native of Spōlētum, Spoletto, a town of the Um̄ri in Italy, was freeborn, but exposed when an infant, in consequence of the disagreement of his parents. From the person who brought him up he received an excellent education, of which his great abilities and industry enabled him to reap the full advantage. He distinguished himself particularly as a grammarian, on which account his benefactor presented him to the emperor Angūstus, who treated him like a friend, and therefore he preferred remaining as a slave to claiming the rank to which he was entitled by birth, for his mother acknowledged him as her son. The emperor soon granted Mēlissus his liberty, and appointed him to arrange his library in the portico of Octāvia. In his sixtieth year, this eminent grammarian began to write short humorous pieces, of which he finished a hundred and fifty, and afterwards added others of a different kind. He composed a new kind of comedy, which he called Trābūta (fabūla). To his comic productions Ovidius alludes (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 30).

Mēlita, ae, v. Mēlitē, es, f. Malta, an island in the Mediterranean, to the south of Sicilia, Sicily. It is of an oval form, about twenty miles in length, and twelve in breadth, very rocky, and does not yield more corn annually than serves the inhabitants for six months, although Ovidius calls it fertile (Fast. iii. 567). Its first inhabitants, mentioned in history, were the Phōeci, who yielded to the Phœnicians, and they in their turn to the Greeks. In 220 B. C., it was in the possession of the Carthaginians, when Tib. Sēmprōnius Lōngus, the Roman consul, took it, and, on returning to Lilybæum, Cape Bæa, sold all the prisoners for slaves, with the exception of the noblemen (Liv. xxi. 31). On the fall of the Roman empire, it came under the dominion of the Goths, who were expelled by the Saracens whom the Normans conquered, from which time it continued subject to the same monarch with Sicily, till Charles V. gave it to the knights of St. John at Jerusalem. During the last war, the French not in every instance accept. From a spirit of ambition, or desire of revenge, he made many inroads on the Carthaginian territories, seized on some of their lands, and compelled several other tributary cities to pay him taxes. These aggressions induced the Carthaginians to make frequent complaints to the senate, who sent ambassadors to settle the differences. From Livius, it appears the deputies, in most instances, left matters nearly as they found them, nor could the Carthaginians, whom the Romans hated as a nation, expect them to act impartially, when the matters lay between an old enemy, and so faithful and efficient ally as Māsīssa. At the advanced age of ninety-two, this prince defeated the Carthaginians, had a son when he was eighty-six years old, and died in his ninety-seventh year (150 B. C.), retaining the vigour of youth till the very end of life. Cicero, according to Valerius Maximus, says, that he went at all times bareheaded, regardless alike of cold and rain (viii. 13), and Appianus, that he rode, even during his last days, without a saddle (Bel. Pun. 64). Besides upwards of forty reputed sons (Eutrop. iv. 11), he left three legitimate sons, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal, among whom the Romans divided his kingdom (Liv. Ep. 50).

Māsīntha, m., a Numidian prince, whom Māsīssa wounded in the battle between Scipio and Hannibal (Ap. Bel. Pun. 25).—2. A Numidian youth, whose cause C. Julius Caesar supported against king Hiempsal, son of Juba (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 71).

Māsīus, i., m. Karadly-Dag, a chain of mountains in Mēsōpōtāmīa.

Maspīi, orum, m. a Persian nation (Herod. i. 125).

Māsūga, m., f. See Māsūga.

Māsūgētēs, arum (Sing. Māsūgētēs, m.), a Scythian nation, bordering on Pārthīa (Hor. Od. i. 35. 40). The Greeks use Māsūgētēs as a general name of Asiatic Scythians. Herōdōtus seems to place them on Arāxes, the Khabour, which is nearly the opinion of Strābo. Their country is now occupied by the Kirgees tribes. They probably sent out frequent emigrations which settled in different countries, hence the various positions assigned them by the Roman poets. Like the Gēte, they drank the blood of horses, and the horrible custom prevalent among the Issēdōnes was observed by them, with this difference, that they ate only such old men or fathers as they killed. They buried all who died a natural death which was considered a misfortune. There was a community of wives, and they offered to the sun horses in sacrifice, for which they gave this reason, that the swiftest of animals ought to be presented to the swiftest of the gods (Herod. i. 201 seq.) Audāx Māsūgētēs (Claud. iii. 312).

Māsīcē, es, f. c. Maceprācta, orum, m. a place in Sŷria, which contained vestiges of extensive walls, intended as a protection to that country from external invasion (Amm. Mar. xxiv. 2).

Māsīcus, i., m. a prince who commanded a thousand Clisīni and Cōsīni, who joined Enēas. Virgilius says, he cut the seas, Æritū āgri, by which he probably meant a brazen-beaked ship with the likeness of a tiger painted or cut on its prow. The weapons of these warriors were arrows, light quivers (cōrgīti), and deadly bows (Æn. x.

166 seq.).—2. A Roman, born on the hill of that name, killed by Hannibal in the battle at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 346).

Māsīcus, i., m. Monte Massico, a bold and lofty mountain of Cāmpānia, which was celebrated in ancient times for the excellence of its wines. Adj. Māsīceus, a., um. Bicchi Māsīceus hūmor, the juice of Bācchus (i. e. wine) produced on Monte Massico (Virg. G. ii. 143). Māsīca Bicchi mūnēra, the gifts of Bācchus (i. e. wine) produced on Monte Massico (Virg. G. iii. 526). Vērtutē (arva) fēlicia Būccho Māsīca qui rāstris, who turn with harrows the soil of Māsīceus fertile in wine (Virg. Æn. vii. 725). Pōcūla vītīvis Māsīci (vini), cups of old Massic wine (Hor. Od. i. 1. 19). Oblīvīosum Māsīceum (vinum), oblivious Massic wine, i. e. Massic wine causing forgetfulness (Hor. Od. ii. 7. 21).

Māsīllā, a., f. Marseilles, an excellent seaport, and very opulent town, in that part of Prōvīncīa now called Provence, was washed by the sea, on nearly three sides. According to Strābo, a colony of Greeks left Phōcæa, of whom part built Vēlia in Italy, the other part founded this city in 546 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xv. 169), and established a republic, adopting the Ionian laws, and the religious rites of the Ephesians. They taught the Gauls to cultivate the land, to surround their cities with walls, to live by laws not by arms, to plant the olive, and to prune the vines. The refinement of manners and improvement of the soil by adopting the Grecian practices, had such an effect both on the people and the country that, says Jūstinus, Greece did not seem to have migrated into Gaul, but Gaul to have been translated into Greece (xliii. 4). In consequence of the sterility of the country, they depended for their subsistence more on navigation than on agriculture. The account of Jūstinus does not materially differ from that of Strābo (xliii. 3). From the eminence of this town as a seat of learning, at one period, the Romans used to resort for their education to it in greater numbers, than to Athens. With a view to extend their trade, for which they were long celebrated as well as for their literature, the inhabitants planted numerous colonies. After the time of Herōdōtus, they were said to have fitted out two fleets for voyages of discovery: of which the one sailed north, visited Shetland, the Baltic Sea, and Frozen Ocean, and afterwards returned in safety; but of the other which went south no account was ever received. This city was long the faithful ally of Rome. But, embracing the interest of Pōmpēius, the resentment of Cæsar robbed it of its greatness, so that it never recovered either its independence or warlike spirit. No vestiges of its ancient magnificence now remain. It is divided into the old and new town. The former stands on a steep declivity, and the latter at the foot of the hill, which is more regular and more neatly built. Marseilles is still a place of considerable trade, and its population amounts to 80,000. It continued a republic till Louis XIV. took it in 1660, and added it to the kingdom of France. The senate, in ancient times, consisted of 600, of whom 15 were over the rest, and 3 had a certain authority over these. Inh. Māsīllēnācs, iūm, rāfīus, Māsīllānī, orum, m. Adj. Māsīllēnācs, is, e. Māsīllānus, et, Māsīllānus, a., um. Māsīllōgicus, a, um, is found in Pliny; but this adjective does not often occur in classic authors. Māssiliāni fumi (Mart. iii. 82), wines, which were very harsh, impregnated with smoke in order to disguise the taste. See Martial, x. 36.

Māssiliānus, i, m. a man who pretended to great purity, whilst the opposite was his character (Mart. iv. 6). Some editions read Mālsiliānus.

Māssissēs, ium, m. a people of Mauri-tania (Anm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Māssiva, æ, m. a Numidian prince of great beauty and elegance of form. Gāla was his maternal grandfather, and Māsinissa his maternal uncle. He joined the latter in Spain. At the battle of Bæcula, Māssiva was taken prisoner by the Romans, and was indebted to his beauty for exemption from being sold as a slave. The quaestor sent him to Scipio, afterwards Africanus, who, on learning his history from himself, presented him with a gold ring, a tunic with a broad purple border, a Spanish cloak with a golden clasp, and a horse splendidly accoutred. Scipio then sent him to Māsinissa, escorted by a body of horse which had orders to attend him as far as he chose. It is probable that Scipio expected by treating the nephew with so great respect, he would secure the good will of the uncle, which he soon after accomplished (Liv. xxvii. 19 seq.).—2. Son of Gūlūssa, and grandson of Māsinissa. In the contest between Adherbal and Jūgūrtha, he took part with the former, and, on his murder at Cirta, he fled from Africa and went to Rome. Sp. Pōstū-nius Albinus, consul, advised this exiled prince to petition the senate for the kingdom of Nūmidia, Algiers, to which he had a just claim, being the only surviving heir of Māsinissa. The province of Nūmidia had fallen to the lot of Pōstūnius, who, ambitious of military fame, exerted every nerve to have the direction of the war. With this view he urged Māssiva to press his claims, 112 B. C., which Jūgūrtha no sooner knew, than he employed Bōmilcar, his most trusty adherent, to accomplish the death of that prince. Faithful to his undertaking, Bōmilcar hired ruffians, who soon murdered Māssiva. The assassin, from having rashly and almost openly executed his commission, did not escape detection, and, on being brought before the proper tribunal, made a full discovery, which excited the public indignation both against Bōmilcar and Jūgūrtha by whom he had been employed (Sal. Jug. 35). Livius makes his application for that kingdom proceed on the idea, that the Romans hated Jūgūrtha (Ep. 64).

Māssigrāda, æ, m. a Numidian of the family of Māsinissa, but not born in wedlock. He was the father of Dabar q. v. (Sal. Jug. 108).—Māssyli, orum (Sing. Māssylus, i), m. inhabitants of the one part of Nūmidia, Algiers, and at the time the Romans became acquainted with that nation they were under the government of Gāla, father of Māsinissa. They were brave soldiers, excellent horsemen, and, like their king, inveterate enemies of the Carthaginians. They managed their horses without bridles, to which the Latin poets often allude. Adj. Māssylus, Māssylus, et, Māssylus, a, um. Māssyla gēns, the nation of the Māssyli (Virg. Æn. iv. 483). Māssyla area (Stat. Th. xi. 27). Māssyla gēns (Luc. Phar. iv. 682). Māssylus, equus (Mart. ix. 23).

Māstānābal, ālis, m. youngest son of Māsinissa, king of Nūmidia, and brother of Mleipsa and Gūlūssa. At his father's death in 150 B. C., he succeeded to the third part of the kingdom, and appears to have been a man of considerable talents, from his being appointed to judge in civil matters, and to determine controversies (Ap. Bel. Pun. 107). Livius states the same circumstance respecting the division of the kingdom (Ep. 50). This prince either did not marry, or had by his wife no son who outlived himself; since historians only mention Jūgūrtha, whose mother was a concubine. Sallustius, in his narrative, differs from these two historians, declaring that both Māstānābal and Gūlūssa predeceased their father (Jug. 5). The assertion of Sallustius does not invalidate the statement of Livius, who surpasses him in two essential qualifications of a historian, accuracy and truth.

Māstor, ōris, m. the father of Lycōphron, a native of Cýthēra, Cerigo (Hom. Il. xv. 430).—2. An Ithacan, the father of the prophet Hālithēses. Māstōrides, æ, m. Hālithēses (Hom. Od. ii. 158).

Māstulus, i, m. a man in the army of Hannibal, whom Murrus killed at the siege of Saguntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. i. 405).

Māsūrius Sābinus, Māsūrii Sābini, m. a lawyer of great eminence in the reign of Tiberius, who wrote, besides other works, three books on the civil law, Rūbrica Māsūrii, the civil laws of Māsūrius, so called from the titles and heads of books of law being usually written with red earth or ochre (Pers. Sat. v. 90).

Mātērina, æ, f. a district of Umbria, the inhabitants of which not only opposed the proposal of their countrymen, of laying down their arms at the arrival of the Roman consul, Q. Fabius Maximus Rūllianus, but urged their attacking him immediately, which was done, and their defeat was the consequence, in 309 B. C. (Liv. ix. 41).

Mātērnus, i, m. a lawyer to whom Martialis writes some epigrams. Like the poet, he appears to have been a native of Spain (Mart. x. 37).

Māthēmāticus, i, m. a name assumed by the professors of judicial astrology, or rather fortune-tellers, at Rome, who wished to be considered men of real sciences, in order to conceal their deceptions. By a decree of the senate, they were banished from Italy in the year 16, when two of their number suffered death. This decree should be considered rather a revival of ancient laws, than a new regulation. It does not appear to have been carried into full effect. Tholus says, "That society never knew a more dangerous pest than these impostors, faithless to princes, deceitful to expectants, who will ever be prohibited, and ever retained in our city" (Ann. ii. 32 seq.).

Mātho, v. Māthon, ōnis, m. a lawyer, formerly poor and unnoticed, afterwards, on account of his numerous vices, if we may credit the Scholiasts, he was the friend of Nēro. Some maintain, that he acquired wealth by becoming an informer; but they do not give the authority on which their assertion rests, nor does this character accord with the mention made of him in Juvēnalis (Sat. i. 32).

vii. 129). A character not materially different will be found in Martialis (iv. 80 &c.).

Matiāni, orum, m. an eastern nation, of whose history little is known. Xerxes, in his invasion of Greece, had their assistance (Herod. vii. 72).

C. Maticenus, C. Maticeni, m. one of the two commanders of the Roman fleet in 183 B. C. According to his orders, he sailed for the coast of Liguria, where he took thirty-two ships belonging to Ligurian pirates (Liv. xl. 26, 28).—2. Was accused before the tribunes of the people, of deserting from the Roman army in Spain in 140 B. C., found guilty, punished for a long time by scourging under a gallows, before the newly-levied troops, and sold for a slave at a very low price; a punishment productive of very salutary results (Liv. Ep. 55).

M. Maticenus, M. Maticeni, m. elected praetor at Rome in 175 B. C., and obtained the south of Spain for his province. He was brought to trial, on a complaint of the natives of that country to the senate, accused of very flagrant crimes, and went into banishment at Tibur, after his cause had been once heard before the recupratores, 173 B. C. (Liv. xli. 28 seq.).

P. Maticenus, P. Maticeni, m. a tribune of the soldiers, whom P. Cornélius Scipio Africanus sent with M. Sērgius q. v., another military tribune, to march three thousand men from Rhēgium to Lōeri in 207 B. C., to regain that place. For ordering a cup to be taken from a soldier, who had stolen it, a scuffle ensued between the soldiers under him and Sērgius, with those of Plēmīnius q. v., the latter ordered the tribunes to be beaten with rods, on which their men flew to arms, treated Q. Plēmīnius with great cruelty, and left him mangled and almost lifeless. On this account, their general afterwards caused them to be put to death (Liv. xxix. 6—9).

Maticēssa, æ, f. a town, now unknown, in Celtiberia, a district of Spain (Mart. iv. 55).

Matinus, i, m. a hill of Apulia, near the boundary of Calabria. Adj. Matinus, a, um. Matinum litus (Hor. Od. i. 28. 3).

Matisco, ōnis, f. Mascon, or, Macon, a town of the Edūi, on the west bank of Arar, the Saône, between Cābillōnum, Chalons, and Lugdūnum, Lyons (Cæs. B. G. vii. 90).

Matrinia, æ, f. an old woman of vicious character (Mart. iii. 32).

Matrona, æ, f. the Marne, a river of Gallia, France, which formed part of the ancient boundary between Gallia Belgica, and Gallia Celtica. It takes its rise at Langres, runs N. W. to Chalons, then westward, passes by Meaux, becomes navigable at Vitry, and at Charenton, a little above Paris, falls into Sēquāna, the Seine, after a course of about ninety-two leagues (Cæs. B. G. i. 1).

—2. An Alpine height, which received this name from the fate of a noble woman (Amm. Mar. xv. 10).

Mattium, i, n. Murgurg, the capital of the Catti, a German nation (Tac. Ann. i. 56). Ptolēmeus has Mattidcon, probably referring to the same place. Inh. Mattiaci, orum, m. (Tac. Mor. Ger. 29 &c.). Adj. Mattiacus, a, um. Mattiaca pila (Mart. xiv. 27). Mattiacæ aquæ, hot springs (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

C. Mattius, C. Mattii, m. a friend of C. Julius Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 52).

Mattus, i, m. a man to whom Martialis writes a short and pointless epigram (xii. 102).

Mātūta, æ, f. a name given by the Latins to Inō, after she became a sea goddess (Ov. Fast. vi. 545). By the Greeks she was called Lēncōthōē (Lucr. v. 655).

Mātūtinus pāter, Mātūtini pātris, m. a name of Jānus, as presiding over the day (Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 20).

Mauritania, æ, f. Morocco and Fez, an extensive country on the northwest part of Africa, bounded on the east by Nūmidia, Algiers; on the south by Gætūlia; on the north by the Mediterranean, and Frētum Hērclūm, the Strait of Gibraltar; and on the west by Mārē Atlānticum, the Atlantic Ocean. The emperor Claudius divided it into two parts, calling the eastern Cæsāriēnsis, and the western Tingitāna; hence, from that period, the expression Dūa Mauritānia (Tac. Hist. ii. 58). Mauritānia habet nomen oris (incolarum) (Manil. iv. 727). Inh. Mauri, Maurici, et, Maurūsī, orum, m. the Moors, who are said to have received this name from the Greeks on account of their dark complexion. Lūcānus says they are of the same colour with the Indians, Cōcōlor Indo Maurus (Phar. iv. 678). Inecōti (sōle) corpōra Mauri, the Moors having their bodies burned by the sun, i. e. rendered black (Sil. Ital. xvii. 632). Adj. Mauritānus, Mauritanicus, Maurus, Maurusius, Maurisicus, et, Mauricus, a, um. Maura unda, the African wave, i. e. the waves on the African coast (Hor. Od. ii. 6. 3). Maurūsia robūra (Luc. Phar. ix. 426). Maurūsia cīlīa (Claud. xxiv. 278). Maurūsīacum citrūm, Mauritanian citron; tables of which the Romans considered most valuable (Mart. xii. 67). Maurici gentes (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 4).

Māvōrs, ōrtis, m. a name of Mārs (Virg. Æn. vi. 873). Adj. Māvōrtius, a, um, descended from Mars; warlike (Virg. Æn. vi. 778). Māvōrtia prōles (Ov. Met. iii. 531).

Mausōlus, i, m. king of Cūria, according to Cicero, the governor of a province, according to Greek writers, who call him Satrāpes, was the husband of Artēmisia q. v. (Gel. x. 18).

Māxārthes, is, m. the Parthian who killed M. Licinius Crassus in 56 B. C. (Ap. Ecl. Par. 153).

Māxēntius, i, m. son of the Roman emperor, Māximianus, who married the daughter of Gālērius, and thus, had not his vices intervened, had a fair prospect of succeeding to the empire. To mental depravity he added mental debility, yet, enraged at the appointment of Constantinus to the dignity of Cæsar, which had been denied himself, he formed a conspiracy for the destruction of Sēvērus, which required neither great address nor great bravery to accomplish. The guards had no sooner despatched the emperor, than Māxēntius appeared in public, clothed in the imperial dress, and the united voice of the senate and people, in loud acclamations, proclaimed him the head of the state. Māximianus quitted his retirement, to which Diocletianus had condemned him, and again assumed the purple, which added to the strength of his son's party. In Italy, the inhabitants suffered every degree of oppression and tyranny. Rapacity, in contempt of justice, seized whatever had escaped fire and sword. Under Măxēntius, the practice of demanding a free gift from the senators came first into use, and this requisition increased in proportion to its continuance, and the wealth of the individual. An enumeration of his vices could only shock and disgust the reader; therefore we need only mention, that Cōstāntinus and he came to a decisive battle at Săxa Rōbra, about nine miles from Rome, where Măxēntius, having been completely routed, attempted to escape by the Mulvian bridge, from which he was forced into Tiber, the Tevere, and drowned. The people rejoiced at their deliverance, on seeing his head next day exposed to public view, after his body, which had sunk from the weight of the armour, had been found. The conqueror not only put his two sons to death, but extirpated his whole family, an act which policy might dictate, but neither humanity nor justice could approve. On his death, Cōstāntinus abolished the praetorian guards, whose privileges Măxēntius had restored, and whose agency had secured him the purple. Prudence and policy united in this measure, which does credit to the heart as well as to the head of Cōstāntinus (Eutrop. x. 2-4).

Măxēra, æ. m. the Goorgaan, a river of Hŷcāula (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Măximiānōpōlis, is. f. Maximianopolis, a town of Thrăcia (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Măximianus, i. m. a native of Pănnōnia, was the son of poor parents who earned their bread by bodily toil. His education corresponded with the meanness of his birth, and it does not appear, that his mind was capable of superior attainments, either in general knowledge, or in the sciences. Pănnōnia had long been the seat of almost continued war, and he entered the army in early life, never rising either in manners or information above a common soldier. Clownish, deceitful, cruel and debauched, he was a ready instrument in the hand of Diocletianus, who chose him for his colleague, to execute schemes which the craftiness of that prince might both recommend and disown. His military talents and contempt of danger, no doubt recommended him to Diocletianus, still, from many acts of his future life, it may be conjectured, that he anticipated advantages from his personal vices, and merciless severity. Măximianus respected the mental superiority of his colleague, consequently adopted whatever measures his stronger reason and more discriminating judgment suggested. Măximianus assumed the name of Hŷcŷlŷns, and Diocletianus, that of Jŷvŷus. To protect the empire against the numerous and powerful forces of the barbarians, Diocletianus proposed to select two generals of approved merit, who, with the title of Caesar, should have an equal share of sovereign authority. The choice fell on Gălŷrius and Cōstāntius Chlŷrus q. v. Italy and Africa submitted to the government of Măximianus, who displayed great bravery in the war in Găllia, France, where he subdued the Băgaudes, repulsed the Germans who had overrun that country, passed the Rhine, and compelled the Franks to implore his mercy. He had the same success in the war with the Quinquēgēntiāni, and delivered the empire from the tyranny of the usurper Jŷllianus. Diocletianus having fallen into a lingering illness which affected his mind, Gălŷrius, taking advantage of it, compelled him and Măximianus to resign the sovereignty. He afterwards resumed the purple on the murder of Sŷvŷrus, and his son Măxēntius and he having disputed about the government, pleaded their cause before the praetorian guards, and these venal troops declared in favour of the son. After this decision, he retired to Illyricum, which Gălŷrius, knowing his disposition, compelled him to quit. His son-in-law, Cōstāntinus, received him at his court. Rashly believing a report of the death of Cōstāntinus, he assumed the sovereignty, scattered the wealth of the royal treasures among the soldiers, with indiscriminate profusion, and had just finished arrangements for the establishment of his imperial dignity, when Cōstāntinus arrived at the gates of Arles, and he with difficulty escaped to Maracilla. The garrison, instead of protecting, delivered up Măximianus, whose death the vengeance of the conqueror demanded, on which he strangled himself. Want of the advice of his colleagues rendered his second reign, if it may be so called, a scene of almost continued disappointment to himself, and of calamity to the public. The conduct of Cōstāntinus would have gained him more credit with future ages, had he spared the life of an old man who had raised his father to the throne, and was the father of his wife Fausta. The impartial reader can scarcely believe that this act did not in some degree alienate her attachment to her husband, who had unnecessarily imbrued his hands in her father's blood (Eutrop. ix. 22).

Măximina, æ. f. an old woman (Mart. ii. 41).

Măximinus, i. m. a Thracian, who spent the early part of his life in the occupation of a herdsman. His courage and strength were first directed against a band of robbers. In size he greatly surpassed ordinary men, his height was not less than eight feet and a half, and every part of his body was in exact proportion. With ease he could break the leg of a horse with a blow of his fist, he could crumble pumice-stones into dust between his fingers, and split young trees by the mere exertion of his arms. He consumed every day forty pounds' weight of meat, and drank six gallons of wine. Brutality, the usual concomitant of extraordinary size and strength, especially in uncultivated minds, marked his whole conduct. Warlike bravery and love of justice, formed the only features in his character, which merit approbation. By his surprising swiftness and feats of extraordinary prowess, he first attracted the notice of the Roman emperor Alexander Sŷvŷrus, who, besides presenting him with a gorget of gold, ordered him to be enrolled among his life-guards. From detesting the murder of Căŷŷŷalla, under whom he obtained the rank of centurion, he quitted the army, and returned to cultivate his lands in Thrăcia. The accession of Hŷlŷgăbŷlus called him forth from the obscurity to which he had retired, yet, it was with difficulty that his friends could prevail on him to accept the office of a tribune in the army, in consequence of his aversion to the lewdness of the new emperor, under whose reign he seems to have remained inactive. On the promotion of Alexander Sévêrus to the purple, he was called to actual service, both in the army and at court. The kindness of Sévêrus did not secure the fidelity, or command the gratitude, of Máximinus, who employed the power entrusted to him by his sovereign to effect his destruction. The former vainly imagined that, by the command of a new legion, and the appointment of commander-in-chief of the forces which were to march against the Germans, he would secure the attachment and obtain the valuable services of an able soldier; but nothing was farther from the intention of Máximinus, to whose atrocity and ingratitude, the amiable prince in a short time fell a sacrifice. The purple was the reward of this villany. Máximinus gave his own son the title of Cæsar, and prince of the youth. The idea that others despised him from the meanness of his birth, heightened the brutal ferocity which marked his early years, and he attempted to remove the impression from his mind by putting to death all who had any knowledge of his family. Even the recollection of favours distressed him, of which the immediate consequence was the destruction of those by whom they had been conferred. Universal hatred necessarily resulted from such conduct, and the public regarded with horror, the monster who considered cruelty the protection of power. Success in war was accompanied with respect from the soldiers, and the terror of the enemy; yet these advantages did not suppress conspiracies, to which tyranny and injustice inevitably give rise. After several attempts on his life, the prætorian guards put him and his son to death about the year 238. According to Eutrôpius he was killed, and his son, then a boy, by Pupliênus, after a reign of little more than three years. He assumed the surname of Germanicus, as did also his son (Eutrop. ix. 1).—2. Son of the former, whom his father invested with the title of Cæsar, and prince of the youth, amongst his first acts after his usurpation. Young Máximinus was reckoned the handsomest youth in the whole empire, polite in his manners, and a master of the Greek and Latin languages. From being a foreigner, and uneducated, his father spoke Latin ill, and with difficulty. In all his expeditions, this youth seems to have accompanied his father; he fell at the same time by the hands of the prætorian guards. After cutting off the heads of the emperor and his son, these guards left their bodies to the birds and beasts of prey. The characters which ancient authors give of the son differ so widely, that the truth cannot be precisely ascertained, and it may possibly be equally distant from the two extremes, in which his virtues and vices have been described.

Máximus Côtta, Máximi Côtta, m. a man to whom Ovidius addresses one of his epistles from Póntus, thanking him for sending him the images of Augustus, Lívius, and Tibérius (ii. 8). He is probably the person mentioned again in Epis. Pont. iii. 2, where the poet praises him for the steadfastness of his friendship, and where he traces his descent, by his mother's side, from Numa Pómpilius. To this Ovidius again alludes (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 43).

Máximus Cúrio, Máximi Cúriónis, m. See Cúrio.

Máximus Scaurus, Máximi Scauri, m. a centurion, and one of the conspirators against Néro, in the year 65 (Tac. Ann. xv. 50).

Máxitáni, orum, m. Just. xviii. 6. The reading ought either to be Mauri, or, Mauritáni.

Mázica, æ, f. v. Mázica, orum, n. a city of Cápádúcia, afterwards called Cæsárea, now Kisariah (Eutrop. vii. 11). Strábo writes that it was first called Eusébia, and that it stood at the foot of mount Argæus, the top of which was always covered with snow (780).

Mázices, is, m. a satrap of Egypt, after Sábaces (Curt. iv. 1 seq.).

Mázices, um (Sing. Mázax, ácis), m. a people of Mauritania (Luc. Phar. iv. 681). This word is disputed, some write Mázices, Sing. Mázix, &c.

Mázæus, i, m. a Carthaginian killed by the Roman consul Scípío, on the banks of Trébia, the Trebia (Sil. Ital. iv. 627).—2. An officer under Dárius, who gave up Bábýlon to Alexander the Great, in 331 B. C., and was appointed governor of that province by the conqueror (Curt. iv. 9).

Mázagæ, arum, v. Mássaga, æ, f. a city near the Indus, which Alexander the Great besieged, and commanded the troops in person (Curt. viii. 10).

Mázaras, v. Mészaras, æ, m. a Syrian, who decoyed the army of Crassus, by which that commander lost his life, and his whole forces were cut in pieces (Flor. iii. 11).

Mázippa, æ, m. a commander of the Moors, who, at the head of his light-armed freebooters, ravaged the country, and struck terror into the inhabitants by fire and sword wherever he went. By these means, he compelled the Cinthli to join him and Tæcárinus q. v. (Tac. Ann. ii. 52).

Mécisteus, eos, m. son of Echlus, a man in the Grecian army, who carried off Téucer wounded by Héctor, and protected by Ajax. He was killed by Polydâmas (Hom. Il. viii. 333 seq.).—2. Son of Tállon, and father of Euryalus, hence called Mécistélâdes (Hom. Il. vi. 28: xxiii. 678).

Médæa, æ, f. a daughter of Æetes, king of Cólchis, but ancient authors differ greatly respecting her mother. She has been called the daughter of Idýia, of Hécátê, of Antiôpê, of Néera, of Astéródia, and of Ephýrê. She is said to have possessed an astonishing knowledge of the powers of herbs, and to have done, by these means, many things which must be considered as entirely fabulous. By her advice and assistance, Iáson was enabled to obtain the golden fleece. In return for her kindness, and agreeably to his promise, he then married Médæa, and carried her with him to Greece. After many years of happiness with her in his native country, he most iniquitously divorced her. But she severely revenged his ingratitude, by causing the death of his favourite Glauco, and the ruin of her family. Not satisfied with these acts of cruelty, she put two of Iáson's sons to death before his eyes, and afterwards returned to Cólchis, where a reconciliation took place between her and Iáson. Both, according to Justinus and Apollodorus, died in the place of her nativity. Her bringing again to life the dead, her flying through the air in a chariot drawn by winged dragons, and other fictions of a similar kind, do not deserve to be related. The short notice of her by Pausanias, and the circumstances connected with it, have more the appearance of historical truth, although not mentioned by other writers (ii. 3). Ætias, lādis, Ætis, idos, et, Ætinē, es, f. Mēdā. Mēdis, idos, f. of Mēdā, with relation to a noun feminine. Mēdēides herba, magic herbs (Ov. Art. Am. ii. 101).

Mēdā, æ, f. a city built by Mēdus, son of Mēdā, who founded the kingdom of the Medes (Just. xlii. 3).

Mēdēon, ōnis, m. a city of Phōcis, so called from Mēdēon, son of Pylades and Electra. When Pausanias wrote, this town was in ruins.—2. A city of Boōtia, named after that in Phōcis (Strab. 596). The inhabitants of Mēdēon joined the army of Etēocles in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 260). Hōmērus describes it as well built (Il. ii. 501).—3. A city of Epirus, Lower Albania, and also a village of that district.—4. A city of Lābēatis, in Illyricum (Liv. xlv. 23).—5. Medenico, a town of Acarnānia, Karnia.

Mēdēsicāstē, es, f. a reputed daughter of Prīamus, and wife of Imbrius (Hom. Il. xiii. 173).

Mēdia, æ, f. a country of Asia, bounded on the east by the territories of the Caspī and Pārthi, on the south by Sittacēnē, Sūsīānē and Pērsia; on the west by Adiābēnē, and on the north by Armēnia (Plin. i. 709). The description of the country by Strābo, is not materially different. The latter divides Mēdia into two parts, Mēdia Māgna, of which the capital was Ecbātāna, Hamedan, and Mēdia Atrōpātā. Inh. Mēdi, orum (Sing. Mēdus, i), m. the Medes, are often in Roman authors, particularly the poets, confounded with the Persians and Parthians. When first mentioned in history, the Medes were a brave people, successful against their enemies, and united among themselves. Like other states, wealth and power rendered them insolent and luxurious, and, in the reign of Cyrus, they lost their independence as a separate kingdom, and became subject to the Parthians. Brāchātī Mēdi, the trowsered Medes (Pers. Sat. iii. 53). Adj. Mēdus, et, Mēdicus, a, um. Mēdus Hūdāspēs, the Median Behat, a proof of the inaccurate and undefined notions which the Romans, at this period, had of the country possessed by the Mēdi; for their territories never came within a thousand miles of that river (Virg. G. iv. 211). Mēdon flūmen, i. e. Euphrātes, the El-Frat (Hor. Od. ii. 9. 21). Mēdus acinōces, a Median scimitar (Hor. Od. i. 27. 5). Mēdica, æ, f. Burgundy trefol, which was brought into Greece by the Mēdi, at the time the Persians made war on the Greeks (Virg. G. i. 215). Plinius says it ought to be sown in May, but Palladius in April. Mēdica mālus, the citron-tree, first brought from Mēdia to Italy, in the time of Virgilius (G. ii. 134).

Mēdiānum, i, n. a fort in Mauritānia Cæsariensis.

Mēdiolānum, i, n. Milan, a town in the north of Italia, Italy, built by the Gauls, which, in ancient times, was the capital of the Galli Insūbres. The name has been derived from a sow found in the foundation, covered with wool in the middle. To this tradition, probably fictitious, Claudius al- ludes (x. 183). The Roman emperor Māximilianus Hērēclēus made Milan the seat of government about the year 304, for the purpose of observing the movements of the *German*s, and, from additions and embellishments, it soon acquired the appearance of an imperial city. The modern town is of considerable extent, surrounded with a wall and rampart. The streets are neither straight nor wide, and the appearance of the houses is mean, from the windows being filled with paper instead of glass. The distance from Rome to Milan, by Via Flāminia, the Furlo road, is four hundred and three English miles. Inh. Mēdiolānēses, ium (Sing. Mēdiolānēsis, is), m. are in modern times computed at about two hundred thousand, of easy and elegant manners, and hospitable to strangers. Adj. Mēdiolānēsis, is, e.—2. Ereux, the capital of the Aulerci Ebūrōvices, from whom the modern name is derived.—3. A town of the Santōnes, in Gallia Cēltica, which afterwards took the name of the inhabitants, hence the modern name Saintes.—4. A town of the Bitūriges, now Chateau Meilan.—5. Meyond, in Montgomeryshire.

Mēdiōmātrīces, um, c. Mēdiōmātrīci, orum, m. a people of Gallia Bēlgica, on Mōsēlla, the Moselle. The Trēviri were their neighbours on the north. Their chief town was Divodūrum, afterwards Mēdiōmātrīci, now Metz. At one period they were a powerful nation, and possessed a very extensive country. But the conquest of Gallia, France, by the Romans, destroyed their power, and confined them to a narrow territory (Ces. B. G. iv. 10 seq.).

Mēdion, ōnis, m. a city on the frontiers of Acarnānia, not far from Ambrācius Sinus, and must not be confounded with Mēdēon in Illyricum. Antiochus, king of Syria, obtained possession of Mēdion through the treachery of Clītus, the pretor, and Mnēslōchus, in 193 B. C., and placed a garrison in it. Inh. Mēdiōnii, orum, m. (Liv. xxxvi. 11 seq.).

Mēdius, i, m. a Thessalian, who prepared an entertainment for Alexander the Great and his officers, at which the conqueror having received a cup, groaned in the midst of the draught, as if struck with a dart, and on the sixth day after, expired, in 324 B. C. (Just. xii. 13). Some editions of Justinus read Midius, others Medicus.—2. See Mēdus.

Mēdixtūticus, i, m. the highest magistrate of the Campanians. The term is compounded of Mēdix, a magistrate, and tūticus, highest, in the language of the Osci (Liv. xxiii. 35 seq.).

Mēdon, ōntis, m. one of the Tuscan sailors whom Bacchus changed into dolphins (Ov. Met. iii. 671).—2. One of the centaurs, who received a wound in the shoulder in the battle with the Lāpithæ, at the marriage of Pirithōus, after which he fled and escaped (Ov. Met. xii. 303).—3. A reputed son of Oilēus, and brother of Ajax the swift, killed by Ænēas (Hom. Il. xiii. 693 seq.).—4. The herald at the court of Ithāca (Hom. Od. iv. 677).—5. Of Bērea, a friend of Pērsēus, in whose army he commanded the Macedonian horse, and the Cretans, in the battle near Sycurium, 173 B. C. The important offices to which Pērsēus appointed him, showed both confidence and respect (Liv. xlii. 58 seq.).—6. Son of Cōdrus, last king of Athens. He was the first Archon of that city. Mēdōn-tide, arum, m. the descendants of Mēdōn (Vel. Pat. i. 2).—7. A priest of Cyzicus, who was engaged in the sacred rites, at the time the Argonauts unexpectedly returned to that city (Val. Flacc. iii. 118).

Mēdōres, is, m. a Scythian commander, who, with Gēlas, fought against Cāstor, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 211 seq.).

Mēdūācus, v. Mēdōācus, i. m. the Brenta, a river in the north of Italy, which has its source in Alpes Tridēntinae, and falls into Sinus Hādrīaticus, the Gulf of Venice, near the city which gives name to that gulf. Livius only mentions one Mēdūācus, although there are two rivers of this name, the one already mentioned Mēdūācus Māior, and the other Mēdūācus Minor, the Bachiglione. Pātvium, Padua, stands on the left bank of the latter (Liv. x. 2).

Mēdūāna, v. m. the Mayenne, a river of France, one of the branches of Ligēris, the Loire. Andécāvi, Angers, stands at the junction of these two rivers (Luc. Phar. i. 438).

Mēdūllia, v. f. a town of the Sabines, the situation of which is unknown. It was taken by the Latins, and recovered by Ancus Mārcius, after a war of twenty-four years. Tārcūnīus Priscus afterwards obtained possession of it (Liv. i. 33 seq.).

Mēdūllina, v. f. an infamous woman (Juv. Sat. vi. 321).

Mēdūllus, i. m. a mountain in Spain, which the Romans encompassed by a ditch of fifteen miles. No sooner was it finished than the natives, who had posted themselves upon it, hastened their death with great ferocity, rather than surrender to the enemy (Flor. iv. 12).

Mēdus, v. Mēdius, i. m. son of Ægeūs by Mēdēa, after her separation from Iāson. After the death of his mother's husband, he built Mēdēa, and, according to some authors, founded the kingdom of the Medes (Just. ii. 6: xlii. 3).

Mēdus, i. m. the Abikuren, a river of Mēdīa, one of the branches of Arāxes, the Khabour. Some suppose Hērāclius to mean this river, Od. ii. 9. 21; but others, with more propriety, consider Mēdum in that line an adjective, and by Mēdum flūmen, understand Euphrātes, the El-Frat. The Roman poets often confound Pārthia, Mēdīa, Syria, and Pērsīa.

Mēdūsa, v. f. a daughter of Phōrcus, v. Phōrcys, a sea deity, or a king of Africa, and Cētō, the only one of the three Gorgons who was mortal. Her sisters, Sthēnō and Eurýālē, were neither subject to old age, nor to death. She greatly surpassed the other two in elegance of figure and comeliness of face; but in nothing was her superiority more remarkable than in the beauty of her locks. Mīnērvā provoked, either because her temple had been profaned by Mēdūsa, which is the cause assigned by Ovid, or because her personal charms had been slighted by Mēdūsa, who had preferred her own beauty to that of the goddess, turned her fine hair, of which she boasted so greatly, into serpents, and gave to her eyes the power of converting to stone, all at whom she looked, hence Lūcānus calls her Saxifera (Phar. ix. 670). According to the same poet, her hair might be looked at

with safety, and perhaps he also understood the same of the whole body, except the face (Phar. ix. 636). Others say that all the Gorgons were born with serpents in place of hair, that their hands were of brass, their body covered with scales which no weapon could pierce, their wings of a golden colour, and that they had only one eye and tooth which they used alternately. Pausānias states, that Mēdūsa reigned over the inhabitants of the Tritonian marsh, was accustomed to hunting, and commanded an army which Pērcēus defeated, and killed herself. In consequence of her beauty, he cut off her head on purpose to show it to the Greeks, and afterwards buried it in Argolis. This author prefers the account of Prōclus, a Carthaginian, who asserted there were savage men and women in Africa, of whom he considered Mēdūsa one. The fiction about Mīnērvā, is explained by the lake Tritōnis being sacred to that goddess (Paus. ii. 21). The opinions of the ancients with respect to the daughters of Phōrcus are very different and contradictory. Nor is this wonderful, since they are mere creatures of the imagination, which could not possibly have any existence in nature. Pērcēus cut off Mēdūsa's head, by which, from its possessing the quality above-mentioned, he gained many victories, and performed many exploits. The blood which fell from it in his flight over Africa, was supposed to produce the numerous serpents which infest that country, and also the winged horse Pēgāsus. According to Ovidius, coral was first formed by the head of Mēdūsa touching some twigs, which had grown under the sea, and the semynphs sowing the seeds over the bed of the ocean, produced a prodigious quantity of that beautiful marine substance. See Cūrūlūm. Mīnērvā placed the head of Mēdūsa in her shield, hence Claudīanus, Tōtā Gōrgōnē, with her whole shield (xxiv. 168). From her father, Mēdūsa was called Phōrcēnis, Ides. Adj. Mēdūseus, a. um. Mēdūsei chelāri, the serpents which spring from the blood of Mēdūsa (Sil. Ital. iii. 316). Mēdūseus fōns, Agānippē, from having risen first out of the earth from a stroke of the foot of the horse Pēgāsus (Ov. Met. v. 312). Mēdūseus ēquus, Pēgāsus (Ov. Fast. v. 8). Mēdūseca dēa, Mīnērvā (Mart. vii. 1).

Mēgābūzus, v. Mēgābūzus, i. m. an officer under Dārius, whom he sent, after his dishonourable flight from Scythia, to subdue Thracia, and the countries around (Just. vi. 3).

Mēgēra, v. f. one of the Furies. See Erinnys.

Mēgālē, es. f. v. Mēgālē māter, the Greek name of Cybele. Adj. Mēgālēsīus, v. Mēgālēsīacus, a. um. et. Mēgālēsīus, is. e. of Cybele. Mēgālēsīa (sacra), festivals in honour of Cybele, in which theatrical performances were introduced, first celebrated at Rome, by the curule ediles C. Atilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, on the Ides of April, 196 B. C., and continued during six days. They afterwards commenced on the day before the Nones of April, probably from the festival of Ceres falling on the day before the Ides. At these games the Roman senate first sat separate from the people (Liv. xxxiv. 54). Mēgālēsīa purpura. The praetor clothed in purple used to exhibit Mē- gālenses ludi, in honour of Cýbèle, at his own expense; hence Mēgālensis pūrpura came to denote the games themselves as in Mārtiālis (x. 41).

Mēgālia, æ, f. v. Mēgāris, is, f. Castel del ovo, an island on the west of Itālia, Italy, between Pausilypus, Pausilypo, and Nēapōlis, Naples (Plin. i. 340).

Mēgālōpōlis, is, f. Leonardi (Palea Arcadia, Leake), a town on the confines of Lācōnia, built from a number of villages and towns of Arcādia, at the suggestion of Epaminondas, hence called the great city. It was only partly built up, hence the saying of a poet, "That the great city was a great desert." The valley of Mēgālōpōlis abounds in delightful scenery, diversified by little hills, numerous rivulets, detached copses; and watered by a large stream, which winds its way through the middle. Inh. Mēgālōpōlitae, arum (Liv. xxviii. 8), and Mēgālōpōlitani, arum, m. (Liv. xxxii. 22).

Mēgāpēnthes, is, m. a reputed son of Mēnelāus and Tērīdās, or Pieris (Hom. Od. iv. 11. Apol. iii. 11).

Mēgāra, æ, f. daughter of Crēon, king of Thēba, Theba, and wife of Hērclēs, whom Lýcus, a son of Nēptūnus, wished to kill, together with her two sons, by that hero, Thērīmāchus and Ophites, and to take possession of the kingdom. Hērclēs, who had been sent to the infernal regions to bring up Cērberus, returned in time to frustrate the plan of Lýcus, whom he put to death. Jūno, enraged at the conduct of Hērclēs, struck him with madness, on which he killed both his wife and his two sons. Mārtiālis alludes to a revolting practice of Hērclēs; but the grossness of the poet invalidates his evidence, and he may have invented what tarnishes the character of another, in order to justify, or palliate, his own immoralities (xi. 43).

Mēgāra, æ, f. v. Mēgāra, arum, n. Megara, a town of Græcia Propria, or Hellas, of considerable note, built by Peloponnesians. Megara is now a miserable town, of which the inhabitants are all Greeks, the houses small, the soil barren, and the climate unhealthy. It stood upon two hills, Karia and Alkathōus, from which walls extended to the harbour. The modern town occupies only one of the hills. Few vestiges of the ancient edifices remain. Inh. Mēgārēnses, ium (Sing. Mēgārēnsis, is), m. in ancient times excelled in naval affairs, were fraudulent and perfidious, and united all the bad qualities of insolent slaves and servile friends. Mēgāris, idis, f. the district of which Mēgāra was the capital. Adj. Mēgārus, Mēgārēus, Mēgārēus, Mēgārēus, a, um, et, Mēgārēnsis, is, e. Mēgārēia arca (Stat. Th. xii. 219).—2. A town of Thessālia.—3. A town of Pōntus.—4. A town of Illyricum.—5. A town of Molossis.—6. A town of Sicily, taken and plundered by Mārcellus, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 35). Ptolēmaeus and Stēphānus state, that this town was first called Hýblē pāra, from its king Hýblon, and the inhabitants, Hýblēai. Adj. Mēgārus, a, um, v. Mēgārēnsis, is, e. Mēgārus sinus, generally called Mēgārēnsis sinus, Golfo di Augusta (Virg. Æn. iii. 689).—7. A place at Carthage, of which Appianus gives a description (Bel. Pun. 71, 72).

Mēgārēus, eos, m. son of Onchēstus, and grandson of Nēptūnus, was the father of Hippomēnes. From Onchēstus, Ovidius calls Mēgārēus Onchēstus (Met. x. 605). Adj. Mēgārēus, a, um. Mēgārēus hēros, Hippomēnes (Ov. Met. x. 659).—2. A man in the army of Etēocles, who, from the watch tower, espied the Argives advancing, and warned the Thebans to shut their gates, to prevent the entrance of the enemy into the city (Stat. Th. x. 485).

Mēgas, æ, m. a man of rank in the Trojan army, the father of Pērīmus. Mēgādes, æ, m. Pērīmus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).

Mēgāsthēnes, is, m. an Athenian, who, with Hippocles, conducted a colony from Chāleis, Egripo, to Italy, and built Cūmæ (Vel. Pat. i. 4).

Mēges, etis, m. a warrior in the army of Etēocles, who, with Lýcus, had the command during the night at the siege of Thēba, Theba, after the Argives had lost four of their commanders, and had particular orders to prevent their secret escape by flight (Stat. x. 19).—2. The son of Phylēus and Cōmēnē, sister of Ulysses. He was a native of Dulichium, a man of great bravery, fought under the standard of Ulysses, and killed Pēdēus q. v. Phylides, æ, m. Mēges (Hom. Il. v. 69 &c.).

Mēgālia, æ, f. a native of Opūs, a city of Locris, a district of Greece, mentioned by Hōrātius (Od. l. 27. 11), where he alludes to a prevalent custom among the Romans of that period, which was, if any one of the company asked the name of the sweetheart of an individual present, on being told, he was obliged to drink as many cups as there were letters in her name. Mārtiālis writes an epigram on this subject (l. 72).

Mēgīstānes, um, m. the grandees of Armēnia (Tac. Ann. xv. 27).

Mēgīstē, es, f. an island and town of Lýcia, mentioned by Livius as a harbour (xxxvii. 22).

Mēhērdātes, is, m. son of Vōnōnes, and grandson of Phrātes, was called to the throne of Pārthia in the year 47. From the emperor Claudius he received good advice before he left Rome, where he had lived some time as a hostage. Young and inexperienced, he conducted matters ill, and was made prisoner by Gōtārzes, who cut off his ears, but saved his life (Tac. Ann. xi. 10 seq.).

Mēncārīrē, is, v. Mēncārīri, n. a small town and fort of Mēsōpōtāmia, to which this name was given from the cold springs there (Amm. Mar. xviii. 6 seq.).

Mēla, arum, f. a town of the Cāmpāni, taken by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman consul, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Mēlena, æ, f. an ancient name of Cōrcýra q. v.

Mēlens, arum, f. a village of Attica, in the tribe of Antiōchis, which Stātius calls verdant (Th. xii. 619).

Mēlenis, is, f. the favourite of the poet Mārsus. Perhaps it is a fictitious name, as Mārtiālis joins it with that of Alēxis (vii. 28).

Mēlāmbium, i, n. a place in Scōtūsseus ager, in Thessālia, at which Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, encamped immediately before the battle of Cýnōcéphāles, in 199 B. C., when the Roman commander, T. Quinctius Flāminius, was encamped at Thetidium (Liv. xxxiii. 6). Perhaps the reading ought to be Mēlāmplum, i.e. a temple of Mēlāmpus.

Melampus, ōdis, m. son of Amŷthāon and Idōmēne, daughter of Abas, was eminent for his knowledge of future events, and for his skill in medicine. He offered to Prætus to cure his daughters of madness, on condition that he received the third of his kingdom. Considering the demand immoderate, Prætus refused it, on which account his daughters not only remained longer in a state of derangement, but the other women became infected with the same malady, which induced Prætus to accede to the demand, and to an additional claim, that so much of the kingdom should be given to his brother Bias. On completing the cure, he received one of the daughters in marriage, his brother Bias another, and soon afterwards became the father of Mēgāpēthes. He was one of the Argonauts (Stat. Th. iii. 453). Mēlāmpōdion, i. n. a species of hellebore, so called from Mēlāmpus, with which he cured the daughters of Prætus of madness.—2. Father of Cisseus and Gŷas, was the companion of Hērēclēs, whom he followed into Italy, and settled in Lātium (Virg. Æn. x. 320).

Melampus, ōdos, m. (Blackfoot), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 206).

Melanchetes, is, m. (Blackhair), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 232).

Melanchleui, orum, m. a tribe of the Sarmatians, who had this name from being clothed in black. Their country was to the north of Pālūs Mæotis (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8). Rennel places them towards the sources of Bōrŷsthēnes, the Dniester.

Melancus, eos, m. (Black), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 222).

Melanius, i. m. son of Hicetion, who lived in Percotē, was wounded by Antilochus. Hicetionides, u. m. Melanius (Hom. Il. xv. 546).—2. A noble Trojan, killed by Pitrōelus (Hom. Il. xvi. 695).—3. A Grecian commander (Hom. Il. xix. 240).—4. A man in the Trojan army, who fell by the hand of Tēucer (Hom. Il. viii. 276).

Melanthēus, eos, m. a man guilty of the crime of murder, whose widowed mother only knew the place where he had concealed himself. Adj. Melanthēus, a, um. Melanthēus codex (Ov. Ib. 623).

Melanthias, ōdis, f. a villa at no great distance from Constantinople, belonging to the emperor, hence called Cæsariāna (Amm. Mar. xxxi. 11).

Melanthion, ōnis, m. the husband of Plōtia. Cæleus Melanthion (Mart. x. 67).

Melanthius, i. m. the herdsman of Ulysses, who, with great readiness, supplied the lovers of Pēnelōpē with whatever part of the flock they wanted, hence Pēnelōpē calls him Actor pœoris edendi (Ov. Ep. Her. i. 95). For this disregard of his master's property, Tēlēmāchus put him to death by torture (Hom. Od. xxii. 474 seq.).—2. A man in the Trojan army, killed by Eurŷpylus (Hom. Il. vi. 36).—3. A noble Ithacan, the father of Amphimēdon, one of the suitors of Pēnelōpē (Hom. Od. xxiv. 103).

Melanthō, us, f. a daughter of Dēucālion, who suffered violence from Nēptūnus, in the form of a dolphin, and had by him a son named Dēlphus (Ov. Met. vi. 120).—2. A beautiful young woman, brought up by Pēnelōpē, to whom she proved unfaithful, for which she afterwards suffered death. She was beloved by Eurŷmāchus, appears to have been of low birth, and was the sister of Mēlānthius (Hom. Od. xix. 65 seq.).

Melanthus, i. m. one of the Italian pirates, by whom Bæchus was carried off from Nāxos, Naxia (Ov. Met. iii. 617).—2. A nobleman of Cŷzicus, Chizico, brother of Ares, both of whom Tēlāmon killed (Val. Flacc. iii. 261).—3. A king of Athens, and father of Cōdrus q. v. (Vel. Pat. i. 2).

Melanthus, i. m. a river which flows into Euxinus pōntus, the Black Sea, by a smooth and slow-running current (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 10. 54).

Mēlas, ānis, m. son of Phrŷxus by Chālōpē, daughter of Aētēs, king of Cōlchis, and brother of Phrōntis, Argus, and Cŷtī-sōrus (Val. Flacc. v. 462).

Mēlas, ānis, m. called by the modern Greeks Mauvo-Nero, i. e. the Black Water. Of this name several rivers occur in the writings of the Greeks and Romans. We find one in Sicily, another in Bēotia, sacred to Minērvā (hence Pallādius Mēlas, Stat. Th. vii. 273), which Pīnŷus says made the wool of the sheep that drank of it black, and Cēphŷus issuing from the same lake rendered their wool white; a third in Thrācia, Romania, between Lŷmāchla and Cŷpsēla, now called by the Turks Kara-sou; a fourth bounded Pāmphŷia on the east, now Alara-sou; and a fifth which had its source in Cāpādōcia, and running eastward fell into the Euphrātes, to which the Turks likewise gave the name of Kara-sou. It joins the Mural in the plain of Mossh. There was a river of Lŷdia, which some call Mēlas, but Pīnŷus and Strābo, Mēles. This last has generally been thought the one mentioned by Ovidius (Met. ii. 247); although several critics have maintained that the one in Romania must have been the one intended by the poet; others Alara-sou; and not a few Kara-sou, one of the branches of the Euphrātes. The adjective seems to point to the Thracian or the Lydian river rather than to the other two. See Megdonia.

Mēlas sinus, Mēlānis sinūs, m. a bay opposite to Chērsōnēsus Thrācia (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Mēldi, orum, m. a people of Gālŷia Belgica, on the coast to the N. of the Morini. To them Cæsar alludes. But of this name was another tribe, whose country was included between the rivers Mātrōna, the Marne, and Sēquāna, the Seine. Mēldis, Meldis, Meaus, was their capital. The modern town is of some note, and contains 6,000 inhabitants.

Mēlēger, v. m. son of Cēneus and Althæa, who distinguished himself at the hunt of Cālŷdon by killing the wild boar. To Atālāntis, for having first wounded that animal, he gave the skin, of which his maternal uncles attempted to deprive her, and Mēlēger, in revenge, put them to death. His mother, from resentment at the death of her brothers, threw into the fire a piece of wood on which his life depended, and he instantly expired (Hŷg. 174). He was one of the Argonauts, and called by Valērius Flāccus, Cenides, from his father (iii. 690), and Parthōnides from his grandfather (iii. 705). Mēlēgrides, um (Sing. Mēlēgris, idis), f. birds into which all the sisters of Mēlēger except Gōrgē and Dēlānira, were transformed from grief at his death (Hŷg. 174). Adj. Mēlēgrus, a, um. Mēlēgrus Pleuron (Stat. Th. iv. 103).—2. A general of Alexander the Great. After the death of that conqueror, he and Përdiccas were invested with supreme power, but a mutual hatred arose between them, and Përdiccas put him to death (Just. xiii. 2—4. Curt. x. 9).

Mēles, ētis, f. Molis, a town which M. Claudius Marc'ellus, consul, took from the Sānnites in 212 B. C., in which he made three thousand of Hannibal's soldiers prisoners, and obtained a considerable quantity of booty, two hundred and forty thousand mōdii of wheat, and one hundred and ten thousand mōdii of barley (Liv. xxvii. 1). Perhaps this is the same as Mēle mentioned by Livius (xxiv. 20).

Mēles, ētis, m. a very beautiful river of Iōniā, which flows by Smýrna. Hōmērus, according to some authors, was born on the banks of this stream. Mēles potus tibi verendo fonte, thou hast drunk of Mēles flowing from a venerable spring, i. e. whose waters are rendered venerable from Hōmērus being born on its banks, and who is hence called Mēlestigēnes (Stat. Syl. iii. 3. 61). Adj. Mēlēcēs, a, um. Mēlēcēa charta, the poems of Homer (Tib. iv. 1. 200).—2. Molise, a town of Sānnitum.

Mēlēas, ēs, m. a native of Ægīna, celebrated by Pindārus (Ol. viii. 71 seq.).

Mēlēsēs, um, m. a Spanish nation, in whose country Oringis was situated (Liv. xxviii. 3).

Mēlia, æ, f. a daughter of Océānus, carried off by Apōllo by whom she had Tēnārus and Ismēnius. There are other fabulous characters of this name.

Mēlibea, æ, f. wife of Phlōctētes, whom Stāsius describes, regretting that she had been left in Greece and had not accompanied her husband to the Trojan war (Syl. iii. 5. 48).

Mēlibea, æ, f. a maritime town of Thessaly, on Thērmāleus sinus, the Gulf of Salōnica, to the south of Ossa, Kissavo, where that mountain stretches out into Thēssālīa, Thessaly. Its position is advantageous for commanding Dēmētrīas. It was taken and plundered by Cæ. Octāvius in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 46). Adj. Mēlibēus, a, um.

Mēlibēus dūx, Phlōctētes (Virg. Æn. iii. 401). Mēlibea pūrpūra, purple dyed at Mēlibea, from the shells which produced that colour being found in its vicinity (Virg. Æn. v. 251); probably taken from Lūcrētius (ii. 499).—2. An island at the mouth of Orōntēs, the El-asi; to which some refer Mēlibea pūrpūra (Virg. Æn. v. 251), which the passage in Lūcrētius (ii. 499) sufficiently disproves.

Mēlibēus, i, m. the name of a shepherd, under whose character Virgilias is supposed to depict the situation of the unhappy natives about Crēmōna and Māntua, who were driven from their paternal possessions to make room for the veterans of Augustus. His character is delineated with great tenderness and interest, and the effect is heightened by his situation being contrasted with that of his more fortunate friend, Tityrus (Virg. B. i.).

Mēlicēta, æ, m. a son of Athāmas, king of Thēba, Thēba, and Inō. On Athāmas becoming mad and killing Lēarchus, from his supposing Inō a lioness, and her sons whelps, to escape being murdered, she fled with Mēlicēta, and threw herself and him into the sea. Neptūnus turned both into sea deities. The Greeks called him Pālēmōn, and the Latins, Pōrtūnus. The former gave to Inō the name of Lēucōthōēs, and the latter that of Mātūta. But some maintain, that Mēlicēta was, after he had been drowned, brought ashore by a dolphin, that Sisypheus buried him near the town of Crēmōn, Canetto or Canetto, and that at a future period, an altar was erected on his grave. It is added, that the Isthmian games were instituted in honour of Mēlicēta. These games were called Isthmian, from being celebrated on the Isthmus of Cōrinthus, Cōrinth, at port Schēnūs, Palao-Castro. Inōus Mēlicētes, Mēlicētes, son of Inō (Virg. G. i. 437).

Mēlicē, es, f. a native of Bithynia, by whom Neptūnus had a son named Amēcus, king of the Bēbrēces. According to Callimachus, she was a daughter of Océānus (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 25). Valērius Flaccus has introduced this nymph in his poem on the Argonautic expedition (iv. 119).

Mēli, orum, m. a Grecian nation, descendants from the Lacedæmonians (Herod. viii. 46).

Mēlissa, æ, f. the first priestess of Cēres, and held in such high esteem, that all the priestesses in future were called by her name (Pin. Pyth. iv. 106).

C. Mēlissus, C. Mēlissi, m. a native of Spōletum, Spoleto, a town of the Umbri in Italy, was freeborn, but exposed when an infant, in consequence of the disagreement of his parents. From the person who brought him up he received an excellent education, of which his great abilities and industry enabled him to reap the full advantage. He distinguished himself particularly as a grammarian, on which account his benefactor presented him to the emperor Augustus, who treated him like a friend, and therefore he preferred remaining as a slave to claiming the rank to which he was entitled by birth, for his mother acknowledged him as her son. The emperor soon granted Mēlissus his liberty, and appointed him to arrange his library in the portico of Octāvia. In his sixtieth year, this eminent grammarian began to write short humorous pieces, of which he finished a hundred and fifty, and afterwards added others of a different kind. He composed a new kind of comedy, which he called Trābēata (fabula). To his comic productions Ovidius alludes (Ep. Pont. iv. 16. 30).

Mēlita, æ, e. Mēlitē, es, f. Malta, an island in the Mediterranean, to the south of Sicilia, Sicily. It is of an oval form, about twenty miles in length, and twelve in breadth, very rocky, and does not yield more corn annually than serves the inhabitants for six months, although Ovidius calls it fertile (Fast. ii. 507). Its first inhabitants, mentioned in history, were the Phœci, who yielded to the Phœnicians, and they in their turn to the Greeks. In 220 B. C., it was in the possession of the Carthaginians, when Tib. Sēmprōnius Lōngus, the Roman consul, took it, and, on returning to Lilybæum, Cape Bæa, sold all the prisoners for slaves, with the exception of the noblemen (Liv. xxi. 51). On the fall of the Roman empire, it came under the dominion of the Goths, who were expelled by the Saracens whom the Normans conquered, from which time it continued subject to the same monarch with Sicily, till Charles V. gave it to the knights of St. John at Jerusalem. During the last war, the French made themselves master of Malta, but were defeated and expelled by the British, who retain possession of it. Bochartus rejects the derivation of MELITE from mel, honey, and refers it to a Hebrew or Phœnician word signifying refuge, escape; because it had an excellent harbour. Lingvæ Melitæ (Sil. Ital. xiv. 251). Adj. Melitensis, is, e, et, Melitæus, a, um. Melitensis cœnis, supposed to have been made of cotton (Cic. Ver. ii. 72). Melitæi catelli (Strab. 406). Here the geographer confounds the MELITÆ in the Mediterranean, with the island of that name in the Gulf of Venice (Plin. i. 387).—2. An island in Hædræticum Mære, the Gulf of Venice, now called Meleda, which, according to Plinius, was famous for a breed of dogs (i. 387). Strabo refers this kind of dog to Malta (400). It has four villages, and the soil is fertile.—3. A town of Attica, not far from Orôpus, Ropo (Plin. i. 424).—4. Another town, near Euphrates, the El-Frat, said to have been built by Sémirâmîs. It was the capital of one of the districts of Arménia Minor, called from it Meliténæ (Plin. l. 652).

MELITÆ, es, f. one of the daughters of Nereus and Dôris (Virg. Æn. v. 825).—2. One of the Phœnicians, who was the mother of Hylus by Hércules. In the opinion of some authors, she gave her name to MELITÆ, Malta. This seems without foundation, for Hylus was not king of Malta but Meleda (Boch.).

MELITÉNÆ, es, f. Malaria, or, Malathia, the metropolis of Arménia Minor, stood between the rivers Euphrates and Mælas. At first it appears to have been a Roman camp, or fort, and grew into a city under the emperor Trajānus (Tac. Ann. xv. 26).

MELLA, æ, v. Mela, æ, m. the Mela, a river which formerly washed Brixia, Brescia, but is now at a considerable distance from that town (Virg. G. iv. 278). Fluvius Mela, yellow, i. e. whitish, Mela. It appears to be a slow-running stream (Cat. lxxvii. 33).

MELIÛNUM, i, n. Melun, a town of the Sênones, on an island in Sequāna, the Seine, about 28 miles S. E. of Paris (Cæs. B. G. vii. 58).

MELON, ônîs, m. the interpreter of Darius, who fell into the hands of Alexander the Great in 330 B. C. (Curt. v. 13).

MÉLOS, i, f. an island in the Cretan sea. Adj. Meliæus, a, um. Melica græus (Gel. vii. 16).

MELÔTIS, lôis, f. a tract of land in Triphylia (Liv. xxxii. 13). The reading here is very doubtful, and neither Melôtis, nor the mountain Lingos, is mentioned by any other author. The situation of both, if the reading be accurate, must have been on the confines of Epirus, Thessalia, and Mæcedônia.

MELPOMÉNÆ, es, f. the Muse who presided over tragedy (Auson. ecclxvii. 2).

MEMACENT, orum, m. a people mentioned by Curtius; but by no other writer (vii. 6).

MÉMNIUS, et, Mémniānus, a, um. Mémnia gens, a plebeian clan at Rome, of considerable distinction; who traced their pedigree from Mnêsthêus, one of the companions of Æneas (Virg. Æn. v. 117).

MÉMNIUS PÔLLIO, Mémni Pôllionis, m. consul elect in the year 49, when, at the request of Agrippina, he proposed, in the senate, that the Fathers should solicit the emperor's consent to a marriage between L.

Dômîtius Abênôthûrus, afterwards the emperor, commonly called Nêro, and Ortivia (Tac. Ann. xii. 9).

MÉMNIUS RÊGÛLUS, Mémni Rêgûli, æ. a noble Roman, illustrious for his frankness, influence, and respectability. Nêro, in a fit of sickness, paid a high compliment to the virtues of Mémnius. His courtiers, in gross adulation, declared that his death would be the destruction of the empire. Nêro replied that Mémnius Rêgûlus would be the support of the state. In retirement, Mémnius found security from danger, and, notwithstanding his moral worth, died a natural death, in the year 61 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 46).

C. Mémnius, C. Mémni, m. son of C. Mémnius, a Roman of considerable distinction, who held the different offices of quaestor, tribune of the people, and praetor. He warmly embraced the interests of the popular party, and hated the nobility for their overbearance in political matters. Awed and open as the bribery of Jûgûrtha was, he would have escaped with impunity, had not Mémnius convinced the people, that a faction had undertaken to conceal or palliate his crimes, and to protect him from justice. In opposition to the intrigues both of Jûgûrtha and the senate, he prevailed on the people to send the praetor, L. Cæsius, to bring Jûgûrtha to Rome, which he accordingly did. In his speeches to the people, and in his account of Jûgûrtha's conduct, which he delineated before the senate, we discover a strong mind, biassed no doubt to the interest of the people, but still acting with candour, judgment, and an immediate regard to the dignity of the state. He lost his life in a canvass for the consulship (102 B. C.), having been murdered by L. Apûleius Sâtûrniûs, a tribune of the people, from an apprehension that he would oppose him in his evil actions (Liv. Ep. 69). The horrible riots which then took place in Rome, and in which many virtuous and eminent men were killed, prove that the magistrates had no authority, and that the citizens regarded no law, human or divine. Mémnius fell under repeated strokes by the bludgeons of hired assassins, in the very midst of the assembly! From Sallustius, he appears to have been an excellent speaker, and yet Cicero does not rank him high amongst illustrious orators. In his numerous accusations, he generally succeeded in procuring sentence against the impeached, perhaps from excelling in violent invective and cutting severity, rather than in force of argument, elegance of language, or gracefulness of delivery (Sal. Jug. 27–34).—2. A Roman poet and orator, mentioned by Plinius in his epistles, who wrote with great severity, and to this bitterness he appears, from Ovidius, to have added gross indelicacy (Trist. ii. 433). He held the offices of tribune and praetor, under the latter denomination commanded the province of Bithynia.—3. After being on an embassy to the Ætolis, was elected praetor a second time, and obtained the government of Sicily in 174 B. C. (Liv. xli. 25 seq.).—4. Son of L. Mémnius, was distinguished for his knowledge in Greek literature, the acuteness which he discovered in his speeches, and for his disregard for Roman learning. In the war against Sêrtôrîus, he served as a quaestor, under Cn. Pômpeius, and probably obtained afterwards higher rank than that already-mentioned. His vices as a man, and his unprincipledness as a politician, debased his character, and conviction of bribery forced him into banishment. He lived at Athens, and history does not record, whether his friend Curius had interest enough to procure a repeal of his sentence. Adj. Mēmniānus, a, um. Mēmniāna praeda (Cic. Att. v. 1).

C. Mēmnius Gēmellus, C. Mēmli Gēmelli, m. son of L. Mēmnius, a man of vicious habits, whom Cātullus holds up to contempt (xxviii. 9). To him Lūcrētius is generally supposed to dedicate his poem, "De rerum naturā." Mēmniādes, a, m. a patronymic of Mēmnius, from his father, L. Mēmnius (Lucr. i. 27). Adj. Mēmniānus, a, um.

C. Mēmnius Rēgulus, C. Mēmli Rēguli, m. a noble Roman, who had the command of the army in Syria, and married Lōllia Paullina q. v., who was afterwards the wife of the emperor Cālīgūla (Tac. Ann. xii. 22).—2. Obtained the office of consul with C. Virginius Rūfus in the year 64 (Tac. Ann. xv. 23).

Mēmnon, ōnis, m. son of Tithōnus and Aurōra, and brother of Emāthion. From Tithōnus being the brother of Priāmus, Mēmnon naturally embraced the interests of the Trojans, to whose assistance he brought ten thousand men, from Sūsa in Pērsia, says Pausānias (x. 31). In ancient history he is called king of Æthiōpia. To his name Virgilius adds the adjective Niger, by which he probably meant swarthy, for the Asiatics are not black. Cātullus calls him Æthiōps. A colossal statue of black marble, in the form of a man sitting, was erected in the temple of Sērāpis at Thēbes, in Egypt, in honour of Mēmnon. When struck by the rays of the rising sun, it emitted a sound resembling that of a burp, and, if tradition may be credited, the sound continued to be heard in the fourth century of the Christian era. To add to the wonder, in the morning the music was cheerful, and in the evening mournful. Strābo bears personal evidence to the truth of the fact, which he declares himself unable to explain. Juvēnālīs seems to have considered this music magical (Sat. xv. 5). The valour and intrepidity of Mēmnon entitled him to high rank, as a soldier, during the Trojan war. Antilōchus, son of Nēstor, fell by his hand in single combat. The aged king, transported with grief at his son's death, challenged Mēmnon, who declined accepting it, not from fear, but from respect to the great age, and venerable character of the bereaved father. Again he entered the lists in single combat, which proved fatal to him, for he fell by the more powerful arm of Achilles, of whose life this was considered the most valiant action, except that of vanquishing Hēctor. Mēmniōides, um (Sing. Mēmniōis, ōdis), f. birds which were said to spring from the funeral pile of Mēmnon, at the request of Aurōra, who begged Jūpiter to grant him some mark of distinction; in mitigation of her maternal grief, he complied with her wish. Ancient authors asserted, that these birds flew annually from Æthiōpia to Ilīum, and fought at the tomb of Mēmnon, and that every fifth year they did the same around his palace in Æthiōpia. Alma pārēns Mēmniōis, Aurōra (Mart. viii. 21). Adj.

Mēmniōnus, a, um. Mēmniōnia dōmus, the palace of Mēmnon (Prop. i. 6. 4). Mēmnon, a tragedy of this name, written in an inflated and turgid style by Alpinus. Mēmnon's death by Achilles, forms the subject of this miserable piece of dramatic composition, on which account Hōrātius says, Alpinus murdered Mēmnon (Sat. i. 10. 36).—2. A native of Pellēnē, one of the Dāmlūrgi q. v., who adhered to the interest of Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, but, being threatened with death by his father, he withdrew from that prince, and agreed to an alliance with the Romans in 200 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 22).—3. A native of Rhōdus, whom Alexander the Great esteemed for his activity and knowledge of war. He died when besieging Mitylēnē. His achievements have been related by Diōdōrus and Arrīanus (Curt. iii. 1. Diod. Sic. xvii. 7 seq. Arrian. ii. 1 seq.).

Mēmōr, ōris, m. a tragic poet, highly commended by Mārtiālis. His brother Tūrnus betook himself to the writing of satire, not to appear his rival (Mart. xi. 10 seq.).

Mēmphis, is, f. Moushee a Dashou, a very ancient and celebrated city of Egypt, built by Mēnes, which stood on the west bank of Nilus, the Nile, near the pyramids, about fifteen miles above the Delta. Its position has been much disputed, and Clarke says, that its site is now partly occupied by two villages, Metrahenny and Mohannan. Diōdōrus Siculus states, it was a hundred and fifty stadia in circumference; Strābo informs us that it contained a number of temples, among which was that of Apis or Osiris, and that, in point of rank, Alēxandria alone surpassed it. The boats at Mēmphis were formed of pāpȳrus (Luc. Phar. iv. 136). Inh. Mēmphitē, arum (Sing. Mēmphites, e), m. Mēmphitis, ōdis, f. of Mēmphis, with relation to a female, or noun feminine. Mēmphitis tellūs, Egypt (Mart. xiv. 150). Mēmphitides pūelle. Mēmphitis vāca, an Egyptian cow, i. e. Isis (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 381). Adj. Mēmphiticus, a, um, of Mēmphis, Egyptian. Mēmphitica tēpla, Egyptian temples (Mart. ii. 14).

Mēne, arum, v. Mēnena, e, f. Meneo, or Minio, a town of Sicilia, Sicily, to the west of Sȳracūsae, Saragossa. Inh. Mēnei, orum (Sing. Mēneus, i), m. Adj. Mēneus, a, um. Mēnei viri (Sil. Ital. xiv. 266).

Mēnēas, e, m. a man in the army of Etēocles, who fought on foot, and was killed by Amphitrāus, priest of Apōllo; whilst that god acted as his charioteer (Stat. Th. vii. 755). Perhaps Mēnēus, and not Mēnēas, is the true reading.

Mēnēas, a, m. the name of a swineherd, according to Heynē. The German critic infers his office from the kind of employment, De hībērnā glāndē, i. e. colligēdā, gathering acorns, which was done in winter. Acorns, or chestnuts, form a considerable part of the food of swine, in Italy, during the winter months (Virg. B. x. 20).—2. A commander of Lacedemonian forces, in the Theban war, killed by Hȳpsēus (Stat. Th. viii. 431).

Mēnēus, ōis, m. a man, killed at the bloody nuptials of Pērsēus, who was one of his own party (Ov. Met. v. 128).—2. A centaur, who fled from the battle with the Lapithae, at the marriage of Pirithōus. (Ov. Met. xii. 306).

Mēnēlippē, v. Mēlānippē, es, f. daughter of Dēsmōntes, or of Æolus, according to some poets, was a woman of great beauty. By Nēptūnus she had twin sons, which, when her father knew, he deprived her of sight, shut her up in a fort, ordered very little meat and drink to be given her, and her children to be exposed to wild beasts. The infants, having been suckled for some time by a cow, fell in the way of herdsmen, who brought them up, and afterwards gave them to Thēanō, wife of Mētāpōntus, king of Icāria, who had threatened to dismiss her unless she had children. With the assistance of the shepherds, she imposed the sons of Mēnālippē on Mētāpōntus, as her own; but having afterwards born twins to her husband, on their having grown up, instructed them to kill these supposititious children, when hunting, that her own sons might succeed to the crown. Beōtus and Æolus, the children of Mēnālippē, assisted by their father, Nēptūnus, overcame the sons of Mētāpōntus, and Thēanō, on hearing of their death, killed herself. Nēptūnus afterwards informed his sons of their true birth, and of their mother being in confinement, on which they slew Dēsmōntes, and set her at liberty. Mētāpōntus then married Mēnālippē, to whom Nēptūnus had restored her sight, and adopted her sons, who built Beōtia and Æolia, on Prōpōntis, and called them by their own names.—2. A sister of Antīōpē, queen of the Amazons, taken prisoner by Hērēcles, who restored her, and, in return, received the arms of the queen (Just. ii. 4). Mēnālippus, i. m. youngest son of Asīacus, who killed Tydeus, in the Theban war, but was mortally wounded by that gallant warrior, who disgraced his character by gnawing the head of his enemy, when he was himself in the very pangs of death (Stat. Th. viii. 718 seq.).

Mēnānder, v. Mēnāndrus, drī, m. an Athenian, who excelled as a writer of the new comedy. Quintiliānus has drawn his character in the following words: "Mēnānder, in my opinion, if carefully read, may be sufficient for procuring all the advantages proposed by my rules. He has delineated the picture of human life most accurately, his invention is very fruitful, his eloquence very powerful, his character, passions, and manners are most proper and natural." After praising him as an orator, the critic adds, "Mēnānder has surpassed all writers in comedy, and eclipsed them by the splendour of his celebrity" (x. l. 69 seq.). None of his works, except a few fragments, now remain (Manil. v. 470). Adj. Mēnāndrēus, a, um.

Mēnāndrēa Thāis (Prop. ii. 6. 3).—2. An officer under Alexander the Great, to whose lot the kingdom of Lydāia fell, on the death of that monarch (Just. xiii. 4).

Mēnāpiā, v. f. a district of Gāllia Bēlgica, of which Cārausius, who usurped the government of Britānia, about the year 286, was a native (Aur. Vic. Cres. 39). Inh. Mēnāpīi, orum, m. a people of Gāllia Bēlgica, whose territory was bounded on the N. by Mōsa, the Meuse. The Tōxāndri were their neighbours on the south (Ces. B. G. ii. 4 seq.). The gammons of the Mēnāpīi were highly valued in ancient times (Mart. xiii. 54).

Mēnāpīa, v. f. a town of Bactria, which Pūblēmus calls Mēnāpiā (Amm. Mar. xlii. 6).

Mēnāpiā, is, m. the governor of Hyrēnia, after the death of Dārius, in 330 B. C. (Curt. vi. 4).

Mēnas, v, m. a freedman of Cn. Pōmpeius, who betrayed the fleet of Sēxtus Pōmpeius to Augūstus. He was the only freedman whom Augūstus admitted to his table at supper, and not before he had raised him to the rank of the freeborn (Suet. Ang. 74).

Mēndēs, ētis (Steph.), f. Ashmun-Tanah, a city of Egypt, on one of the mouths of Nilus, the Nile, which, from it, was called Ostium Mēndēsium, v. Mēndēsium, Delē, or, Pescheira, twenty-one miles east of Damietta. Inh. Mēndēsīi, orum (Sing. Mēndēsus i), m. worshipped Pan and a goat. Adj. Mēndēsus, et, Mēndēsicus, a, um.

Mēndis, is, f. a maritime village of Mācēdōnia, in Pallēnē, which the combined fleet, under Attalus, king of Asia, reached, in 92 B. C., as they advanced against Cāssāndria (Liv. xxxi. 45).

Mēnēclides, is, m. a Theban, a man of considerable abilities as a speaker, who detracted from the merits of Epāmīnōndas, and opposed him in the government of the state (Cor. Nep. Epam. 5).

Mēnēcrātes, is, m. a native of Nēapōlis, Naples, was a man of great wealth and high rank. Stātius courted his friendship, and addressed to him a poem on the birth of his third child (Syl. iv. 8).—2. An officer of Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlii. 24).

—3. A freedman of Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus, after whose death he held a naval commission under his son, Sēxtus Pōmpeius, when he and Mēnas acted like pirates (Vel. Pat. ii. 73).—4. A harper, on whom the emperor Nēro bestowed the hereditary estates and houses of men whose merits had entitled them to the honour of a triumph (Suet. Ner. 30).

Mēnēdēmus, i, m. a commander under Alexander the Great (Curt. vii. 6 seq.).—2. The chief man of Mācēdōnia, who came as ambassador to Cesar, and assured him of the assistance of his countrymen (Ces. B. C. iii. 34).

Mēnēlāis, īdis, f. a town of Dōlōpia, which Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, maintained belonged to him, and the Thēssālī had taken by force of arms, in 187 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 26).

Mēnēlāius, i, m. a mountain, very near Sparta, at the bottom of which T. Quinctius Flāminius, the Roman commander, drew up his forces, offering battle to Nābis, king of the Lacedemonians, in 197 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 28).

Mēnēlāus, i, m. the younger brother of Agāmēmnon, was, according to Hōmērus, the son of Atrēus. Apollōdōrus and others relate, that both Agāmēmnon and Mēnēlāus were the sons of Pisthēnes and Aērōpē, daughter of Cātēus, whose father was Minos, king of Crētē, Candia. Some make Pisthēnes a son, others a brother, and others a nephew of Atrēus. It is sufficient to observe, that the Latin poets have, in general, followed Hōmērus. In a few instances only, has the opinion of Apollōdōrus been adopted. On reaching manhood, Mēnēlāus appeared at the court of Sparta, Mistra, among the suitors of Helēna; and his personal accomplishments gained the affections of that unrivalled beauty. Tyndārus resigned to them his kingdom, and sought for his declining years, in the walks of private life, that ease and tranquillity, which the splendours of royalty denied. The happiness of the newly-wedded pair was not of long continuance. In the third year after their marriage, Paris q. r. arrived at Sparta, with a dazzling retinue, seduced the queen, and carried her to his father's palace. Ménélaus did not tamely submit to this indignity, but instantly reminded the princes of Greece of their oath to protect his wife. They all recognised their solemn promise, and the whole country was quickly in arms. Before the commencement of hostilities, Ulysses and he were sent to Troy, to demand the restoration of Hélène, and, in the event of a refusal, to threaten the united vengeance of Greece. Their mission failed of success, and war was immediately proclaimed. After a siege of ten years, the Greeks obtained possession of the city, which they levelled with the ground. Hélène, according to Hómérus, returned with her husband to Sparta; Mistra, where they spent the remainder of life in happiness and peace. But this is a point on which the writers of antiquity are not agreed. His character in the Iliad is that of an active and brave soldier. Minor Atrides, Ménélaus. Atrides, without an adjective expressive of age, generally refers to Agamémnon, but, sometimes, to Ménélaus (Ov. Met. xv. 803). Fratrisque, i. e. Ménélai (Ov. Met. xiii. 191). Portus Ménélai, the harbour of Ménélaus, which Strabo places above Páratónium (57). Adj. Ménélaeus, v. Ménélaüs, a, um. Ménélaeus thálamus (Prop. ii. 15. 14).—2. Father of Amýntas II., king of Mácédónia, who ascended the throne in 391 B. C., killed by his brother Philippos (Just. vii. 4). Other authors call him Philippos.—3. A son of Amýntas II., king of Mácédónia, and Gýgae (Just. vii. 4).—4. The brother of Ptolémæus Lágus (Just. xv. 2).

Ménénius, a, um. Ménénia gēns, the clan of the Ménéni.

Ménénius, i, m. the husband of Rūfa of Bōnōia, Bologna (Catul. lix. 2).

Agrippa Ménénius, Agrippæ Ménéni, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Lānātus), the first distinguished character of the Ménéni, was consul at Rome, with P. Pōstūmīus, in 503 B. C. Having been deputed to treat with the commons, who had retired to mōns Sacer, he related the fable which Līvius has recorded, and which had the effect of pacifying them. He died in 493 B. C., equally beloved by patricians and plebeians, in so great poverty, that he was buried at the charge of the commons, who contributed a sextan each to defray his funeral expenses (Liv. ii. 16—33).—2. A commissioner for conducting the colony to Ardea (Liv. iv. 14).

Agrippa Ménénius Lānātus, Agrippæ Ménéni Lānāti, m. a noble Roman, who, after being consul in 438 B. C., was twice chosen a military tribune (Liv. iv. 13—47).

C. Ménénius, C. Ménéni, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Lānātus) appointed consul, at Rome, with P. Sēstius Cāpitōlinus, in 452 B. C. (Liv. iii. 32).

L. Ménénius, L. Ménéni, m. elected a military tribune, with consular authority, at Rome, and held the same office in 379 B. C. (Liv. vi. 5—27).

L. Ménénius Lānātus, L. Ménéni Lānāti, m. elected consul, at Rome, with Prōcūlus Gōgānīus Mácērtius, in 439 B. C. During their consulship, a dreadful famine cut off a number of the people, and many of the commons, preferring death to a miserable existence dragged out in hunger, threw themselves into the Tevere, and perished (Liv. iv. 12).

T. Ménénius, T. Ménéni, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Lānātus), elected consul at Rome, in 477 B. C., with C. Hōrātius. Ménénius commanded against the Etrūsci, who defeated him, took possession of Jāniculum, Monte Gianicolo, and would have besieged Rome, had not C. Hōrātius come to his assistance. For the loss of the fort of Crémēra, the tribunes of the people accused him next year, and notwithstanding the opposition of the patricians, obtained sentence against him, by which he was condemned to pay two thousand asses. Grief for this trial and its result made a deep impression on his mind, and brought on a disease which put an end to his life in the same year (Liv. ii. 51, 52).

Mēnēphites, is, m. son of Ptolémæus Phýscōn, whom his father caused to be killed before his eyes, and cut off his head, hands, and feet, which he sent as a present to his mother on his birthday (Val. Max. ix. 2).

Mēnēphron, ōis, m. an Arcadian, guilty of infamous crimes, mentioned by Hýginus (253), and by Ovidius (Met. vii. 386). The former author writes Mēnēphras.

Mēnēptōlémus, i, m. a Grecian, son of of Iphiclus (Hom. II. xiii. 698).

Mēnes, ētis, m. was appointed governor of Cilicia, by Alexander the Great, in 331 B. C. (Curt. v. 1).

Mēnes, is, m. the first king of Egypt, and founder of Mēmphis (Herod. ii. 4, 99).

Mēnēstas, as, m. a native of Epirus, whom the consul M. Acilius Glābrius demanded to be given up to him, in 193 B. C. It does not appear that this request was complied with (Liv. xxxvi. 28 seq.).

Mēnēsthes, is, m. a brave Greek, killed by Hēctor (Hom. II. v. 609).

Mēnēsthēus, ēos, m. a Trojan, son of Clytius, and brother of Aemon, who were natives of Lyrnēssus. Some editions of Virgil read Mnēsthēus, but improperly (Æn. x. 129).—2. A man of noble ancestry, celebrated by Stātilius for his skill and dexterity displayed in the games performed in honour of Archē-mōrus (Th. vi. 661 seq.).—3. An Athenian, son of Iphicrates, and a daughter of Cōtys, king of Thrācia, and son-in-law of Timōsthēus. To recover what they had lost in the Archipelago, the Athenians appointed him prætor, and gave him his father and father-in-law as counsellors, both men distinguished by their wisdom and experience. At Sāmos, he discovered an inconsiderate rashness, in which his two advisers did not follow him, and, after losing a number of ships, necessity compelled him to steer back to the place from which he had parted with them. To justify this improper action, he wrote to the government of Athens that he would easily have taken Sāmos, had Iphicrates and Timōsthēus not deserted him. On this unfounded charge, the fickle and capricious republicans brought them to trial for their lives, when Iphicrates was acquitted, and Timōsthēus condemned to pay a fine of a hundred talents (Cor. Nep. Iphic. 3, and Timoth. 3).—4. Son of Pētēus, commanded the Athenians in the Grecian army against Troy, and excelled in military knowledge. His squadron consisted of fifty ships (Hom. II. ii. 552 seq.).

Ménesthius, i. m. son of Aréthōus and Philomédusa, killed by Paris (Hom. II. vii. 9).—2. Son of the river Spérchius and Pólydōra, commanded the fourth division of the troops of Achilles (Hom. II. xvi. 173).

Menidas, x. m. an officer under Alexander the Great (Curt. iv. 12 seq.).

Méuinx, ingis. f. afterwards Gırba, now Zerbi, or Gerbi, an island in Syrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabez. This island was also called Lōtōphāgētis. Plinius makes its length twenty-five miles, and its breadth twenty-two. It had a cognominal town on the side next Africa (Plin. l. 546). According to Livius, the Roman consul Cn. Sērvilius Gēminus ravaged it, in 219 B. C., and Solinus states, that C. Mārius concealed himself on it during his expulsion from Italy. Nēritia Mēnina (Sil. Ital. iii. 318).

Mēnippus, i. m. a general of Philippos, king of Mācēdōnia. To him and Pōlyphāntas that monarch gave the command of a considerable force, to aid his allies when he left the Achaean war and returned to his own kingdom, in 210 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 32 seq.).—2. An ambassador sent by Antiochus, king of Syria, to the Roman senate, in 195 B. C. In his speech before that assembly, he discovered considerable abilities; but in his statements to the Aetoli he did not confine himself to truth. With three thousand foot, and two hundred horse of that nation, he took Mállea and Cyrítēē, and ravaged the territory of Trípōlis, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiv. 57 seq.).—3. A Macedonian, whom Antiochus, king of Syria, sent with Alexander, an Acaeanian, to lead the army from Charōnēa to Stratum, in Aetolia, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 11).—4. A Cynic philosopher, a native of Phenicia, was born a slave. Having purchased his freedom, he became a usurer, and, from his love of money, so niggardly that he was exposed to continual insult and reproach. Unable to bear the contempt of the community, he destroyed himself. It is said that he wrote thirteen books of satires, of which scarcely a fragment has descended to modern times. Adj. Mēnippēus, a. um. Mēnippēa sātīra (Gel. i. 17).

Mēnnis, is. f. a town of Assyria, which stood near the bituminous fountain, from which the Babylonians cemented the walls of the city (Curt. v. 1).

Mēnnius, i. m. prefect of the Roman army, stationed among the Chauci, who checked a commotion among the troops by his personal bravery, in the year 14. He put two of the ringleaders to death, an act of severity, not legal, says Tacitus, but justified by necessity (Ann. i. 38).

Mēnnius Rūfīnus, Mēnni Rūfīni. m. commanded the garrison at Atria, where he put Bassus in prison, in the year 69 (Tac. Hist. iii. 12).

Mēnō, ōnis. m. a native of Antigōnēa, a commander under Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xlv. 58).

Mēneceus, ēos. m. son of Crēon, ascended the throne of Thēbie, Thēba, to the great injury of the state. In the Theban war, on hearing the groans of the foppish warrior Atys, he roused his countrymen in a short, forcible, and animated speech to take up arms.

He afterwards heard that Tirēstias had prophesied, that his death would be the safety of the city, on which, according to Apollōdōrus, he killed himself before the gates. The account of Hyginus differs from that of Apollōdōrus, and Stāsius states, that he mounted the walls, uttered a solemn prayer, and, having sprinkled the battlements with his own blood, threw himself down amidst the troops of the enemy, and in this manner offered himself a victim for the safety of his country (Th. x. 750 seq.). Cicero seems to have had the same opinion of his conduct (Tusc. i. 48).

Adj. Mēneceus, a. um. Mēneceus cingit, the blood of Mēneceus (Stat. Th. x. 840).

Mēnetes, x. m. a companion of Eneās, who was the steersman of Gyas, in the ship Chimera. He was of an advanced age, and, on that account, less active, and too cautious. In the naval contest, he was thrown overboard by Gyas, in consequence of his not steering in the direction pointed out to him, and by which means the ship behind passed them. On rising to the surface, he, with some difficulty, crept to a rock, on which he sat, and was subject of derision to the Trojans, both at his fall and at his vomiting the salt water (Virg. Aen. v. 161 seq.).—2. An Arcadian fisherman, supposed to have come with Evānder into Italy. He went to the assistance of Eneās, and was killed by Turnus (Virg. Aen. xii. 517).—3. A Lycian of low birth, whom Achilles transfixed with a spear (Ov. Met. xii. 116—127).—4. A man killed by Tydeus as he was returning from Thēba, Thēba, to Argos. Etēocles, displeased with the message which Tydeus brought from the court of Adrāstus, and also with his manner of delivering it, ordered fifty men to lie in wait at some distance from Thēba, and to deprive him of life. Mēnetes formed one of the party, fled from Tydeus, and when overtaken, begged for life, which the conqueror refused, and instantly transfixed him with a spear (Stat. Th. ii. 644).—5. An Argive, who accompanied Argia and the other matrons of Argos, who had gone after their war to Thēba, Thēba, to bury their husbands during the night (Stat. Th. xii. 245 seq.).

Mēnetius, i. m. son of Actor and Eginia, and father of Pātrocclus. According to Vālerius Flāccus, he was one of the Argonauts (vi. 343). Mēnetiades, x. m. a patronymic of Pātrocclus (Ov. Trist. v. 4. 25).—2. The herdsman of Plūto, who engaged in battles with Hēracles, driving away the cattle of Gērjōn, and whom that hero killed, by transfixing him with an arrow at the river Antheūmus (Apol. ii. 5).

Mēnōgēnes, is. m. the cook of Pōmpēius Strābo, whom he much resembled in appearance (Val. Max. ix. 14).—2. A guzzler, who teased the people whom he knew, until they asked him to supper. Although he lived at Rome, from his name, it is probable that he was a Greek, either by birth or extraction (Mart. xii. 84).

Mēnon, ōnis. m. a warrior on the side of Troy, killed by Lēontēus (Hom. II. xii. 193).—2. Appointed prator over the Arābiā chōsū, on their being conquered by Alexander the Great, in 329 B. C., and died a natural death, in 326 B. C. (Curt. vii. 3 seq.).

Mēnōphānes, is. m. the man who advised Mithridates not to put his son Phāruaces to death, who had plotted against him, yet the forgiveness of the father did not change the disposition, or alter the design, of the son, who still endeavoured to overpower his parent (Ap. Bel. Mith. 247).

Mēnophilus, i. m. a merchant of Pērrhēbia, a man of distinction and fidelity, whom, with Scēnus, the Roman consul L. Emilius Paullus, consulted with respect to the passage into Pērrhēbia, in 170 B. C., that consul having resolved to employ them as guides (Liv. xlv. 35).—2. A man mentioned by Mārtialis. It is probable he was a comedian, or at least connected with the stage (vii. 81).—3. A eunuch of Mithridātes, who acted with great tenderness and care towards the daughter of that monarch, after his defeat. At a future time, dreading that the fort in which they were would surrender, that the virgin would be violated, he deprived her of life, and then plunged his sword into his own bowels (Amm. Mar. xvi. 7). See Drypetina.

Mēns, tis, f. Mind, to which T. Octāvius Crāssus, prætor, vowed a temple, in 219 B. C., and dedicated it two years after (Liv. xxii. 10 seq.).

Mēnsarii, orum, m. bankers, so called from mensa, a table, which was set in the market place, and on which money was placed for various purposes. They had also different names, as, Nūmmulārii, Trapēzitæ, Cōlybistæ, and Argēntārii. In consequence of the scarcity of money after the battle of Cannæ, three Mēnsarii were created, in 218 B. C., at the suggestion of M. Minūcius, a tribune of the people (Liv. xxiii. 21).

Mēnsis, is, m. a month; a term originally employed to denote that portion of time which elapses between two successive changes of the moon. This has been called a synodical month, and is subject to considerable variation in point of length; but a lunation, or mean synodical month, has been found to contain 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, and 3 seconds. The interval between the moon's departing from any fixed star, and returning to it again, or, what is the same thing, the time during which she performs a complete revolution round the earth, has been denominated a sidereal month, and consists of 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, and 5 seconds. A civil month is an arbitrary portion of time, and, of course, has more or fewer days, according to the fancy of the person who forms the Kalendar. Rōmulus divided the year into 10 months, of which he called the first Mār-tius, from his supposed father Mārs, the god of war; 2d, Aprilis, either from the Greek name of Venus, or from the Latin verb aperire, because plants and trees then begin to open their buds; 3d, Maia (2 syl.), after one of the daughters of Atlas, who was the mother of Mercury, or out of respect to the aged, Mājores; 4th, Jūnius, from Jūno, the queen of the gods, or from Jūniōres, the young; 5th, Quīntilis; 6th, Sēxtilis; 7th, Sēptēmbēr; 8th, Octōber; 9th, Nōvēmbēr; and 10th, Dē-cēmbēr. The last six had their names from the place which each held in the year. Quīntilis was afterwards called Jūlius, to flatter the vanity of the first Roman emperor; and Sextilis, Augustus, in honour of his successor. It is difficult to discover the principles on which Rōmulus proceeded with regard to the length of his months, as each exceeded a lunation, and they varied in the number of days which they contained. March had 31, April 30,

May 31, June 30, July 31, August 30, September 30, October 31, November 30, and December 30; which amount to 304. The solar year exceeds that of Rōmulus by 61 days, and nearly 6 hours. To make up, in some measure, this deficiency, he annexed a number of intercalary days to the end of each year, to which Numa added a day taken from the months which contained 30, and formed them into two months, one of 29, and the other of 27 days. With the former of these, which he called Jānuārius, in honour of the god Jānus, he made the year to begin, and terminated it with the latter; to which he gave the name of Fēbrūārius, from the verb febrūare, to perform sacrifices, purifications, &c., which ignorance and superstition vainly imagined atoned for the sins of the year. The number of days in each month, and their arrangement according to that monarch, stood thus: Jānuārius 29, Mārtius 31, Aprilis 29, Maia 31, Jūnius 29, Quīntilis 31, Sēxtilis 29, Sēptēmbēr 29, Octōber 31, Nōvēmbēr 29, Dēcēmbēr 29, and Fēbrūārius 27. It cannot fail to be observed, that all the months of Numa consisted of odd numbers, which, it is generally understood, he preferred from a superstitious notion, that they were more lucky than the even numbers. The aggregate of the whole amounted to 354 days, which, unfortunately being an even number, he felt himself under the necessity of adding one to February, in order to procure the auspicious number. From that period February contained 28 days, and the year consisted of 355. It is perhaps unnecessary to add, that Numa's object was to form a Kalendar adapted to the revolutions of the moon, and not to that of the sun. The solar year exceeding the lunar 11½ days nearly, that the months might retain the same place in the seasons, he, from necessity, appointed 90 additional days to be inserted in the course of every eight years. This improvement was carried into effect by an intercalary month of 29 days in the second year, of 23 in the fourth, of 22½ in the sixth, and of 23 in the eighth, between the 23d and 24th of February. But this intercalation exceeded the truth 24 days, which some suppose he rectified, by reducing the intercalary days to 66 every third period of eight years. Others think that the intercalation, in the eighth year, amounted only to 15 days; but Livy's statement supports the former opinion. This correction would have been unnecessary, had Numa not added a day to February, that the year might consist of an odd number. The Kalendar, however, thus rectified, brought the Roman year, at the completion of every twenty-fourth year, within two hours of the truth, a degree of precision truly astonishing at so very early, and illiterate a period. The arrangements of Numa remained without alteration until the end of the Republic, only the Dēcēmbēr placing the months in their present order, Jānuary, February, March, April, &c. When criminal ambition, added to martial bravery, had put the reins of government into the hands of Caius Jūlius Cæsar, he corrected the errors introduced by intercalation, adapted the Kalendar to the revolution of the sun, and assigned to the different months the number of days which they still retain in modern times. Most of the nations of antiquity computed by the lunar month. The Greeks and Jews reckoned in this manner, and the Romans, until Julius Cæsar adjusted the months to the course of the sun. As a lunation contains 29 days and upwards of 12 hours, some nations, to avoid the fraction, made their months consist of 29 and 30 days alternately. Others, with less accuracy, gave 30 days to each month; 12 of the latter containing 360 days, probably suggested the idea of dividing the ecliptic, and, afterwards, circles, into 360 degrees. All the Jewish months consisted of 30 days, except the last, which amounted to 35, so that their years were within six hours of perfect accuracy.

Mētes, m. n. a commander of the Ciccōnes in the Trojan war. They appear to have had two, for Euphēmus is mentioned in the catalogue as their leader (Hom. II. xvii. 73: II. ii. 846).—2. King of the island Tāphos, said to have been a particular friend of Hōmērus, and to have taken him in his ship to many parts on the coast of the Mediterranean, on account of which kindness the poet has immortalized him in the Odyssey (Hom. II. i. 105 seq.).

Mēntissa, ie. f. a town of Hispania Tārraconensis, in the country of the Orētāni, hence frequently called Mēntissa Orētāni, to distinguish it from another of the same name, in the territory of the Bastitani (Liv. xxxv. 17).

Mēntōr, ōris, m. a Grecian artist, who excelled in carving and engraving. Cicero has extolled the excellence of his workmanship, and Plinius mentions this artist with equal commendation (v. 74).—Adj. Mēntōrēus, n. um; Mēntōrēusianus (Mart. ix. 69).—2. Son of Alcimus, whom Minēra personated when she acted as the friend and counsellor of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xii. 235).—3. Brother of Mēmnon, the Rhodian, and father of Thy-mādes; both were in the interest of Dārīus (Curt. iii. 3).

Mēntūla, m. f. a fictitious name, under which Cātullus is supposed to satirize Mā-mūra (xciv. xiv).

Mēphātis, is, f. the goddess of offensive smell, supposed by some to be Jūno. She had a temple on the outside of the walls of Crēmōdia, the only building left entire when that town was burnt by the troops under Antōnius, who had espoused the interest of Vespasianus. Tacitus attributes the preservation of this temple either to its situation or to the protection of the goddess (Tac. Hist. iii. 33).

Mēphra, is, f. a town of Arabia Felix (Amm. Mar. xxlii. 6).

Mērcūri Prōmōntōrium, v. Prōmōntōrium Hērmiūm, Cape Bon, called by the Moors Ras-Adder, a promontory to the east of Cāthāgo, of which Livius calls the inner or more northerly part, Pūchri Prōmōntōrium, a name derived, according to some, from Appius Claudius Pūcher having lain there with the Roman fleet (Liv. xxix. 27). The western part was called Apōllinis Prōmōntōrium.

Mērcūrius, i. m. Mercury (Eng.), was, according to Hēsiodus, Apōllōdōrus, and Diōdōrus Siculus, the son of Jūpiter and Maia (2 syl.), the most beautiful daughter of Atlas, king of Maurītania, Morocco and Fez. But of this name Lāctāntius mentions four; the first, the son of Jūpiter and Maia (2 syl.); the second, of Cēlus and Dies; the third, of Bācehus and Prōsēpina; and the fourth, of Jūpiter and Cyllēnē, who, by order of Jūpiter, put Argus to death. Cicero makes the number to be five; one the son of Cēlus and Dies; another of Valēus and Phōrōnis, who on earth is called Trōphōnius; a third, of Jūpiter and Maia (2 syl.), to whom Pē-nēlōpē bore Pan; a fourth, the son of Nilus, the Nile, whom the Egyptians consider it unlawful to name; and a fifth, worshipped by the Phēnciāte, whose parentage is unknown. The last put Argus to death, and afterwards fled to Egypt, where he appointed laws, and communicated to the natives a knowledge of letters. The Egyptians called him Thoth, or, Thoyth, and, in honour of him, gave his name to the first month of their year. The son of Maia (2 syl.), whom the Latins denominated Mērcūrius, and the Greeks Hērmes (i. e. the Interpreter), is almost the only one celebrated in the writings of these two nations, and to him the actions of the other four may be chiefly, if not wholly, referred. Besides executing the messages of the gods, and conducting the souls of the dead to the Infernal Regions, Mērcūrius was the god of oratory, of thieves, and of merchants. From the last (a Mercibus), he had, according to Fēstus, his Latin name. On his head he wore a winged cap (Pēlāsus, i. m.), on his feet winged sandals (Tālaris, ium, n.), and carried in his hand a rod entwined with two serpents (Cādūceus, i. m.). The first two are emblematical of his being the messenger of the gods, and the last is a badge of his office as conductor of the souls of the dead. He is sometimes seen holding a purse, which has a reference to his being the god of merchants. Mērcūrius invented the lyre with its seven strings. The epithet Arēōcēta, applied to him by Hōmērus, grammarians have explained by exemption from toil, i. e. either doing or receiving; but others refer it to a cave in mount Cyllēnē, in which he was born. He was the god chiefly worshipped by the Germans, and to him they offered human victims (Tac. Mor. Ger. 9). From his grandfather Atlas, he was called Atlāntiādes, i. e. Sum-tibi Mērcūritas, I am Mercury to you, i. e. I bestow unexpected gain upon you (Pers. Sat. vi. 62).—Adj. Mērcūriālis, is, e. Mērcūriāles viri, learned men; men of genius (Hor. Od. ii. 17. 29). Perhaps Hōrātius meant by that expression, poets.

Mērenēs, is, m. the master or commander of the cavalry in Persia (Amm. Mar. xxv. 1).

Mēricus, i. m. one of the three officers who had the command in the Achēradina, at the time the Roman forces had partly obtained possession of Syracūse. The surrendering of the whole city may, in a considerable degree, be attributed to his embracing the interest of the Romans, for which the senate decreed him the freedom of the city, and five hundred acres of land. The Spaniards who came along with him, as well as himself, were to have lands, and Scipio, then governor of Spain, assigned them Murgantia. In the oration of M. Claudius Mārcellus for the conquest of Syracūse, Mericus appeared in the procession with a golden crown (Liv. xxv. 30 seq.).

Mēriōnēs, is, m. son of Mōlus, a native of Crēta, Caudia, who was the charioteer of Idoménēus, king of that island, during the Trojan war, in which he displayed great dexterity and courage (Ov. Met. xiii. 359).

Mērmērus, i. m. a centaur of uncommon swiftness, who was wounded in the battle with the Lapithæ, at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. xii. 305).—2. A Mysian nobleman, killed by Antilochus (Hom. Il. xiv. 513).—3. A Thessalian prince, the father of Ilus. Mērmērides, m. Ilus (Hom. Od. i. 259).

Mērmēssus, i. f. a Trojan village, on mount Ida, of which was the Sibyl Hēllēspōntiāca, who, from it, is called Mērmēssia (Tibul. ii. 5. 67). It had its name from the appearance of the place. Some suppose Mērmēssus to be the same with Mārpēssus.

Mērōē, es, f. the wife of Mōpsus q. v. (Sil. Ital. ii. 104).

Mērōē, es, f. Nuabia, a large island, according to the ancients, in Nilus, the Nile, and the first formed by that river, in the opinion of Pōmpōnius Mēla. It, says Diōdōrus Siculus, resembled, in appearance, a shield, extended to three thousand stadia in length, and one in breadth, containing mines of gold, silver, iron, and brass, besides a great quantity of ebony, and various kinds of precious stones. On Mērōē was a number of towns, of which the most celebrated had the same name, appears to have been of a great magnitude, and was the capital of the Ethiopians. The same author makes it the seat of superstition, adding, that its priests ruled like sovereigns. They even ordered kings to kill themselves, on pretence that it was the will of the gods. Ergamēnes, king of Ethioṗia, first resisted their tyranny, put the priests to the sword, and afterwards reigned unmoled. That historian also informs us, that besides Mērōē, the Nile contained an incredible number of islands, a statement confirmed by modern travellers, so far as the river is actually known, particularly by Burckhardt. From Pliny's account of the time at which the sun was vertical at Mērōē, its latitude must have been about 16° North. As nothing is known respecting the form, extent, and natural history of Mērōē, modern geographers seem to think it was a tract of land bounded on two sides by the rivers Astāpus, the Abauē, and Astabōras, the Tacazzē, two branches of the Nile, and on the third by that river. These streams were, perhaps, known to the ancients only towards their confluence, from which they inferred they had formerly been united, and, separating, had encompassed that large tract of land known by the name of Mērōē. The inhabitants filled their hair with light arrows, to which Claudianus alludes (vii. 21). Calda Mērōē, from its being in the Torrid Zone (Juv. Sat. vi. 527). Adj. Mērōēticus, a. um. Mērōētica ebēnus (Luc. Phœr. x. 117). This seems the true, though not the common, reading; and confirmed by line 303 of the same book.

Mērōpē, es, f. one of the Pleiades, who married Sisyphus q. v. Ovidius says, that of all the Pleiades, she alone had a mortal husband; her sisters captivated some of the celestial deities (Fast. iv. 175).—2. The wife of Crēsphōntes, king of the Mēssēni (Apoll. ii. 8).—3. The daughter of Cēnōpion (Apoll. i. 4).

Mērōpēs, um, m. the inhabitants of the island afterwards called Cos (Pin. Nem. iv. 42).

Mērōps, ōpis, m. the husband of Clēmēnē. To mortify the pride of Phāethon, Epāphus maintained that Mērōps, and not Sol, was the father of that spirited youth. See Phāethon.—2. Of Pēreotē (Pēreōsius), a Trojan, skilled in prophecy, whose two sons fell into the hands of Diōmēdes and Ulysses in the Trojan war. The former killed them (Hom. Il. xi. 329).

Mēros, i. m. a mountain in India, on which Bācehus was brought up, hence, says Cārtius, the Greek fiction of his being preserved in the thigh of his father (viii. 10).

Mēsaulius, i. m. the slave of Eumæus, the swine-herd of Ulysses (Hom. Od. xiv. 449).

Mēsēmbria, a. f. Miceeria, a town of Thrācia, on the western coast of Pōntus Euxinus, the Black Sea, to the north of Anchālūs.—2. Marogna, another town of Thrācia, on the northern coast of Mārē Egeum, the Archipelago, to the west of Sāmōthrācē, Sīmothrāki. Inh. Mēsēmbriāni, orum (Sing. Mēsēmbriānus, i. m. Adj. Mēsēmbriācus, a. um. Mēsēmbriēcū pōrtus, Thrāciān harbour (Ov. Trist. i. 9. 37).

Mēsēnē, es, f. a surname of Apāmēa, a town of Assyria, according to Ammilius Mārcellinus (xxiii. 6), but Plinius makes it a different town (i. 716).

Mēsūs. See Mōsæus.

Mēsōpōlis, is, f. a town near Hypepe.

Inh. Mēsōpōlitæ, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Mith. 201).

Mēsōpōtāmia (i. e. the middle of the river), a. f. Jezirah, by the Arabs, and Irak-Arabi by the Persians. The former, Jezirah, signifies an island, or peninsula, a name given to this extensive tract of land, from its lying between Tigris, the Dejilah, or Shat-Bagdad, and Euphrates, the El-Prat, extending in length about six hundred and eighty miles from the conflux of these rivers to the foot of Taurus. The Latins called it Intērāmma, sometimes Mēdāmma; the latter is the more literal translation of the Greek term Mēsōpōtāmia, which it received for the reason already mentioned (Tac. Ann. vi. 36). Plinius informs us, that it belonged wholly to the Persians, and had villages scattered here and there, besides the noble cities of Bābylōn and Ninus (i. 710). Adj. Mēsōpōtāmicus, a. um. Mēsōpōtāmēni hōmīnēs (Sal. Frag.).

Mēssa, a. v. Mēssæ, es, f. Mayna (Mezapō, Leake), a maritime town of Lūcōnia, a few miles to the north of Tēnārium prēmōntōrium, Cape Matapan. Hōmērus and Stācius describe it as abounding with pigeons, hence the latter has Cithērōta Mēssæ (Th. iv. 226).

Mēssala, a. m. a surname of Valēriū gēns, first given to M. Valērius Lævinus, in consequence of his having conquered Mēssina, Messina, a town of Sicily, Sicily. The Romans changed the n into l, either from convenience of pronunciation, or aggressiveness of sound (Senec. Brev. Vit. 13). Mēssala Valērius, Mēssalæ Valērii, m. a Roman senator, who moved that the oath of fidelity to the emperor Tiberius should be renewed every year. Tacitus observes, that this was the only species of flattery now left (Ann. i. 8). M. Mēssala, M. Mēssalæ, m. a noble Roman, who was consul with Marcus Pūpilius Piso, 60 B. C. (Cass. B. G. l. 2). Mēssalīna. See Valēria.

Messālinus, i. m., a friend of Ovidius, to whom that poet addresses an epistle from the place of his banishment, mentioning his respect for the father and brother of Messālinus. Like his other poetical compositions from that barbarous country, this letter to Messālinus mentions his banishment in plaintive strains, which express the painful feelings and melancholy depression of his mind (Ov. Ep. Pont. i. 7).

Messāna, re. v. Messēnē, es, f. (the former the Roman, the latter the Grecian name), Messina, a seaport town of Sicily, Sicily, built many centuries before the Christian era. It stands at the strait which separates that island from Itālia, Italy, now called the Strait of Messina, anciently Prētum Sicūlum. The original name of this town was Zāncle. Pirates from Cūmæ expelled the original inhabitants, and, in return, Chalcidenses from Eubœa, Negropont, drove them out, and took possession of the town. These afterwards yielded to the Messenians, whom the Lacedæmonians had conquered in war, and, on their obtaining possession, in conjunction with Anaxilæus, from Sāmōs, they called the town Messēnē, which the Latins afterwards wrote Messāna. Hērōnŷmus states, but without good authority, that it was afterwards called Māmērtina, from the Māmērtini having been admitted into an equal participation both of the city and lands. From that period the inhabitants were frequently called Māmērtini. The Messālæ at Rome derived that surname from this city, which was first assumed by Valērius Cōrvīnus, who conquered it. In the lapse of time, the Romans changed Messāna into Messāla. The modern town is about five miles in circumference, and contains 60,000 inhabitants. The harbour, nearly five miles in circuit, is one of the safest in the Mediterranean, and has a quay about a mile in length. Inh. Messēni, orum, v. Messānenses, ium, et, Māmērtini, orum, m. Adj. Messānius, et, Messāniacus, a, um. Messānia menia (Ov. Met. xli. 549).

Messāpia, re. f. a name given by the Greeks to that part of Italy which the Romans called Calabria (Plin. i. 352). It had this name from Messāpus, who conducted a colony to Iapygia. — 2. Messagna, a considerable town, which probably gave name to the district in which it stood. Inh. Messāpi, orum, m. originally from Crēta (Herod. vii. 170). Adj. Messāpius, a, um. Messāpia area, i. e. Calabria (Ov. Met. xiv. 513).

Messāpus, i. m. one of the chiefs of Etrūria, Tuscan. He was a son of Nēptūnus, and excelled in horsemanship. In the war between Tūrnus and Ænēas, he joined the former, to whom he was a very useful and powerful auxiliary. According to Virgilius, he could not be injured either by fire or sword, a fiction which has been attempted to be explained, by his having under his command the inhabitants of Sōrāetē, on which was an annual sacrifice to Apōllo, when they walked over the burning pile, without injury, and his being a son of Nēptūnus, by his coming into Italy by sea (Virg. Æn. ix. 523).

Messēis, idis, f. a celebrated fountain in Thēssalia (Hom. Il. vi. 457). Messēis, idis, f. of Messēis, applied to nouns feminine. Messēides undæ (Val. Flacc. iv. 374).

Messēnē, es, f. an Argive, daughter of Triōpa, and grand-daughter of Phōrbas. She married Pōlycāon, who, with auxiliaries from Argos and Lacedæmon, overran the district in Pelōpōnēsus, the Morea, called from his wife, Messēnē, which was afterwards the name of the chief town.

Messēnē, es, v. Messēnia, re, f. Maionathi, the chief city of Messēnia, a district of Pelōpōnēsus, the Morea, bounded on the E. by Lacedonia, on the N. by Arcadia and Elis, on the W. and S. by Mārē Ionium, the Ionian sea. This term originally denoted a district, not a town, and received its name from Messēnē, wife of Pōlycāon, son of Lēlēx, who first reigned over it (Paus. iv. 1). To the descendants of the Messenians, who fought at the battle of Lēuctra, the foundation of this city must be referred; and that they discovered great judgment in the choice of a situation cannot be denied. The walls that encompassed mount Ithōmē, on which was a citadel of the same name, so strongly fortified by nature and art, as to be deemed impregnable, were of brick, protected by numerous battlements and towers. According to Pausanias, they were stronger than those of Byzantium, Constantinople, Rhodes, Rhodes, or those of any other Grecian city. But notwithstanding all its strength, it was several times taken and destroyed. The plain of Messēnē is one of the best, if not the most fertile of the districts of the Morea; to the richness of its soil may be chiefly referred the war with the Spartans, as their territory was naturally poor. Messēnē constituta (Cor. Nep. Epam. 8). Inh. Messēni, orum, m. the Messenians (Just. iii. 4. liv. xxix. 12). Adj. Messēniacus, et, Messēnius, a, um. Messēniacus Sinus, the Gulf of Kalanata. — 2. An island in Tigris, the Dejlah, below Samarra.

Messius Cicērrus, Messii Cicērrī, m. a man mentioned by Horatius. He appears to have been a buffoon, at least he is as much of that character as Sarmēntus, who was the favourite buffoon of Augustus, and who makes him the butt of his ridicule, to which Messius Cicērrus replied with equal keenness and severity (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 32).

C. Messius Quintus Trajānus Dēcius, C. Messii Quinti Trajāni Dēcii, m. whose original name appears, from medals, to have been Messius. He was born near Sirmium (at Būdalla, in Pannōnia, Eutrop.), and had the honour of being the first of the princes of that country who obtained the purple. In his reign, there is nothing deserving of notice, except his persecution of the Christians, and his war with the Goths. The measures which he adopted for the destruction of all who had renounced paganism, discover considerable ingenuity, combined with the most ferocious cruelty. His hatred was chiefly directed against the higher ecclesiastics, supposing that, on their being cut off, the common people would more easily renounce their religion. In general, however, the firmness of their faith defied his tortures, and they preferred death to "denying the Lord who bought them." A merciful Providence shortened the period of their suffering, for the Goths required his undivided attention. It can scarcely be doubted that he would have extirpated the whole race of these barbarians, had not the treachery of Gallus led him into a snare, from which neither the emperor nor one of his army escaped. His death happened in December, 251, only two years after he had ascended the imperial throne. In history, he is frequently called Dēcius (Eutrop. ix. 4).

C. Mēssius Nēpos, C. Mēssii Nēpōtis, m. celebrated the games of Flōra, when edile at Rome, in 56 B. C. The presence of M. Pōrcius Cāto restrained the spectators from desiring the actors to appear naked, a fact which that rigid moralist no sooner knew, than he retired, that the people might enjoy that indelicate sight (Val. Max. ii. 9).

Mēsthles, is, m. a commander in the Trojan army (Hom. Il. xvii. 216).

Mēstor, ōris, m. a son of Priāmus, killed during the Trojan war (Hom. Il. xxiv. 257).

Mēstrius Flōrus, Mēstrii Flōri, m. a man of consular rank, intimate with the emperor Vespāsianus (Suet. Vesp. 22).

Mētābus, i, m. king of Prīvērnum, Piperino, and father of Cāmilla. When driven from that ancient city, he carried with him his infant daughter, and, whilst surrounded by his enemies, he came to the river Amāsēnus, the Toppia, which was then on a level with its banks. Afraid for the safety of his child, if he attempted to swim over with her on his back, he tied her to a large spear, which he carried, and threw her in safety to the other bank, after which he crossed the river by swimming. Received within no city, he led the life of a shepherd, on the solitary mountains, where he brought up his daughter, and accustomed her, from infancy, to the use of the bow and the sling (Virg. Æn. xi. 540 seq.).—2. A Roman, killed by Hānibal, in the first battle which the Carthaginians fought in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 327 seq.).

Mētāpōntum, i, n. Torre di Mare (anciently Mētābum), a town of Lūcānia, built by Greeks from Achāia, under Epēus, in which was a temple of Minēra, where the iron tools, used by that artist in the fabrication of the Trojan horse, were deposited (Jest. xx. 2). Inh. Mētāpōntini, orum (Sil. Ital. iv. 327 seq.).—Adj. Mētāpōntinus, i, m. revolted to Hānibal, after the battle of Cannā, in 216 B. C. Adj. Mētāpōntinus, a, um. Mētāpōntinus ager (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Mētāurus, i, m. a native of Hispellum, Ispello, killed in the first engagement with Hānibal, on his descent from the Alps. His name is derived from the river now called the Metro (Sil. Ital. iv. 187).

Mētāurus, i, m. the Metro, a rapid river of Umbria, in the country of the Gālli Sēnōnes, on the banks of which the consuls, M. Lūlius Sēllinianus and C. Clāudius Nēro, defeated the Carthaginian army, and killed Hāndrōbal, who was on his march with a reinforcement to his brother Hānibal, 208 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 47–49). Vltor Mētāurus (Luc. Phar. ii. 405). Vltor Mētāurus (Claud. xxviii. 501).—2. The Metro, a river in the territory of the Brūtii, on which stood a town of the same name (Val. Max. vii. 4).

Mētillus, v. Mētillus, i, m. a man, who appears to have dealt in poisons (Mart. iv. 43).

Mētillus, L. Mētilli, m. a tribune of the people, who endeavoured to prevent Caesar from taking the treasures from the temple of Sātūrnus, which Pōmpēius and his partisans had, by a most unaccountable oversight, left behind them. Caesar, after threatening to lay him dead at his feet, if he continued to resist, ordered the door of the temple to be opened by force (Cæs. B. C. i. 33). Adj. Mētillinus, a, um.

Methion, ōnis, m. the father of Phōrbas q. v.

Mēthōnē, es, v. Mēthōna, v. f. Modon (Mothoni, Leake), a seaport town of Mēssēnia, a district of Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea. Clarke states, that the modern name is not Modon, as D'Anville has asserted, but Lepterschori, pronounced, by the natives, Leftshoi. Pārva Mēthōnē (Val. Flacc. i. 388).

—2. A maritime town of Mācedōnia, on Thērmālcus sinus, the Gulf of Saloniki, at the siege of which, Philippus, king of Mācedōnia, lost his right eye (Just. vii. 6). See Ater.

Mēthymna, v. f. Molivo, the largest town in Lēsbos, Mityleni, except the capital, Mitylēnē, Mityleni, which now gives name to the island. Mēthymnias, adis, f. of Mēthymna, applied to females or nouns feminine. Mēthymniādes pūella (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 15). Inh. Mēthymniaci, orum, m. (Curt. iv. 5). Adj. Mēthymneus, a, um. Mēthymnaea uva, the grape of Mēthymna, from which excellent vinegar was made (Hor. Sat. ii. 8. 50). Mēthymneus vātes, Arion (Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 60).

Mēthymnātus, i, m. a son of Māsīnissa, king of Nūmidia, born to that monarch after he had passed his eighty-sixth year (Val. Max. viii. 13).

M. Mēthius, M. Mēthii, m. a plebeian tribune, who, in conjunction with two of his colleagues, impeached two of the military tribunes with consular authority, who had been in office the former year (Liv. v. 11).—2. Held the same office, in 219 B. C. Lūlius has recorded his speech against Q. Fābius Māximus (xxii. 25).—3. One of the two commissioners sent by the senate to the consuls, in 214 B. C., to prevent, if possible, their surrendering to the enemy, although they had been unsuccessful (Liv. xxv. 22).

Sp. Mēthilius, Sp. Mēthii, m. a tribune of the people, who proposed an Agrarian law, probably from gratitude to the commons, who had thrice elected him to that office; the last time in his absence (Liv. iv. 48).

T. Mēthilius Crōto, T. Mēthii Crōtōnis, m. a lieutenant-general, sent, by Appulus Clāudius, to take the command of the old army, and transport it into Sicily, in 217 B. C. (Liv. xxiii. 31).

Mētiosēdum, i, n. Mendon, a town of Gallia, France, situated on Sēquāna, the Seine, below Paris (Cæs. B. G. vii. 61).

Mētiscus, i, m. the charioteer of Tūrnus, whom his sister, Jūtūrna, forced from his seat, and took the management of the reins. To preserve her brother, and to render him victorious, Jūtūrna, at the suggestion of Jūno, performed the office of charioteer, a measure attended with no advantage to the Rutulian prince (Virg. Æn. xii. 469 seq.).—2. A man killed by Hānibal, at the siege of Sāguntum, Muriedro (Sil. Ital. i. 457).

Mētius Cārus, Mēti Cāri, m. an informer, who, with Māssa, was put to death, on the accusation of Hēliōdorus (Juv. Sat. i. 36). Pflinius, the younger, has held up this man to the detestation of posterity. When Rēgulus, another detested informer, inveighed against Hērēnius Sānclō, whom Mētius prosecuted, the latter said, "What have you to do with my dead men?" Did I ever molest either Crāssus or Cāmērinus, whom you accused in the reign of Nēro?" (Plin. Epist. i. 5). Tacitus calls him Cārus Mētius (Ag. 45), and Plinius, Mētius Cārus.

Mētius Cēler, Mētī Cēleris, m. a friend of the poet Stātiūs, whom he addresses on his departure from Rome, as governor of Sýria (Syl. iii. 2).

Mētius Pōmpōsianus, Mētī Pōmpōsianī, m. a noble Roman, whom the emperor Vēs-pāsianus raised to the consulship, from a conviction that it would secure his favour, for against him the emperor had been cautioned to be on his guard, because he was destined, by his nativity, to be emperor. Dōmītiānus, who was of a very different mind, deprived him of life, for no other reason than that above-mentioned, added to the report of his carrying about with him a map of the world, with speeches of kings and generals extracted from Livius (Sust. Vesp. 14; Dom. 10).

Mētōn, ōnis, m. a native of Athens, who excelled in mathematics and astronomy, and immortalized his name by the discovery of the lunar cycle. From accurate observation, he found, that the moon returns to the same point in the zodiac, from which she set out with the sun, in nineteen years, a period of time to which the moderns have given the name of the Golden number. By improvements of mathematical instruments, and the patient investigation of philosophers in modern times, it has been ascertained, that these heavenly bodies do not come to the same point precisely at the same time; but that there is a difference of one hour, twenty-seven minutes, and thirty-two seconds (Auson. cccxci. 12.).
Adj. Mētōnleus, a, um. Mētōnleus, annus, the period of time above-mentioned.

Mētōpē, es, f. daughter of the river Lādon, and the wife of the river Azōpus, in Thēbe (Pin. Ol. vi. 144).

Mētrōdōrus, i, m. the scholar and intimate friend of Epīcūrus. Tacitus remarks, that his writings, like those of Epīcūrus, abounded with the rhetorical figure, called exclamation (Orat. 31). Cicero and Diōgēnes Lāertius mention him in their writings; a few of his opinions may be found in the pages of antiquity, from which, however, little either of his life or doctrines can be learned.

—2. A Rhodian, who came to Pērcēus, king of Mācedōnia, in 170 B. C., and asserted, on the authority of Dīno and Pōlyārātus, the principal men of that state, that his countrymen were ready to join in the war against the Romans. He was set at the head of the joint embassy of the Macedonians and Illyrii to the Rhōdii (Liv. xlv. 23).

Mētron, ōnis, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great (Curt. vi. 7).

Mētrōphānes, is, m. called by Mārtiālis Cōlōnilla Lucili. Some consider Cōlōmēlla as part of his name, others, perhaps with more propriety, suppose the word denotes a servant (Mart. xi. 91).—2. An officer of Mithridates, king of Pōntus (Sal. Frag.).

Mētrōpōlis, is, f. a city of Thēssālia, Thēssaly, between Pērrhebus, Alesson, and Gōmphi. Gōmphi, on one of the northern branches of Pēnēus, the Salampria (Caes. B.

C. iii. 80). It was taken by Antiochus, king of Sýria, in 193 B. C., and surrendered to the Romans the same year (Liv. xxxvi. 10, 14).
Inh. Mētrōpōlite, arum, m. Adj. Mētrōpōlitānus, a, um. Mētrōpōlitānus cāmpus, a plain in Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

M. Mētius, M. Mētī, m. a man allied to Arlōvistus, by the rights of hospitality, whom Caesar joined in commission with C. Valērius Prōcillus, on an embassy to that king. As soon as they entered his camp, without suffering them to speak, Arlōvistus commanded both to be put in irons. He thrice drew lots to determine whether they should be burned alive upon the spot, or reserved for another time. The lots being always favourable, their lives were preserved. After the defeat of Arlōvistus, Caesar himself in the pursuit fell in with Prōcillus, and Mētius was likewise recovered and brought back to the Roman camp (Caes. B. G. i. 47 seq.).

Sp. Mētius Tārpa, Sp. Mētī Tārpa, m. an excellent critic, appointed by Augustus one of the judges who determined what works should be admitted into the temple of Apōllō. Hōrātius mentions him, if not in allusion to that office, at least in reference to his critical knowledge of literary productions (Sat. i. 10, 38 seq.).

Metūlum, i, n. Metuc Vetus, was the capital of the Iāpēdes, at the siege of which Augustus was wounded. Inh. Metūllī, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Illyr.).

Mētus Fūffētius, Mētī Fūffētī, m. an Alban, who was created dictator on the death of king Clūllius. Willing to save the effusion both of Alban and Roman blood, he proposed to refer the fate of the two kingdoms to three champions on each side, and thus terminate hostilities between the two nations. The bravery of the Romans having secured the subjection of the Albans, Mētus fell under the displeasure of his countrymen, because the matter had been entrusted to so small a number, on which account he sought an early opportunity of violating the agreement. At his suggestion, the Fīdēnātes and Veīentēs made war on the Romans, whose monarch, Tūllus Hōstilius, called for Mētus and his troops. In the first engagement, the Albans stood for some time inactive, then gradually filed off, leaving the Roman flank exposed to the enemy, and it cannot be doubted, that if the Fīdēnātes and Veīentēs had shown a superiority, they would have joined the stronger party. By a dexterous manœuvre, Tūllus prevented the desertion of the Albans from being generally known to his troops, and obtained a decisive victory, not, however, without a great loss of men. He then punished the perfidy of Mētus, by tying each of his legs to a chariot, and driving them furiously in opposite directions, by which the body of the Alban dictator was mangled, a part being carried away by each chariot (Liv. i. 23—28).

Mēvānia, a, f. Bevagnia, a town of Umbria, on Clitūmbus, the Clitunno, near its junction with Tīnia, the Tīmia (Sil. Ital. viii. 456). Propertius calls it Nēbūlōsa, from the nature of its valleys, which exhale the vapours (iv. 1. 123). Inh. Mēvānātes, ium (Sing. Mēvānas, ātis, m. (Sil. Ital. iv. 544). Adj. Mēvānes, us, a, ātis. Mēvānes ager, the territory of Mēvānia (Plin. iii. 121).

C. Mēvius, C. Mēvī, m. a brave Roman, who had frequently distinguished himself in battle against M. Antonius, and falling at last into his hands said, "Order me to be butchered, if you please; but neither the hope of life, nor the dread of death, will induce me to cease to be a soldier of Augustus and to become yours." His fortitude secured his safety and the forgiveness of Antonius (Val. Max. iii. 8).

Mēzentius, i, m. a king of Etruria, Tuscanus, who lived at Cærē, Cerecheri, joined the Rūtūli against the Latins, on condition that he received all the wine produced in the territory of the latter for so many years. Pilius and Aurēlius Victor state, that Mēzentius besieged the Latins in Lavinium, that his son, Lausus, obtained possession of the hill on which the citadel stood, and, that among other severe conditions of surrender, he demanded all the wine of Lavinium for several years. By the advice of Ascānius, the Latins consecrated their wine to Jūpiter, sallied from the town, which that monarch then besieged, routed the garrison, killed Lausus, and compelled his father to fly. After this defeat, Mēzentius formed a friendship and alliance with the Latins. In the narratives of Roman authors, there is some discrepancy; Pilius makes Mēzentius the enemy of Aenēas, Victor and others, of the Latins, and what is stated respecting Ascānius seems to refer to a later period, since Lavinium was built after the conquest of the Rūtūli. His character, as delineated by Virgilus, is that of a merciless tyrant, who delighted in cruelty, despised the gods, and derided their worship. Except paternal affection for his son, and advice to military prowess, and that not of the highest kind, he possessed no quality deserving approbation. It was probably the intention of the bard to give variety to his poem, to exalt the distinguishing virtues of his hero, by depicting in Mēzentius the opposite vices, and thus to form an admirable contrast. The manner of his fall exhibits a striking instance of the awful consequences of cruelty and impiety (Pilius, iii. 142. Aur. Vic. Or. 14 seq. Virg. Æn. vii. 648 seq.).

Mēzetūlus, i, m. a Numidian of the royal family, who made war on Capūsa, the king, who fell in battle, and the whole nation of the Māsīli submitted to Mēzetūlus. He then took the title of protector, and called Lacumāces, the only brother of Capūsa, king. To strengthen his authority, he married the daughter of a sister of Hānibāl, formerly the wife of king Esūlces, and renewed an ancient connexion of hospitality with Syphax. After Māsīnissa had defeated Mēzetūlus and Lacumāces, and they had fled into the territory of the Carthaginians, he invited both back, and restored to Mēzetūlus the whole of his property, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 29 seq.).

Micēle, arum, m. a Scythian nation, described by Valērius Flaccus, as being in the practice of perfuning their hair. From that poet, they appear to have lived on the coast of the Black Sea; but of their history and geographical position no accurate account has been transmitted to modern times (vi. 129).

Micipsa, m. eldest son of Māsīnissa, king of Nūmidia, and brother of Gālissa and Māsīnābal, to each of whom P. Cōrnelius Scipio Æmiliānus allotted a third part of their father's kingdom (150 B. C.), whose will invested him with that power (Liv. Ep. 60). Sallūstius does not mention this division of the kingdom, and simply states, that Micipsa obtained the government alone, after his brothers had been cut off by a natural death. This prince had two sons, Adhēbal and Thēmpsā, and he educated, in his own house, Jūgūrtha, a reputed son of his brother, Māsīnābal, in the same manner as his own children. In mental endowments, personal activity, and warlike courage, Jūgūrtha far surpassed the sons of the king, who, finding every attempt at his destruction unsuccessful, endeavoured to secure his attachment to himself and to his children, particularly the latter, by assigning him the third part of his dominions. His plan did not succeed, and, from the narrative of Sallūstius, Jūgūrtha could not fail to see the insincerity with which he acted, and the motives which induced him to that deed of apparent munificence. From the little which we know of the character of Micipsa, he does not appear to have possessed the qualities necessary to make a great king, or an amiable man. Juvenal uses Micipsa as a general appellation of the Numidians (Sat. v. 69).—2. A man in the army of Hānibāl, who fell by the hand of Thēron at Sāgūntum (Sil. Ital. ii. 160).

Micthio, ōnis, m. an officer under Antiochus Māgnus, who gained an advantage over the Romans at Dēlos (Ap. Bel. Syr. 93).

Mictio, ōnis, m. a nobleman of Chalcis, and a steady friend of the Romans, whose interest he supported, in opposition to the Aetoli and Antiochus, king of Syria. On account of his lameness, he had to be carried into the senate, when he went to Rome, to complain of the cruelty and rapacity of C. Locrētius Gellus in his praetorship, and a carriage at the public expense was procured to convey him to Brūndisium, Brintisi, when he left that city, which was in 172 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 38 seq.).

Micythus, i, m. a servant of Anaxilāus, king of Sicily, to whom he entrusted the guardianship of his children, and to whom the Sicilians submitted from respect to the memory of the deceased monarch (Just. iv. 2).

Midas, m. a king of Phrygia, who hospitably entertained Silēnus, the fosterfather of Bācchus, whom some peasants found and brought to him. For this act of kindness, Bācchus promised to bestow whatever he should ask. Love of money impelled him to request, that whatever he touched might become gold, and the god instantly granted him his wish. The Phrygian monarch soon found the impropriety of his demand, for the very food in his mouth became gold, and he must have died from hunger, had not Bācchus, on his earnest supplication, withdrawn his grant. He ordered him to wash in the river Pāctōlus, and the gold departed from his body into that stream, which still retains particles of that precious metal among its sands. From that period, Midas lived chiefly in the country, and became a great admirer of Pān and his playing on the flute. Tmolus, when Pān disputed with Apōllo the palm of music, these deities appointed umpires, and he decided in favour of Apōllo, which judgment displeased Midas; on that account, Apollō, to punish his stupidity, as well as to show contempt of his opinion, caused asses' ears to grow out of his head. This disgrace the monarch attempted to keep secret; but the servant who usually cut his long hair observed the ears, and feeling an irresistible inclination to mention what he had seen, yet dreading the vengeance of his master if he published it, he dug a hole in the ground, into which he whispered that Midas had the ears of an ass, and returned the earth again to its place. In this spot sprung up a number of reeds which, when shaken with the wind, repeated the words which the servant imagined he had buried at their root, and thus proclaimed to the country around that Midas had the ears of an ass. From his being king of Phrygia, Ovidius calls him Bēregethius hēros (Met. xi. 106). Claudianus writes Mida, not Midas (xxiv. 230). Sallustius makes him king of the Dardāni, from which he derives Dardānia (Frag.).—2. Son of Gōrdius, who succeeded his father in the throne of Phrygia. He acquired a knowledge of religion from Orpheus, which he communicated to his subjects, and by which, says Justinus, his life was rendered safer than by arms (xi. 7). According to this author, there was another Midas, who was banished from Mæcēdōnia by Cārānus (vii. 1).—3. A native of Agrigēntum; Girgenti, who gained the prize for music at the Pythian games (Pin. Pyth. xii).

Midēa, m. f. the mother of Licymalus by Electryon, who was not her husband (Pin. Ol. vii. 53). Midēatis, idis, f. a daughter of Midēa.

Midēa, æ, v. Midēē, es, f. a town of Boeotia; afterwards called Lēbādēā, now Lieadīa. The inhabitants joined the Thebans against the Argives (Stat. Th. vii. 331). Hōmērus writes Midēia (Il. ii. 507).—2. A town of Argolis, afterwards destroyed, and its inhabitants removed to Argos (Paus. viii. 27).

Midylus, i, m. a nobleman of Egina. Midylide, arum, m. the descendants of Midylus (Pin. Pyth. viii. 53).

Milānion, ōnis, m. son of Amphidamas. He was one of the lovers of Atālānta who, at her father's request, consented to marry the man who surpassed her in running. Failure was followed by death. Notwithstanding of this hard condition, many presented themselves as candidates for the prize, who all fell a sacrifice to their rashness, in consequence of her superior swiftness. At last Milānion, impelled by violent attachment to Atālānta, offered himself on the terms which had proved fatal to all her other lovers, and was more indebted to his prudence than to his speed for his success. He carried to the contest golden apples which he had received from Vēnus, and, throwing them behind him one by one, when she was on the point of getting before him, arrived first at the goal, in consequence of the time which she lost in gathering them. By her he had Pārthēnōpeus, who carried on war against the Thebans; but others say Mārs was the father of that youth. According to ancient fiction, he and Atālānta went into a grove of Jūpiter, where they underwent a transformation, passing from a human form into that of lions (Apol. iii. 9).

Milētus, i, m. son of Apollō and Dēiōnē, hence called Dēiōnides. He was a native of Crēta, Candia, and, being suspected of aspiring at the crown, to free Mīnos from fear, he fled with his party, and came into the coast of Anāctōria, where he built, or perhaps only enlarged, Milētus. By Cýāncē, daughter of the river Mæānder, he had two children, Býblis and Caunus (Ov. Met. ix. 443). Apollōdōrus says, he was the son of Apollō and Arēa, daughter of Clēōchus, and gives another reason for his quitting Candia (iii. 1). Antōninus Libēralis asserts, Acaallis, daughter of Mīnos, hid him in the woods, where he was protected by wolves in obedience to an order of Apollō, and was afterwards taken up by the shepherds, with whom he was brought up. According to this author, Mīnos was the cause of his quitting his native island, but not on account of his aspiring at the government. Milētis, idis, f. Býblis, daughter of Milētus (Ov. Met. ix. 634).

Milētus, i, f. Polatschia, or, Milazzo, the capital of Iōnia, which stood near the boundary between that country, and Cāria. Stēphānus says it was first called Lēlēgis from its inhabitants the Lēlēges, that it was afterwards known by the name of Pityūsna from the number of pines in the vicinity, and from that kind of tree having first grown there, and at a later period, from Anāctor, son of Cēlus and Tērra, it assumed the name of Anāctōria. It was one of the most celebrated cities of Asia Minor. Suicide became, at one time, common among the virgins of Milētus, who were so bent on self-destruction, that no argument had any effect; at last the country passed a decree, ordaining, that every girl who hanged herself should be laid on her back naked with the rope round her neck, and a sense of shame put an end to this crime. Plinius mentions, that Milētus was the mother of eighty cities, and that many of the natives of Milētus were distinguished by their learning, among whom was Thales, who may be considered as the father of philosophy among the Greeks (l. 600). Milētus digna tūo cōllere (Mart. viii. 28). Ind. Milēsii, orum (Sing. Milēsitas; i, m. excelled in the manufactory of wool, particularly of cloaks or mantles (Hor. Ep. i. 17. 30). Adj. Milēsitas, et. Milēsitas, a, um. Milēsia cōllera, Milesian fleeces. The wool of Milētus was uncommonly fine, and the cloth made of it much esteemed by the Romans for its delicate softness (Virg. G. iii. 306). Milēsia (fābūle), et. Milēsitica (poēmata), plays of a ludicrous and impure kind.—2. A city of Æolis, or, Mýsia, near Lyrnēssus on the banks of Evēnus, the Kosak (Pin. i. 608).—3. A city of Crēta; Candia, which, according to Strābo, gave name to that in Iōnia (Pin. i. 451).

Milichus, i, m. son of a Satyr by the nymph Mýricē, one of the ancestors of Imilcē, the wife of Hannibal. From Silius Italicus, he appears to have reigned over a considerable part of Spain (iii. 104).—2. A man whom Mārtiālis blames for luxurious extravagance (ii. 63).—3. A freedman of Flāvius Scēvīnus, who discovered a conspiracy formed against the emperor, Nēro, for which he received an ample recompense, and a Greek name signifying the Preserver (Tac. Ann. xv. 54).

Milōnia, æ, f. a town of the Mārsi, on the confines of the Sāmmites, which the dictator,

M. Valerius Maximus, took in 303 B. C. (Liv. x. 3 seq.).

Milo, v. Milon, onis, m. a native of Crōton, v. Crōtoni, Crotonē, a city of the Brūtii, in the south of Italy, was a man of prodigious strength. He studied under Pythagoras, who, for many years, kept a school at that place. To the strength of his scholar, that eminent philosopher and his other pupils were indebted for their lives. The house, in which they were met, was in the act of falling, from one of the pillars giving way; Milo supported the edifice, and allowed them all to escape. He was seven times victorious at the Pythian, and six at the Olympic games. On his presenting himself the seventh time, at the place where the latter were celebrated, no man would venture to combat with him. It is recorded by Pausanias that having tied a rope tightly around his head, by suppressing his breath he could swell the veins till the rope broke (vi. 14). To the admiration of a prodigious multitude, he entered the Stadia at Olympa, carrying on his shoulders a live ox of four years old. To acquire dexterity and strength sufficient to walk under such an enormous load, he began to carry the animal, when a calf, so far every day. The weight in this manner increasing imperceptibly, he was at last enabled to astonish the whole assembly of Olympa. In advanced life, probably to ascertain what part of his strength remained, he attempted to split a growing tree, which he partly accomplished; but, when cleft half-way, it closed again, and his hands continued fixed in the trunk. Being alone, and unable to extricate himself, he remained in this situation until devoured by wild beasts. He was called Crōtoniata, v. Crōtoniātes, as from his native city (Ov. Met. xv. 229).—2. A Roman, who first took possession of the walls of Capua on the death of Virrius, for which he received a mural crown (Sil. Ital. xiii. 300 seq.).—3. A man, mentioned by Martialis, whose wife proved incontinent during his absence (vii. 101). If he be the man to whom the same poet addresses xli. 103, her guilt was not only with his knowledge, but also with his concurrence.—4. A friend of Pylæus, king of Epirus, who left him with his son Hellenus to guard Tarentum when he returned to his own country (Just. xxv. 3).—5. The murderer of Laodamia, who immediately became mad, cut his own bowels, now with the sword, now with a stone, and at last with his teeth, and died after being in that state twelve days (Just. xxviii. 3).

Milonius, i. m. a prætor, who commanded the troops of Lavinium. They had scarcely marched out of the city, on purpose to join the Latins against the Romans, when they received information, that the latter had been victorious; on which they instantly faced about and returned to the city, when Milonius is reported to have said, "That a great price must be paid to the Romans for so very short a journey," 399 B. C. (Liv. viii. 11).—2. A man mentioned by Horatius, whose practice it seems to have been that, upon being heated with wine, he began to dance (Sat. ii. 1. 24).

C. Milonius, C. Milonii, m. a Roman senator of the same party with Q. Sertorius (Ap. Bel. Civ. 389).

Miltiades, is, m. a distinguished Athenian, whose father's name was Cypselus. He traced his remote origin from Alcæus and Egina, and more nearly from Philæus, son of Ajax. The Dælonci, a Thracian nation, who inhabited Chersonesus Thraciæ, Gallipoli, having been long harassed in war by the Absynthii, consulted the oracle at Delphi, Cos-tri, and received for answer, that they should invite as the conductor of their colony, the man who first asked them into his house, after they had left the temple. Miltiades, sitting before his own door, observed the Dælonci passing, asked them to his house, and presented them with the rites of hospitality. They informed him of the oracle, but his caution induced him first to consult Pylia himself, who confirmed the statement of the Dælonci. He had formerly been victorious in the chariot-race at Olympa, which had raised his celebrity among his countrymen, and he now set sail with the Dælonci, and such of the Athenians as volunteered to accompany him, and was created king by the colony. He fortified the peninsula from Cardia to Pactya against the incursions of the Absynthii, and then made war on the inhabitants of Lampsacus, Lampsaki, who took him prisoner. Cræsus, king of Lydia, who was his particular friend, procured his liberty by threatening the Lampsaceni with his vengeance, if they detained him in captivity. Miltiades died soon after he obtained his freedom, and, having no child, he left his kingdom and wealth to Stesagoras, son of Cimon, his maternal brother. The Chersonesites paid him divine honours after his death, and appointed games to be celebrated at a stated time; but allowed none of the Lampsaceni to enter the lists (Herod. vi. 35–38).—2. Son of Cimon, and brother of Stesagoras, who, like Miltiades, their father's half brother (for they were sons of the same mother only), died childless. The Pisistratidae sent him to Chersonesus, Thraciæ, Gallipoli, with a ship of three banks of oars to carry off his brother's property. On his arrival he kept the corpse, pretending extreme sorrow, of which the Chersonesites no sooner heard than they waited on him to express their grief at his brother's death, and sympathy with his distress, when he put them in confinement, took possession of the government, and strengthened himself in the monarchy, by marrying Hegesipyla, daughter of Olorus, king of Thraciæ. When the Scythians approached his residence, he fled; but returned on their leaving that place, which they did at the end of three years. The oracle of Apollo had ordered the inhabitants of Lemnos to submit to punishment from the Athenians; because they had treated with cruelty the Pelasgian women, whom they had carried off by violence. The Athenians demanded the country, which the Lemnians promised to give up, on their sailing to that island from Athens by a north wind. Miltiades, many years after, demanded the fulfilment of this promise, when he was tyrant of Chersonesus Thraciæ, as he could then easily sail to them with a north wind, and the Lemnians obeyed, which put that island under the government of the Athenians (Herod. iv. 137 seq.). Afterwards hearing that the Phœnicians were at Tenedos, he loaded five ships with spoils, sailed for Athens, which he reached with the loss of only one captured by the Phœnicians, on board of which was his son Mētiōchus, whom they sent to Darius. The Athenians brought Miltiades to trial for seizing the monarchy of Gallipoli, the judges acquitted him, and not long after, he was appointed commander by the votes of the people. His advice prevailed on Pōlēmārchus to risk an engagement with the Persians at Mārāthon, when measures were taken for defending the liberties of Greece against foreign invasion. In the event of failure, the Athenians resolved to prefer the dreadful alternative of death to the degradation of slavery. They elected ten praetors, each of whom had the command of the forces for one day, in turn; but they all delegated their power to Miltiades, who resolved not to engage until his own day arrived. His judicious arrangement, animated speech, and bravery of the troops secured one of the most brilliant victories recorded in history. Miltiades was wounded at Mārāthon, Marathon, which gave additional interest to his person, and heightened his character as a soldier. At a future period, his countrymen brought him again to trial, because he had failed in an attack on Pāros; the influence of his friends, added to his victories, freed him from the capital part of the charge, but they adjudged him to pay a fine of fifty talents, which he had not the means of liquidating. A mortification, arising from a wound which he received in the thigh at Pāros, terminated his life, and he left the fine to be discharged by his son. Herōdōtus does not say that he died in prison, as asserted by Cōrnēlius Nēpos and Jūstinus. Cōrnēlius Nēpos confounds the lives of Miltiades, son of Cypsēlus, and Miltiades, son of Cimon, probably from considering them the same person. His accuracy in the statement of facts merits little commendation, being frequently at variance with the narrative of Herōdōtus (Cor. Nep. Vit. Milt.).

Milvius, i, m. (pons), Ponte Molle, a bridge over Tiber, the Tevere, at Rome, which Statius calls Mileus agger (Syl. ii. 1. 176). Flāminia via commenced at this bridge. Under the emperors, Ponte Molle became the fashionable scene of midnight revelry, being out of the limits of Rome, and thus affording greater freedom to the votaries of dissipation (Tac. Ann. xlii. 47).

Milyas, ādis, f. a country of Lycia, given by the Romans to Eumēnes, king of Asia, in 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Inh. Milyae, arum, m. (Herod. vii. 77).

Mimas, āntis, m. a Trojan, the son of Amycus and Thēanō, who was the companion of Pāris and was born on the same night. He was killed by Mēzentius (Virg. Æn. x. 702).—2. A valiant soldier in the army of Etēocles, whom Hippomēdon killed in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 290).—3. A giant (Claud. xxxvi. 347).

Mimas, āntis, m. Capo Stellari, a very high mountain of Iōnia, a maritime country of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the E. by Lydia, on the N. by Eolia, on the S. by Caria, and on the W. by Mārē Aegēum, the Archipelago, Mīmāllōnes, et, Mīmāllōnides, um, f. priestesses of Bāchus, a name derived from that mountain which was sacred to the god of wine (Ov. Art. Am. i. 541). Adj. Mīmāllōnēus, a, um (Pers. Sat. i. 99).

Mimnērmus, i, m. a Grecian poet, who wrote the war of the Smyrnæi against Gyges and the Lydi, in elegiac verse. In the beginning of that poem he mentions, that there were muses, the daughters of Caelus, more ancient than the nine daughters of Jūpiter and Mnēmōsýnē, but their names have not been transmitted. From Propertius, it appears, that he wrote also love verses (i. 9. 11). Some consider him the inventor of elegiac verse, and assert, that he lived in the time of Sōlon, or a little before it.—2. A man mentioned by Ovidius. Of his history nothing is known, except what is told by the poet, who states that he had been maimed (Ib. 548).

Minācius Māgius, Mināci Māgii, m. grandson of Dēcius Māgius, and great-grandfather of the grandfather of the historian Vēllius Pātērcūlus. From that author, he appears to have been born at Aeculanum, a town of the Hirpini. In the Social war he raised a legion amongst that people, performed a signal service to the Romans, for which he obtained the freedom of the city (ii. 16).

Minclius, i, m. the Mincio, a river of Italy, which has its source in the Alps, and runs through Lācus Bēnācus, Lago di Garda, on which account, Virgilius calls this lake the father of the river, Minclius (ex) patre Bēnico. It bursts from the lake at Peschiera, through which it runs broad, deep, clear as crystal, and rapid like other mountain torrents. About twelve miles below Māntua, Mantova, it falls into the Po, after traversing a country so flat, that it is embanked to prevent inundation. Above Māntua, it spreads into Lago di Sopra, and below that town, into Lago di Infra. Virgilius was born near the banks of this river, which still retains the characteristic marks of ancient times (Virg. Æn. x. 206). Flexuosus Minclius (Claud. xii. 18).

Mindarus, i, m. a Spartan, who commanded the fleet in the Peloponnesian war, and was defeated by the Athenians near Abidos (Sēstos, Just.), in 410 B. C. His armament consisted of sixty-eight ships (Thucyd. viii. 85—104). The account of Jūstinus is too concise for comparing with that of Thucydides, since the former makes the loss of ships, on the part of the Macedonians, eighty (v. 4).

Minerva, æ, f. the goddess of war, of wisdom, and of the arts and sciences. She is said to have sprung from the brain of Jūpiter, full grown and completely armed, upon the head of that god being, at his own request, split by Vūlcānus with the stroke of an axe. It was chiefly among the Romans that she was known by this name. The Greeks called her Athēnē, Pallas, &c., which also occur in Latin poetry. She was a great benefactress to the human race, and taught them many of the useful arts. Though not perfect, her character is more respectable than that of any other heathen deity. She was represented in different ways, according to the different arts over which she presided. Among trees, the elm was sacred to Minerva; among birds, the owl and the cock; and among reptiles, the dragon. Pausanias mentions some of the statues of that goddess, which appear to have been painted (i. 14). The Ægis of Minerva was borrowed from the inhabitants of Africa, near the lake Tritōnis, and the name derived from the fringed and dyed goatskin worn by them in the worship of that goddess (Herod. iv. 183 seq.). Minervæ prōmōntōrium, Capo della Minerva, the extremity of Campānia, towards the Picentini (Liv. xl, 18). Minervālia, ium (Sing. Minervālis, ālis, e, Minervālis, is), n. festivals in honour of Minerva; also entrance money paid by scholars on their first going to school. Intempestiva Minerva, unseasonable work; i. e. work done at an unseasonable or improper time (Ov. Met. iv. 33). Adj. Minervālis, is, e, of Minerva, of learning, et. Minervius, a, um, of Minerva, of Attica, of Athena, Athenian, from her being the protectress of that city which bore her name.

Minervium, i, n. Castro, a town of Calabria, called also Castrum, v. Arx Minervæ (Liv. xlv. 16).

Minio, ōnis, m. a particular favourite of Antiochus, king of Syria, whom that monarch appointed to treat with the Roman ambassadors, sent for that purpose to Ephesus, in 195 B. C. Ignorant of the state of foreign nations, consequently ill qualified for his office, the conference terminated without any beneficial result. In the battle at Thyatira, Minio, Zenxis, and Philippus, master of the elephants, commanded the centre of the army (Liv. xxxv. 15 seq.).

Minio, ōnis, m. the Mugone, a river of Etruria, Tuscany (Virg. Æn. x. 183).

Minithya, v. Thalēstris, is, et. Thalēstris, v. f. a queen of the Amazons, who continued thirteen days with Alexander the Great, on purpose to have a child by him. Justinus in other places says twenty-five (xii. 3). She seems to have been the last queen of that nation (Just. ii. 3 seq.). This may be considered doubtful, since Arrianus maintains that the Amazons ceased to exist as a nation, before the time of that warrior.

Minus Cerrivius, Minii Cerrivii, m. son of Paculla Ania, a Campanian, priestess of Bacchus, who first initiated men, and they were her own sons. Minus was one of the chief priests, and founders of the Bacchanalia. When brought before the consul, he confessed his guilt, and was sent to Ardēa, to be kept in custody there, and care taken that he should neither escape, nor kill himself (Liv. xxxix. 13-19).

Minus, i, m. the Minho, a river of Spain, which falls into the Atlantic Ocean, after a westerly course of 410 miles.

Minos, ōis, m. a king of Crēta, Candia, son of Jupiter and Europa, who framed a code of laws for the government of his subjects, pretending that he received them from Jupiter, in order that they might have greater influence and solemnity; hence Horatius says he was admitted to the secrets of Jupiter (Od. i. 28. 9). This, however, in the ancient style of writing, may mean nothing more, than that he was eminent for moderation, wisdom, and justice. These qualities raised him so high in the opinion of his subjects, that they constituted him one of the judges of the infernal regions after his death (Minos fecerit splendida arbitria de te, Minos shall have pronounced an honourable sentence on you, viz., from the manner in which your life has been spent, Hor. Od. iv. 7. 21). He married Pasiphæ, daughter of Sol and Pērseis, or, according to Asclepiades, Crētē, daughter of Astrivus, who left no male children at his death, and therefore Minos assumed the government, a measure which the Creteans opposed. To convince them that his reign had the approbation of the gods, he declared, that whatever he would ask would be granted, and therefore while sacrificing to Neptūnus, he begged that god to send him a bull from the bottom of the sea. Neptūnus complied, but Minos sent that bull to his herds, and sacrificed another in his stead. To this violation of the vow, may be referred the displeasure of Neptūnus, the criminality of Pasiphæ, and the birth of Minotaurus. Warned by the oracles, he confined this monster within the walls of the labyrinth which Dædalus had constructed, and which, from its inextricable mazes, prevented escape. According to Apollodorus, the immoralities of Minos excited the jealousy of Pasiphæ, who had recourse to certain sorceries to prevent his infidelity. On the death of his son Andrōgeos, whom the Athenian wrestlers had murdered, he fitted out a powerful fleet, besieged Athens, and attacked Mēgāra. Of the latter he obtained possession by the perfidy of the king's daughter Scylla q. v. At his entreaty, Jupiter punished the Athenians with famine and pestilence, from which they obtained no alleviation by putting to death the daughter of Hylæanthus, in the tomb of Gorgæstus, a Cyclops; they consulted the oracle, by which they were ordered to submit to whatever terms Minos should prescribe, and he ordered fourteen of their youth, seven boys and seven girls, to be sent annually to Candia, to be devoured by the Minotaur. Hylæus says, that Andrōgeos was killed in battle, that Minos conquered the Athenians, and that he imposed the annual sacrifice of fourteen of their children, as one of the conditions of peace. The account of Pausanias does not materially differ from that of Hylæus. Geminus filius Minōis, i. e. Minotaurus (Manil. iv. 782). Minōis, Idis, f. Arīadnē, daughter of Minos (Ov. Met. viii. 174). Adj. Minōius, et. Minōus, a, um. Minōia regna, i. e. Crētam (Virg. Æn. vi. 14). Minōus Thōas (Ov. Ep. vi. 114).

Minotaurus, i, m. a monster, having the head of a bull, and the rest of the body that of a man, according to Apollodorus (iii. 13) but according to Ovidius, half the body only was human (Art. Am. ii. 24). Pausanias seems doubtful whether Minotaurus was a man or a monster, although he is rather inclined to the latter, because in his own age, women had produced more wonderful births than that of the Minotaur. He adds, that Thēseus was represented, in a painting of Bathycles, as leading the Minotaur in chains; but Hylæus says that Thēseus killed him, which he accomplished by means of information received from Arīadnē, daughter of Minos. From what is narrated by Pausanias there can be no doubt, that the fiction originated in Taurus from Crēta, Candia, who ravaged part of the territory of Greece, and was naturally called Minōia Taurus, from his having been sent by that monarch, which would be gradually shortened into Minotaurus, agreeably to the analogy of the Greek language, and from Taurus signifying a bull. Statius writes Minōi brachia tauri (Ach. l. 192).

Minoturnæ arum, f. La barca del Garigliano, a town of Lätium, now in ruins. It covered a considerable extent of ground on Liris, the Garigliano, about four miles from the mouth of that river. The intervening space between the town and the sea, was covered by the sacred groves of Mārica, the mother of Latinus, and marshes which rendered the air unwholesome by noxious vapours. When Sūlla forced C. Mārius to flee from Rome, he concealed himself in these well known marshes, where he was discovered and dragged to Mintūrnæ. These pestilential fens modern industry has not only drained, but cultivated and rendered fertile.—2. A town of the Ausōnes, betrayed into the hands of the Romans, in 314 B. C. A colony was sent to this town as a protection against the Sāmītes, in 298 B. C. (Liv. ix. 25—x. 21). Inh. Mintūrnēnses, ium (Sing. Mintūrnēnsis, is), m. claimed an exemption from the land service, in 209 B. C., which the Roman senate refused, and from sea service in 193 B. C., which met with a similar denial. They embraced the interest of Sūlla. Adj. Mintūrnēnsis, is, e.

Minūcia, æ, f. a vestal virgin, who, having violated her chastity, was buried alive at Porta Cōllina, on the right hand of the road in Scēlērātus Cāmpus, so called from her criminality, 336 B. C. (Liv. viii. 15). In it, all convicted of the same breach of law, suffered the same punishment.

Minūcius, i, m. the præfect of Minūci Cāstella, under C. Jūlius Cæsar. Several editions of Lūcānus have Nūmīcius, and derive the name either from its founder, or from the river in Lātium on which it stood; but Minūcius is the best reading (Phar. vi. 126).

Minūcius Crispus, Minūci Crispi, m. an officer under Cæsar, and governor of Bithynia (Ap. Bel. Civ. 576).

Minūcius Jūstus, Minūci Jūsti, m. præfect of the camp, whose severity provoked the fury of the soldiers. By joining Vespasianus, he saved his life (Tac. Hist. iii. 7).

Minūcius Thērmus, Minūci Thērmī, m. a Roman knight, accused and condemned, but he saved his life by giving evidence against others (Tac. Ann. vi. 7).

C. Minūcius, C. Minūci, m. a spearman of the fourth legion, who, in an engagement between the Romans and Pŷrrhus, proved to his countrymen, what they appear to have scarcely believed, that the elephants might be killed. He cut off the proboscis of one, and the animal soon after died (Flor. i. 18).

L. Minūcius, L. Minūci, m. one of the ten men elected through the interest of Appius Claudius, for framing the laws which formed the two additional tables to the ten that had been just ratified, in 451 B. C. From the character given by Livius, L. Minūcius and his colleagues appear to have been persons of very inferior distinction (iii. 35).

—2. A president of the market at Rome, in 439 B. C., a year of great scarcity. To him the senate were indebted for information respecting the treasonable intentions of Sp. Mælius, for which the senate presented him with an ox with gilded horns, and a statue on the outside of the gate Trigēmina. Both marks of respect had the approbation of the common people, as Minūcius had sold to them at a very low price, the grain which Mælius had bought on purpose to obtain their votes for the crown (Liv. iv. 12—16).—3. A lieutenant-general of Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who was his brother, and commanded in the north of Spain, in 182 B. C. (Liv. xl. 35).

L. Minūcius, L. Minūci, m. surnamed

Augūrinus, was consul in 458 B. C., when he marched against the Æqui, but from fear allowed them to besiege him in his camp, on which L. Quinctius Cincinnātus was elected dictator, and he soon compelled the enemy to surrender at discretion. As a mark of disgrace, the dictator compelled Minūcius to resign his consulship, and to serve under the title of legātus (Liv. iii. 25—29).

L. Minūcius Bāsilius, L. Minūci Bāsili, m. an officer under Sūlla (Val. Max. ix. 4).

—2. One of Cæsar's officers. To C. Fābius, and L. Minūcius Bāsilius, he gave the joint command of two legions, which were stationed among the Rēmi (Cæs. B. G. vi. 28 seq.).

L. Minūcius Myrtilus, L. Minūci Myrtilli, m. a Roman, charged with the crime of having beaten the Carthaginian ambassadors, on which account M. Claudius, city prætor, delivered him, and his associate in guilt, L. Mānlius, over to these ambassadors, by whom they were sent to Carthage, in 189 B. C. Valerius Māximus says this was done by a decree of the senate, and that the order of the prætor was executed by the feciales (Liv. xxxviii. 42. Val. Max. vi. 6).

L. Minūcius Thērmus, L. Minūci Thērmī, m. a lieutenant-general under the consul A. Mānlius, in Istria (Liv. xli. 8).

M. Minūcius, M. Minūci, m. a tribune of the people, who, in conjunction with two of his colleagues, accused two military tribunes of consular authority, in 400 B. C. (Liv. v. 11).—2. Surnamed Augūrinus, was consul at Rome, in 497 B. C., the year in which a temple was dedicated to Satūrnus, and the Satūrnalia instituted. Six years after, he obtained the same office (Liv. ii. 21—34).—3. A tribune of the people, who proposed, that three public bankers should be appointed at Rome, in 218 B. C., in consequence of the scarcity of money (Liv. xxiii. 21).

M. Minūcius Fēssus, M. Minūci Fēsi, m. one of the first plebeian augurs at Rome. He was chosen in 302 B. C. (Liv. x. 9).

M. Minūcius Rūfus, M. Minūci Rūfi, m. named master of the horse by Q. Fābius Māximus, dictator. His conduct in that office was not distinguished by prudence, moderation, or military talents. He inveighed with great violence against the judicious measures adopted by Fābius, endeavoured to raise himself in the opinion of the army by underrating the merits, and misrepresenting the motives, of his superior officer. The impetuous ardour of the Romans for engaging the Carthaginians, and their consequent dislike of the inactivity to which they were subjected by the caution of Fābius, induced them to listen with eagerness to the inflammatory harangues of Minūcius, which nearly brought the army to a state of mutiny. Matters of religion requiring the presence of the dictator at Rome, he left the command of the army to the master of the horse, strictly commanding, and even requesting him, not to come to an engagement with Hānnibal. Minūcius, disregarding both the order and entreaty of the dictator, took an early opportunity of gratifying the army, by leading them on to battle. In this encounter he was not unsuccessful, of which he sent an exaggerated account to Rome, and thus excited odium against the dictator, and procured such favour to himself, that he was appointed his equal in command, a measure wholly without precedent. When Fabius returned to the army, and the order of the senate was communicated to him, the troops were divided betwixt them, and each formed a separate camp. The rashness of Minucius soon led him into an ambush, artfully laid for him by Hannibal, in which, it is probable, the greater part of the forces under him would have fallen, had not Fabius, when all hope was lost, come up for their deliverance. Minucius, conscious of the impropriety of his conduct, confessed his error to his own troops, avowed his intention of putting himself and them immediately under the dictator again, declared he looked on him as his father, and that they should consider his troops as their patrons, since they owed their lives to them. He instantly marched all under his command to the camp of Fabius, saluted him with the title of Father, and his troops hailed the soldiers of the dictator with the title of Patrons. From that period he acted under the orders of Fabius, but each seems to have retained their own army. Minucius was killed in the battle at Cannæ. He had been master of the horse during the year preceding, and had, in 223 B. C., been consul with P. Cornélius Scipio Asiaticus (Liv. xxii. 8-49). To him Silius Italicus alludes (vii. 386).—2. Elected prætor in 199 B. C., and obtained the foreign jurisdiction. Four years after, he was appointed a triumvir for settling a colony at Vibo, and afterwards sent an ambassador to Africa, in order to decide a controversy betwixt Masiussa and the Carthaginians (Liv. xxxii. 27 seq.).—3. A Roman, descended from a patrician family, who had for his colleague in the consulship Sp. Postumius Albinus, in 112 B. C. In the allotment of the provinces, Minucius obtained Mæcedonia, and he carried on a successful war against the Thracians (Liv. Ep. 65), conquering the Scordisci and Treballi in Mæcedonia (Eutrop. iv. 27). Sallustius calls him Quintus (Jug. 33), whilst in Livius and the consular calendar he is called Marcus. Errors in the prænomens frequently occur in the writings of Sallustius. Adj. Minucius, a. um. Minucia porticus (Vel. Pat. ii. 8).

P. Minucius, P. Minucii, m. a military tribune in the army of L. Cornélius Mærcula in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 5).

Q. Minucius, Q. Minucii, m. surnamed Augurinus, a noble Roman, who held the consulship with C. Horiæus Pulvillus, in 457 B. C. He marched against the Sabines, who had begun to plunder the Roman territories; but did not come up with them (Liv. iii. 30).—2. A lieutenant-general of Appius Claudius Pulcher (Liv. xxvi. 33).—3. A military tribune in the army of L. Cornélius Mærcula in 195 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 5).—4. A lieutenant-general, sent with ten ships to Cræta, Candia, in 176 B. C., to quiet the contentions which existed among the natives, and had driven them to war (Liv. xli. 25).

Q. Minucius Rufus, Q. Minucii Rufi, m. on being elected prætor, obtained Bruttium ager for his province, where he found the temple of Proserpina at Locri had been plundered, and he replaced the money taken by that sacrilegious robbery, out of the funds of the culprits. His fidelity in this part of duty procured a continuance of the office, and in 129 B. C. he obtained the consulship, when Italy was decreed the province of himself and colleague; because two plebeian tribunes maintained, that recalling the commanders annually had protracted the war in Mæcedonia, and, therefore, T. Quinctius Flamininus should not be recalled. The consuls then conducted the armies to the north of Italy, against the Gauls, where their success did credit to their talents, and to the bravery of their troops. Neither the people nor the senate seemed willing to grant him the honour of a triumph, which they readily granted to his colleague, C. Cornélius Cethegus, and for that reason he triumphed on the Alban mount. At a future period, he was one of the ten ambassadors sent to settle affairs in Asia, and afterwards to France (Liv. xxxi. 4 seq.).

Q. Minucius Thérus, Q. Minucii Thérmi, m. was appointed a tribune of the people in 203 B. C., when the whole thirty-five tribes voted that P. Cornélius Scipio should be commander-in-chief in Africa. He and M. Acilius Glabrio opposed the wishes of the consul Cn. Cornélius Lentulus, who was anxious to have Africa for his province. After passing through the office of curule edile, the government of Spain fell to his lot, on obtaining the prætorship, and his success in that country secured him the honour of a triumph. In 195 B. C., he was raised to the consulship, the lots gave him the command in Ligúria, in which he declined to engage the natives, as his troops were undisciplined. So critical was the situation of the army, that he refused to obey the order of the senate, requiring his attendance at Rome to hold the elections. Neither this disobedience nor his aversion to engage the enemy had subjected him to censure, for he was continued in command, with a supplement of nearly ten thousand foot and horse, and, after some very narrow escapes, fought a pitched battle, in which he killed nine thousand, and drove the rest to their camp, which they deserted next day. After this defeat, the Ligúres attacked him in his camp, displayed much courage, and fled after they had four thousand men killed. Minucius afterwards returned to Rome in expectation of a triumph, which the senate refused. He was one of the ten ambassadors sent to Ephesus, on purpose to settle affairs betwixt Antiochus, king of Syria, and certain Asiatic states in 191 B. C. Minucius fell in battle with the Thracians, leaving the character of a brave and gallant officer (Liv. xxx. 40 seq.).—2. A prætor who, with five cohorts, fled from Igúvium, Gubbio, on the approach of Cúrio, with three cohorts, whom Cæsar had sent to take possession of that town (Flor. iv. 2).

T. Minucius, T. Minucii, m. surnamed Augurinus, was consul in 306 B. C., when he attacked and defeated the Samnites. At the end of the first engagement, his colleague came up, and completed the slaughter of the enemy, not allowing a single man to escape. The united army gained other advantages, for which they had the honour of a triumph. Some authors state, that Minucius was brought back to the camp severely wounded, and died next day; but this does not appear to have been the opinion of Livius (lx. 44).

T. Minucius Mollécus, T. Minucii Mollécii, m. was elected prætor, obtained the foreign jurisdiction at Rome, in 182 B. C., and died, a few months after, of a plague which raged for three years, and threatened to depopulate the city (Liv. xl. 35 seq.).

T. Minūcius Rūfus, T. Minūciū Rūfū, m. an officer in the Roman army, who, with Hippās, prætor of the Thessalians, entered the town Gyrton, which protected it against Pērseus, king of Mācēdōniā, in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 54).

Minyas, m. v. Minyēus, i. m. a king of Boōtia, son of Nēptūnus and Tritōgēnia, who had several daughters, from whom, according to some authors, the most distinguished of the Argonauts were descended (Apol. Rhod. i. 233), hence they were called Minja. Apollōdōrus mentions that Alcimēdē, the mother of Iāson, was the daughter of Clēmēnē, a daughter of Minyas. From this monarch the inhabitants of Boōtia were called Minyæ, a colony of whom settled in Thēssaliā, Thessaly, whose chief town was Iōlchos, and who accompanied Iāson to Cōlchis. Being driven out by the Pēlāsgī, they took possession of the summits of Tāygētus, whence the Spartans invited them to their territory (Val. Max. iv. 6). From them some authors derive that appellation of the Argonauts (Hyg. 14. Strab. 601). Minyēias, Iādos, v. Minyēis, ēidos, f. a daughter of Minyas. Ancient authors are agreed in making the daughters of Minyas three in number (Triplices Minyēidas, Ov. Met. iv. 425); but are divided with respect to their names. We find them called Alcithōē, Lēucippē, and Lēucōnōē; Iris, Clēmēnē, and Alcithōē; and Arsinōē, Alcithōē, and Lēucōnōē. Adj. Minyēus, a. um. Minyētia Prōtes, the offspring of Minyas, i. e. his three daughters, who, for refusing to acknowledge the divinity of Bāchus, and for deriding his orgies, were transformed into bats (Ov. Met. iv. 389). See Alcithōē.

Minyēlus, i. m. a river, which falls into the sea near Arēnē (Hom. II. xi. 721).

Mirmydōnis, is. f. a woman of Lēmnos, Stalimen, who murdered Gyas (Stat. Th. v. 224).

Misagēnes, v. Musicānes, is (acc. en. v. em.), m. a son of Māsīnēssa, king of Nūmīdiā, sent with auxiliaries in aid of the Romans against Pērseus, king of Mācēdōniā, in 173 B. C. The troops under this prince consisted of a thousand foot, a thousand horse, and twenty-two elephants. At the conclusion of the war, the consul, L. Æmilius Paulus, directed him to return to Africa; but he was driven by a storm into Brūndisium, Brindisi, with only three ships. The senate sent L. Stērtinius, quæstor, to him there, in bad health, with presents of the same kind with those given to his brother Mūsāba at Rome (Liv. xlii. 29 seq.).

Misēnus, i. m. the companion of Hēctor, eminent both as a musician and a soldier. After the death of that hero, he attached himself to Ænēas, and was drowned by Triton, both from jealousy of his talents, and from his having challenged the gods to contest. Virgilius calls him Æolides, which Servius explains, by observing that sound is produced from wind, not that he was really a son of Æōlus; but in the same manner as soldiers are said to be sons of Mārs, sailors of Nēptūnus, &c. He was buried at the foot of Mōns Misēnus, Capo di Miseno, in Cāmpā-nīa, where there was also a cognominal town, of which some ruins still remain. It had an excellent harbour, in which Augūstus stationed a fleet for the protection of the western coast of Italy. Inh. Misēnenses, v. Misēnates, i. m. Adj. Misēnensis, is. e. Misēnensis (ager) (Plin. iii. 444). Misēnensis clāssis (Tac. Hist. iii. 57).

Misēricōrdia, æ. f. Pity; worshipped by the Athenians only of all the Greeks (Paus. i. 17).

Misitius, i. m. a native of Rāvēnna, who, at an advanced age, suffered a personal injury from the priests of Cýbēlē, in place of the boy Achillas (Mart. iii. 91).

Mistýllus, i. m. the cook of Æmīlianus, to whom he gave this name from messallas in Hōmērus (Il. ii. 428); on which Mārtialis writes an epigram (i. 51).

Mithracēnes, is. m. a man who, with Orsillos, informed Alexander the Great that the Persians were only distant five hundred stadia, and they offered to act as guides (Curt. v. 13).

Mithrādātes, v. Mitrādātes, is. m. the hero who saved the life of Cýrus, king of Pērsia, when an infant (Herod. i. 110).

Mithras, v. Mithres, æ. m. the sun. Among the Persians chiefly, the sun had this name (Strab.).

Mithrēnes, is. m. the governor of Sārdes, who betrayed the city to Alexander the Great, after the battle on Granicus, the Ostrota. He accompanied that hero, who afterwards gave him Armēniā (Curt. iii. 12).

Mithridātes, is. m. the ally of Clēarchus, through whom he was recalled to his native country, and against whom he laid snares; thus turning him from a friend to an enemy, about 364 B. C. (Just. xvi. 4).—2. A son of Antiochus, king of Sýria, whom that monarch sent with his brother Ardýes and the army to Sārdes, with orders to wait there for his arrival (Liv. xxxiii. 19).—3. A king of Pōntus and ally of the Romans, from whom they received assistance in the war against Aristōnicus, and, in return for his good offices, he received Phrygiā Māior, on the conquest of that usurper. He died about 125 B. C., and was succeeded by his son of the same name, then very young (Just. xxxvii. 1).—4. Son of the former, a king of Pōntus, who was distinguished for his personal bravery and military knowledge. He was the sixteenth in descent from Dārius, the last king of the Persians, and the eighth from the Mithridātes who founded the kingdom of Pōntus. During forty-six years (forty, Flor. iii. 5), he successfully resisted the armies of Rome; but, after being deserted by his allies, betrayed by his son Phārnāces, and frequently defeated by the Romans, was at his own request slain by a Gaul, that he might not fall into the hands of his enemies.

Mithridātes put to death not only a number of his commanders and friends, but many of his own sons (Ap. Bel. Mith. 248). The constitution of this monarch was so fortified by antidotes, of which he is said to have been the inventor, because his tutors frequently attempted to cut him off in that way, that the strongest and most active poisons had no effect on him. Dreading he might be cut off by the sword, since poison had often failed, he fled to the woods, supported life by hunting, and by daily exercise acquired prodigious strength. Unknown to all, he remained seven years in this condition, nor did he return to Pōntus till he had conquered the Scythians, and had distinguished himself as a very brave and successful commander. His sister and wife, Lāōdicē, after bearing a son to him, became licentious, from a conviction that he was not in life, and to conceal her crime, she attempted to procure his death, of which a servant girl gave him notice, and he immediately punished the guilty (Just. xxxvii. 1 seq.). Jūvénālīs calls him ter cictus rex, the thrice conquered king, from the victories gained over him by L. Cōrnēlius Sūlla, L. Licīnīus Lūcūllus, and Cn. Pōmpeius (Sat. vi. 660). The second Mithridatic war lasted only three years (Ap. Bel. Mith. 214 seq.). Vēllēus Pātērcūlus gives his character (ii. 18). Adj. Mithridatēus, Mithridatīcus, et, Mithridatīus, a, um. Mithridatēi vultūs, the countenance or face of Mithridates, i. e. golden vessels, on which was represented the face of that monarch (Manil. v. 510). Mithridatēa nōmina (Ov. Met. xv. 755). Mithridatēum antidōtum, an antidote against poison, invented by Mithridates; the component parts of which Plīnius describes (iv. 291). Mithridatēa victōria, the victory of Mithridates (Plin. iii. 207). Mithridatēum bellum (Mart. vi. 19).—5. (I.) The second son of Arsāces Priāpātius, a man of remarkable bravery, who succeeded to the throne on the death of his elder brother Phrātēs, in 174 B. C., oppressed the Bactriāni, conquered Mēdia, marched into Hīrcāniā, and added Elymāis to his dominions, after which he died, says Jūstinus, in a glorious old age, 137 B. C. (Just. xli. 5, 6).—6. (II.) Succeeded his father Artābānus II. in the throne of Pārthia, in 124 B. C., made war on many of the neighbouring nations, whom he added to his kingdom, avenged the death of his father by a successful war against the Scythians, and at last made war on Ortoadistes, king of Armēniā. Jūstinus confounds this king with Mithridates III., although three kings reigned between them (Just. xlii. 2).—7. (III.) Son and successor of Phrātēs III., assumed the reins of government in 61 B. C., and was killed in 54 B. C. by his brother Orōdes I. q. v. (Just. xlii. 4).—8. A descendant of the great Mithridates, whom the emperor Claudius made king of Bōspōrus. After he had been driven from his dominions, and had wandered about forlorn and helpless, he attacked the king of the Dāndāridē, and made himself master of his dominions. Fortune soon deserted him, and, in his distress, he applied to Eunōnes, who acted the part of a mediator between him and the Romans. Jūlius Cīlo, governor of Pōntus, to whom this monarch had been given up, brought him to Rome, where he showed a mind superior to his misfortunes. The emperor exhibited him as a spectacle to the people, and he stood unmoved at the gaze of the multitude, with his natural resolution strongly depicted in his countenance. Like his ancestor, he possessed the talents of an intrepid warrior, and an active enemy (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—21).—9. A king of Ibēria, and brother of Pharāsmānes, who obtained possession of Armēniā, from which Rhādāmīstus, his brother's son, expelled him; when he threw himself into the fort Gōrncās. Rhādāmīstus having decoyed him into a conference, bound him with fetters, and afterwards smothered him to death. From Tācītus we learn, that Mithridates incurred the displeasure of his subjects by his oppression and severity (Ann. vi. 32 seq.).

Mithrōbārzānes, is, m. an officer in the army of Tigrānes, king of Armēniā (Ap. Bel. Mith. 228).

Mitra, ae, f. the Vēnus of the Persians (Herod. i. 131).

Mitylēnē, es, v. Mitylēna, ae, Plur. Mitylēnae, arum, f. Mityleni, the principal city of Lēsbos, which now gives name to the island. It was celebrated for its numerous magnificent buildings, but more remarkable for the many great characters who were natives of it. Among the number were Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, &c. Mitylēnē was long eminent as a seat of learning, and many illustrious men, both Greeks and Romans, were educated at this city. Caesar received a civic crown at the storming of this place (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 2). Pulchra Mitylēnē (Hor. Epis. i. 11. 17). Inh. Mitylēnai, orum, m. From Mārtiālis, the men appear to have been beautiful, at least in early life (vii. 79). Adj. Mitylēneus, a, um. Mitylēneum vulgus (Luc. Phar. viii. 109).

Mitys, is, m. a river of Mācēdōniā (Liv. xli. 7).

Mnāsylus, i, m. the name of a Satyr or Faun (Virg. B. vi. 13).

Mnēmōnides, dum, f. a name of the Muses, from the Greek word μνημον, mindful. Their mother's name Mnēmōsīnē has nearly the same derivation (Ov. Met. v. 268).

Mnēmōsīnē, es, f. the mother of the Muses by Jūpiter, who assumed the appearance of a herdsman, and in that form deluded her (Ov. Met. vi. 114).

Mnēsārchus, i, m. the father of Pūthāgōras q. v. (Herod. iv. 95).

Mnēsīlōchus, i, m. a nobleman of the Acūrnānes, whom Antiōchus, king of Sīria, bribed over to his interest, and, through him, Clītus, their pretor. By means of the private and treacherous intercourse which these noblemen had with Antiōchus, Mēdion was betrayed into his hands. The Romans demanded that Mnēsīlōchus, Philo, Eubūldas, Thōas, and Hannibal should be delivered up, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvi. 11 seq.).

Mnēster, ēris, m. a freedman of Jūlia Agrīppīna, who killed himself on seeing her funeral pile lighted, either from respect to his mistress, or dread of her enemies (Tac. Ann. xiv. 9).—2. A man involved in the guilt of Mēssālina, put to death by order of the emperor Claudius. Moved with compassion at his supplication, Claudius would have spared his life, had not his freedman interposed and urged his death, alleging that he could not preserve a player, after so many illustrious men had been put to death on the same account (Tac. Ann. xi. 36). The readings in Tācītus are different, some editions have Nesteris, or Nestoris, and others Vālērīi.

Mnēsthōus, ēos, m. one of the Trojan commanders, who accompanied Ænēas into Italy. He was a man of great spirit and bravery, one of those who contended for the naval prize. He sailed the ship Pristis. Like the other competitors, he displayed great earnestness, and was rewarded with a coat of mail, of great weight, richly ornamented, which Ænēas had taken from Dēmolōes, although his ship had been surpassed by the Scylla, which Clānthus commanded. Ænās offered a prize to the best marksman with the arrow. The mark was a pigeon suspended from the mast of the ship, Cēntaurus. Mæstheus presented himself among the candidates, and although he missed the bird, his arrow broke the thread or string, on which the pigeon flew off, and was shot on the wing by Eurýtion (Virg. Æn. v. 116 seq.). The clan of the Mēmūli (gēns Mēmūlia) traced their origin from Mæstheus (Virg. Æn. v. 117).

Mæsus, i, m. a noble Pæonian, killed by Achilles (Hom. Il. xxi. 210).

Muēvis, is, m. the ancient name of Apis q. v. This, however, does not appear to be the idea of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 14).

Mōgētes, is, m. tyrant of Cibyra, whom the Roman consul Cn. Mānlius Vūlso compelled to pay one hundred talents, and to furnish ten thousand mēdiani of grain in 191 B. C. Besides Cibyra, Scylēum and Alimnē were under his government. He appears to have been a man of great meanness and insincerity (Liv. xxxviii. 14).

Mōscires, is, m. son of Phrātes I., succeeded Mithridates II. in the throne of Pārthia, in 87 B. C., died in 76 B. C., and was succeeded by Sinatrocēs.

Mōdia, æ, f. a rich, childless, aged widow. Juvēnālīs represents the prætor hastening to salute her, most probably in expectation of inheriting either the whole, or part of her wealth (Sat. iii. 130).

Mēnicæptus, i, m. a Gallic chieftain, killed in the battle at Aurūx, v. Auringis, a town of Spain (Liv. xxiv. 42).

Menis, is, v. Mænus, i, m. the Mein, a considerable river of Germany, which has its source in Franconia, runs by Bamberg, Wurtsburg, Hanau, and Frankfort, after which it falls into Rhēnus, the Rhine, near Mōgūntiācum, Mentz (Tac. Mor. Ger. 28).

Mæra, æ, f. a priestess of Egēa Vēnus, who, contrary to the conditions of office, had two sons, called by Stātius, Hēlēāōnes. Both fell by the hand of Tydeūs, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. viii. 477).

Mæris, is, v. Idīs, m. the name of a magician, who, by the power of herbs, could transform himself into a wolf, raise the souls of the dead from their tombs, and transport growing crops from one place to another (Virg. B. viii. 96).—2. A king of Egypt, whose most celebrated work seems to be that of the lake, which bears his name.—3. A king of the Delta of India, called Pātālēuē, from the chief town, Pātāla, who deserted his city on the approach of Alexander, who took possession of it, and plundered his territories (Curt. ix. 8).—4. The steward or manager of the farm of Virgilius, according to Sērvius, but Catrow makes him the father of Virgilius; both are mere conjectures.

Mæris, is, v. Idīs, f. a lake, in Egypt, of two hundred and fifty thousand paces in circumference, or, according to others, four hundred and fifty thousand and fifty, deep (Plin. i. 553). Strābo does not mention either the circumference or depth of this lake; but says, that it resembles a sea, both from its extent, and the colour of its waters (1147).

Mæsia, v. Mýsia, æ, f. a country of Europe, bounded on the north by Dānūbius, the Danube, on the west by Pānnōnia, and on the east by Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea, comprehended the countries now called Serbia, and Bulgaria, anciently divided into Mæsia Supērior, and Mæsia Infērior; hence Suetōnius, Exercitus Mæsarum (Vitel. 15). Inh. Mæsi, v. Mýsi, orum (Sing. Mæsus, v. Mýsus, i), m. According to Plīnius, the Dārdāni, Celegeri, Trībālli, Tināchi, besides Thrāces and Scythæ, were also inhabitants of Mæsia (i. 386). M. Licīnius Crissus carried on war against the Mæsi, together with the Bāsīrnæ and other nations, in 29 B. C. (Liv. Ep. i. 34). Adj. Mæsius, Mæsiacus, et, Mýsus, a, um. Mæsiacæ gēntis (Plin. i. 404). Mæsiaci exērellus (Suet. Vesp. 6).—2. A city of Pārthia, near the Caspian Sea (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Mōgūntiācum, i, n. v. Mōgūntiācus, i, f. Mentz, a city of Germany, situated at the confluence of Rhēnus, the Rhine, and the Maine. The public buildings in Mentz are magnificent; but the houses, in general, are of mean appearance, and the fortifications of no great strength. It gives name to the electorate in which it stands, and has a bride of boats over the Rhine. Pōstūmus, who usurped the government of Gāllia, France, was killed by his soldiers, about the year 264, because he would not give up to them Mōgūntiācum to be plundered (Eutrop. ix. 9).

Mōlion, ōnis, m. the charioteer and companion of Thymbræus, in the Trojan army, killed by Ulysses (Hom. Il. xi. 322).

Mōlōnes, um, m. two brothers, sons of Actor, hence called Actōrīōnes (Hom. Il. xi. 708 seq.).

Mōlo, ōnis, m. See Apōllōnius Mōlo.

Mōlōrchus, i, m. according to some authors, was a pilot of great nautical knowledge (Stat. Syl. iii. 2. 30). There are editions of Stātius which read Mōlōrchus, v. Mōlōrtus, denoting an instrument, for ascertaining the depth of the sea, called, by the Greeks, Cātāpirāter, a word adopted by Lucilius in the following line, Et cātāpirāterus eodem deferat uncum, which ought to read thus, Hanc cātāpirātem puer eodem deferat uncum, making the word cātāpirātes, not cātāpirāter.

Mōlōcis, ōntis, m. a river of Bæōtia (Herod. ix. 57).

Mōlōrchus, i, m. a poor man of Clēōnē, who earned his subsistence by the labour of his hands. He entertained Hērclēs when he went to destroy the Nemean lion, to which Stātius alludes (Th. iv. 169). Dives Mōlōrchus (Mart. iv. 64). Adj. Mōlōrchēus, a, um. Mōlōrchēa tēcta, the hut or cottage of Mōlōrchus, in which Hērclēs was entertained (Th. iv. 1. 13).

Mōlōssia, æ, v. Mōlōssis, Idīs, f. the most southern district of Epirus, Lower Albania, having Sinus Ambrācius, the Gulf of Arta, on the south; Thēssālia, Thessaly, on the east; and Mārē Ionīum on the west. It was famous for its dogs, of which Aristōtēles says, there were two sorts; a shepherd's dog, large, and fierce against wild beasts, the other used for hunting. The former kind was, perhaps, the same, or nearly the same, with our bull-dog or mastiff (Virg. G. iii. 405. Hor. Epod. vi. 5). Inh. Mōlōssi, orum, m. According to Jūstinus, they were the founders of the kingdom of Epirus (xvii. 3). Adj. Mōlōssus, et, Mōlōssicus, a, um. Mōlōssus rēx, Pýrrhus (Juv. Sat. xii. 108); Mūnŷchus (Ov. Met. xiii. 717). Insāni Mōlakai (cānes), the dogs of Acteon (Stat. Th. iii. 203).

Mōlpeus, ēos, m. a man whom Pērsēus wounded in the leg. He was a native of Chāōnīa, in Epirus, Lower Albania; hence, Chāōnīus Mōlpeus (Ov. Met. v. 163).

Mōlus, i, m. father of Mērlōnes, charioteer of Idōmēneus (Hom. Il. x. 269).

Mōna, e, f. (called also Mōnēda, v. Mōnāpia), the Isle of Man, an island in Océānus Vērgīnius, St. George's Channel, nearly equidistant from England, Scotland, and Ireland (Cæs. B. G. v. 13). It is thirty miles long, and about eight broad. The soil is fertile, the air salubrious, and the inhabitants live in general to a great age. The sovereignty of this island formerly belonged to the Duke of Atholl; but it was sold, in 1765, to the British government. Tacitus and others call Anglesey, Mōna, but Cæsar is more correct.

Mōneses, v. Mōnēsēs, is, m. a Parthian, who fled to M. Antōnius, on Orōdes, king of Pārthia, being killed by his son, Phrāates. He appears to have been an able officer, and successful against the Roman armies (Hor. Od. iii. 6. 9). The command of the Parthian army was conferred on him, therefore it is probable that he was at the head of the forces when Crāssus fell.—2. A nobleman of Pārthia, who commanded the cavalry which attended the person of Tiridātes, in the year 62. From Tacitus he appears to have been an officer of distinguished rank, but only a single enterprise of his, and it unsuccessful, is mentioned by this historian (Tac. Ann. xv. 2—4).

Mōnesus, i, m. a soldier, in the army of Hānñibal, killed in close fight, by Q. Fābius Māximus, the Roman dictator, in the engagement with Hānñibal, when he had led into an ambuscade the troops of M. MīnūciusRūfus, the other dictator (Sil. Ital. vii. 604).

Mōnēsēs, is, m. a Colchian, killed by a Scythian, whom Vālētus Flācus calls Cāspius, in place of Scythia (vi. 189).—2. A commander of the Colchians, slain by Cōlāxes, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 651).

Mōnēsī, orum (Sing. Mōnēsus, i), m. a people of Aquitānia (Plin. i. 487). Some critics have supposed that Mōnēsī is the true reading in Lucānus (Phar. i. 419), where most editions have Nēmētis, a word for which it is difficult to find a meaning consistent with the context. Their name is recognised in Monein, between Pau and Navarinus.

Mōnēta, e, f. (Jūno), in whose temple, at Rome, were deposited the books of the magistrates, written on linen, and money used to be coined with the impression of the face of Mōnēta, hence coin came to be called by her name. A temple to Jūno Mōnēta was built on the site of the house of M. Mānlius Cāpitōlinus (Liv. iv. 7 seq.).

Mōnētārīi, orum, m. coiners, men employed in the Mint, who, under the Roman emperors, appear to have been numerous and powerful. In the reign of Aurēlianus, they raised a rebellion, killed Fēlicissimus, the auditor of the exchequer, and attempted the subversion of government. In the suppression of that insurrection, Eutrōpius says, that the emperor exercised the greatest cruelty. These coiners had vitiated the currency, but in what manner the historian does not state (ix. 14).

Mōnīmē, es, f. daughter of Philōpōmen (Ap. Bel. Mith. 184).

Mōnimus, i, m. a Lacedæmonian ambassador, to Dārius, in 383 B. C. (Curt. iii. 13).

Mōnōbāzus, i, m. king of the Adīābēni who excited the neighbouring states to make war on Tigrānes, king of Armēnia (Tac. Ann. xv. 1).

Mōnēcus, i, m. Monaco, a seaport town of Genoa. It is generally found in the genitive Mōnēcī, governed by pōrtus, arx, &c. The full expression is Hērēulīs Mōnēcī pōrtus Ligūsticus. Mōnēcus is derived from monos, alone, and oikos, inhabiting, because Hērēulēs having defeated his enemies, either reigned there alone, or because, in his temple there, himself only, no other of the gods was worshipped. The harbour, according to Strābo, did not admit either many or large ships; but, according to other writers, it was very safe. Arx Mōnēcī, the promontory of Monaco (Virg. Æn. vi. 831).

Mōns Sācer, Mōntis Sācri, m. Monte Sacro, a small hill on the opposite side of Anō, the Teverone, from Rome, which had this name from the commons, by the advice of Sicinius, retiring to it in 494 B. C., in consequence of a dispute between them and the patricians, respecting the remission of debts, and from their taking an oath binding themselves to certain conditions. The fable of Mēnēlus Agrīppa q. v. had a powerful influence on their minds, yet they did not return till they obtained the election of tribunes of the people to guard their rights, and to protect them from oppression. Before this event, the mountain was called Vēlia, and Livius makes its distance from Rome about three miles (ii. 32).

Mōutānus, i, m. a corpulent unwieldy glutton (Juv. Sat. iv. 107).

Mōnŷchus, i, m. (μονος, one, οὐς, hoof), a centaur, who probably had this name from the centaurs being fabled to be half men and half horses, and the horse being a whole hoofed, not a cloven-hoofed, animal. He possessed prodigious strength, and threw at his enemies large trees (Juv. Sat. i. 11). With logs of wood, or trees, he overwhelmed Cānēus, who could not be wounded by any weapon. The accumulation of wood which Mōnŷchus heaped upon him occasioned his death, according to Ovidius, by suffocation, not by the pressure (Met. xii. 499).

Mōpsēlus, i, m. a knoll, half way between Lārissa and Tēmpē, Tembi, on which Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, encamped the day after he had gained the battle at Callicinus in 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 61). See Mōpsalum.

Mōpsīi, orum, m. a powerful family at Cōmpsa, Conza, who had great influence among their townsmen through the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 1). Livius calls them also Mōpsāni.

Mōpsalum, i, a. a town of Thessaly, so called from Mōpsus, one of the Lāpithæ. Strābo mentions only the town, but Livius, an eminence of that name between Tēmpē and Lārissa (xlii. 61).

Mōpsōps, ōpis, v. Mōpsōpus, i, m. a king of Athens, from whom that town received the name of Mōpsōpia, v. f. Adj. Mōpsōpius, a, um. Mōpsōpiū mūri, the walls of Athens (Ov. Met. vi. 423).

Möpsüestia, m. v. Möpsus, i. f. Messis, a town of Cilicia, which stood near Mount Taurus, on the river Sáros. It was built by Möpsus q. v. At this town Constantinus died (Amm. Mar. xxi. 15). It is very differently written (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8), and is the same with Möpsüerēnē, es, v. Möpsüerēne, arum, f.

Möpsus, i. m. a herdsman, skilled in playing on the pipe. Menälceas and he celebrated the death and apothēōsis of Dāphnis q. v. Möpsus chiefly bewails his death, and Menälceas sings his deification.—2. Son of Ampyēus and Chlōris, who, in the battle with the centaurs at the marriage of Pirithōus, killed Odites. He was a priest of Apōllo, from whom he possessed the gift of prophecy, and obtained an astonishing knowledge of augury (Apol. Rhod. i. 65). His great bravery and activity he displayed in the battle above-mentioned, and at the hunting of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. xii. 456 seq.). He sailed to Cölchis with Iāson (Stat. Th. iii. 521 seq.), and acted as the priest and augur of the Argonauts, hence Vālērīus Flaccus calls him the son of Phœbus (l. 383), Phœbus (iii. 572), and, Dellus Sacerdos (iii. 432). From his father, he is called Ampijeldes, and Sāgax from his skill in augury (Ov. Met. viii. 316). Apollōn writes, that he did not return to his native country, but died from the bite of a serpent in Africa, where he was worshipped as a god. He built a city Möpsüestia q. v., in Cilicia.—3. A man in the army of Pōly-nices during the Theban war. He reported to Adrastus, that the ground opened under Amphīlārus and his chariot in an earthquake, and that he had disappeared, and the ground closed again (Stat. Th. viii. 151).—4. A man killed by Hippōmēdon in the Theban war (Stat. Th. ix. 126).—5. A Cretan, who excelled in the use of the bow and arrow, and, having been compelled by poverty to quit his native country, settled at Sāgūntum, where his two sons, Dōrylas and Icārus, were killed during the siege, and he met his death by precipitating himself from the wall on the dead body of one of them (Sil. Ital. ii. 89 seq.).

Mōreus, i. m. an ambassador of Gēntius, king of the Illyrii, who, with Pārmēnio was appointed to receive the oath, hostages, and money of Pērseūs, king of Mācedōnia, and thence proceed to Rhōdus, to attempt to persuade the natives of that island to join them against the Romans, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 23.).

Mörgēntia. See Murgantia.

Mōrini, orum, m. a people of Gālīa Bēlgica, whose country lay along the coast opposite to Cāntium, Kent, on which account Virgilius calls them Extrēmī hominū, remotest of men, because they were at a great, in the days of Virgilius, probably an undetermined, distance from Rome (Æn. viii. 727). They fled from Cæsar, says Flōrus, into the woods, on which that warrior set them on fire (iii. 10). Adj. Mōrinus, a, um. Mōrinus pōrtus (Flor. iii. 10).

Mōrinus, i. m. a trumpeter in the Carthaginian army, slain by Q. Fābius Māximus (Sil. Ital. vii. 605).—2. A man killed during the war carried on by the Carthaginians in Spain (Sil. Ital. xv. 723).

Moritāsus, i. m. the king of the Sēnōnes, at Cæsar's arrival in Gālīa, France. He was the brother of Cavarinus q. v. (Cæs. B. G. v. 54).

Mōrphēus, ēs, v. ēi, m. a son of Sōmnus, who in dreams assumed only the human form. Mōrphēus, Phōbētōr, v. Icēlos, and Phāntāsōs, held the highest rank among the sons of Sōmnus, and were sent only to kings and generals (Ov. Met. xi. 635 seq.). Hōmērus places the residence of Mōrphēus at Lēmnos, Stātiūs beyond Ethiopia, and Ovidius among the Cimmerians. The description of Ovidius excels that of Stātiūs, although possessing numerous beauties and delicate touches, which mark the genius of that great poet (Stat. Th. x. 84 seq.).

Mōrys, is, m. son of Hippōtōn, a man in the Trojan army, killed by Mēriōnes (Hom. Il. xiv. 514).

Mōrzus, i. m. a king of Pāphlāgōnia, who sent auxiliaries to the Gāllogræci in 191 B. C., who were defeated along with the Tēctōsāgi and Trōcēni on Mount Māgāba (Liv. xxxviii. 26, 27).

Mōsa, w, m. a Gaul in the army of Hān-nibal, killed by the Roman consul, M. Lāvīus Sālūnātor, during the war carried on by that Carthaginian in Italy (Sil. Ital. xv. 727).

Mōsa, w, f. the Maas, or, Meuse, a river of Gālīa, France, rising a little to the west of Mount Vōgēsus, Vauge, or, Voges, runs north, passes a number of celebrated towns, receives, at Namur, Sābis, the Sambre, joins Vāhālis, the Wahal, or, Waal, below the island of Bommel, and falls into the German Sea. The course of this river, which extends to 160 leagues, is north. From Cæsar's description of the Meuse, it is manifest, the Romans, at that time, had no accurate knowledge of this river except at its source. He states that 80 miles below its junction with Vāhālis, the Waal, it falls into the ocean, an assertion very wide of the truth (Cæs. B. G. iv. 10).

Mōseus, i. m. a river of Sūsīāna, which Ammīānus Mārcellīnus calls Mēsēus (xxiii. 6).

Mōschi, orum, m. a savage nation adjoining to the Sārmāte (Luc. Phar. iii. 270). Stēphānus makes them a nation, or tribe of the Cōlchi, bordering on the Mātīēni, and Pōmpōnīus Mēla places them between the Albāni and Hýrcāni (iii. 5), and between the Gēōrgi and Cōrāxi (i. 2). Mōschien, w, f. the country of the Mōschi. Adj. Mōschus, et, Mōschicus, a, um. Mōschi (mōntes) (Pom. Mel. i. 19). Mōschicus (mōns) (Plin. i. 591), an expression used also by Solinus (58).

Mōschus, i. m. a rhetorician, a native of Pērgāmus. At Rome he was accused of poisoning, and was defended by L. Mānlius Tōrquātus (Hor. Epis. i. 5. 9).

Mōsēlla, v. Mōsūla, w, m. the Moselle, a river of France, which rises in Mount Vauge, and running northward, falls into the Rhine, near Cōnflūēntes, Coblentz. L. Antistīus Vētus formed the design of making a canal between Mōsēlla, the Moselle, and Arar, the Saone, to convey the troops from the Mediterranean to the German Ocean. L. Gracīllus, who had the command in Gālīa Bēlgica, from jealousy, objected to the plan, which the projector considered it prudent to give up (Tac. Ann. xiii. 58).

Lārgus tranquillo praelibitur amne Mōsalla (Auson. cclxxxviii. 6).

Mōses, m. the Jewish lawgiver. The history of this greatly favoured servant of the Most High, is recorded in the Volume of Inspiration, of which the first five books were written by him; Jūvēnālis inaccurately ascribes to him the whole book (Sat. xiv. 102). The character given of this holy man by heathen authors, does not deserve either to be transcribed, or noticed. Whoever wishes to know the falsehoods and misrepresentations which they have narrated respecting him and the Jews, may consult Tacitus, Plinius, and Justinus.

Mōssyneci, orum, m. a people of Pōntus, who had their name from inhabiting wooden towers. It was the practice of this nation to make spots on their skin (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8).

Mōstēnē, es, f. a town of Lȳdia. Inh. Mōstēni, orum, m. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).

Mōsȳni, orum (Sing. Mōsȳnus, i, m. a people of the Gēte, who lived on the banks of Ister, the Danube. They are also called Mōssyneci q. v. (Tibul. iv. l. 146). According to some writers, they had their name from living in wooden fortresses (ναερον et σινος). They are mentioned by Vālērĭus Flāccus (v. 152).

Mōxoēna, ae, f. Moush, a district of Mēsōpōtāmia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 3).

Mūcia, ae, f. the mother of Sēxtus Pōmpeius, whom the Roman people compelled to undertake an embassy to her son, on purpose to effect a reconciliation between him and Antōnius and Augustus (Ap. Bel. Civ. 712).

C. Mūcius, C. Mūci, m. a noble Roman youth, who formed the resolution of putting to death, in his own camp, Pōrsēna, who was then besieging Rome. Having reached the presence of the king unobserved, he killed his secretary, because Pōrsēna was unknown to him; then by force, attempted to effect his escape, in which he failed. Scorning concealment, he boldly avowed his intention, looked with indifference at the fires in which he was to be consumed, and, to convince the monarch how little pain is regarded by them who aspire at great renown, he thrust his left hand into the flame, where he held it until it was burnt to ashes, seemingly, as entirely at his ease, as if he had been divested of feeling. In admiration of such fortitude, Pōrsēna not only ordered him to withdraw his hand, but also to return to Rome. Mūcius, in token of his gratitude, informed the king of the conspiracy against his life. See Pōrsēna. From the loss of his left hand, Mūcius was afterwards surnamed Scævōla. Martiālis writes an Epigram on the burning of his hand (x. 25). To him Manilius alludes (iv. 30). Adj. Mūcius, a, um. Mūcia prāte, the meadows of Mūcius, i. e. lands in the vicinity of Rome, allotted to him for his heroism (Liv. ii. 12 seq.).

P. Mūcius, P. Mūci, m. (Scævōla) whom Vālērĭus Māximus asserts to have caused his nine colleagues in office to be burnt alive, who had acted under Sp. Cāssius, and had endangered the common liberty of the state, by not electing other magistrates in room of those who had been put to death (Val. Max. vi. 3).

P. Mūcius Scævōla, P. Mūci Scævōlae, m. a Roman praetor, who obtained the government of Sicily in 181 B. C. In his consulship, he managed matters with judgment and success in Gāllia Cisālpina, the north of Italy, and afterwards, he canvassed for the censorship, but had to submit to the mortification of disappointment (Liv. xl. 44 seq.).—2. Held the consulship with L. Cālpurnius Piso q. v.

Q. Mūcius Scævōla, Q. Mūci Scævōlae, m. a lawyer, who wrote on The Laws of the Twelve Tables (Gel. vii. 15).—2. Obtained the praetorship and the government of Sārdīnia, in 217 B. C. From a tedious disorder into which he had fallen, he was rendered unfit for military service, and, therefore, superseded by T. Mānlius Tōrquātus (Liv. xxiii. 24 seq.).—3. A dēcēmvir sacrōrum, who died in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 8).—4. Elected praetor, at Rome, in 181 B. C., and to him the lots gave the jurisdiction of the city. He afterwards held the office of a military tribune, in Greece. In the battle near Sycurium, with Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnia, he commanded a body of picked horsemen of the allies, and afterwards had the command of two thousand horse, as a lieutenant-general, at Ambrācia (Liv. xl. 44 seq.).—5. An eminent lawyer, who was the colleague of L. Caeilius Mētēllus, in the consulship, 119 B. C., when they had the honour of a triumph over the Dalmatians. To Caeilius the victory may be either chiefly or entirely ascribed, since from it he had the surname of Dalmāticus (Eutrop. iv. 23).—6. Son of P. Mūcius Scævōla, a Roman, son-in-law of Lælius, obtained great distinction among his fellow-citizens for his eloquence, knowledge of the civil law, and his delicate sense of right and wrong, which marked his whole conduct. In his praetorship (proconsulship, Liv. Ep. 70) of Asia, which he obtained after holding the offices of tribune of the people, and plebeian edile, he governed with such moderation, integrity, and justice, that the natives instituted a festival in honour of him, and used his name to denote a just, upright, and lenient praetor.

The tax-gatherers, whose extortion and violence he opposed, procured his recall at the end of nine months. In his consulship with L. Licinius Crāssus, 96 B. C., he carried the law respecting the right of citizenship. In regard to this law, different opinions may be maintained, still the rectitude of principle in which it originated cannot be doubted. The immediate consequence of this enactment, which it did not require great knowledge to foresee, was the Social war, in which he adopted the interest of Mārius, consequently incurred the hatred of Sūlla. Dāmāsiippus, a friend of the latter, murdered Mūcius, in the temple of Vēsta, before the image of the goddess, at the time he was pōntifex māximus, an office which he filled with such propriety of conduct, as gained the approbation of the virtuous, and defied the censure of the vicious (Flor. iii. 21. Liv. Ep. 86. Vel. Pat. ii. 26). Mūcia, orum, a. festivals in honour of Mūcius already mentioned.

Mūlciber, bēris, bris, v. bri, m. a surname of Vūlcānus, a. Mulcendo, because fire softens iron and other metals (Ov. Met. ix. 263).

Mūllinus, i, m. a secretary of Alexander the Great, according to Cūrtius (viii. 11).

Mūlius, i, m. the son-in-law of Augustus, and father of Agamēdē, killed by Nēstor. He commanded the cavalry in that battle in which Nēstor fought for the first time (Hom. Il. xi. 738).—2. A chief in the Trojan army, killed by Pātrocclus (Hom. Il. xvi. 696).—3. A man killed by Achilleus (Hom. Il. xx. 472).—4. A Dulichian nobleman (Hom. Od. xviii. 422).

Mulucha, α, m. the Malua, or, Mulooiah, as pronounced by the Moors, is a large and deep river, in that part of Africa which formerly belonged to the Tingitani, which empties itself into the Mediterranean, directly opposite to the Bay of Alinera, in Spain. It is distant about two hundred and forty miles from the Atlantic Ocean, has its sources, according to Abulfeda, at the distance of eight hundred miles from the shore, and its course is almost wholly in the same meridian. Its channel still admits small cruising vessels, and might be greatly improved. It appears to be the river called, by Strābo, Molochath (Sal. Jug. 19).

Mūlvius Pōns, Ponte Molle, a bridge over Tiber, the Tevere, at Rome, which Stātiūs calls Mileius agger (Syl. ii. 1. 176). Via Flāminia commenced at this bridge. See Mileius.

M. Mūlvius, M. Mūlyi, m. a triūmvir, who was accused before the people and condemned, because he and his colleagues had gone too slowly to the extinguishing of a fire in Via Sacra (Val. Max. viii. 1).

Mūmilia Achāica, Mūmilia Achāice, f. the wife of Sērvius Sūlpicius Gālba, the father of the emperor, and grand-daughter of L. Mūmmius, who took Corinth (Suet. Galb. 3).

Mūmmius Lūpērcus, Mūmmi Lūpērci, m. a lieutenant-general, in the Roman army in Germany, in the year 70. Having fallen into the hands of Cīvilis, he sent him as a present to Vēlēda q. v. Mūmmius was murdered on the road to that prophetess (Tac. Hist. iv. 22 seq.).

L. Mūmmius, L. Mūmmi, m. a tribune of the people, in 189 B. C. Ten years after, he obtained the government of Sardinia as praetor, and to him the senate committed the inquiry respecting such of the allies as did not return to their respective states before a given period (Liv. xxxviii. 54 seq.).—2. (Surnamed Achāicus,) conquered the Achaei commanded by Diaeus, at Isthmus Cōrinthiācus, in 148 B. C., when consul with Cn. Cōrnēlius Lēntūlus. In obedience to a decree of the senate, he demolished Cōrinthus (in bello Argivo, v. Achāico), because at that city violence had been done to the Roman ambassadors, and he destroyed Thēbe and Chalcis, Egripo, because they had assisted the Achaei. Pausānias states, that he killed the men found within the walls of Corinth, and sold the women and children for slaves (vii. 16). Livius commends him for his great moderation, on account of his not having appropriated to himself any of the wealth and spoils of Corinth; but from Vēlēcius Pātērcūlus, he appears to have been grossly ignorant of their value, since he bargained with the masters of the ships, who were to carry home from that city pictures and statues of the best artists of Greece, that if they lost any of them, they should put others of equal workmanship and value in their place (i. 13). He exhibited a splendid triumph over the Achaei, and for this victory and the reduction of Greece into a province, obtained the surname of Achāicus (Liv. Ep. 52). Tacitus says, that he introduced theatrical representations at Rome (Ann. xiv. 21). To him Justinus refers (xxxiv. 2), and calls him Spūrius, in xxxviii. 8.

Q. Mūmmius, Q. Mūmmi, m. a tribune of the people, in 189 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 54).

Mūnātia Plāncina. See Plāncina.

Mūnātius Gāllus, Mūnāti Gālli, m. a man, extolled by Mārtiālis, for simplicity of manners surpassing the ancient Sabines, and for goodness surpassing Sōcrātes (x. 33). Some editions have erroneously Nūmātius Gāllus.

Mūnātius Grātus, Mūnāti Grāti, m. a Roman knight, who entered into the conspiracy against the emperor Nēro, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xv. 50).

Mūnātius Plāncus, Mūnāti Plānci, m. a senator, of consular rank, in danger of being murdered in a tumult of the soldiers under Gērmānicus, to whom he had been sent on an embassy, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 39).

C. Mūnātius, C. Mūnāti, m. one of the ten commissioners appointed to divide the unoccupied lands in Līgūria, and the north of Italy, in 175 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 4).

L. Mūnātius Plāncus, L. Mūnāti Plānci, m. was consul, in 44 B. C., and had for his colleague, M. Emilius Lēpidus. After the death of Cēsar, whose lieutenant-general he had been for several years, he commanded the forces in Gāllia, France, joined Dēclmus Brūtus, in opposition to M. Antōnius, and even refused the latter a conference when he had effected his escape into that country, but the soldiers admitted him privately, by making a breach in the back part of the camp. He was, says Vēlēcius Pātērcūlus, the very worst of commanders, and M. Antōnius, an eminent commander when he was sober. In perfect consistency with his fickleness and treachery, Mūnātius, instead of supporting his colleague, Dēclmus Brūtus, consul elect, betrayed him, and joined the triumvirate. When the quarrel commenced between M. Antōnius and Octāvius, he attached himself to the former, whom he deserted before the battle of Actium, and, during the rest of his life, he appears to have been one of the most servile flatterers of Octāvius, whose esteem or confidence he never obtained. At his proposal, the senate conferred upon the grand-nephew of Cēsar, the title of Augustus, and, from that period, or even before it, he seems, on account of his duplicity, to have lost all dignity of character, and almost all personal influence. Of his house near Tibur, Tivoli, Hōrātius has given a beautiful description (Od. i. 7). It has been conjectured, that Hōrātius wrote this ode to Mūnātius when overwhelmed with some disgrace or calamity, perhaps apprehensive of banishment, from the poet's mentioning the story of Tēucer.—2. Supposed to be the son of the former, who had a quarrel with Jūlius Flōrus, to which Hōrātius alludes (Epis. i. 3. 31).

Mūnda, α, f. Munda, a town of Spain, to the northeast of Gibraltar, in the kingdom of Grenada, at which Cn. and P. Cōrnēlius Scipio gained a victory over the Carthaginians under Häsdrūbal, Māgo and Häsdrūbal, son of Gisgo, in 216 B. C. Near it C. Jūlius Caesar defeated the sons of Cn. Pōmpeius in 47 B. C., and his success that day procured him the peaceful possession of the Roman empire (Liv. xxiv. 42 seq.). Adj. Mūndēsis, is, e. Mūndēnsē praelium (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 56).

Mūndātes, is, m. the commander of the district of the Uxii according to Cūrtius (v. 3).

Mūna, æ, m. a man who sent very bad wine from Māssilia, Marseilles, to Rome. Mārtiālis writes an epigram, in which he condemns the wine from that town, and alleges that Mūna had not for a long time come to Rome, lest he should be obliged to drink his own wine (x. 36).

Mūnŷchus, i, m. a king of Athens. Mūnŷchla, æ, f. a rising ground in the form of a peninsula, from which a wall of forty stādia in length was built to conjoin Athens with Piræus, Porto Leone, and other harbours. To this eminence Stātilius alludes (Th. ii. 252). Adj. Mūnŷchus, a, um, of Mūnŷchus, of Attica, Athenian. Mūnŷchiū agri, Athenian lands (Ov. Met. ii. 709).

Mūrcia, æ, f. one of the wives of Cn. Pōmpeius, corrupted by Jūlius Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 50).

Mūrcus, i, m. the ancient name of Mōns Avēntinus, Monte Aventino. Plūtārchus informs us that this word was originally written Murtus, and this agrees with the derivation supported by Vāro and Plinius, a myrto, probably from the mountain being, in ancient times, covered with myrtles. Adj. Mūrcus, a, um. Mūrcia vallis (Claud. xxii. 404). Mūrcia dēa, i, e. Vēnus, to whom the myrtle was sacred. Ad Mūrcia (Venēris templum) (Liv. i. 33).

Mūrgāntia, e. Mōrgēntia, æ, f. v. Mūrgāntium, i, a. a very ancient town of Sicilia, Sicily, on Sŷmethus, the Jarretta, near the mouth of that river. It was in ruins when Strābo wrote, and does not appear to have been rebuilt. In 216 B. C., it fell, by treachery, into the hands of Himilco, the Carthaginian general. The Romans had in it at that time a great quantity of grain, and all sorts of provisions. On Sicily being reduced under the dominion of Rome, M. Cōrnēlius gave Mūrgāntia with the lands belonging to it, to Mericius, a Spaniard, and the troops who had revolted with him to the Romans only three years after it had been betrayed to Himilco (Liv. xxiv. 36: xxvi. 21). Inh. Mūrgāntini, orum (Plin. i. 347). v. Mūrgāntini, orum (Just. xxii. 2), m. Adj. Mūrgāntinus, et, Mōrgāntinus, a, um. Mūrgāntina terra, the territory belonging to the Mūrgāntini (Liv. xxvi. 21), which Cicēro calls Mōrgāntinus ager (Ver. iii. 18).—2. A strong town of Sīnnium, taken by the Roman proconsul, P. Dēcius Mūs, in 298 B. C. (Liv. x. 17).

L. Mūrēna, L. Mūrēnæ, m. who, with Q. Cæcilius Mētēllus Pīna, a lieutenant-general, defeated the Mārsi in several battles, on which they sued for peace in 91 B. C. He renewed the war with Mithridātes, king of Pōntus, in 84 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 76—86).

Mūrrānus, i, m. a Latin, who boasted of the antiquity and dignity of his family, being a descendant of the Latin kings. Æneas killed him with the stroke of a stone, and, having fallen from his chariot, his body was trampled under the feet of his own horses (Virg. Æn. xii. 529).—2. A native of Anxur, killed by Hānnibāl, in his first engagement with the Romans in Italy (Sil. Ital. iv. 529 seq.).—3. A native of Sūrrēntum, Sorrento, skilled in music, whom Sŷchæus killed in Italy during the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. v. 461).

Mūrrus, i, m. a native of Sāgūntum, Murriedro, and a man of great bravery, who engaged, in single combat, with Hānnibāl, and fell by the hand of that hero. His father was born at Ardēa, and had removed to Sāgūntum where he married his mother, who was a native of that town. Her parents were Greeks, or of Greek extraction (Sil. Ital. i. 377 seq.).—2. A man in the Carthaginian army, killed in Spain by C. Lælius, during the time his friend Scīpio Africānus commanded the Roman forces in that country (Sil. Ital. xv. 467).

Mūrsa, æ, f. Essek (improperly written Mūrsia), a town of Pānnōnia, on the southern bank of Drāvus, the Drave, near its junction with Dānūbius, the Danube, at which Ingēnūus, who had assumed the purple, was killed by Gāllienus, the Roman emperor, in the year 261 (Eutrop. ix. 8). Adj. Mūrsēnsis, is, e, et, Mūrsinus, a, um. Mūrsēnsē praelium (Amm. Mar. xv. 5). Mūrsina labe (Aur. Vic. Cæs. 33).

Mūse, arum, f. the muses, the daughters of Jūpiter and Mnēmōsŷnē, were nine in number; Cāllioṗē, Clō, Erātō, Eutērpē, Mēlpōmēnē, Pōlyhŷmnia, Thālia, Tērpŷchōrē, and Urānia. Of their number, origin, and names, different accounts are given in the writings of the ancients. These goddesses presided over music, painting, poetry, and all the fine arts. From the springs and mountains sacred to them, they derived a number of names which will be found in their alphabetical order. Adj. Mūseus, a, um. Mūseus tēpor (Lucret. i. 933).

Mūseus, i, m. a Grecian poet of very great antiquity, but at what period he lived is uncertain. The idea of Virgilius must have been, that his death preceded the Trojan war, since he makes his hero meet with him in the infernal regions (Æn. vi. 667).

Mūsicānus, i, m. a king of India, in the opinion of some; but others consider Mūsicāni as the name of a people, in which they are supported by Cūrtius (ix. 8).

Mūsōnius Rūfus, Mūsōnii Rūfi, m. a Stoic philosopher of Tuscan origin, who trained the Roman youth to a love of virtue by his lectures on philosophy and wisdom. To his celebrity he owed his banishment in the year 65. On the death of Nēro, he returned to Rome, where he gained great reputation by the prosecution which he commenced against P. Cēler for the murder of his friend Bārēas Sōrānus q. v., which ended in the condemnation of that informer (Tac. Hist. iv. 40).

Musulāni, orum, m. the Musulanians, a people of Africa, who led a roving life, without towns, or fixed habitations. They appear to have lived to the south of Nūmidia, Algiers, and Maurītānia, Morocco and Fez (Tac. Ann. ii. 52). Flōrus is very inaccurate respecting their situation (iv. 12). Aurēlius Victor writes Musalami (Cæs. 4).

Mūtē, es, f. a town of Sicily, which some suppose to be the same with Mūtēē q. v. (Sil. Ital. xiv. 273).

MÛCĒNE, æ (Virg. Æn. v. 52), et, MÛCĒNĒ, es (Sil. Ital. i. 27); more frequently MÛCĒNE, ærum, f. Caræathi, or, Khareæti, a town of Argolis, in the Morea, once the capital of Læcônia. From having been enlarged by Pélöps, or perhaps by his descendants, Ovidius has Pélöpētiades MÛCĒNE (Met. vi. 414). From that time it surpassed Argos, from which it was distant fully six miles, both in extent and population. MÛCĒNE formed part of the kingdom of Agamémnon and was, during his reign, the seat of government. After the murder of that prince, the city gradually declined, and at last the Argives levelled it with the ground, about 465 B. C. Several vestiges still remain. Persæus q. n., according to Stråbo, was the founder of this city (547), to which he gave the name MÛCĒNE, from having there dropt the pommel (μῦρον) of his sword. See MÛCĒNOR, baneful MÛCĒNE, in allusion to Agamémnon's being commander-in-chief in the Trojan war. He was king of MÛCĒNE.

hence, Agamēmnōnīa Mýcēnē (Virg. Æn. vi. 838). Cyclōpīa Mýcēnē (Eurip. Iph. Aul. 265). Mýcēnis, īdis, f. Iphigēnīa, a daughter of Agamēmnōn; also of Mýcēnē, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Inh. Mýcēnēsēs, īum, m. Adj. Mýcēnēsīs, is, e, et, Mýcēnēs, a, um. Mýcēnēs dūctor, Agamēmnōn (Virg. Æn. xi. 266).

Mýcēnē, es, f. a heroine of antiquity, who gave her name to the city, and appears, from Hōmērus, to have been a favourite of the gods (Hom. Od. ii. 120).

Mýcēnīca, a, f. a place in the vicinity of Argos (Liv. xxxii. 39).

Mýci, orum, m. an Asiatic nation, whose country is not known (Herod. iii. 93).

Mýcon, ōnis, m. a vinedresser (Virg. B. iii. 10).—2. The person whom Cōrýdon was to employ to carry his present to Diāna. (Virg. B. vii. 30).

Mýcōnūs, i, m. a mountain in Sicily, on which Augūstus passed a rainy night without a tent (Ap. Bel. Civ. 738).

Mýcōnos, i, e. Mýcōnē, es, f. Mycoli, an island in Ægēum Mārē, the Archipelago. It was one of the Cyclādes, and is in circumference about twenty-five or thirty miles. In ancient times, this island did not abound either with wood or water, but produced corn, wine, figs, and some olives. It has a town of the same name with a good harbour. The soil is dry, and the mountains are of considerable height, one of which is called Dimāstos, from its having two tops resembling breasts (Plin. i. 455). Stēphānus derives the name from Mýcōnus, a son of Ænēas, son of Caristus and Rhýō, daughter of Zarēx. Inh. Mýcōnī, orum (Sing. Mýcōnīus, i), m. In ancient times, the Mýcōnī seem to have been subject to boldness, from which circumstance, some derive the name of the island. At present, the population amounts to about five hundred, chiefly seafaring men, and they are all Greeks. Adj. Mýcōnīus, a, um. Mýcōnūm vīnum, wine of Myconi (Plin. iii. 137).

Mýcōnus, i, m. a man in the Carthaginian army, killed in the Spanish war by Lænas (Sil. Ital. xv. 447).

Mýdon, ōnis, m. son of Atýmniūs, was charioteer of Pylāmēnes, and killed by Antilōchus (Hom. Il. v. 580).—2. A Pæonian in the Trojan army, who fell by the hand of Achilles (Hom. Il. xxi. 209).

Mýgdon, ōnis, m. a king of Thracīa, Romania. He was the brother of Hécuba, wife of Priāmus, king of Troy, and father of Cōrēbus. Mýgdōnīdes, a, m. a patronymic of Cōrēbus (Virg. Æn. ii. 342).

Mýgdōnīa, a, f. a district of Mācēdōnīa, separated from Bōttīas, by the river Axiūs. Ammiānus Mārcellīnus makes it an ancient name of Bithŷnīa q. v. Inh. Mýgdōnēs, um, m. of whom a colony migrated to Phrygia, or to the vicinity of that district of Natolia, and another, according to Strābo, took possession of the northern part of Mēsōpōtāmia, which from them was also called Mýgdōnīa. Its capital was Nisibis. Mýgdōnīs, īdos, f. of Mýgdōnīa, with relation to a female, or to a noun feminine. Adj. Mýgdōnīus, a, um, of Mýgdōnīa; of Phrygia, Phrygian. Mýgdōnīa āpes (Hor. Od. ii. 12. 22). In annos Mýgdōnīi (Tithōnī), to the age of Phrygian, or Trojan, Tithōnus q. v.

(Stat. Syl. ii. 2. 107). Mýgdōnīa māter, Cybelē (Val. Flacc. iii. 47).

Mýgdus, i, f. a city of Phrygia, on Sāngārius, the Sakaria (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 7).

Myla, a, f. the Fiume di Santo Juliano, a river of Sicily, Sicily, in the eastern part of that island, between Leōntīni and Mēgāra (Liv. xxiv. 30, 31).

Mylē, arum, f. Cabila, a town of great strength in Thessaly, which Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnīa, carried by storm on the fourth day, pulled down and burned the greater part of it, selling the inhabitants, even the free persons, for slaves, 173 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 54).—2. Milazzo, a town of Sicily, Sicily. See Mylē.

Mylāsa, orum, n. Melazzo, considered the first town of inland Cāria, both in beauty and importance. Inh. Mylāsēnī, orum, e. Mylāsēsēs, īum, m. to whom the Romans granted independence after the conquest of Antilōchus and the Gallōgræci, 190 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 39). They were defeated by the Rhōdīi in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 25).

Mylē, es, e. Mylē, arum, f. Milazzo, a town on the northern coast of Sicily, near Pēlōrus, Cape Faro, on a promontory of the same name, the Cape of Milazzo (Sil. Ital. xiv. 202), at which M. Vipsānius Agrīppa gained a victory over Sēxtus Pōmpeius (Vel. Pat. ii. 79). Inh. Mylēsēs, īum, m. Adj. Mylēsūs, a, um. Mylēsūs Alcon (Ov. Met. xiii. 684).

Myles, ētis, m. son of Lēlēx, first invented a handmill, and taught men to grind corn with it (Paus. iii. 20).

Mylitta, a, f. the Assyrian name of Vēnus (Herod. i. 131).

Mýndus, i, f. Mindēs, a town of Cāria. Inh. Mýndī, orum, m. preserved their liberty through the Rhōdīi, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 20).

Mýnes, ētis, m. son of Evēnus, king of Lýrnēsūs, and husband of Brīscēs, whom Achilles killed, and carried off his widow (Hom. Il. ii. 692 seq.).

Mýnio, ōnis, m. a native of Smýrna, an intimate of Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 202).

Mýonnēsūs, i, m. Ialunghi Liman, a promontory between Tēos and Sāmos. It is formed of a hill rising from a pretty large base into a sharp top, in the form of an obelisk. On land there is an access to it by a narrow path; and, by sea, it is terminated by clefts, scooped out below by the waves, so that in some places the superimpending rocks project into the sea beyond the ships lying at anchor. Off this promontory, L. Æmilius Rēgulus fought the fleet of Antilōchus, king of Sýria, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 27—30).

Mýrācēs, es, f. supposed by some authors to have been a wood, according to others a state in Sārmātīa, and others a lake in Scythia. It has been conjectured, that the word should be written Mārācēs, the Marosch, a branch of Tibīscus, the Theiss, which flows into Ister, the Danube (Val. Flacc. vi. 50).

Mýrācēs, is, m. ambassador from the king of the Parthians, to Ætēs, king of Cōlchis. Having rashly engaged in the war with the Argonauts, he lost his life by an arrow discharged at him by Sýēnes, a commander of the Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 690 seq.).

Myriāndrus, i, f. a town of Sýria, originally on the coast, the bay of which is now filled up, its site several miles inland, and not certainly known. Adj. Myriāndricus, a, um (Herod. iv. 38).

Mýricē, es, f. a nymph, mother of Mīlchus, by a Satyr (Sil. Ital. iii. 103).

Mýrina, æ, f. Sanderlik, a small town of Æolis, a district of Asia Minor (Tac. Ann. ii. 47). Inh. Mýrinei, orum, m. Adj. Mýrinus, et Mýrinæus, a, um. Mýrini cāmpi (Mart. ix. 43). Mýrinavum oppidulum (Strab.).

Mýrinus i, m. a celebrated gladiator (Mart. xii. 29; Mart. Spec. 20).

Mýrmidon, ōnis, m. king of Pthia, and father of Eupōlēmia (Apol. Rhod. i. 55).

Mýrmidōnes, um (Sing. Mýrmidon, ōnis), m. inhabitants of Thessaly, which Vellēius Pātērūlus says was anciently called Mýrmidōnum Civitas (i. 3). According to Plinius, this country had a number of names from its kings, hence Thēssālī, Mýrmidōnes, Hēllēnes, and Achæi, were the same people. Ovidius states, that Æacus, king of Ægina, Egina, having lost his whole people by a dreadful pestilence, prayed to Jūpiter either to conceal him in a grove, or to restore his people to him. Near the place where he stood, was an oak sacred to Jūpiter, of seed from Dōdōna, at which he saw a number of ants, and begged, that the king of the gods would give him as many citizens. His prayer was immediately granted, and these same animals were transformed into men, whom he called Mýrmidōnes, "not to defraud their name of its original." They retained the same habits, were frugal, patient of toil, bent on gain, and careful of what they acquired (Met. vii. 517 seq.). The account of Hýginus, is not, in substance, different from that of Ovidius, only that Jūno destroyed the inhabitants by poisoning the waters, merely because Æacus was a son of Jūpiter (52).

Mýron, ōnis, m. an Athenian statuary, who excelled in the representation of oxen, to which Prōpērtius alludes (ii. 31. 7), and Phædrus (v. 1). His merits were not limited to that particular branch. The ancients praised his statues of Apōllo, Hērēcles, &c., which, however, do not appear to have approached so near to life as his figures of black cattle. To him Mārtiālīs alludes (iv. 39 seq.).

Mýrrha, æ, f. daughter of Cīnēras, king of Assýria, or, Cýprus, and Cēnchrēis, according to others, of Thōas, king of Assýria. During her pregnancy, in consequence of the criminality of which she had been guilty, she concealed herself in the woods, where Vēnus, from pity, changed her into a tree of the same name, out of which myrrh flows, and from which Adōnis sprung after his mother's transformation (Hyg. 58).

Mýrsinus, i, f. a town of Elis, near Mount Scōllis, afterwards called Mýrtūntium (Hom. II. ii. 616).

Mýrtālē, es, f. the original name of Olýmpias, the mother of Alexander the Great, by it she called the sword which had deprived Philippius of life, and which she consecrated to Apōllo (Just. ix. 7).—2. A woman addicted to drinking (Mart. v. 4).

Mýrtilus, i, m. the charioteer of Enōmāus, king of Pisa in Elis, who excelled in chariot-driving, and, therefore, proposed to the suitors of his daughter Hippodāmia, that she should be the prize of the one who surpassed him in the race, and that all who failed should instantly lose their lives. After many had fallen, and their heads had been stuck up in the stādium, Pēlōps presented himself, and, having bribed Mýrtilus, the charioteer of Enōmāus, to furnish his master with a defective chariot, easily gained the prize. Mýrtilus claimed the reward of his treachery, the half of the kingdom, which Pēlōps was unwilling to give, and, therefore, as he was returning home with his bride, both to retain his possessions, and to conceal the disgraceful transaction, he threw Mýrtilus into that part of Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, which from him was called Mýrtōum mārē q. v. (Hyg. 84). To the conduct of Mýrtilus, Ovidius alludes (Ib. 369), and Claudianus (xxix. 169).

Mýrtōus, a, um. Mýrtōum mārē, a part of Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, extending from Eubœa, Negropont, to Mālœa prōmōntōrium, Cape Malio, along the coast of Greece. Some derive this name from Myrtos, an island near the coast of Eubœa, and others from Mýrtilus q. v.

Mys, ūos, m. an eminent carver, mentioned by Plinius (v. 75). Mānus ducti Mjos, the hand of the skilful Mys (Mart. viii. 51).

Mýscēlos, i, m. son of Alēmon, who built Crōton, Cotrone, on the tomb of a king of that name. He was by birth an Argive, but compelled by the apparitions of Hērēcles to leave his native city. He stood higher in favour with the gods than any one of his contemporaries. The Argives punished with death all who attempted to quit their native country, and, a rumour of his emigration having reached the magistrates, they brought him to trial, found him guilty, and accordingly threw into the urns the black stones, which Hērēcles, on the prayer of Mýscēlos, changed all to white, and thus procured a sentence of acquittal, in opposition to the opinion of his judges. In obedience to the order of Hērēcles, he then sailed for Italy, and fulfilled the promise made by that hero to Crōton, by building the town over the ground which contained his ashes, and by calling it by his name (Ov. Met. xv. 20—59).

Mýsīa, æ, f. a district of Asia Minor, Natolia, bounded on the east by Bithýnia and part of Phrýgia, on the south by Lýdia, on the west by Mārē Ægēum, the Archipelago, and Hēllēspōntus, the Dardanelles, and on the north by Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora. The extent of this country may be estimated at upwards of 8,000 square miles. It included Trōas and a district afterwards called from its situation Hēllēspōntus. In 190 B. C. the Romans gave it to Eumēnes, king of Asia (Liv. xxxviii. 39). Inh. Mýsi, orum (Sing. Mýsus, i), m. were once distinguished by warlike bravery which they afterwards lost, and sunk so deep in ignorance and contempt, that Ullianus Mýsorum denoted a person of the most despicable character. Adj. Mýsus, a, um. Mýsus jūvēnis, Telēphus (Prop. ii. 1. 63). Mýsus Cāteus, the Grimakli, a large river of Mýsīa (Virg. G. iv. 370).

Mýstes, æ, m. a boy whom T. Vālgīus Rūfus treated with paternal kindness, and whose death he sincerely lamented (Hor. Od. ii. 9. 10).

Mýūs, ūntis, f. Sarukomer, one of the twelve cities of Iōnia, said to have been built by the Iōnes, who migrated from Athens

(Plin. i. 601). Others think that the Athenian Ionians migrated from Asia Minor, since the population of the earth was from the east, consequently that of Europe from Asia. Artaxêrxes gave this city to Thémistöcles, whence he might receive opsonium, i. e. food (Cor. Nep. Themis. 10). According to Strábo, Cýdrêlus founded Mýus, of which no vestige now remains. Inh. Mýusli, orum, m. (Herod. vi. 8).

N

Nábālia, æ, f. the channel made by Drusus from the Rhine to the Issel (Tac. Hist. v. 26). Tacitus calls it Drusianā fossa (Ann. ii. 8).

Nābānnæ, arum, m. a people of Sērica (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nābārzānes, is, m. an officer who commanded the right wing of Darius' army, at that monarch's first engagement with Alexander, in which he was completely routed. At a future period he conspired against his sovereign, fled to Hýrcānia, and by letter made peace with Alexander, whom he joined in Asia (Curt. iii. 9 seq.).

Nābāthæa, v. Nābātea, æ, f. a country of Arābia Pētræa, of which Pētra, Karac, was the capital, and must have been of considerable note, since it gave name to that province of Arābia in which it stood. Ptolemy is the first geographer who mentions the divisions of Arābia, viz., Pētræa, Stony, Dēsērtā, Desert, and Fēlix, Happy, which still continue. Some refer Pētræa to the number of granitic rocks and mountains, of which the most remarkable is Sinai, frequently mentioned in Holy Writ. This province, the least of the three, lay between Ēgyptus, Egypt, and Pālestīna. Inh. Nābāthæi, orum, m. Adj. Nābāthæus, a, um, of Nābāthæa, of Arābia, Arabian, Eastern. Nābāthæa regna (Ov. Met. i. 61).

Nābdālsa, æ, m. a Numidian, of noble birth and of great riches, who stood high in favour with the people. Jūgūrtha intrusted him with the command of a separate army, and employed him to execute whatever either fatigue or a multiplicity of affairs put it out of his power to accomplish personally. Fidelity and activity marked his conduct in every instance of his delegated authority, until Bōmilcar engaged him in a plot for the ruin of his sovereign. Into that measure, Nābdālsa had rashly entered, but upon reflection shrunk with terror from such an atrocity, and failed to meet Bōmilcar at a time which had been agreed upon. The latter, burning with impatience for the execution of the plot, and trembling with apprehension at the scruples which might have seized Nābdālsa, wrote him a letter, complaining of his irresolution, assuring him that the fall of Jūgūrtha was at hand, and that he could only choose between the tortures of the rack, and the reward of fortitude. His secretary, having come into his apartment, found him asleep, and the letter lying by him, which he read and instantly set out to discover the whole to Jūgūrtha. Nābdālsa immediately went to the king, assuring him that he was on the point of making the discovery himself, had he not been anticipated by the perfidy of a domestic. Bursting into tears, he conjured the king by their friendship, and by his own former fidelity, not to suppose him capable of so horrible a crime.

To these protestations Jūgūrtha returned a mild answer, very different from his real sentiments, thinking it prudent to dissemble his resentment lest he should endanger the public tranquillity by further severity, since he had already put to death Bōmilcar, and many of his associates in the conspiracy (Sal. Jug. 70, 71).

Nābis, idis, m. a king of the Lacedæmonians, who was included in the treaty which the Romans formed with Philippius, king of Mācēdōnia, 207 B. C. That illustrious monarch gave Argos to Nābis, who robbed the men of their property, and sent his wife who pillaged the women not only of their ornaments, but even of their very clothes. His insincerity and suspicious conduct induced the Romans to declare war against him, after he had entered into a treaty with T. Quinctius Flāminius, and they attempted to retake Argos, which the bravery of his son-in-law, Pýthāgōras, rendered impracticable without destroying the city itself. Nābis then marched to Lācēdæmon where by putting eighty of the principal citizens to death, and other acts of similar atrocity, he prevented a revolution within the walls in favour of the Romans, and rendered them active and obedient. In spite of their bravery and his military skill, Flāminius compelled him to accept of such terms as he chose to offer. Not long after, indulging his hostility against the Romans, he took up arms against the Achæi, on which Philōpemen, prætor of that nation, marched against him, gained important advantages over his forces, desolated the country, and returned loaded with spoil. The Ætōli sent Alēxāmnus to seize on Lācēdæmon, who soon after deprived Nābis of life in the presence of his body guards (Liv. xxix. 12 seq.). Eutrōpius writes that Flāminius admitted Nābis to a peace on such terms as he thought fit (iv. 2).—2. The priest of Jūpiter Ammon, killed by the Roman consul, M. Līvius Sālinātor, after he had slain Sābēllus (Sil. Ital. xv. 672 seq.).

Nacolia, æ, f. a town of Phrýgia (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 9).

Næsus, v. Nessus, et, Naisus, i, m. Nissus, a town of Dācia, Stēphānus says of Thrācia, celebrated as the birthplace of Cōnstantinus Māgnus.

Nævīa, æ, f. wife of Rūfus (Mart. i. 69).—2. A friend of Mārtiālis (ii. 9). Probably she is the woman again named (iii. 13).

Nævīus, i, m. a native of Cāmpānia, Campagna, who served several campaigns in the first Punic war, on which he composed a poem. He wrote comedy, in which he displayed both learning and elegance. Cicero charges Ennius, who affected to despise Nævīus, with borrowing or stealing from him. Plautus informs us, that, on account of his censuring and ridiculing some of the nobles, he was thrown into prison where, according to A. Gellius, he composed two plays, Hārī-ōlus and Lēon, in which he recanted his former lampoons, and on that account obtained his liberty. The time of his death is uncertain. He wrote his own epitaph, in which there is more vanity than elegance (Gel. i. 24). Adj. Nāyīānus, a. um. Nāyīānus Hēctor, the name of one of his plays (Cic. Tusc. iv. 31).

L. Nāyius Bālbus, L. Nāyīi Bālbi, m. one of the five commissioners appointed to settle the differences between the inhabitants of Pisa and Lūna, in 170 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 13).

M. Nāyius, M. Nāyīi, m. a tribune of the people who, according to some authors, instituted the prosecution against P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africanus (Liv. xxxviii. 56).

Q. Nāyius, Q. Nāyīi, m. one of the three commissioners appointed to settle a Latin colony in Brūtīlus ager, in 196 B. C. Two years after, he had a similar appointment in settling a colony in Vibo (Liv. xxxiv. 53 seq.).

Q. Nāyius Cēntūriō, Q. Nāyīi Cēntūriōnis, m. had the merit of being the first who trained infantry in the Roman army to act jointly with the cavalry. By this improvement in military exercise, the Romans conquered the Campanians, and punished their revolt to Hannibal after the battle of Cannā (Val. Max. ii. 3).

Q. Nāyius Crīsta, Q. Nāyīi Crīstae, m. a man of enterprise, and skilled in war. M. Valērius Lāyīnus sent him, when a prefect of the allies, with two thousand men in ships of war from Oricum to protect the Apollōniātes, whose town was then besieged by Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, in person. By a well conducted attack, he took the enemy's camp during the night, gave the booty to the Romans, and the engines of war to the Apollōniātes, in 216 B. C. (Liv. xxiv. 40).

Q. Nāyius Mātho, Q. Nāyīi Māthōnis, m. was elected praetor at Rome in 186 B. C., and obtained Sardinia for his province, from which he was detained for four months by investigations respecting the frequent practice of administering poison in Italy. According to Valērius Antias, he condemned two thousand persons. These inquiries were held without the city, in free towns, and in Cōnciliābula, i. e. places where inhabitants of several villages met on important occasions (Liv. xxxix. 32-41).

Nēvōlus, i. m. a monster of iniquity, who ruined himself by the very vices which he expected would have enriched him (Juv. Sat. ix. 1).—2. An ignorant pleader. Martialis addresses several epigrams to Nēvōlus; but whether they all refer to the same or not, cannot be ascertained (l. 98).

Nāgīra, orum, n. a town of Arābia Fēlix, west of the Persian Gulf (Amm. Mar. xxii. 6).

Nahārmālcha, a. m. (i. e. the royal river), a canal which unites the Euphrātes and Tigris, the work of Trajanus, according to Ammianus Marcēllinus (xxiv. 6).

Nahārvālī, orum, m. the Naharvalians, a German nation, supposed to have lived between Viādrus, the Oder, and Vistula, the Vistula (Tac. Mor. Ger. 43).

Nāīdes, dum (Sing. Nāīs, adis), v. Nāides, dum (Sing. Nāīs, idis), f. (Ov. Met. iv. 49. Or. Fast. ii. 599), nymphs who presided over the springs, fountains, and rivers. They were represented as beautiful young virgins leaning over an urn, from which issued a stream of water. Their offerings were milk, fruit, and flowers, though sometimes goats and lambs were sacrificed to them, with oblations of wine, honey, and oil. The Nāīdes appear to have been nearly the same with the Nymphae. (Bācchē) pōtens Nāīdum (O Bācchus), presiding over, in whose power are, the Naiads; king of the Naiads (Hor. Od. iii. 25. 14).

Nāmēius, i. m. a nobleman of the Hēlvētīi, who, with Vērūdōctius, was at the head of the embassy which that nation sent to Caesar (Ces. B. G. i. 7).

Nānnētes, v. Nānnētes, um, m. a people of Gallia Cēltica, who lived on the north bank of Ligēris, the Loire, where it falls into the sea (Ces. B. G. iii. 9).

Nāonus, i. m. king of the Sēgōbrīgīi, who gave his daughter Gyp̄tis in marriage to Prōtis q. v., and ground on which the city Māsilia was built, in 546 B. C. (Just. xliii. 3).

Nāntūātes, um, m. a people whose country lay on the S. of Lācus Lēmānus, the Lake of Geneva (Ces. B. G. iii. 1).

Nāpae, arum, f. nymphs, the same with the Dryādes, who preside over groves (uērs), from which their name is derived (Virg. G. iv. 535).

Nāpaei, orum, m. a people of enormous barbarity. To them, the Ariachi, and Sinchi, Ammianus Marcēllinus refers the first, or original name, of the Black Sea, and also that of Euxinus, as expressive of the opposite of their true character (xxii. 8).

Nāpāris, is, v. Nāpārus, i. m. the Jalome-nitza, a river of Scythia, which empties itself into the Danube (Herod. iv. 48).

Nāpē, es, f. (Forester), one of Aedon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 214).

Nār, aris, m. the Nera; a river of Umbria, which flows into Tiber, the Tevere. Its waters are of a whitish colour, from their being impregnated with sulphur; hence Virgilius, Sulphurēā Nār albus aquā (Æn. vii. 517), and Claudianus, Nār vitiatas odoro sulphurē (l. 256). From this river, the Intērāmūātes had the surname of Nārtēs (Plin. l. 364). It runs with a strong current, praeceps (Ov. Met. xiv. 330).

Naraggāra, a. f. a town of Nūmīdia (Liv. xxx. 29).

Nārbo, ōnis, m. et. f. v. Nārbohna, a. f. (Nārbo Mārtius, Vel. Pat. i. 15). Narbo, a town of Prōvincia to the S. of the river Atax, the Aude, near the seacoast, which, afterwards, gave name to that division of Gallia, France, called Nārbohēnsis. It stands in a deep valley between two mountains. A canal, supplied with water from the Aude, goes through it, which communicates with the Royal Canal, with Lācus Rūbrēs, the Lake Robine, and also with the Mediterranean. The ruins which still remain, give some idea of its former greatness. Narbonne is famous for its honey. The inhabitants do not exceed 8,000, of which three-fourths are priests and women. Pūkhērrima Nārbo (Mart. viii. 72). Inh. Nārbohēnses, ium, m. Adj. Nārbohēnsis, is, e.

Narcē, es, f. a city of Nūmīdia, taken from Māsīnissa by stratagem (Ap. Bel. Pun. 18). Nārcissus, i. m. a most beautiful youth.

the son of Cēphīsus, the Mavroneri, and the nymph Lirīōpē. After slighting many virgins, who were solicitous to obtain his favour, having accidentally observed his face one day, when stooping down to drink at a fountain, he continued fixed to the spot, and pined away gazing at his own shadow. He was turned into a flower of the same name. From his father, Nārēissus is called Cēphīsius.—2. A freedman of the Roman emperor Claudius, who, after concerting with Mēssālina the ruin of Appius Claudius, and enriching himself with the plunder of the condemned, plotted the destruction of that empress, which he accomplished without the sanction or knowledge of the emperor. The influence of this enfranchised slave shows the deplorable condition of the Roman government, of which many similar instances occur during the reigns of the succeeding emperors. Agrippina, having baffled his schemes, compelled him, at last, to become his own executioner. Before his death, he burned all the papers which were in his possession as secretary to Claudius, of which Agrippina might have made an improper use. Dio, who relates this circumstance, adds, that he left a fortune of four hundred millions of sesterces (Tac. Ann. xi. 29 seq. Suet. Claud. 28).

Nāris, is, m. a man in the army of Hān-nibal, killed by Q. Fābius Māximus, when that general had surrounded the troops of M. Minūcius Rūfus, who then commanded the one-half of the Roman army, and held the dictatorship along with Fābius (Sil. Ital. vii. 598).

Nārisci, orum, m. the Nariscans, a German nation, who occupied part of what now forms the circle of Bavaria (Tac. Mor. Ger. 42).

Nārūla, ae, f. anciently Nēquūnum, now Narni, a town of Umbria, a district of Italy. It stood on Nār, the Nera, from which the name is derived. Inh. Nārnlēnses, ium (Sing. Nārnlēnsis, is), m. objected to furnish the Romans with supplies, in 211 B. C. See Indrānna. Adj. Nārnlēnsis, is, e. Nārnlēnsis tribus (Liv. vi. 5).

Nārseus, i, e. Nārses, is, m. a king of Pērsia, who succeeded Varavanes III., against whom Gālērīus commanded the Roman forces, under Diocletianus, and gained a decisive victory, about the year 297, which obliged Nārses to retire to the extremity of his dominions, and to sue for peace. The wives, children, sisters, and whole family of the Persian monarch, remained prisoners in the hands of the conqueror, and the delicacy and purity of his conduct towards the females, procured him as much credit as the success of his arms. The captive family of Nārses adorned the triumphal procession of Diocletianus (Eutrop. ix. 22 seq.).

Nārŷcia, ae, e. Nārŷx, ŷcis, f. et. Nārŷcelon, i, n. a city of the Lōcri Epīenēmidīi, of which Ajāx, the son of Oileus, was a native. Inh. Nārŷceli, et. Nārŷceli, orum, m. A colony of the Lōcri founded Lōcri Epizēphŷrii, in Bruttius ager; hence Virgilius calls the inhabitants Nārŷceli Lōcri (Æn. iii. 399). Adj. Nārŷcelus, a, um. Nārŷcelia pis, the resin, or pitch, of Nārŷcia. Groves of pine, and other kinds of trees, yielding resin, or pitch, grew in its vicinity. Nārŷcelus hēros, Ajāx, son of Oileus (Ov. Met. xiv. 468).

Nāsāmōnes, um (Sing. Nāsāmōn, ōnis), m.

a ferocious people of Libŷa, who subsisted on rapine. They are supposed to have lived near Cŷrēnē, and probably extended from the seacoast to the S. E. extremity of the desert of Zaara, or, Zahara. They are represented by Lūcānus as poor; Inops Nāsāmōn (Phar. iv. 679). Ignāvus Nāsāmōn (Claud. xxi. 354). Nāsāmōnūs, adis, f. applied to females, or nouns feminine. Nāsāmōnūs Harpē (Sil. Ital. ii. 117). Adj. Nāsāmōnūs, et. Nāsāmōnīlūs, a, um. Nāsāmōnūs Tōnans (Stat. Syl. ii. 7. 93). Nāsāmōnīlūs ager (Ov. Met. v. 129).

Nasavisium, i, n. a mountain in Scŷthia, called by Ptōlēmēus, Ανακία (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nāscos, i, f. a city of Arāblā (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nāsica, ae, m. a man whom Hōrātius describes as a legacy, or fortune, hunter, and giving his daughter in marriage as payment of a debt (Sat. ii. 5. 57).—2. A man whom Mārtiālis blames for inviting him to his house, when he knew he was engaged (il. 79).

Nāsīdīanus, e. Nāsīdīenus, i, m. a man who teased Mārtiālis with his dreams (vii. 53).

Nāsīdīenus Rūfus, Nāsīdīēni Rūfi, m. a man, of whom nothing more is known than what Hōrātius has mentioned (Sat. ii. 8. 1 seq.). The critics differ in opinion respecting his character, some supposing Hōrātius to be in earnest, and others in jest. The latter seems the more probable opinion, and the expensive entertainment to which he invited Mācēnas, by no means proves that his pretensions to taste were well founded. The extravagant delicacies which his wealth enabled him to purchase, displayed a vulgar and ostentatious profusion, which Mācēnas, perhaps, anticipated, on that account accepted the invitation only to laugh at the absurdity of his host.

Nāsīdīus, i, m. a soldier under P. Cōrnēlius Scipio Africānus, when he commanded the Roman army in Spain, by whose hand Kārthāgō fell (Sil. Ital. xv. 450).

L. Nāsīdīus, L. Nāsīdīi, m. sent, by Pōmpeius, with sixteen ships, to the relief of Māssilla, Marseilles. Dēcimus Brūtus, Caesar's admiral, sailed to meet the combined fleet of the Māssilians and L. Nāsīdīus, and came to an engagement, in which the Māssilians fought on the right, and Nāsīdīus on the left, but he behaved in a cowardly manner, fled out of the battle, and escaped, without the loss of a single ship, to the coast of Spain (Cæs. B. C. ii. 3 seq.). Adj. Nāsīdīanus, a, um. Nāsīdīāne nāves (Cæs. B. C. ii. 7).

Nāso, ōnis, m. an infamous man, held up to detestation by Cātūllus (112).

Nāsūa, ae, m. the brother of Cimbērius, who commanded the 100 Cantons of the Suēvi, who had encamped on the bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine, with the design of crossing that river (Cæs. B. G. i. 37).

Nāsus, i, f. a city of the Acērnānes, taken from them by M. Valērius Lavīnus, the Roman proprætor, in 213 B. C., and given to the Ætoli, agreeably to the treaty (Liv. xxvi. 24).—2. The island on which part of the town Sŷracūsse stood (Liv. xxv. 30).

Natīso, ōnis, m. the Natīsoe, a river of Italy, near Aquīlēia (Plin. l. 372. Amm. Mar. xxi. 12).

Natta, æ, m. a surname of the gens Pina- ria.—2. A sordid miser, satirized by Hōra- tius (Sat. i. 6. 124), and Jūvenalis (Sat. viii.
95). In Pērsius this name likewise occurs, but denotes a spendthrift. It is probable that these three poets had not, therefore, the same character in view, and each might allude to a different person, who was alive at the time when he wrote. The best editions of Pērsius have not this word as a proper name, and, referring to its etymology (natæ, a skin with the hair upon it), it may be considered as denoting one of the lowest of the people (Sat. iii. 31).

Nāva, æ, m. the Nāhe, a river of Gallia Bēlgica, which falls into the Rhine (Tac.
Hist. iv. 70).

Naubōlides, æ, m. a noble Phaeacian, a competitor in the games exhibited by Alci- noūs. He surpassed his countrymen in beauty of countenance and elegance of form, with the exception of Lāodāmas (Hom. Od. vii. 115).

Naubōlus, i, m. a native of Phōcea, was the son of Hippasus, and father of Iphitus.
He is called Ornithides, by Apollōnius Rhō- dus, to distinguish him from Naubōlus, son of Lernus. Naubōlides, æ, m. a patronymic of Iphitus (Val. Flacc. i. 362).

Q. Nāvius, Q. Nāvii, m. a Roman cen-turion, who distinguished himself by his bravery at the siege of Cāpua, in 213 B. C.
He was the first who advised the mixing of infantry with cavalry, an improvement which procured him high honours from his commander (Liv. xxvi. 4 seq.).

Naubius, i, f. a town of the Pārōpāmī- sidae (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Naulōchus, i, c. Naulōchi, orum, m. et,
Naulōchum, i, c. Naulōcha, orum, n. probably a few houses on a bay or road, in which ships lay safely at anchor (hence the name), on the north coast of Sicily, a little to the west of Pelorus, Cape Furo. Clūverius thinks it was at the mouth of the river now called Mulpurito fiume. Non Naulōcha pigra pērieli (Sil. Ital. xiv. 264).

Naumachia, æ, f. a naval engagement.
Among the Romans, the term denoted the representation of a battle at sea, which was exhibited in some place constructed for that purpose. After having been for some time displayed in Circus Māximus, Augustus formed a lake near Tiber, the Tevere, in which this kind of show was more naturally represented. Dōmītiānus built a naval theatre, which Mārthalis prefers to the work of Augustus (Spec. 25). The emperor Nero improved this species of entertainment by having it in sea water, with large fishes swimming amongst the vessels (Suet. Ner.
12). Naumachiarū, orum, m. the combatants who fought in these sea engagements, and consisted generally of the prisoners who had fallen into the hands of the Romans in war, or of convicts sentenced to death. Unless the emperor interfered, these unhappy men continued the engagement until they fell by the superiority of their opponents.
See Gladiātor.

Naupactus, i, f. Nepaktos, Epakto, or, Le- panto, a city of Greece, on the most northern extremity of Staus Cōrinthiācus, to which it now gives the name of the Gulf of Lepanto.
The Hērāclidae built the first ship, which carried them to Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, at this city, from which its name is derived.

Inh. Naupactil, orum (Sing. Naupactilus),
m. Adj. Naupactōus, a, um, of Nepaktus.
Ætolian. Naupactōus Achēlōus (Ov. Fast.
ii. 43).

Nauplia, æ, f. Anapli, a town of Argōlis, not mentioned by Hōmērus, only the arsenal of Argos, when Strābo wrote, and in ruins in the days of Pausanias, who states, that it was built by Nauplius, son of Nēptūnus and Amymōnē (ii. 38). From the Byzantine historians we learn, it afterwards rose to some distinction. The Acropōlis, now Palanoli, recalls to memory the unfortunate Pālāmēdes.

Nauplius, i, m. son of Nēptūnus and Am- ymōnē, daughter of Dānāus, was one of the Argonauts, and father of Pālāmēdes, by Clymēnē (Val. Flacc. v. 65). Naupliades, æ, m. Pālāmēdes (Ov. Met. xiii. 39).

Naupōrtum, i, n. c. Naupōrtus, i, f. Ober Laybach, a town of Pännōnia, which stood on a cognominal river (Tac. Ann. i. 20).

Naura, orum, n. a town of Sōgdiāna (Curt. viii. 2). Perhaps the reading should be Nau- taca, as the other word no where else occurs.

Nausicaa, æ, f. daughter of Alcinōus, king of Schēria. When she went to wash her clothes, her mother gave her a goatskin, full of wine (Hom. Od. vi. 17 seq.).

Nausimēnes, is, f. an Athenian, whose wife, from grief at the sight of the wickedness of her own children, lost the power of speech (Val. Max. i. 8).

Nausithōus, i, m. son of Nēptūnus, and the nymph Pērithoea, prince of the Phaeaces, whom he settled in the island Schēria, in the vicinity of the Cyclōpes (Hom. Od. vii.
56—77).

Naustathmus, i, m. a harbour of Phōcea, so called, from its containing an immense number of ships (Liv. xxxvii. 31).

Nautes, æ, c. Nautius, i, m. an aged Tro- jan, who accompanied Enēas into Italy.
He was endowed with the gift of prophecy, was the priest of Minerva, and had the charge of the Palladium. From him descended Nautia gens, who retained the charge of that image (Virg. Æn. v. 704 seq.).

Nautēs, cos, m. a competitor in the games exhibited by Alcinōus (Hom. Od. viii. 112).

C. Nautius, C. Nauti, m. a noble Roman, who held the consulship with P. Vellētus, in 475 B. C. On his being again appointed to that office, in 458 B. C., he fought with great success against the Sabines at Erētum
(Liv. ii. 52 seq.).

C. Nautius Rutilus, C. Nauti Rutili, n.
a noble Roman, who held the consulship with M. Pāpius Atratinus, in 410 B. C.
(Liv. iv. 52).

Sp. Nautius, Sp. Nauti, m. (Surnamed, in con. cal., Rutilus) held the office of consul, at Rome, in 488 B. C. (Liv. ii. 39).—
2. A noble Roman, who held the consulship, with M. Pōpillius, in 316 B. C. (Liv. ix.
21).—3. An officer in the army of L. Pāpi- us Cūrsor, the Roman consul. For his bravery in the battle at Aquilōnia, he was rewarded with a bracelet, and a crown of gold (Liv. x. 41 seq.).

Sp. Nautius Rutilus, Sp. Nauti Rutili,
m. a noble Roman, who held the office of tribune of the soldiers, with consular power, in 423 B. C. (Liv. iv. 35).—2. Thrice held the office of military tribune, with consular authority (Liv. iv. 44—61). Livius writes iterum (iv. 61), the con. cal. has tertium.

which ought to be the reading in the historian.

Nāxos, i. f. Naxia, anciently called Dia, probably from Dia, Zia, the highest mountain in that island, the largest of the Cyclādes, a number of small islands in Mare Ægæum, the Archipelago, to the east of Peloponnesus, the Morea. For fertility of soil, agreeable intermixture of woods, hills, and valleys, excellence of wines, and variegated marble, this island has long been celebrated. The modern population is eighteen thousand, all Latins and Greeks; and, like the ancient inhabitants, the natives are still too much addicted to the immoderate use of wine. All the antiquities discovered in Naxia show the prevalence of the worship of Bacchus. In the interior of the island is a colossal statue of that god, sixteen feet high. On all the gems and medals found in Naxia, Bacchus is represented with a beard, and all his statues have likewise beards. It was a favourite residence of Bacchus, and on the south coast the ruins of his temple are still visible. Here he was found drunk and asleep by the Tuscan sailors, who, in expectation of great plunder, put him on board their ship, purposing to carry him off. On regaining his senses, he earnestly entreated them to land him on Nāxos, Naxia, which request they, contrary to their real intention, solemnly pledged themselves to grant. But the god, perceiving their treacherous conduct, punished their breach of promise, by transforming them all, except Acetes, to dolphins. There is a singular class of people on this island, the independent shepherds. They pay no taxes of any kind, subsist wholly by feeding their flocks, live always in the open air, have no wives or children, and wear the ancient Cōthurnus of undressed goatskin, with the hairy side out. They tend their flocks on the remote and uninhabited parts of the island, and have little intercourse or connexion with the inhabitants of the villages. Their number remains nearly the same, probably the deficiencies occasioned by death are supplied by the Albanians. Nāxos bacchata jūgis, Naxia, the mountain tops of which are revelled on by the Bacchanals, or frequented by Bacchus. The former was more probably the opinion of Virgilius, since the sacred rites of that god were celebrated on the summit of the mountain of that island (Virg. Æn. iii. 125). Adj. Nāxus, a. um. Nāxia turba, the worshippers of Bacchus. Nāxiūm, i. n. perhaps, emery. The greater part, if not the whole, of the emery used in Britain, is brought from Naxia.

Nāzavielūm, i. n. a district in the territory of the Seres (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nēvera, a. f. a country girl, courted by Egon (Virg. B. iii. 3).—2. A woman, with whom Hōrātius appears to have been in love, and of whose fickleness and perfidy he complains, in an Epod which is addressed to her (xv).—3. A nymph, beloved by the river Xānthus (Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 23).—4. A Lemnian matron, in the time of the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. ii. 141).—5. Mother of Phæthusa and Lampetie, by Hypērion, or Sol (Hom. Od. xii. 133).

Nēthūs, i. m. a river, in the south of Italy, near Crōto, Crotone (Plin. i. 351). Salēntinūm Nēthum, in Ovidius (Met. xv. 51), should be Salēntinūm Nēretum.

Nēālce, es. f. wife of Hippomēdon (Stat. Th. xii. 122).

Nēālces, a. m. a Trojan, who excelled as an archer, and was distinguished for his dexterity in throwing the javelin. By him Sālius was killed (Virg. Æn. x. 753).—2. The commander of the Adyrmachide, under Hānnibal, in Italy (Sil. Ital. ix. 226).—3. Another, whom Cāttilina, who served under Scipio Africanus, in Spain, killed. Silius Itālicus charges him with flagrant immoralities (xv. 448).—4. A nobleman of Cyzicus, Chizico, killed by Pōllux, in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 191).

Nēāpōlis, is. acc. im. p. in. f. Naples, a large and beautiful city in the south of Italy, at the top of a bay nearly thirty miles in circumference. The adjacent country is highly fertile and beautiful. This city was first called Parthēnōpē, from a Siren of that name, who, according to some, was the founder of it, or, according to others, was buried there. Augustus caused it to be repaired and greatly enlarged; on that account, he called it Nēāpōlis, i. e. new city. It is the capital of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, which, on the continent, includes that part of Italy, lying south of the territory of the Church. Otōsa Nēāpōlis, idle Naples, because many of the Romans, from love of indolence and luxury, retired to it on account of its delightful situation (Hor. Epod. v. 43). Inh. Nēāpōlitāni, orum (Sing. Nēāpōlitānus, i.), m. the Neapolitans. Adj. Nēāpōlitānus, a. um. Nēāpōlitānus ager (Liv. xxiv. 13). Nēāpōlitānūm certāmen (Suet. Claud. 11).—2. A city of Thraciā (Liv. xxxviii. 41).—3. A part of Syrācusæ (Liv. xxv. 24).—4. Nobolus, anciently Sicheim, was the royal city of Sāmāria, stood on a valley, between the two mountains, Ebal and Gerizim (Amm. Mar. xiv. 8).—5. A city of Egypt, according to Ammianus, but placed in Cyrēnāica, by Etōlēmæus (Amm. Mar. xxii. 16).

Nēārchus, i. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, who had the command of the fleet, and published his voyage in the Indian Sea. This work, which is still extant, contains much geographical information. On the death of Alexander, he obtained Lycia and Pamphylia (Just. xiii. 4).—2. A youth who appears to have been beautiful and much admired (Hor. Od. iii. 20. 6).

Nēbrissa, a. f. Lebriza, an ancient town of Spain, on the eastern bank of Bætis, the Guadalquivir, between Hispalis, Seville, and the Sea. Plinius adds, it was surnamed Vēnēria (i. 294), and Silius Itālicus makes it famous for the orgies of Bacchus, probably a poetical fiction, originating in the resemblance of the word to Nēces, the skin of a fawn, worn by the worshippers of Bacchus (iii. 293).

Nēbrōdes, is. m. Madonia, a mountain in Sicily, in which arise two fountains, their waters run in opposite directions (Sil. Ital. xiv. 236).

Nēbrōphōnē, es. f. one of Diana's attendants, whose name is derived from killing fawns (Claud. xxiv. 250).

Nēbrōphōnos, i. m. (Kill-fawn), one of Actæon's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 211).

Nēcus, i. m. the father of Psammetichus; also a son of the latter, who was king of Egypt, who formed a canal to the Red Sea, band ordered Phœnicians to circumnavigate Africa. Of this hazardous enterprise, which was successfully accomplished, we have a minute account (Herod. ii. 152 seq.). Nēctānēbus, i. e. Nēctānābis, i. d. is, m. a king of Egypt, who lived 500 years before Alexander the Great. Plinius writes his name Nēctābis (v. 304). According to Plutarchus, he was the cousin of Tāchus, from whom he revolted, and the Egyptians proclaimed him king. By the assistance of Agēsiliās, who had gone to Egypt to support Tāchus, but deserted him, he was established in the throne, and showed his sense of his efficient services, by pressing him to spend the winter in Egypt, which the affairs of Sparta did not permit, and by presenting him with the sum of twenty talents when he sailed for Greece, which the latter gave as a present to the people. Dārius, king of Persia, made war upon him, and, by the superiority of his numbers, gained a complete victory over Nēctānābis, although he marched into the field an army of eighty thousand men. After this fatal engagement he fled to Ethiopia, where he passed the remainder of his days in peaceful security.

Nēda, æ, f. a river of Arcādia, which has its sources in mount Cērausius, a part of Lysēus. In windings Nēda, says Pausanias, is next to Mēander. In a tributary of this river, Rhēa was purified after the birth of Jupiter, hence called Lymax (Paus. viii. 41). Nēdymnus, i. m. a centaur, whom Thēsēus struck to the ground with an oaken stick (Ov. Met. xii. 350).

Nētas, arum, f. one of the gates of Thēba, at Thēba, of which Etēocles had the command, at least he went out by it to engage the Argives (Stat. Th. viii. 334).

Nētum, i. n. a promontory of Ithāca, part of the large mountain Nēyton, Anoi (Hom. Od. i. 186). Towards the southern part of the island was mount Nēus, Stephano Bount.

Nēlus, ēos, v. ēi, m. the son of Nēptūnus and Tērō, and twin brother of Pēlias q. v., was king of Pylus; Nabario, a city of Mēsēnia; a district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Morea. He married Chlōris, daughter of Amphiōn, by whom he had one daughter Pērō, and twelve sons, all of whom, except Nēstor, were killed at the same time with their father, by Heracles. Hyginus mentions him among the Argonauts. He founded Miletus (Herod. ix. 97). Nēlides, æ, m. a patronymic of Nēstor. Nēlides, arum, m. the sons of Nēlus. Bis Nēlides fulmus (Ov. Met. xii. 553). Adj. Nēlētus, v. Nēlus, a, um, of Nēlus; also of Pylus, from Nēlus being king of that city. Nēlētus (Nēstor) (Ov. Met. xii. 577). Nēlētia mēllis, the eloquence of Nēstor (Sil. Ital. xxi. 436). Nēlētus sanguis (Ov. Met. xii. 558).

Nēmaus, i. f. Nēmes, a town of Gāllia Narbōnēnsis, in ancient times the capital of the Arēcōmēci. Inh. Nēmausēnses, ium, m. (Suet. Tib. 13). Adj. Nēmausēnsis, is, e. Nēmausēnsis ager (Plin. ii. 290).

Nēmēa, æ, f. the eldest daughter of Asōpus, who gave her name to the district Nēmēa regio (Paus. ii. 15).

Nēmēa, æ, et, Nēmēō, es, f. a village in Rēgio Nēmēa, of which the name must be referred to the daughter of Asōpus. It was included in Argolis. The plain is deep, the ground wet, and the natives afflicted with coughs, as in more northern climates. The hills which surround it are barren, and of a sombre tint. In modern times there is no parsley which grew from the blood of Ophētes, and which encircled the brows of the conquerors at the quinquennial games; no vestiges of the tomb of Lyeurgus, or of the theatre, or of the stādium; not a single tree on the plain, only a few bushes about the temple, part of which still remains. Adj. Nēmēus, Nēmēus, et, Nēmēcius, a, um. Nēmēa rūpes (Virg. Æn. viii. 295). Nēmēus rēlus, the skin of the Nemean lion, called Nēmēa mōles, from his prodigious size (Ov. Met. ix. 197: ix. 235). Nēmēus hīatus lēonis, i. e. hīatus Nēmēi lēonis (Lucret. v. 24). Nēmēus (leo) (Manil. iii. 431).

Nēmēa, æ, m. a river which separated the territory of the Corinthians from that of the Sicyonians (Liv. xxxv. 15).

Nēmētes, is, f. one of the Nereids (Hom. Il. xviii. 46).

Nēmēsis, is, f. a goddess, who punished wickedness and impiety, and rewarded goodness and virtue. The depravity of mankind called oftener for the exercise of her office in inflicting torment, than in conferring happiness, on which account she came to be considered the goddess of vengeance. According to Hyginus, Jupiter attempted violence to Nēmēsis, which her purity detested; but he effected his iniquitous purpose by ordering Vēnus to pursue him in the form of an eagle, and he took shelter in the arms of Nēmēsis. From this intercourse she produced an egg which Mērcūrius carried to Sparta and threw into the bosom of Lēda. From it sprung Hēlēna, whom the Spartan queen acknowledged as her daughter. Others make Lēda the mother of Hēlēna. This account does not materially differ from that of Apollōdōrus. To her being worshipped at Rhāmēnus may be referred her surname of Rhāmēnēsia, and to the temple erected to her by Adrāstus, that of Adrāstia. Pausanias mentions, that she was only implacable to the insolent, and, therefore, caused the defeat of the barbarians at Mārathon. Phidias executed a statue of her with a chaplet representing stags and emblems of victory. In her right hand she held a branch of an ash tree, and in her left, a cup on which Ethiopians were engraved; the latter emblem, that author acknowledged he did not understand. Fōrmēsa Nēmēsis est fāma argūti Tibūlli (Mart. viii. 73).

Nēmētes, um (Sing. Nēmētis, is), m. a people of Gāllia Bēlgica, probably a tribe of the Germans (in the opinion of Tacitus, expressly of German extraction, Mor. Ger. 28), on the W. bank of Rhēnus, the Rhine, between the Tribōci, and Vāngiōnes. Their principal city was Nōvlōmāgus, afterwards Nēmētes, now Spire (Cas. B. G. i. 51). Lūcānus has Rūra Nēmētis (Phar. i. 419), which some consider as the singular of Nēmētes, and others the name of a river, neither of which can be reconciled with the context, therefore Mōnēci has been suggested as the true reading.

Nēo, ōnis, m. a Theban, who fled with Pērsēus, king of Mācēdōnia, from the battle in which the latter was conquered, and, having been taken prisoner by the Romans, was beheaded, because his countrymen by his advice, had formed an alliance with the Macedonian king (Liv. xliv. 43 seq.).

Nēōbūlē, es, f. a young woman, whom Hēracles advises to continue her fondness for Hēracles (Od. iii. 12. 6).

Nēōcesārēa, as, f. Niksar, a town of Pōntus on the Lycus (Amm. Mar. xvii. 12).

Nēōcles, is, m. the father of Thēmistōcles. Nēōclides, as, m. a patronymic of Thēmistōcles (Ov. Ep. Pont. i. 3. 69).

Nēōtichos, i, f. (i. e. new wall), a fort erected by Alcibiādes, about the year 406 B. C., in Chērsonēsus Thraciā, Gallipoli (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 7).—2. A town of Æolia (Plin. i. 106).

Nēōphytus, i, m. one of the few attendants of the emperor Nērō, after the senate had condemned him to death (Aur. Vic. Ep. 5).

Nēptōlēmus, i, m. a name of Pērrhus q. v. son of Achilles and Deidānia. Virgilius calls him Pēlides, from his being the grandson of Pēlēus (Æn. ii. 263).—2. Brother of Arrūbas, king of the Mōlōssi (Iustinus says, the son), and father of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great (Iust. vii. 6; xvii. 3).—3. One of the generals of Alexander the Great, who, after the death of that conqueror, received Armēnia for his province. He and Crātērus made war on Eumēnes, and both fell in battle (Cor. Nep. Eum. 4). From Iustinus, he appears to have been faithless and treacherous.—4. A prefect of Mithridates, king of Pōntus (Flor. iii. 5).

Nēpētē, e. Nēpē, is, n. (Liv. vi. 9. Nēpētē, Plin. i. 321. Nēpita, Strab. 321); Nepi, a town of Etruria, Tuscany, near the river Pozzolo. Inh. Nēpēsini, orum, m. capitulated to the Etrusci, whilst the ambassadors were imploring the aid of the Romans under Cāmillus, for which, after that general had retaken the town, he beheaded the advisers of that surrender, in 385 B. C. (Liv. vi. 9 seq.). Adj. Nēpēsinus, a, um. Nēpēsinus ager (Liv. v. 19). Nēpēsina cōlōra (Sil. Ital. viii. 489).

Nēphēlē, es, f. the wife of Athamas, king of Thēbes, Thēba, who, after being the mother of Phryxus and Hellē, was divorced on pretence of madness, as a preparatory step to his marriage with Inō. Nēphēlēis, ēidos, e. Nēphēlēas, ēidos, f. Hellē, the daughter of Nēphēlē (Luc. Phar. ix. 956). Adj. Nēphēlēus, a, um. Nēphēlēum pēcas, the ram with the golden fleece (Val. Flacc. i. 56).

Nēphēlis, ēdis, f. a promontory of Cilicia, remarkable from being mentioned in an ancient treaty of the Athenians. The Rhōdi in 199 B. C. threatened, if Antiochus, king of Syria, brought his troops to the west of Nēphēlis, that they would make war on him (Liv. xxxiii. 20).

Nēphēris, is, f. Selymen, a town of Africa, in what was afterwards called Zēugitāna, considerably to the west of Cape Bon. It was a place of very difficult access, of which Hāsdrubal availed himself, and pitched his camp there in 149 B. C. The advantages of situation did not prevent the camp falling into the hands of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus (Liv. Ep. 51).

Nēpus, ōtis, m. a neighbour and friend of Mārtialis, whom he mentions in several of his epigrams (vi. 27 &c.).

Nēpōtānus, i, m. son of Eutrōpia, sister of Constantinus, who, with the assistance of a body of desperate slaves and gladiators, assumed the title of Augustus, received the homage of the senate, and reigned twenty-eight days, in the year 352. Not satisfied with the life of Nēpōtānus, the conqueror, Māgnētius, put to death his mother Eutrōpia, all his adherents, and proscribed all who bore the name, or were connected with the family, of Constantinus. Nēpōtānus appears to have committed some acts of great cruelty, on which account, Eutrōpius adds, that his end was worthy of his cruel commencement (x. 11).

Nēptūnia, as, f. a Roman colony, known by the Greek name Pōsidōnia q. v.

Nēptūnus, i, m. the god of the sea, was the son of Sātūrnus and Rhēa, and the brother of Jupiter and Plūto. He was generally represented in a chariot made of sea shell, drawn by sea horses, dolphins, or horses with wings. In his hand he held a trident, as an emblem of his sovereignty of the ocean. Horses and bulls were sacrificed to this god. He was called Equūstris, from having produced a horse from the earth, with a stroke of his trident, when Minerva and he contended who should give name to the city which Cærops had built. She caused an olive to spring up, which the gods considered more useful to mankind than the horse, and therefore adjudged the victory to her. The goddess then, from her own name (in Greek, Ἀθήνα), called the city Athēna, now Athens. The ancients attributed earthquakes to Nēptūnus, hence called Ἐνέσιγες. Equester Nep-tūnus, from the ancients believing that he produced the first horse (Liv. i. 9). Nēptūnus is often employed to denote the sea, or salt-water. Nēptūnālia, ium, n. festivals of Neptune. Nēptūnicōla, as, e, g. a mariner.

Telon Nēptūnicōla (Sil. Ital. xiv. 443). Nēptūniēs, es, f. Thētis, the daughter of Nēptūnus. Adj. Nēptūnālis, is, e, et, Nēptūnus, a, um. Nēptūnia Trōja, from its walls being built by Nēptūnus and Apollō (Virg. Æn. iii. 3). Nēptūnia cōnjūr, Amphitrītē (Virg. Cir. 483). Nēptūnia area, the fields of Nēptūnus, i. e. the surface of the sea (Virg. Æn. viii. 696). Nēptūnius dix, i. e. Sextus Pompeius q. v. (Hor. Epod. ix. 7).

Nēquinum, i, n. afterwards Narini q. v. It received the latter name from the river Nār, the Nera, on a colony of Roman soldiers being sent thither as a barrier against the Umbri in 301 B. C. (Liv. x. 10).

Nērēis, ēdis, f. daughter of Pērrhus II., king of Epirus, and wife of Gēlo, son of the king of Sicily (Iust. xxviii. 3).

Nērētum, i, n. Nardo, a town of the Salēntini, on the eastern shore of Tarētūnus Sinus, the Gulf of Taranto. Salēntinūm Nērētum (Ov. Met. xv. 51). Inh. Nērētūni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 357).

Nērēus, ēos, v. Nērēus, i, m. (whose name has been derived from Nērōs, moist) the son of Ocēānus and Tērta, who married Dōris, by whom he had fifty daughters. He possessed the gift of prophecy, and the power of assuming any shape. This term is often used to denote the sea. Nērēides, dum (Sing. Nērēis, ēidos), f. the fifty daughters of Nērēus, who were all sea goddesses. Nērēiēs, es, f. a patronymic of the daughters of Nērēus, which Virgilius applies to Gālātēa, but is not of frequent occurrence (B. vii. 37). Adj. Nērēus, et, Nērēus, a, um. Nērēus nēpos, grandson of Nērēus, i. e. Achilles (Hor. Epod. xvii. 8). Nērēia quātūor, Thētis (Ov. Met. xiii. 162). Nērēia Græca, the marriage-bed of Nērēus, i. e. a cave in Mount Pélion (Claud. vii. 116).

Nērēus, i, f, e. Nērēum, i, n. (Nērītum, Plin. i. 497), an island on the western coast of Greece, afterwards called Leucas, from a son of Icārus, and brother of Pēnēlopē. It appears to have had a cognominal town (Hom. Od. xxiv. 376).

Nērīs, is, f, a village of Argolis, according to Pausanias; but Stēphānus makes it a town of Messēnia.

Nērītōs, i, f, an island in the Ionian Sea, near Cēphallēnia, anciently under the government of the kings of Ithāca and Dulichium. From Virgilius, it appears to be high and rocky (En. iii. 271), which answers likewise to the description of it, by Silius Italicus (xv. 305). Adj. Nērītus, a, um. Nērītia rātis, the ship of Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiv. 563), who is called Nērītus dux (Ov. Trist. i. 4. 57). Nērītia dōmūs, the houses on Nērītōs (Ov. Met. xiii. 712). Some understand, by this, Leucas, or, Leucadia, which seems a mistake, since that formed no part of the kingdom of Ulysses, and Ovidius expressly includes Nērītia dōmūs in the dominions of that king.

Nērītus, i, m, a son of Pterelāus, and brother of Ithācus and Pōlyctor. He appears to have given his name to the mountain in Ithāca (Hom. Od. xvii. 207).

Nērītus, i, m. Anōi, (i. e. lofty), a mountain in Ithāca, Teaki, so called from Nērītus q. v., brother of Ithācus and Pōlyctor. He is reckoned the founder of Ithāca (Ov. Met. xiv. 159). This mountain is high and rocky, naked and barren, producing nothing but stunted evergreens, and aromatic plants. It is the highest in the island, and has a monastery, named Cathāra, near its summit. Adj. Nērītus, a, um. Nērītia prōles, i. e. Sāgūntini, the inhabitants of Sāgūntum, from its having been built by a colony from Zācynthus, Zante (Sil. Ital. ii. 817).

Nērītus, i, m, a man killed by Iētes in the battle of Trāsīmēnus, the Lake of Perugia (Sil. Ital. v. 260).—2. A banker, mentioned by Hōratius (Sat. ii. 3. 69). Others understand him to be a lawyer, or money-lender. The first is the more probable opinion.—3. A usurer, who had a third wife, consequently was in the possession of the dowry of the former two, by which he had become wealthy (Pers. Sat. ii. 14).

Nērō, ōnis, m. See L. Dēmītius Abēnōbāribus.

Nērō, ōnis, m, a Roman, who fought against Hannibal, after the battle of Cannā (Sil. Ital. xii. 483).—2. Son of Germānicus and Agrippina. At his entering on the estate of manhood, Tiberius recommended him to the senators, requested he might be exempted from serving the office of Vigintivirātus, and allowed to stand candidate for the quaestorship five years sooner than the age prescribed by law. The senate not only granted all that was asked, but added a seat in the college of priests. He married Jūlia, daughter of Drusus, son of the emperor Tiberius. Through the wicked arts of Sējanus, he was banished to the island Pōntia, Ponza, where he died of hunger in prison. Suetonius relates that, according to some, Nērō killed himself, being frightened at the sight of the instruments of death presented by an executioner, who, without doubt, acted by the orders of Sējanus (Tac. Ann. ii. 43 seq.).

Nērse, v. Nūrse, arum, f, a town of the Equi, of which Ufens was a native (Virg. Aen. vii. 744). It does not occur in any author, except Virgilius.

Nērtōbriga, ae, f. Valera la veja, a town of Bētica, a district of Spain.—2. Another, of Celtiberia (Plin. i. 296). Inh. Nērtōbriges, um, m. (Flor. ii. 17).

Nērva. See Cūccius.

Nērvi, orum (Sing. Nērvius, i), m, the Nervians, a powerful and warlike nation of Gallia Belgica, whose country lay on both sides of Scāldis, the Scheldt, near the source of that river, afterwards Hainault, and Nord. They revolted, and attacked the Roman troops under Cæsar; but were totally routed. The character of this nation will be found in Cæsar, B. G. ii. 15. Tacitus relates they were ambitious of being reckoned descended from the Germans (Mor. Ger. 28). Their mode of defence against the attacks of cavalry was simple and effectual. The different readings in Cæs. B. G. ii. 17, are numerous, yet the idea conveyed by all is not very materially different. In the place where the Nērvi wished to raise a barrier, they half-cut two rows of young trees, probably at a considerable distance from each other, so that they continued to grow, bent them longitudinally, and gave their branches a lateral direction. The middle space between these rows was planted with briars and thorns, which, intermixing with the trees that formed the outside of the fence, rendered the whole so close and impervious, that it not only stopped the progress, but even the view, of the invaders. If enātis be joined with ramis, which is the common reading, its force is lost; because it then only shows that the branches were growing, which is sufficiently expressed by inclatis; and the intervening ground might, in that case, have been filled up with dead thorns, which would have been both a weaker defence, and, besides, being subject to rapid decay, could have been easily destroyed by fire. Several MSS. want enātis; but the sense is injured by the omission. Adj. Nērvius, a, um. Nērviūm praliūm (Cæs. B. G. iii. 5).

Nērūlius, i, m, son of P. Silius q. v., whom the enemies of his father charged with extortion, but Nērō checked the prosecution in the year 59 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45).

Nērūlōnēnsis, in Suet. Aug. 4. The true reading seems to be Vētūlōnēnsis, or, Nēmōrēnsis, since no place is known from which such a word as Nērūlōnēnsis could be derived.

Nērūlum, i, n, a town of Lucānia, taken by the Roman consul, Q. Æmilius Bārbūla, in 317 B. C. (Liv. ix. 20).

Nēsōē, es, f, a sea nymph (Virg. Aen. v. 826).

Nēsātium, i, n. Castel-nuovo, a town of Istria, near the mouth of Arsia, the Arso, besieged and taken by the Roman consul, C. Claudius Pūlcher, in 179 B. C. The inhabitants, who had no thoughts of peace, began to kill their wives and children in open view, and then threw them down from the walls, which the Romans, during the carnage, scaled (Liv. xlii. 11).

Nēsītōta, arum, m, a people of Cēphallēnia, who gave twenty hostages to the Roman consul, M. Fūlvius Nobilior, without resistance, in 101 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 28).

Nēsis, īdis, f. Nisita, an island on the western coast of Italy, between Pausilypus, Pausilyppo, and Pūtēōli, Puzzuolo (Stat. Syl. iii. l. 148). Lucānus describes it as infested with a very unwholesome atmosphere (Phar. vi. 90).

Nessus, i, m. a son of Ixion and a cloud, one of the centaurs, the ferryman of the river Euxinus, whom Hērclēs killed with a poisoned arrow, for having attempted to injure his wife Dēlānira. Before he expired, Nēsus sent his cloak, stained with the blood and poison which flowed from the wound, to Dēlānira, assuring her that it possessed the power of recalling a husband from unlawful attachments. She, in a fit of jealousy, persuaded Hērclēs to put on this deadly robe, which produced such violent pains, that, unable to bear them, he raised a funeral pile on Eta, Banina, on which he stretched himself, and was burnt to ashes. See Hērclēs. Perfida dōna Nēsi, the treacherous gift of Nessus, i. e. the poisoned tunic (Mart. ix. 67). Adj. Nēssēus, a, um. Nēssēus sīnguis, the poisoned blood of Nessus (Ov. Met. ix. 153).

Nessus, i, m. the name of a ship belonging to the Carthaginians or Sicilians, sunk by Pōdētus, in an engagement off the coast of Sicily, between the Romans and Carthaginians during the second Punic war. She had this name probably from having a figure of the centaur Nessus on her prow (Sil. Ital. xiv. 500).

Nessus, i, m. the Mesto, Mestro, or, Carasa, a river dividing Thrācia from Mācēdōnia. Pērsēus had some villages to the east of it, and the lands comprehended between Strýmon and Nēssus formed the first division of Mācēdōnia, on that country becoming a Roman province (Liv. xlv. 29).

Nēstor, ōris, m. a son of Nēlēus and Chlōris, who succeeded his father in the throne of Pēlos, Nabario, hence Rex Pēllus, Pēllus Nēstor, &c. He was the only male of that family who escaped the sword of Hērclēs. Nēlēus himself, and his other eleven sons, fell victims to the strength and ferocity of that hero. According to Ovidius, he was one of the hunters of the Calydonian boars, and also present at the battle between the centaurs and the Lāpithæ at the marriage of Pirithōus (Ov. Met. viii. 313 seq.). He was one of the Argonauts, according to Valērius Flaccus (i. l. 145 seq.). Among the Grecian chiefs who went to the Trojan war, Nestor was distinguished for the superiority of his wisdom, and the sweetness of his eloquence. Hence his name came to signify a judicious and able adviser. He is said to have lived three ages (Ov. Met. xii. 188); by which Ovidius understood three hundred years. He was, according to that poet, in his third century when the Trojan war began. Hýginus says Apōllo granted to him the years which he had taken from Chlōris and his ten brothers (10). Vivat Nēstōra totum, let him live the whole life of Nestor, i. e. as many years as Nestor lived (Juv. Sat. xii. 128). Nēstōrides, a, m. a patronymic of Antilōchus, son of Nēstor (Ov. Ep. Pont. ii. 4. 22). Adj. Nēstōrēus, a, um. Nēstōrēa sēnēcta (Stat. Syl. i. 3. 110).

Nētum, v. Nētum, i, n. Noto, a town of Sicily, not far from Pachynus, Cape Passaro. From Plinius (l. 346), it appears to have been anciently a town of considerable note, which the expression of Cicero Nētārum civitas federata, confirms (Ver. v. 51). It was destroyed by an earthquake in the year 1693, and the small town was afterwards built, called Noto Nuovo. It gave name to the province in which it was situated, Val di Noto. Inh. Nētini, orum, v. Nētīnēses, ium, m. The latter, although uniformly found in the best editions of Cicero (Ver. ii. 65), probably originated in the mistake of a transcriber, since Latin authors seldom vary the names of people in that manner.

Neuri, orum, m. a tribe of the Sarmātas, who, according to Ammianus Mārcellinus, lived on the sources of Bōrýsthēnes, the Dniéper (xxii. 8). Neūris, īdis, f. the country of the Neuri (Herod. iv. 51).

Neūrus, i, m. one of the three commanders of the Ibēri, in the war against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 122).

Nicea, a, f. the wife of Crātērus (Liv. xxxv. 26).

Nicea, a, f. a city of Lōcris, on Sinus Māllācus (Liv. xxviii. 5).—2. Isnik, the metropolis of Bithýnia, surrounded by a large and fertile plain, not very healthful during the heat of summer. Cātullus includes both ideas in one line, Niceaquē aper ubi estātores (xvi. 5). Antigonūs, son of Philippus, first built this city and called it Antigonēa; Lysimachus afterwards rebuilt it, and in honour of his wife gave it the name of Nicea. It formed a square of which each side extended four miles in length. Inh. Niceēnses, ium, m. (Cic. Ep. Fam. xiii. 61).—3. Nice, or, Nizza, a town of Ligúria, founded by the Massiliēnses, on Vārus, the Var (Liv. Ep. 47).—4. A city of India, built by Alexander the Great in 327 B. C., to which he gave this name commemorative of his victory over Pōrus (Strab. 995).

Nicānder, dri, m. an Ætolian, whom his countrymen sent to Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia, with the view of exciting him to take up arms against the Romans in 195 B. C. On returning from Antiochus, king of Syria, Nicānder deceived his countrymen by unfounded assertions with respect to preparations for war, making at that time both by land and sea. In 191 B. C., the Ætolians appointed him prætor, but whatever his hatred of the Romans may have been, his plans and operations as a soldier were quite harmless, and scarcely gave any trouble to that warlike nation (Liv. xxxv. 12 seq.).—2. The chief of a set of pirates whom Polyxēnidas despatched with five decked ships for Pānōrmus, ordering him to lead his men by the shortest road through the fields to that town, and to come behind the enemy, in 192 B. C. This commission he executed with ability and success (Liv. xxxvii. 11).—3. One of the courtiers of Philippus, king of Mācēdōnia (Liv. xxxiii. 8).

Nicānor, ōris, m. a præfect of Cāssānder, who, by a stratagem, obtained possession of Piræus, Porto Leone, owing to the inactivity, or treachery of Phōcion (Cor. Nep. Phoc. 2). Elated with pride, and full of arrogance, Cāssānder treacherously put him to death, supposing that he was alienated from him in consequence of his keeping possession of Mūnýchia by his troops (Diod. Sic. xviii. 75).—2. The son of Pārménio, who was in Alexander the Great's Asiatic expedition, greatly beloved by that monarch, who was mented his early death. He appears to have been universally esteemed (Curt. iii. 9 seq.).—2. Another of this name, in the army of Alexander, who conspired against him (Curt. vi. 7).—4. A fourth, remarkable for his rashness and audacity. He was killed along with Symmachus (Curt. viii. 13).—5. An officer of Alexander the Great in India, who succeeded to the kingdom of Parthia, on the death of that conqueror (Just. xiii. 4).

Nicæbides, is, m. an officer in the army of Alexander the Great, whom he appointed governor of Persæpôlis, with a garrison of three thousand Macedonians, in 330 B. C. (Curt. v. 6).

Nicæsiippus, i, m. the person who carried to Thrasybûlus the second Isthmian ode of Pindarus (Pin. Isth. ii. 68).

Nicæ, es, f. a town, or rather a fort, of Thracia, near Hæmus, Balkan (Amm. Mar. xxvi. 11).

Nicéphôrtum, i, n. a grove at Pêrgamus, which Diônysidôrus, ambassador of Attalus, demanded, in the conference at Nicæa, should be restored by Philippus, king of Mæcêdônia, to Attalus, with the temple of Vênus, which Philippus had plundered, in their former state. This grove was planted by Euimenes (Liv. xxxii. 33, 34).—2. Racca, a town at the confluence of Bilichia and Euphrates, built by the Macedonians (Tac. Ann. vi. 41). Flor. iii. 11. It is also written Nicéphôrtum (Plin. i. 711).

Nicéphôrtus, i, m. the Khabour, a considerable river of Asia, which washed part of the walls of Tigrânocerta, Serd (Tac. Ann. xv. 4).

Nicer, eri, m. the Necker, a river of Germany, which rises in the south part of Suedia, runs through this circle, and falls into the Rhine at Manheim (Amm. Mar. xxviii. 2).

Niceros, ôtis, m. a perfumer at Rome (Mart. xii. 66). Adj. Nicêrôtianus, a, um. Nicêrôtianâ plumbæ, the leaden vessels in which Niceros kept his perfumes (Mart. vi. 55).

Nicetes, is, m. a native of Smÿrna, and a rhetorician of great celebrity. From Sêneca and Plinius the younger, he appears to have been an excellent man, and an able instructor (Sen. Controv. iv. 25. Plin. Epist. vi. 6).

Nicîas, a, m. an Athenian, son of Nicêratus, who rose to great distinction among his countrymen, from the continued success with which fortune long favoured his enterprises. Want of great endowments rendered it necessary for him to secure the favour of the populace by his liberality, gymnastic exercises, and the like exhibitions. Extreme caution marked his whole conduct, which frequently thwarted the plans of his enemies, and seldom terminated in disappointment. Of his success in arms, Plûtarchus has recorded numerous instances. Amongst his powerful opponents were Clêon and Alcibiades, who sometimes prevailed against him in the assemblies of the people, and added to their celebrity as warriors. The influence of Alcibiades induced the Athenians to declare war against the Syracusans, a measure which Nicîas opposed, and Lãmachus, Nicîas, and Alcibiades were appointed joint commanders in 415 B. C., in expectation, that by uniting the caution of Nicîas with the impetuosity of Alcibiades, and the boldness of Lãmachus, they would ensure success. Socrâtes, warned by the usual tokens of his genius, foretold the expedition would be fatal to Athens, and Nicîas protested against the war as disastrous, which was justified by the event, of which much of the blame must be attributed to himself, who dispirited the troops, both by his delays and harangues. Alcibiades being recalled, and Lãmachus killed in battle, the sole command devolved on Nicîas, under whom one disaster followed another, until he and Dêmôsthênes, who had been sent with a reinforcement, were obliged to surrender, when, according to Philletus and Thucydides, the Syracusans stoned both to death. Timæus says, they killed themselves. The account of Justinus, who differs from both, makes Dêmôsthênes fall by his own hand, and Nicîas a prisoner (lv. 45).

—2. An intimate friend of Pyrrhus, who, says Claudius Quadrigarius, an historian, offered to the Roman consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius to cut off Pyrrhus by poison, of which they informed the king by letter, a copy of which is preserved by A. Gellius (iii. 8).—3. A prætor of the Acheans, whom Philippus, king of Mæcêdônia, sent with booty to Ægium, Vostitza, in 209 B. C. (Liv. xxviii. 8).—4. An officer, who, by the order of Pêrseus, king of Mæcêdônia, threw into the sea all the treasure found at Pella, Allahkissia, in 171 B. C. In order to conceal his own cowardice on that occasion, the monarch put both Nicîas and Andrônîcus to death, the only witnesses of that command (Liv. xlv. 10).

Nico, ônis, m. a youth of Tarentum, Taranto, surnamed Pêro, who joined Philéménus, in forming, against the Romans, a conspiracy of the young noblemen of that city, by which it was betrayed to Hânribal, in 214 B. C. He was in the Tarentine fleet, under Dêmocritus, and, with his own hand, killed Dêelus Quinctius, who commanded the Roman fleet. He fell fighting, at the time Tarentum was retaken by Q. Fabius Maximus, consul (Liv. xxv. 8 seq.).

Nicôcles, is, m. a man, mentioned with approbation by Pindarus, after his death. He appears to have excelled in boxing, and to have gained the prize at the Isthmian games (Pin. Isth. viii. 134).

Nicôcrôn, ôntis, m. tyrant of Cÿprus, who lived about 330 B. C. Valerius Maximus has recorded his cruelty to the philosopher Anaxarchus, who accompanied Alexander the Great (iii. 3).

Nicodâmus, i, m. a commander of the Ætolians, sent to the aid of the Ambraciens. By a dexterous manœuvre, he contrived to enter the city, with five hundred men, at the time it was closely besieged by M. Fulvius Nobilior, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 5 seq.).

Nicômæchus, i, m. a charioteer (Pin. Isth. ii. 32).—2. A youth, for whom Dÿmnus had a criminal attachment, and endeavoured to engage him in the plot against the life of Alexander the Great, in 330 B. C. (Curt. vi. 7).

Nicômôdes, is, m. was king of part of Bithÿnia, and assisted Leônôrtus, a chieftain of the Gauls, in crossing from Byzantium, Constantinople, to Asia, where he joined Lôtarius, and, by their united efforts, defeated Zibetis, who possessed part of Bithÿnia.

nla, and was then making war on Nicomēdes. After the defeat of Zibœta, in 191 B. C., all Bithynia became subject to Nicomēdes (Liv. xxxviii. 16).—2. Son of Prusias, king of Bithynia, who came to Rome with his father, in 168 B. C., and was recommended to the protection of the senate, a charge which they readily accepted, and ordered him a present of the same value as that given to Māsāba, son of Māsīnissa. He murdered his father, in 150 B. C., with the assistance of Attālus, king of Pergāmus, Bergamo (Liv. xlv. 44—Ep. 50).—3. Surnamed Philōpator, grandson of Prusias, a king of Bithynia, restored to the throne, in 91 B. C., and expelled from it the following year, by Mithridātes, king of Pōntus. He died, in 77 B. C., and left his dominions to the Romans, which they reduced into a province (Liv. Ep. 74—93. Sal. Frag. 4). The account of Jāstinus is somewhat different (xxxvii. 4—xxxviii. 2).—4. Son of the former, by a dancing girl, who fled to Rome on being driven from his kingdom, soon after his father's death, by Mithridātes (Just. xxxviii. 3 seq.). This account of Jāstinus is at variance with that of Lālius.

Nicomēdia, s. f. Is-Nikmed, a town of Bithynia, at the northeast extremity of Prōpōntis, the Sea of Marmora, founded by Nicomēdes, one of the first kings of that country. Besides the splendour which it enjoyed during the dynasty of that prince, many of the emperors of the east fixed their residences there, and the town flourished in all the wealth and magnificence attendant on an imperial court. Its ancient name was Asticum, and, by Cōstantinus, it was called Piētus, in honour of his wife. Ammianus Mārcellinus has given a description of the earthquake by which it was destroyed (xvii. 6 seq.). The country round it is fertile and pleasant, and, from standing on a bay of the Sea of Marmora, Is-Nikmed continues to be a place of considerable trade (Eutrop. x. 6). Subj. Nicomēdienses, ium, m. (Eutrop. iv. 5). Adj. Nicomēdiens, a, um.

Nicōpolis, s. f. Bereia, or, Prevesa Ecechia, a town of Greece, built by Augustus, to commemorate his victory at Actium. The modern village occupies only the lower part of the old town which is now in ruins (Tac. Ann. ii. 53). Some fragments still remain of the aqueduct, which brought a copious supply of water from the distance of at least thirty miles. Adj. Nicōpōlitānus, a, um. Nicōpōlitāna civitas (Plin. i. 406).—2. A town of Media, built by Trajānus, in consequence of his conquest of the Dāci, which still retains its ancient name (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).—3. Dioriet, a city of Armēnia Minor, built by Cn. Pōmpeius, on his conquest of Mithridātes (Ap. Bel. Mith. 243).

Nicōstrātus, l. m. an officer under Alexander the Great, and one of the conspirators against his life, in 328 B. C. (Curt. viii. 6).—2. A praetor of the Achaë, who aided in forming a peace between the Romans and Nābis, tyrant of Lācēdæmon. Besides, he concluded a truce with Nābis and his countrymen, during the war with Philippus, over whose general, Andrōsthēnes, he gained a complete victory, by a skilful stratagem, and by that means relieved Achāia from fear, in 199 B. C. (Liv. xxxii. 39 seq.).—3. A Greek, who excelled in wrestling and boxing. Quintillānus mentions (that) he, when a young man, had seen Nicōstrātus, and adds his testimony to his being invincible in the athletic arts just mentioned (ii. 8). Tacitus speaks of his strength (Orat. 10).

P. Nigīdus Figūlus, P. Nigīdī Figūli, m. a noble Roman, whom Lūcānus extols for his knowledge of astronomy, or rather astrology (Phar. i. 639). He received the surname of Figūlus, from maintaining, on his return from Greece, that the earth revolved as rapidly as a potter's wheel. He wrote on a variety of subjects, but all his works have perished. Cicero frequently mentions this learned Roman, and acknowledges his obligations to him for his advice in crushing the conspiracy of Cātilina. We find him mentioned as praetor, and history informs us that Caesar banished him, because he had attached himself to Cn. Pōmpeius. As a proof of his knowledge in astrology, it has been stated, that he declared, the very day on which Augustus was born, that the master of the world had entered life. The young reader should withhold his belief from such fictions, since the whole science of astrology can be reckoned nothing but deception and quackery.

Nigrina, s. f. a woman, in whose praise Mārtilis writes an epigram (iv. 75).

Nilēus, ῥος, m. a man, who falsely pretended that he was the son of Nilus, the Nile, and bore on his silver shield a representation of that river. Pērcēus showed him the Gorgon's head, which converted him into stone (Ov. Met. v. 187).—2. A son of Cōdrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia Minor, where he built Miletus, and other cities (Amm. Mar. xxii. 8. Herod. ix. 97).

Nilus, l. m. the Nile, a large river of Africa, which takes its rise in Abyssinia; runs through Abex, Nubia, and Egypt, and pours its waters into the Mediterranean Sea by two channels. In ancient times, the Nile had seven mouths, of which five are now dry, and the tracts of land which they watered are become nearly desert. The two which remain are Ostium Bolbitinum, the Rosetta Branch, on the west, and Ostium Phatmeticum, the Damietta Branch, which is by much the larger of the two. These, with part of the Mediterranean Sea, now form the boundaries of the Delta of Egypt. The ancients called the most easterly mouth, Ostium Pelusiæum; the second, Ostium Taniticum, the Eumæ fan-reggè mouth; the third, Ostium Mendesium, the Delè, or, the Pascheira mouth. Measuring along the coast, the Delta has lost, on the east side, about seventy British miles, by these three ceasing to run, except during the swell, and the space which they traversed is become barren sand. The fourth was called Ostium Phatmeticum, the Damietta branch; the fifth, Ostium Sebenniticum; the sixth, Ostium Bolbitinum, the Rosetta branch; and the last, Ostium Canopicum, which is now dry. By the Nile deserting the last mentioned channel, the Delta q. v. is diminished eighteen miles on the west side. Diodorus Siculus states, that the Nile contained an incredible number of islands, and Burckhardt has confirmed that opinion, as far as the course of this river is accurately known. About the end of June the swell of this celebrated river begins, and it continues to rise till the last days of September, or begins ning of October. From this period till the winter solstice, it is gradually decreasing. Its waters, during the inundation, are of a dirty red colour, and, even in April and May, when they are least turbid, they are never quite clear, but have always a cloudy hue. The term inundation, strictly speaking, is correct only when applied to the Delta, as the river is confined in Upper Egypt, between high banks, so as to prevent an overflow. The adjacent country is watered entirely by canals cut in various directions, and opened at certain periods for the purposes of irrigation. At the head of the Delta, the water rises twenty-five feet, in some years probably more, and gradually decreases to Rosetta and Damietta, at which its height does not exceed four feet, some think less. The mud or slime left by this river, is regarded as a sufficiently enriching substance for the land, without any other kind of manure. The Etesian winds prevail with great violence, and, for a considerable length of time, annually, at the period of the Nile's inundation. A vessel leaving Rosetta, is driven by this monsoon with extraordinary velocity, against the whole force of the torrent, to Cairo, or any part of Upper Egypt. For the purpose of her return, with even greater rapidity, it is only necessary to take down mast and sails, and leave her to be carried against the wind by the powerful current of the river. It is thus possible to perform the whole voyage from Rosetta to Bahig, the quay of Cairo, and back again, with certainty, in about seventy hours, a distance equal to 400 miles. There are said to be eight cataracts in the course of the Nile, from its source to the last fall, which is not far above Syênê, Esouan, where the river is about half a mile broad. This last cataract is not, in height, above four feet, and Pococke maintains that it does not exceed three feet. Crocodiles, of which the largest are about twenty-five feet long, are seen a little below Diôspôis Pârva, Holo, and are supposed not to go farther down the river than Gôrgeh, but abound between that place and Syênê, Esouan. The common Egyptian mode of clarifying the water of the Nile, is by means of pounded almonds. It holds a number of substances in a state of imperfect solution, which are in this way precipitated. Its water is then of uncommon purity, remarkable for its being easily digested by the stomach, for its salutary qualities, and for all the purposes to which it is applied. The ancients maintained a very different opinion, which proves that it was then used in an unclarified state. See Plinius. Pappyrifer Nilus (Ov. Met. xv. 763). Nilotes, re, m, an inhabitant of the banks of the Nile; an Egyptian (Prop. iv. 8. 89). Nilicola, a, c, g, an inhabitant of the Nile. Niligên, a, c, g, one born on the banks of the Nile. Nilôis, idis, f, of the Nile; applied to a female, or to a noun feminine. Nilôis tunica (Mart. x. 6). Adj. Nilicus, et, Niloticus, a, m, of the Nile; of Egypt, Egyptian. Nithens pecten, the Egyptian fan, which, Martialis says, surpassed the Babylonian needle, i. e. the Egyptians embroidered better in the loom, than the Babylonians with the needle (xiv. 150). Nithica jutea, Apis (Mart. viii. 81). Nithica plect, the commonalty of Egypt (Juv.

Sat. i. 26). Nithica mœdi, Egyptian strains, i. e. lascivious verses (Ov. Art. Am. iii. 318). Nithica rûpi (Claud. viii. 574).

Ninus, 3, m, a son of Belas, who built Nineveh, one of the greatest cities of antiquity, on the bank of the Tigris, was the founder of the Assyrian monarchy, and, according to Justinus, was the first who, from love of empire, changed the ancient custom of nations, made war upon his neighbours, and retained possession of the countries which he conquered (i. 1). He married Sémirâmis q. v., the wife of one of his officers, who, from a dread of Ninus, after he fell in love with her, killed himself. Sémirâmis outlived her husband, and succeeded him in the government.

Ninus, i, et, Ninêvê, es, f, called, in Scripture, Nineveh, a name still given it by the natives, a very ancient city of the Assyrians, on the banks of Tigris, the Dejilah, in the province of Adiabênê, built by Ninus, the husband of Sémirâmis, hence its name. Strabo says, that Ninus built Ninus, in Aturia, and Diôdorus Siculus records the same fact. In magnitude, this city surpassed Bâbylon, and, in Holy Writ, it is said to be a city of three days' journey. Ammianus Marcellinus states, that it was of prodigious extent, that it was afterwards called Hicrâpôlis, and that it was the seat of the Persian government (xviii. 7—xxiii. 6). Strabo mentions it was in ruins when he wrote; but Tacitus, Ptolémæus, and Ammianus Marcellinus, describe it as existing when they composed the different works which bear their names. Diôdorus Siculus makes its circumference four hundred and eighty stadia, two of its sides being each a hundred and fifty in length, and the other two ninety, so that it formed a rectangle, not a square, like Bâbylon. Its walls rose to the height of a hundred feet, and so thick, that three chariots abreast could run along them. These walls contained fifteen hundred towers, each two hundred feet in height. The natives pretend to show the tomb of the prophet, Jonah, near the site of this celebrated city, and an insignificant village called Nunior, by the modern Persians, occupies a small space of what formed the ancient town. Felix Ninus (Luc. Phars. iii. 215).

Ninûs, a, m, son of Ninus and Sémirâmis, who lost his father before he had reached manhood. From similarity of features, size, and voice, his mother was induced to counterfeit him, on purpose to secure the kingdom against the neighbouring princes. Satisfied with the empire procured for him by his parents, he did not attempt to enlarge his boundaries, or to obtain the character of a great warrior. On the contrary, the society of women engaged his whole attention, and he seldom appeared in the presence of men. He reigned thirty-eight years (Just. i. 1. 2). Ninêvê, es, f, a daughter of Tântâlus, king of Lydia, and Diônê, one of the Hîades. She married Amphion, by whom she had seven sons, and seven daughters. Authors differ respecting the number of her children. Hêrodôtus says she had ten sons, and as many daughters; Hêrodôtus, two sons and three daughters; Hômérus, six sons and six daughters; others, only three sons. Proud of the number and beauty of her children, she boasted that she was more prolific than Lâtôia, æ which the latter, being offended, excited Apollō to put to death all the sons of Niōbē, which he did, except Amphion, and Dīana, at the suggestion of her mother, left only alive, of all the daughters, Chlōris, the wife of Nēleus. Grief for the loss of her children changed Niōbē into a stone, or rock, which Pausanias explains by stating, that he had climbed the mountain Sipylus, and there saw a rock, which, at a distance, had the appearance of a woman in a weeping, or mournful posture; but, at hand, it had neither of these forms; hence Stāsius calls her Sipylēia gēnitrīx (Syl. v. l. 33). To her sufferings and grief, that poet alludes (Th. vi. 124). Adj. Niōbēus, a, um. Niōbēa prōles, the offspring of Niōbē (Hor. Od. iv. 6. 1).

Niphēus, i, m. a Rutalian, whose horses took fright at the approach of Ænēas, and threw him out of the chariot, which they dragged empty to the shore (Virg. Æn. x. 570).

Niphātes, is, m. Barema, a high mountain of Armēnia, in which the Tigris has its source, according to Strābo. It forms part of the range of mount Taurus. Rigidus Niphātes, frozen Niphātes, from its summit being always clad with snow (Hor. Od. ii. 9. 20).—2. A rapid river of Armēnia, mentioned by Lucānus (Phar. iii. 245). Commentators, in general, consider it to have been a mountain, and Servius states, that there were both a river and mountain of this name (Virg. G. iii. 30).

Nipsēi, orum, m. a Thracian nation (Herod. iv. 93).

Nirēus, ēos, m. son of Chārōpus and Aglāia, was king of Nāxos, Naxia, a man of great elegance of form, who is sung in the Iliad of Hōmērus. He owed his celebrity to the beauty of his person, more than to his martial bravery. Among the Latin poets, Propertius, Hōrātius, and Ovidius have described, or alluded to, the personal comeliness of Nirēus (Hor. Od. iii. 20. 15).

Nisa, m, f. the bride of Dāmon (Virg. B. xiii. 18).—2. Daughter of Nicōmēdes, king of Bithynia.

Nisēus, i, m. one of the inhabitants of Cyzicus, Chizio, whom Telāmon killed in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 198).

Nisēa, e, f. Nesa, a town of Mārgāna. Others say the town is now called Herat (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nisibis, is, f. Nisibin, or, Nisibeen, a town of Mēsōpōtāmia, Al-Jezrah, on Mēgdōnūs, the Nahr-el-Hanali, near the source of that river. Under the Macedonian princes, it had the name of Antiōchia Mēgdōnie, and under the Roman emperors, it served as a barrier against the eastern nations, being a place of considerable strength. The emperor Jūlianus, in the disgraceful treaty which he formed with Sapor, king of Pērsia, delivered up this important city and its faithful inhabitants, against their will, to that monarch (Eutrop. vi. 9). Inh. Nisibēni, orum, m. Adj. Nisibēnus, a, um. Nisibēna prōditio (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 10).—2. A town in Aria (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Nisibia, e, f. Nabia, a town of Africa, near Clāpēa, Kalibia. Inh. Nisibēte, arum, m. were among the auxiliaries of the Rhodians and fought in the battle at Alabānda, in which Dindorates, and the troops of Philippus king of Mācedōnia, were routed; 193 B.

C. (Liv. xxxiii. 18). It is by no means certain, that the allies of the Rhodians were inhabitants of that African city.

Nisus, i, m. son of Pāndion, and king of Mēgāra, who had a purple-coloured lock of hair, upon which his good fortune depended; hence Stāsius calls him purple Nisus (Syl. iii. 4. 84). This was known to his family, and, therefore, his daughter Scylla, who was passionately in love with Mīnos, king of Crēta, cut out the fatal lock, on which her father died, at the time that monarch was besieging the capital of the kingdom, in order that she might secure his affection. Nisēis, idis, f. a patronymic of Scylla (Ow. Rem. Am. 757). Adj. Nisēus, et, Nisēlus, a, um. Nisēia virgo, Crētē (Virg. Cir. 390). Nisēi cānes, the dogs which encircled the body of Scylla. Ovidius calls them ship-wrecking monsters, from the danger of crossing the Strait of Mēssina (Fast. iv. 500).—2. A Trojan, son of Hēriacus and Ida. Some are of opinion that Ida was not the name of his mother, but that he was a native of mount Ida, Kazdag. The former idea is unquestionably preferable. He was a youth of remarkable bravery, and most amiable dispositions. Amongst the candidates for the prizes which Ænēas offered for superiority in the foot-race, appeared Nisus and Eurýlus, whose friendship Virgilius has immortalized in the ninth book of the Æneid. In swiftness, Nisus surpassed all the competitors, Sālius was the next to him, and Eurýlus only third. Near the end of the contest, Nisus, confident of the prize, fell, which in a moment blasted all his hopes. Personal disappointment did not exclude anxiety for his friend, whose success he secured, by opposing himself to Sālius, and thereby occasioning his fall. His own loss was more than compensated by seeing Eurýlus receive a horse richly caparisoned, the prize of victory (Æn. v. 294 seq.). After the arrival of Ænēas in Italy, and the commencement of the war with Tīrrus, king of the Rūtūli, when these gallant youths were on sentry one night, love of glory inspired Nisus with the design of attacking the Rūtūli alone during the darkness. Communicating his intention to Eurýlus, the latter insisted on accompanying him, and having obtained the permission of their commanders, they, unperceived, entered the enemy's camp. Agreeably to their expectation, they found the Rūtūli buried in sleep and wine. Numbers had been deprived of life by their bravery, when Nisus observed the approach of three hundred horsemen from Laurētum, and Volsēns, commander of the troop, springing forward, demanded who they were. Attempting no reply, they rushed towards the woods which the horsemen, well knowing every outlet, quickly surrounded. Here the two friends divided, and Nisus would probably have effected his escape, but missing Eurýlus, he returned and found him in the hands of the enemy, two of whom fell by the javelins sent, without being observed, from his own powerful arm. Seeing Volsēns rush on Eurýlus, regardless of death, to save his friend's life, he presented himself before them and exclaimed, "Adsum qui feci, in me convertite ferrum," Volsēns plunged deep his sword into the breast of Eurýlus, whose death Nisus instantly avenged, by a mortal wound, although surrounded by the Laure-fine troops. His friendship disregarded personal safety, and his sole consolation in death was depriving of life the foe by whom his friend had fallen (Virg. Æn. ix. 176 seq.). From his father he is called Hýrtácides.—3. A king of Mégára, anciently called Hýbla, a town of Sicily, of which a colony from Mégára, in Attica, took possession. Nísias, ádis, f. of Nisus, applied to females, or nouns feminine, also of Sicilian Mégára. Nisádes mátres, the matrons of Mégára (Ov. Ep. Her. xv. 54).—4. A nobleman of Dulichium, son of Arctus, and father of Amphinómus (Hom. Od. xvi. 395).—5. A man mentioned by Pindarus (Pyth. ix. 161).

Nisýrus, i. m. one of the Cýcládes (Hom. Il. ii. 678). Adj. Nisýrius, a. um. Nisýrium vinum was reckoned excellent.

Nitíobriges, um. m. a people of Gália, whose country was situated on both sides of Gáruinna, the Garonne, where it is joined by Oltis, the Olt (Cæs. B. G. vii. 7 seq.).

Nixi, v. Nixi, orum. m. (dii), gods who, according to Festus, presided over childbirth. Different explanations have been advanced, but chiefly conjectural, respecting the Nixi dii, because they do not occur in any ancient authors, unless in an instance or two, where the reading is doubtful, as in Ovidius (Met. ix. 294).

Nóctúmus, i. m. a person to whom two of the Laubicus of Virgilius are addressed.

Nóemon, ónis. m. a Trojan, killed by Túr-nus (Virg. Æn. ix. 767).—2. One of the troops of Sárpédon, slain by Ulysses (Ov. Met. xiii. 259).—3. Son of Phrónius (Hom. Od. ii. 386).

Nóes, is. m. a river of Thrácia, Romania, which ran through the territory of the Cróbýzi into Ister, the Danube (Herod. iv. 49). Válerius Fláccus likewise mentions it, but which of the branches of that river was known among the ancients by this name is not certainly known (vi. 101).

Nóla, is. f. Nóla, a town of Cámpánia, Cámpagna, built by Chalcidenses (Just. xx. i. Sil. Ital. xii. 161), or by Tuscans (Vel. Pat. i. 7), or by Tyrians (Solin. 2). The Roman dictator, C. Patellus, or the consul, C. Jántus, took it in 313 B. C. Here the emperor Augustus died. Loh. Nóláni, orum (Sing. Nólani; i. m. During the second Punic war, the nobles prevented the populace from revolting to Hannibal, hence Pana-nón pérota Nólá (Sil. Ital. viii. 534). Adj. Nólanius, a. um. Nólanius ager (Liv. xxiii. 14).

Nólba, is. f. a town of the Orétáni, in Hispánia Tárracónensis, taken by M. Fúl-vius Nobílior, the Roman proconsul, in 194 B. C. (Liv. xxxv. 22).

Nómádes, um (Sing. Nómas, ádis), m. people who had no fixed habitation, but lived by pasturage, and moved from one place to another, as convenience or advantage suggested. Their subsistence depended solely on their flocks, to which their name must be referred (visus, páscó); so that Nómádes describes rather a mode of life than a particular people. Hence we find people known by this appellation in Arabia, Æthiopia, and Africa. The last, quitting that uncivilized practice, settled on the southern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, adjoining to the western boundary of the Carthaginian territory. The Greeks called them Nómádes; the Latins Nómádes and their country Nómádia v. v., but the Latin poets frequently use the Greek appellation (Sil. Ital. i. 215). Nómas, ádis, f. Nómádia (Mart. ix. 77).

Nóméntum, i. n. Lamentatio, or, Mentana, a town on the banks of Anio, the Tecrone. It was taken from the ancient Latins by Túr-quínus Priscus, and near it Q. Sêrvilius, the Roman dictator, routed the legions of the Etrúsci (Liv. i. 38 seq.). Loh. Nóméntáni, orum (Sing. Nóméntani; i. m. were admitted citizens of Rome, with the right of their own worship, in 337 B. C. (Liv. viii. 14). Adj. Nóméntanius, a. um. Nóméntana via, formerly Ficulensis (Liv. iii. 52). Nóméntanius ager (Mart. ii. 38).

Nómion, ónis. m. a prince of Cária, the father of Nástes and Amphimáchus (Hom. Il. ii. 871).

Nómius, i. m. a man in the army of Póli-nices, who exchanged arms with Agýlleus (Stat. Th. x. 254).—2. A man in the army of Etéocles, killed by Hippomédon, after Ætólus, the horse of Týdeus, had been wounded, and he obliged to fight on foot (Stat. Th. ix. 290).—3. A son of Apóllo and Cýrênê (Just. xiii. 7).

Nónacris, is. f. a town and mountain of Arcádia, an inland district of Pélopónnêsus, the Morea. The name is derived from Nónacris, a daughter of Lýcæon, king of that country. Adj. Nónacris, et. Nónacris, a. um. Nónacris rúra (Stat. Th. iv. 294). Virgo Nónacrina, Callistó, a daughter of Lýcæon (Ov. Met. ii. 409).

Nónæ, arum. f. the Nones; the second division of the Roman month. Of this word different derivations have been given. Some suppose it comes from Nónæ, new, because in eight of the months they fell on the fifth day, when the new moon had so completely emerged from the solar rays as to be visible. Others imagine that it is derived from Nónæ, nine; either from the Nones coming in place of the Ninth Ides, or from their being nine days from the Ides, reckoning inclusively. In the months of March, May, July, and October, the Nones fell on the seventh, and, in the other months, as formerly stated, on the fifth day. Like the Kalends and Ides, they were counted backwards. See Kalenda.

Nónius Actiánu, Nónii Actiáni, m. a notorious informer in the reign of the Roman emperor Nêro, who suffered by a decree of the senate, in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

Nónius Réceptus, Nónii Récepti, m. a centurion of the eighteenth legion, who attempted, with other three officers of the same rank, to defend the images of Gálba. The soldiers loaded the whole four with fetters, and Vitellius hurried their execution, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 56—59).

Nónius Strúma, Nónii Strúmæ, m. a man of vicious character, whom Cátullus satirizes with severity, insinuating that no good man would wish to live, when such a person held the office of curule edile. Nónius was also prætor (Catul. lii).

A. Nónius, A. Nónii, m. when a candidate for the office of tribune of the people at Rome, was murdered by the soldiers of C. Márius, through the influence of his competitor, L. Apúleius Sátúrninus, 103 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 69).

C. Nónius Aspénus, C. Nónii Aspénatis, m. was presented by Augustus with a golden chain, and not only himself, but his descendants, allowed to bear the surname of Trojanus, because he had been lamed in the game of Troy. At his trial for administering poison, Augustus sat among the advocates, but did not speak one word in his favour, lest he should appear to protect him, in opposition to the laws (Suet. Aug. 43 seq.).

Ca. Nōlū, Cn. Nōlū, m. a man of equestrian rank, who, having been seized in the emperor's court, in the year 47, with a dagger under his robe, avowed his desperate purpose, when he lay stretched on the rack, but torture could not extort from him the name of a single accomplice (Tac. Ann. xi. 22).

Nōra, orum, n. v. Nōra, e, f. a fort on the confines of Lycōnia and Cappadōcia, in which Eumēns sustained a long siege (Cor. Nep. Eum. 5). When Strabo wrote, it was called Nērōssus (779).—2. A town in Sardinia, built by Nōrax, son of Mercūrius, by Erēthēa, daughter of Gērjōn (Paus. x. 17).

Nōrba, e, f. Norma, an inland town of the Volsci, in Lātium, near Pōmptinus ager, into the mountains of which a colony was sent, in 492 B. C., to serve as a barrier to that territory. Inh. Nōrbāni, orum, m. Adj. Nōrbānus, a, um. Nōrbānus ager (Liv. viii. 19).

Nōrbāna, e, f. the wife of Cārus (Mart. vii. 73).

Nōrbānus, i, m. son of Māntiā, and brother of Rūllus. In the second Punic war, he killed Teucer (Sil. Ital. xvii. 426).—2. A man to whom Mārtiālis sent his works (Mart. ix. 86).

C. Nōrbānus Flāci, C. Nōrbāni Flāci, m. was consul with Drusus Cāsar, in the year 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 55).

L. Nōrbānus, L. Nōrbāni, m. held the office of consul with M. Jūnius Silānus, in the year 18 (Tac. Ann. ii. 59). In the list of consuls, he is called L. Nōrbānus Bālbis Flāci.

Nōricum, i, n. a country of considerable extent, which was bounded on the N. by Dānūbius, the Danube; on the W. by Enus, the Inn, one of the branches of the Danube, and Rhetia; on the S. by Itālia, Italy; and on the E. by Pannōnia. It comprehended the greater part of Austria, all Salzburg, Stiria, and Corinthia. The chief city of Nōricum was Noricā, the site of which is unknown. It was besieged by the Boii, in the inland which they had made upon Nōricum, before they entered into alliance with the Helvēti. Inh. Nōrici, orum, m. originally Taurūci (Plin. i. 376). Adj. Nōricus, a, um. Nōricus ager, the territory of the Nōrici. Nōrica castella in tūmūlis, the Noric castles on heights (Virg. G. iii. 474). The poet probably meant villages from their situation resembling heights, as he is there speaking of pastoral life. Nōricum ferrum, the Noric iron, which was much esteemed for its excellence (Plin. v. 149), to which Ovidius alludes (Met. xiv. 712), and Hōrātius (Od. i. 16. 9). Nōrica rura, the territory of Nōricum (Claud. xxvi. 365).

Nōrtia, e, f. a Tuscan goddess, into whose temple at Volsinī, a nail was driven annually as the number of the year (Liv. vii. 3).

Nōtārius, i, m. a person who wrote to another's dictation. It appears from Mārtiālis that the Nōtārius could write faster than the person who dictated could speak (xiv. 208).

Ausōnius likewise writes an epigram on this subject, which confirms the idea of Mārtiālis (xlvii. 16). In courts of law, the Nōtārii took down, in writing, the substance of the pleading of counsel, and observations of the judges, in notes, or short sentences, hence their name.

Nōtūm, i, n. a town of Iōnia, near Cōlōphōn, on the seacoast. Hither Antiōchus marched his forces, in 192 B. C., at the time he had sent Pōlyxēnidas to engage the Roman fleet. It was inhabited by Cōlōphōnii two years after, to whom the Romans granted independence (Liv. xxxvii. 26 seq.).

Nōvāria, e, f. Novara, a town of Italy, near Mēdiolānum, Milan (Tac. Hist. i. 70).

Nōvēmpōpūlū, v. Nōvēmpōpūlāna, one of the three divisions of Aquitānia, a district of France (Amm. Mar. xv. 11).

Nōvēnsiles dūi, gods worshipped by the Sabines; but neither the derivation of their name, nor their peculiar rites are known (Liv. viii. 9).

Nōvēsum, i, n. Nuyz, or, Neuz, a town of Gallia Belgica, on the west bank of the Rhine (Tac. Hist. iv. 26).

Nōviōdūnum, i, n. Soissons, or, Noyons, a town of the Suessōnes (Ces. B. G. ii. 12).

—2. Another, of the Edūi, now Nevers, on the banks of Ligēris, the Loire (Ces. B. G. vii. 55).—3. A third, now Neney, or, Neufcy, about twenty miles west from Nevers, belonging to the Bituriges (Ces. B. G. vii. 12).

Nōvius, i, m. a freedman, who was probably a tribune at the same time with Tillius. The tribunes sometimes exercised the power, which properly belonged to the senate, of ordering criminals to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock, to which Hōrātius alludes (Sat. i. 6. 40). There were two brothers of this name, of whom this was probably the elder. Minor Nōviōrum appears to have frequented the forum, and Hōrātius sarcastically supposes the contortions of the statue of Mārsyas, which stood there, and was represented as suffering under the punishment of slaying inflicted by Apōllo, to have proceeded from the pain felt at the presence of such a man as Nōvius (Sat. i. 6. 121).—2. A notorious legacy-hunter (Juv. Sat. xii. 141).—3. A neighbour of Mārtiālis, with whom he seems to have had no intercourse. On this circumstance he writes an epigram, not without humour (i. 87).—4. A famous gamester (Mart. vii. 71).

Nōvius Cālāvulus, Nōvii Cālāvii, m. a Campanian, who, having formed a conspiracy against the Roman power, avoided a trial by laying violent hands upon himself (Liv. ix. 26).

Nōvius Niger, Nōvii Nigri, m. a quaestor at Rome, in the year that Cātilina formed his conspiracy. Before him Q. Cūrius arraigned Cāsar, then praetor, as one of the accomplices of that traitor. For receiving this accusation, Cāsar threw him into prison, on the ground that it was illegal in him to receive a charge against a superior magistrate (Suet. Jul. Cēs. 17).

Nōvius Priscus, Nōvii Prisci, m. an intimate friend of Sēneca, on which account the Roman emperor Nēro banished him from Rome, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 71).

Nōba, arum (Sing. Nōba, e), m. a people who lived on the banks of Nilus, the Nile, probably in the vicinity of Nōba pālis (Claud. xxi. 254). Strabo places them on the west bank of that river; but Plinius and Proleimus on the east, a proof that their exact geographical position is not known.

Nucerina, n. f. Nocera (frequently written Nuceria, Alfaterna, to distinguish it from Nuceria in Umbria), a town of Campania, which Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, consul, subjected to the power of Rome in 309 B. C. Hannibal carried it by starving the inhabitants, and afterwards reduced it to ashes, because none of the Nucerni would enlist into his army (Liv. ix. 41 seq.). It was rebuilt, and in modern times Ruggerio, king of Naples, razed its walls, and dispersed the inhabitants, from their attachment to the Pope. On the restoration of tranquillity, the natives, instead of erecting their houses on their old sites, occupied the neighbouring villages, hence the modern town extends over a large space of ground, and has many fine buildings, interspersed with rural scenery (Sil. Ital. viii. 532). Inh. Nucerni, orum (Sing. Nucernus, i), m. Adj. Nucernus, a, um. Nucernus ager (Plin. i. 327).—2. A town of Umbria, which has the same modern name, and to distinguish it from the one above-mentioned, is frequently written Nuceria Camellaria, on Via Flaminia, at the crossing of the Apennines, not far from the sources of the Tinea. Inh. Nucerni Camellani (Plin. i. 365).

Nucera, arum, f. a town mentioned by Silius Italicus, of which nothing is known, and the reading doubtful (viii. 564).

Nudum, i, n. a town of the Minæ, destroyed by the Elæi (Herod. iv. 148).

Nuthones, um, m. a people of Germany, mentioned by Tacitus, of whom little is known. They appear to have been neighbours to the Eudosiæ and Suardoniaus (Tac. Mor. Ger. 40).

Numa, n. m. a Rutulian, killed by Nisus, or Eurýlus (Virg. Æn. ix. 454).—2. Another Rutulian, to whom the epithet strong is applied. Æneas made an attack on this warrior (Virg. Æn. x. 562).

Numa Marcius, Numa Marci, m. the son of Marcus, v. Marcius, one of the Roman senators, was the first pontifex. He married Pompilia, Numa's only daughter, by whom he had Ancus Marcius, the third king of Rome. The father of Numa Marcius is said to have impelled Numa Pompilius to accept the crown, to have departed with him to Rome; but, being disappointed of the crown at Numa's death, he is reported to have laid violent hands upon himself (Liv. i. 20).—2. Appointed prefect of Rome by Tullus Hostilius (Tac. Ann. vi. 11).

Numa Pompilius, Numa Pompili, m. son of Pompo, a Sabine, distinguished for his justice and piety, who possessed the greatest knowledge possible in that age, of all laws, human and divine. He lived at Cures, which appears to have been the chief city of the Sabines. Livius considers his being a scholar of Pythagoras as a fiction, and supposes that his knowledge resulted from his natural disposition, and from the discipline of the Sabines, which he commends for its purity. On the death of Romulus, the crown of Rome was unanimously conferred on him; and after the confirmation of his appointment by augury, and obtaining possession of the kingdom, he formed a design of founding it anew upon the principles of justice, law, and morals. To soften the fierceness of the Roman temper, he resolved to discontinue the practice of war, and with this view, built a temple to Janus, which was to be open in war, but shut in peace. Having secured the friendship of the neighbouring states by treaties and alliances, his next object was to inspire his subjects with the fear of the gods. To give greater solemnity to his institutions, he made them believe, he had nightly meetings with the goddess Egéria, by whose instructions he instituted the rites most acceptable to the gods, and appointed their own priests to each of the deities. His attention was first turned to the Calendar, and he divided the year into twelve months, according to the course of the moon. But as twelve months, of thirty days each, do not form a complete year, by the insertion of intercalary months, his arrangement was rendered so accurate, that every twenty-fourth year the days coincided almost exactly with the position of the sun, whence they had commenced. See Annus. He next created the Flamen Dialis, or high priest of Jupiter, whom he adorned with a splendid dress, and a royal curule chair. He added a Flamen to Mars, and another to Quirinus. He chose the vestal virgins, and likewise the twelve Sali of Mars Gradivus. He nominated Numa Marcius, son of Marcus, one of the senators, Pontifex, and furnished him with written and sealed instructions, with regard to all the sacred rites, with what victims, on what days, in what temples, these religious duties should be performed, and whence the money for defraying their expense. To the Pontifex he subjected all other religious performances, and made his opinion final respecting the invocation of the gods, funeral solemnities, and the expiation of prodigies, whether by lightning, or otherwise. On purpose to know the will of the gods, he dedicated an altar on Mons Aventinus, Monte Aventino, to Jupiter Elicus. These regulations, aided by the example of the king, produced a complete change in the dispositions and manners of the people. The neighbouring states, who had formerly considered Rome, not as a city, but as a camp, changed their dread and hatred into reverence and esteem, believing that it would be impious to molest a nation wholly occupied in the worship of the gods. After building a temple to Single Faith, and instituting many other sacrifices, the days Fasti and Nefasti, he died after a reign of forty-three years, during which the Romans enjoyed uninterrupted peace (Liv. i. 18—32). In 183 B. C., two stone chests (dive-lidæ arce), each about eight feet long, and four feet broad, having their covers fastened with lead, were found in the property of L. Pœllius, notary, at the foot of Janiculum, Monte Giannicolo, by the husbandmen digging a little deeper than usual. Inscriptions both in Greek and Latin were written on the covers, purporting that the body of Numa Pompilius, son of Pompo, and king of the Romans, was in the one, and his books in the other. On being opened, nothing whatever was found in the chest, said to enclose his body, but the other contained two bundles tied round with waxed cords, each consisting of seven books, which were not only entire, but appeared quite fresh. Of these books, seven were written in Italian, respecting the pontifical law, and the other seven, in Greek, recording the doctrines of philosophy, which might have been known in that age. After they had been read by Q. Pëdilius, and his friends, they were borrowed by Q. Pëdilius Spürinus, prætor urbânus, who examined their contents, and declared that he would not return them to the owner, since they ought to be burned, because most of their doctrines had a tendency to undermine the established religion. The senate approved of the conduct and opinion of the Prætor Urbânus, and the books were accordingly burnt in the Cômîlum before the people by the public servants. From this statement of Lælius, it is manifest, either that the religious rites of the Romans had been greatly changed from the time of Numa, or that he established a system of religion, which he did not believe to be the true one, but adapted to the dispositions and circumstances of the people at that period. The latter supposition is unfavourable to the character of the Roman monarch, although it appears more probable than the other, for this reason, that the Romans were of all nations, perhaps, the least inclined to deviation from ancient usage in religious ceremonies. If these books had been intended to serve no purpose after his death, he would have destroyed them; and if the Romans, in that age, could, in his opinion, have received advantage from them, he would not have concealed from his people the doctrines which they contained. He would naturally have committed them to the care of the Pontifex Mâximus, or some other priest, who would have communicated their contents, and this discovery would have been subversive of the established religion. It is more probable, that he foresaw, that the Romans would, in future ages, arrive at such a degree of civilization, as would enable them to appreciate the merits, and derive advantages from the study, of his writings. Here a difficulty occurs: If intended for future usefulness, why were they buried? Why was the place neglected and forgotten?—for the discovery was wholly accidental. Our limits will not allow further discussion; and each reader will form his own opinion on this interesting subject. Adj. Pômilius, a, um. Pômilius sanguis, blood; i.e. descendants; of Numa Pômilius (Hor. Art. Poet. 292).

Nûmâna, æ, f. Humana, a seaport town of Ploënum, a district of Itâlia, Italy, bounded on the east by Mârë Hâdriaticum, the Gulf of Venice. It was built by the Sicilians. Scîpîosa Nûmâna (Sil. Ital. viii. 431).

Nûmânîa, æ, f. a town of Spain, near the sources of Dûrus, the Douro, celebrated in history for the brave resistance which it made against the Roman armies for fourteen successive years. Florus says, that Nûmânîa was inferior in power to Carthage, Cápua, and Córînthus, but equal to them all in bravery and honour, and, including the character of its inhabitants, was the greatest ornament of Spain. Situated on an eminence of no great height, without walls, without forts, it alone withstood an army of forty thousand men; with one-fourth of that number, and not only held out, but frequently gained very considerable advantages over the enemy, and obliged them to accede to dishonourable treaties. After the destruction of Carthage, P. Córnelius Scîpio Afrîcânus Emîliânus took the command of the army at Nûmânîa, and at last reduced it to such extremity by famine, that the inhabitants destroyed themselves and their native city by sword, fire, and poison, so that not a single man remained alive to be led in chains; and the triumph of the conqueror was merely over the name of the Nûmânîni. From the destruction of Nûmânîa, Scîpio received the additional surname of Nûmânînus (Flor. ii. 18). It is now an inconsiderable village, called Gorray, in the opinion of certain geographers, whilst some think it is represented by Tienza, and others, that it stood near Seria. Inh. Nûmânîni, orom (Sing. Nûmânînus, i), m. the Numanians. Adj. Nûmânînus, a, um. Nûmânîni avi, Numanine ancestors, i. e. the paternal ancestors of Córnelia, particularly P. Córnelius Scîpio Afrîcânus Nûmânînus, who obtained additional celebrity by the destruction of Nûmânîa (Prop. iv. 11. 30). Nûmânînum bellum (Sal. Jug. 7).

Nûmânîna, æ, f. wife of Plautius Silvânus, who was accused of distempering his brain by magic rites; but acquitted in the year 24 (Tac. Ann. iv. 22).

Nûmânus, i, m. surnamed Rêmûlus, a brave Rutulian, killed by Ascânus. He had lately married the younger sister of Tûrnus (Virg. Æn. ix. 592).

Nûmânîus Gâllus. See Mânîus Gâllus.

Nûmêriânus, i, m. younger son of the Roman emperor Cârus, possessed a disposition every way unlike that of his elder brother Cârînus. The bent of his mind was to literary pursuits, and he obtained distinction by the excellence of his compositions, both in verse and prose. The qualities of his heart surpassed even the vigour of his mind, whilst the modesty of his deportment, the propriety of his sentiments, and the affection which he bore to his father, rendered him a favourite with all who respected either talent or virtue. On the death of his father, Cârînus and he succeeded to the empire, in right of the rank which they previously held, and Nûmêriânus fell by the hand of Arrius Aper, whose daughter he had married (Eutrop. ix. 18-20).

Nûmîciûs, a, um. Nûmîciûs pîns, a patrician clan at Rome, which had this name from Nûmîciûs, the Rîco di Nemi, because from the banks of that river they had been removed to the capital, and admitted into the senate.

Nûmîciûs, i, m. a man to whom Hôrâtîus addresses the sixth epistle of the 1st book, but commentators are not agreed in opinion respecting him.

Nûmîciûs (Nûmîciûs, Sil. Ital.), i, m. a fountain in Lâtium, whence issues the small river, Nûmîciûs, i, m. (Virg. Æn. vii. 150). Some maintain, that this river flows from Lâcus Nêmôrênsis, and is now called the Tôrto, or, Rîco di Nemi (Rîco di Patria, Clav.), while others assert, that it is dry. There is also a difference of opinion respecting its source, whether it flows from a fountain, a lake, or a pool. Perhaps Virgîlius, by Stagna fontis Nûmîci, meant simply the spring, poetically expressed. Lælius says, that Enûs was buried near this river, without mentioning what kind of death he died; and Dîonýsius has recorded the inscription on his tomb. The more general notion is, that in the war with the Etrusci and Rutuli, he was drowned in Nūmiclus, and his body not having been found, the Latins supposed he had been taken up into heaven (Tibul. ii. 3. 43). On the banks of this river, a chapel and grove were consecrated to Æneas, where he was worshipped under the name of Jūpter Indiges (Liv. i. 2). Ovidius makes Nūmiclus a calm-running stream (Met. xiv. 599).

Nūmicus Thērmus, Nūmiclī Thērmī, m. a man of praetorian rank, whom the emperor Nēro sacrificed to the rage of Tigellinus, whose resentment he had incurred by no fault of his own, but solely from a freedman of his preferring an accusation against that favourite, in the year 67 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 20).

L. Nūmicus, L. Nūmiclī, m. one of the two Latin praetors at Circē, Circello, who excited war against the Romans, in 339 B. C., on which they were summoned to Rome. See L. Annus.

T. Nūmicus Priscus, T. Nūmiclī Priscī, m. a consul at Rome, in 469 B. C., when he routed the Volsi, and took Cēno from the Antlatēs (Liv. ii. 63).

Nūmidia, v. f. Alyria, a country of Africa, bounded on the north by the Mediterranean; on the west by Ampsaga, the Wadī-kibir (i. e. the Great River), which separated it from Mauritania, Morocco and Fez; on the south by Gietulia, and on the east by Mulucha, the Malua, the boundary between Nūmidia and Africa Propera, Tunis. When Nūmidia became first known to the Romans, it was possessed by two nations, the Māssyli, and Māsēsylī q. v. (Liv. xxi. 29 seq.). Inf. Nūmidie, arum, et, Nōmādes, um, m. the Numidians, described by Sillūstius, in the Jugurthine war, as faithless, unsteady, and fond of revolutions in the state. From the same author we learn, that their food consisted chiefly of milk, and flesh of wild animals, that they made no use of salt or any other stimulant of the palate. They had no other idea of eating and drinking but as a protection against hunger and thirst, not as means of gratifying intemperance or luxury (Sal. Jug. 89). According to Appianus, of all the Africans, the Numidians were the strongest, and lived to the greatest age (Bel. Pun. 39). Columnae Nūmidarum, columns of Numidian marble, which was both expensive, and highly esteemed by the Romans (Juv. Sat. vii. 182). Inf. Nūmidie, reinless Numidians; referring to their cavalry using no kind of rein or bridle (Virg. Æn. iv. 41). Adj. Nūmidianus, et, Nūmidicus, a, um. Nūmidiana pyra, Numidian pears, the fruit of a particular kind of pear-tree first brought to Italy from Nūmidia (Plin. iii. 188). Nūmidicum marmor, Numidian marble; first imported to Rome (77 B. C.), by M. Æmilius Lepidus, consul, which was considered an act of great extravagance, and for which he was severely censured (Plin. v. 288). Nūmidica guttata (gallinae) (Mart. iii. 58).

Nūmisus, i, m. a Latin commander, who urged his countrymen to make war on the Romans. In the first engagement, the strength of the Latins was so completely destroyed, that they submitted to the mercy of the conquerors, and the Campanians followed their example, 339 B. C. (Liv. viii. 11).

Nūmisus Lāpus, Nūmisī Lāpī, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, who obtained consular ornaments, and the command of the eighth legion, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. i. 79 seq.).

Nūmisus Rufus, Nūmisī Rufī, m. a lieutenant-general in the Roman army, first put in fetters by Clāssicus, and afterwards murdered with Hērēnnatius, by the Trēviri, in the year 71 (Tac. Hist. iv. 22 seq.).

C. Nūmisus, C. Nūmisī, m. a Roman praetor, to whom the lots gave the government of Sicily, in 179 B. C. (Liv. xli. 8).

T. Nūmisus Tārquiniēnsis, T. Nūmisī Tārquiniēnsis, m. one of the ten ambassadors sent by the Roman senate to regulate the affairs of Mācedōnia, in 169 B. C. (Liv. xlv. 17).

Nūmistro, ōnis, f. Muro, an inland town of the Bruttii, others say of the Lucāni (Liv. xxvii. 2). Inf. Nūmēstrāni, orum, m. (Plin. i. 352).

Nūmītor, ōris, m. a Rutulian, brother of Alcānor, who, with the weapon which Æneas had driven into the body of his brother, attempted, but without success, to transfuse that prince, and his javelin only grazed the thigh of Achātes (Virg. Æn. x. 342).—2. Elder son of Prōcas, the fourteenth king of Alba, according to Diōnysius of Hālicarnāssus. Amūlius, his younger brother, by whom he was supplanted, put his sons to death, and obliged his only daughter, Rhēa Silvia, to become a vestal virgin, which office prevented her marrying, consequently excluded all hopes of children. This scheme, intended by Amūlius to secure the crown to his own descendants, failed of success, although he caused his niece to be put to death, as soon as he heard of her having born twin sons, Rōmūlus and Rēmus, and he ordered the infants to be drowned in Tiber, the Tevere. See Rōmūlus. On these grandsons of his brother reaching manhood, they learned the true history of their birth, put Amūlius to death, and restored the kingdom to their grandfather Nūmītor (Liv. i. 3—6. Ov. Met. xiv. 773). Juvēnalis uses Nūmītor as a common appellation of the rich and noble Romans, who were mean and parsimonious, as patrons of the learned; but extravagant in their pleasures and sensuality (Sat. vii. 74).—3. Brother of Laurēns and Lābūrnus. Like them he commanded a hundred men in the second Punic war (Sil. Ital. xiii. 194).

Nūmītōrius, i, m. a Roman killed in the war between C. Marius and Silla, and the executioners dragged his lifeless body with a hook into Tiber, the Tevere (Flor. iii. 21).

L. Nūmītōrius, L. Nūmītōrī, m. a tribune of the people at Rome, and one of the first who were elected at the Cōmilia Tribūta, in 171 B. C., when the number was raised from two to five (Liv. ii. 58).

P. Nūmītōrius, P. Nūmītōrī, m. the maternal uncle of Virgīnia, who aided Icilius, the betrothed husband of that maiden, in opposing the iniquitous proceedings against her by Appius Claudius, a dēcēvir, in 449 B. C. He advised the army, in the country of the Sabines, under Q. Fabius, a dēcēvir, to revolt, and, for the active part which he took against the dēcēvirī, was elected a tribune of the people (Liv. iii. 43—54).

A. Nūmīus, v. Nōmīus, A. Nūmī, m. a competitor with Sātūrnīnus for the office of tribune of the Roman people, in that struggle he lost his life (Vol. Max. ix. 7).

Nūmūlīzīnthis, Dīōgīris, Nūmūlīzīnthis Dīōgīridis, f. a daughter of a Thracian king. The manner in which she is mentioned by historians is most horrid (Val. Max. ix. 2). Nūrsia, a, f. the goddess of fortune, among the Tuscans. She had a temple at Volsinūm, Bolsena (Juv. Sat. x. 74).

Nūrsia, a, f. (Nūrsia, Liv.) Narcia, a town of the Sabines. Tuh. Nūrsini, v. Nūrsini, orum (Sing. Nūrsinus, i), m. Adj. Nūrsinus, a, um. Nūrsinusger, the territory of the Nūrsini (Plin. iii. 477). Nūrsina pila, the wild turnips of Nūrsia (Mart. xiii. 20).

Nusa, a, f. wife of Nicomēdes, the last king of Bithynia (Sal. Frag. 4).

Nyctēllus, i, m. a name of Bæchus, from nocturnal gamboling (Ov. Met. iv. 15).

Nyctēus, ēs, m. son of Chthōnīus, whose daughter Antīōpē, Jūpiter vitiated, and she, dreading her father's displeasure, fled to Sicily to Epōpēus who married her. Grief consumed his frame, and, having instructed his brother Lēcus to punish Epōpēus and Antīōpē, he killed himself. Hēcēnus makes him the son of Nēptūnus and Cēlenō (157), and Apollōdōrus, of Hērēus and Clōnīa (iii. 10). Nyctēis, idis, f. a patronymic of Antīōpē (Ov. Met. vi. 111).—2. A companion of Diomēdes, who was changed into a bird (Ov. Met. xiv. 504).

Nyctēus, ēs, m. one of the horses of Plūto, and the best of the Stygian breed (Claud. xxxiii. 289).

Nyctimēnē, es, f. daughter of Epōpēus, king of Lēbos, Mityleni, possessed uncommon beauty, which excited in her father an unlawful passion, the indulgence of which compelled her, from a sense of modesty, to conceal herself in the woods. Minērvā, pitying her situation, changed her into an owl, (noctia), a bird, which from modesty, does not appear in light, but flies abroad during the darkness (Hyr. 204). Ovidius shortly touches on her story (Met. ii. 599).

Nymphæ, arum (Sing. Nymphæ, a, v. Nymphæ, es), f. nymphs who lived an almost incalculable number of years; but were not immortal. Those who presided over woods were called Drūīdes, over single trees, Hāmā-drūīdes, over mountains, Orēades, over springs, Nālūīdes, over the sea, Nērēīdes, over lakes, Limnūīdes, and over meadows, Limnūīdes.

Nymphæum, i, n. according to Cesar (B. C. iii. 26), a harbour of Illyricum, exposed to the south wind, and distant about three miles from Lissus, Alessio; but Plinius makes it a promontory.—2. An elegant structure erected at Rome, by M. Aurēlius, for the worship of the nymphs. Besides being adorned with statues of these objects of heathen adoration, it had various fountains and waterfalls, to cool the air, and render the place pleasant and beautiful (Amm. Mar.

xv. 7).—3. A rock near Apollōnia, which emitted flames, and below it were springs which sent forth hot bitumen. There was an oracle at it (Liv. xlii. 36).

Nymphæus, i, m. a river of Mēsōpōtāmīa, near Amida, Diarbekr (Amm. Mar. xviii. 9).

Nymphidius Sabinus, Nymphidii Sabinī, m. an officer in the Roman army, whose ambition aspired at the imperial dignity; with that view he favoured the party of Gālba, whom he afterwards exerted himself to dethrone. His life atoned for this wild attempt, and the soldiers dragged his dead body through the camp, in contempt of the low-born incendiary, who aimed at the purple (Tac. Hist. i. 5 seq.). The account given by Suetonius is somewhat different (Gal. 11).

Nymphius, i, m. a leading man of Pālēpōlis, who, with Chārillāus, formed a plan to get rid of the Nōlani and Sāmmites, who had obtruded themselves as allies on the inhabitants of that city, in 325 B. C. Their design succeeded, the Romans obtained possession of Pālēpōlis, and obliged the Sāmmites and Nōlani to fly (Liv. vii. 25 seq.).

Nysa, a, f. a town of India, which Bæchus built according to some writers, and, according to others, was sacred to him (Plin. i. 691). Of all the cities which the Indians possessed, this was the greatest and most distinguished in the opinion of Pōmpōnius Mēla (iii. 7). Nothing certain respecting it is known. There appear to have been eleven towns and mountains of this name. From Nysa, Bæchus was called Dīōnysius. Dōminus Nysæ, Bæchus (Juv. Sat. vii. 64). Nysēides, v. Nysiādes, um (Sing. Nysēis, idis), f. the nymphs by whom Bæchus was brought up (Ov. Met. iii. 314; Ov. Fast. iii. 769). Nysigēna, a, m. one born at the town Nysa (Catul. lxiv. 253). Adj. Nysæus, Nysæus, et. Nysæus, a, um. Nysæus Hēdāspes, from that river having its source in the mountain Nysa (Luc. Phar. viii. 227). Nysia iuga (Luc. Phar. viii. 801).—2. A town of Bæotia. Its inhabitants joined Etēocles in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 261).

Nysæus, i, m. younger son of Dīōnysius I., tyrant of Sýracūse and Aristomāchē. He was the brother of Hippārinus (Cor. Nep. Dion 1).

Nysēus, ēs, v. ēi, m. a name of Bæchus. Nysēis, idis, f. of Bæchus, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Nysēides nymphæ (Ov. Met. iii. 314). Adj. Nysæus, a, um. Some derive these words from Nysa, a mountain of India, where Bæchus was brought up, or from a city in that country, which he built.

Nysa, a, f. a mountain of Thrācia, which produced excellent vines. Adj. Nysæus, a, um (Hom. Il. vi. 133). There were many other mountains of this name.

Oenēum, i, n. a town of Pēncētia, a district of Illyricum, enclosed on one side by a river called Artātus, and on another by a very high mountain of difficult access. Pērsēs, king of Mācēdōnīa, took it by means of works, put all the male inhabitants, who had reached the age of puberty, to death, threw the women and children into confinement, and gave the whole of the booty to the soldiers, in 171 B. C. (Liv. xliii. 19).

Oānus, i, m. a river of Sicilia, near Cāmāria (Pin. Ol. v. 25).

Oārus, i, m. the Volga, a river which empties itself into Pilius Maōtis (Herod. iv. 123). Others take it to be the Woronez.

Oāsis, is, f. a tract of land in the desert of Zāra, in which was the temple of Jūpiter Ammon. By the Greeks it was called the Islands of the Happy (Herod. iii. 26). There was another similar tract, the larger has been called Oāsis Māior, El Wah; the less, Oāsis Mīnor, El Wah el Ghurbi. Their names are very differently written by travellers.

Oāxis, is, m. a rapid river of Crēta, Candia (Virg. B. i. 66). Much difference of opinion with respect to this river, and the reading of the line of Virgilius in which it occurs, has prevailed both in ancient and modern times. No other author mentions Oāxis as the name of a river in Candia. There was a city of this name in Crēta, founded by Oāxes, the son of Apōllo and Anchālā. This city is called by Vāro Oāxis, Idis; but Vibius Sequēster calls it Oāxia, æ. Apōllōnius Rhōdus calls Crēta, Oāxis (Oiaxis), and Hērōdōtus says, it is reported that there is a city in Crēta called Oaxer, from which it may perhaps be inferred there was a river of the same name.

Oblivio, ōnis, m. a river of Lūsitanā, called otherwise Lēthē, Limea, or, Limea, hence the modern name Lima, all conveying nearly the same idea, that of forgetfulness (Liv. Ep. 55).

Obrīma, w, m. the Bur Basha, a river of Phrygiā, the sources of which the Roman consul, Cn. Mānlius Vūlso, passed, when marching from Ephēsus against the Gāllogrēci, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 15). It is a branch of Māēder, the Meinder.

Obrōātis, is, f. a town of Pērsia, probably not far from Pērsēpōlis (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Obsidius, i, m. the commander of the troop of the Frēntāni, who made a gallant charge against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, in his first engagement with the Romans, and compelled him to flee from the battle, after he had thrown away the badges of his rank (Flor. i. 18).

Obultrōnēs Sābīnus, Obultrōnī Sābīni, m. a quæstor of the treasury, who was murdered in Spain, in the year 57 (Tac. Ann. xliii. 28 seq.).

Ocālē, es, v. Ocālē, arum, f. a town of Bōōtia (Plin. i. 425). The inhabitants joined Etēocles in the Theban war (Stat. Th. vii. 260).

Ocēla, æ, f. a vestal virgin, of great sanctity of manner, who presided over that order during fifty-seven years (Tac. Ann. ii. 86).

Ocēānus, i, m. the eldest son of Cēlus and Tērra. He married Tēthys by whom, according to Hēsiodus and Apōllōdōrus, he had three thousand beautiful daughters. The word afterwards became the name of any immense expanse of salt-water, in which sense it has been adopted by the English. Justinus uses it to signify the Indian sea (xli. 10); the Mediterranean (xliii. 3); and Hōmērus, to signify the Nile (Od. xxiv. 11). Ocēāntides, dum (Sing. Ocēāntis, Idis), et, Ocēāntides, dum (Sing. Ocēānis, Idis), f. the daughters of Ocēānus (Virg. G. iv. 341).

Ocēllātē, arum, f. vestals, sisters who had violated their vow. From their crime being committed under the reign of his father or brother, Dōmōdānus allowed them to choose their own death (Suet. Dom. 8).

Ocēlum, i, n. Ouz, or, Exilles, a town on the frontiers of Gāllia Cisālpina, Citerior, v. Tōgātā, in Alpes Graie (2 syl.), near the source of one of the N. branches of Pādus, the Po (Ces. B. G. i. 10).

Ochēsius, i, m. an Ætolian, the father of Pēriphas (Hom. Il. v. 843).

Ochus, i, m. a native of Cŷzicus, Chizico, attacked by Phlās in the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. iii. 148).—2. The original name of Dārius q. v.—3. A son of Dārius (Curt. iii. 11 seq.).

Ochus. See Artāxerxes Ochus.

Ochus, i, m. a river of Bactria, which runs in the neighbourhood of Nesa, and falls into the Caspian Sea (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Ocilis, is, f. a town of the Celtiberians in Spain (Ap. Bel. Mith. 281).

Ocnus, i, m. son of Tiber, the Tevere, and Māntō, the daughter of Tirēsias. He built the city Māntūa, to which he gave this name in honour of his mother. He joined Ænēas against Tūrnus, with an army of his subjects (Virg. Æn. x. 198). Sērvius makes him the same with Blānor, whose tomb is mentioned by Virgilius (B. ix. 60).—2. A man whom Prōpērtius describes labouring without effect (iv. 3. 21). Pausānias represents him twisting a rope of rushes, which an ass, standing beside him, ate as fast as he made it (x. 29).

Ocerēla, æ, f. a native of Cōrnēculum, a town of Lātium, was distinguished by her beautiful countenance, and had been made prisoner at the taking of that town. Her beauty captivated Vūlcānus, to whom she bore Sērvius Tūllius, the sixth king of Rome. From right of conquest, she became the servant of Tānāquil, and one day when she threw wine into the fire by order of her mistress, a figure of an indelicate kind presented itself, which she appears to have made known to the queen, by whose order she approached it, and Sērvius Tūllius q. v. was the consequence of this phenomenon (Ov. Fast. vi. 627 seq.).

Oericulum, i, n. Otricoli, a town of Umbria, which Florus calls a city of Lātium, at the junction of Nār, the Nera, and Tiber, the Tevere, taken by the Romans during the reign of Tāquinius Sūpērbus (Flor. i. 7).

Inh. Oericulāni, orum (Sing. Oericulānus, i), m. admitted into friendship by the Romans on their giving security, in 309 B. C. (Liv. ix. 41). Adj. Oericulānus, a, um. Oericulāna villa (Cic. Mil. 24).

Ocris, is, m. a native of Sētia, Sezzo, and brother of Opiter, who were both killed at the battle of Cānnæ (Sil. Ital. x. 32).

Octāvia, æ, f. daughter of C. Octāvius and Atia, and sister of Augūstus. She married C. Claudius Mārcellus, by whom she had M. Claudius Mārcellus, whose name Virgilius has immortalized (Æn. vi. 835 seq.). After the death of Mārcellus, she was married to M. Antōnius, who had repudiated his former wife, Fūlvā. Between her brother and husband she effected a reconciliation. From her second husband she experienced only neglect and desertion, in consequence of his criminal connexion with Clēopātrā, queen of Egypt. After his death, she took the greatest care of his children. She was a woman of exemplary virtue, and of great literary attainments. Augustus had the strongest affection for her, and pronounced her funeral panegyric. She died in 10 B. C., in the fifty-fourth year of her age.—2. Daughter of Tiberius Claudius Drusus Caesar and Messalina, born in the year 42, and married to Nero, the sixth Roman emperor (whose original name was L. Domitius Ahēnōbārus), who divorced her, on pretence that she was barren, but, in reality, to marry Pōppēa. He banished her to Pāndātāria, Sante Maria, where she was murdered. She had been first betrothed to L. Silanus. Tacitus has given a shocking account of the unjust and cruel treatment which she experienced, and concludes his narrative with the tragical particulars of her death. After the murder, her head was cut off, and sent to Rome, to glut the eyes of Pōppēa (Ann. xi. 32 seq.).

Octāvius, i. m. an excellent poet and historian, who died suddenly at table, from a transport of passion, which gave rise to the report, that he was killed by drink. Hōrātius mentions him with Plōtius, Mācēnas, Virgilius, and Vārius (Sat. i. 10. 82). Some understand the emperor to be meant under that name, but that is contrary to the practice of Hōrātius, who always calls him Augustus, or, Cæsar, and does not mention his name amidst those of others, but quotes him alone, as sufficient approbation of his writings (Sat. ii. 1. 19).

Octāvius Bālbis, Octāvilī Bālbī, m. a Roman, proscribed by the second triumvirate. After he had fled from his own house, and might have escaped the swords of the assassins, a false report reached him, that they had put his son to death. Parental affection impelled him to return, and his life was the forfeit (Val. Max. v. 7).

Octāvius Frōnto, Octāvilī Frōntōnis, m. a Roman prætor, who proposed, in the year 16, to regulate by statute, the quantity of plate, the expense of furniture, and the number of domestics, in a family. Luxury had made too great advances before that period to admit of restraint, and the law did not pass (Tac. Ann. ii. 33).

Octāvius Māmillius, Octāvilī Māmillī, m. a native of Tuscūlum, was the most eminent of all the Latins, derived his origin from Tēlēgōnus, the son of Ulysses and Circē, and married Tārquīnia, a daughter of Tārquīnius Sūpērbus, who retired in banishment to his son-in-law. At his instigation, thirty states entered into a treaty against the Romans, and this powerful combination induced them to create a new magistrate, whom they called a dictator, in 501 B. C. Two years after, hostilities commenced, and Octāvius Māmillius, after displaying great bravery, fell in battle, by the hand of T. Hērminius (Liv. i. 49—ii. 20. Flor. i. 11).

Octāvius Mētius, Octāvilī Mētī, m. a commander in an engagement between the Romans and Samnians, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 41). See Sp. Nautius.

Octāvius Sāgitta, Octāvilī Sāgittæ, m. a tribune of the Roman people, in the year 58, who first seduced and afterwards murdered Pōntia Pōstūmia, q. v. On the expiry of his office, he was banished to an island (Tac. Ann. xiii. 44 seq.), from which he appears to have returned, for the senate remanded him to the island, in the year 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 44).

Octāvius Tēucer, Octāvilī Tēucī, m. a grammarian of celebrity, who, it is probable, taught in the south of France (Suet. II. Gram. 8).

C. Octāvius, C. Octāvilī, m. son of C. Octāvius Rūfus, and brother of Cn. Octāvius. The descendants of C. Octāvius did not rise above the equestrian order, until the father of Augustus obtained higher honour (Suet. Aug. 2).—2. A Roman, of equestrian rank, and the first of his family who obtained admission into the senate. Vēllēius Pātērcūlus praises both his talents and his moral excellence. On obtaining the prætorship, Mācēdōnia became his province, and he cut off the remains of the rebel armies of Spārtācus and L. Sērgius Cātīlina, as he marched into Greece. His conduct in the government of his province Cicēro considers as a model for the imitation of others, both on account of his justice and bravery. For his victory over the Bēssi and Thrāces, he received the title of Impērator. On his way to Rome, with the view of standing candidate for the consulship, he died suddenly. Octāvius had married Atia, daughter of M. Atius Bālbis and Jūlia, sister of C. Jūlius Cæsar, by whom he had one son, C. Octāvius, or Octāviānus, afterwards Augustus, and two daughters.—3. Son of the former, by Atia, daughter of M. Atius Bālbis and Jūlia, sister of C. Jūlius Cæsar, was born in 65 B. C., in the consulship of M. Tullius Cicēro and C. Antōnius. The Octavian clan was of equestrian rank, and, in some instances, after the subject of this article had become emperor of Rome, he mentioned his family as equestrian, not patrician. Passing over the numerous prodigies recorded by fabulous history, presaging his future greatness, and either preceding or announcing his birth, it may be stated, that his father died in his infancy, and that his mother and her second husband, L. Mārcius Philippus, brought him up with the greatest tenderness and care. The excellent dispositions and powerful mind which he discovered in early life, captivated his granduncle, C. Jūlius Cæsar, who paid every attention to his education, and, having no legitimate son of his own, resolved to make Octāvius his heir. From him, and at his request, Octāvius assumed the name of Cæsar, to which the senate afterwards added that of Augustus. In early life he was surnamed Thūrinus, either in memory of the origin of his family, or from his father's success against the banditti or fugitive slaves, the relics of the armies of L. Sērgius Cātīlina and Spārtācus. He accompanied his granduncle into Spain, against the sons of Cn. Pōmpēius, and, after the reduction of that country, he applied himself to his studies at Apōllōnia, until he heard of the death of Cæsar, and of his being appointed his heir. He returned immediately to Rome, and collected a strong military force, in opposition to the advice of his step-father, who dreaded danger from the boldness of his measures, and his mother entertained similar apprehensions. A desire to avenge the death of Cæsar, whose courage he naturally wished to imitate, induced him first to make an attack on the leading conspirators by surprise, and his design having been discovered, consequently the danger avoided, he became a candidate for the office of tribune of the people, in order to ingratiate himself with the commons. In this application M. Antōnius opposed him, on which account he joined the nobles, by whom Antōnius was hated, and having persuaded the veterans of Cæsar to espouse his cause, and that of the senate, he marched against Antōnius, then besieging D. Brūtus, in Mūtina, Modena. Both the consuls went with him, and both fell before that town, not without suspicion of his having plotted their death, that he might have the victorious army entirely under his own command. Suetōnius seems to think, that Octāvius had no hand in their death. M. Æmilius Lēpidus received Antōnius, after his defeat at Modena; which Octāvius had no sooner heard, than he deserted the senate and nobles, and entered into an alliance with these two powerful but unprincipled men. This combination against the laws and liberties of Rome, formed the Suorum Triumviratus. In the first battle at Philippi, the republican army drove him out of his camp, and he, with difficulty, escaped to the wing commanded by Antōnius; but in the second engagement, the republican forces were defeated, and Octāvius, intoxicated by the success, set no bounds to his insolence and cruelty. He caused the head of M. Jūnius Brūtus to be cut off, and thrown at the foot of Cæsar's statue. On conducting back the army to Italy, he gratified the rapacity of the veterans, by expelling the ancient inhabitants in different parts of the country, and assigning their lands to his victorious troops. In the number dispossessed of their hereditary property, was the poet Virgilius, who has alluded to this act of injustice in his Eclogues. To enable him to meet Sextus Pōmpēius, the younger son of Pōmpēius Māgnus, at sea, he formed the Julian harbour, a work of great labour, which he accomplished by letting the sea into Lācus Lūcrinus, and Lācus Avērnus, and thus trained his men to naval tactics during the whole of winter. His success over that noble youth increased his power, on which he deprived M. Æmilius Lēpidus of his army, and banished him to Circē. Policy dictated the alliance with Lēpidus and Antōnius, consequently he seized the first opportunity of taking the advantage of both. The brother of Antōnius he had compelled to surrender at Pērsia, Perugia, when many of the Roman nobles were butchered. Victory at Actium, over the infatuated Antōnius, left Augustus in the peaceful possession of the empire, without a rival. He put to death the elder son of Antōnius, by Fūlvīa, and Cæsāriō, son of C. Jūlius Cæsar and Clēōpātrā; but he preserved the children of that queen by Antōnius. In Egypt, he visited the tomb of Alexander the Great, made some improvements for the better cultivation of the country, and reduced the kingdom to a Roman province. At Actium, he built a city, which he called Nicōpōlis, to commemorate his victory, instituted games, and gave every encouragement to settlers; but the destroying hand of time has not left a single house standing, and even the ruins have almost disappeared. For his victories he entered Rome twice in ovations, and three times in triumph; yet, as a warrior, he personally makes but little figure in history, as his military commanders displayed greater knowledge and bravery than their general. In the proscription, he at first opposed his colleagues in the triumvirate, but afterwards was guilty of more enormous atrocity than either. Fourteen hundred women were proscribed by the second triumvirate, merely on account of their wealth (Ap. Bel. Civ. 607). After the undisputed sovereignty of the empire had for some years satiated his ambition, he spoke of re-establishing the republic, a design which he most probably never executed, and therefore his sincerity has been justly questioned. Rome received from him, it is readily granted, a number of embellishments and improvements, which, in some measure, justified his boasting that he had found the city brick, and left it marble. The calendar which his granduncle had corrected, he cleared of the imperfections which had crept in through carelessness, and called Sextilis by his own name, rather than September, the month in which he was born, because in the former he had gained his most important victories. In the administration of justice, in modelling the courts for the despatch of business, and in the enactment of many salutary regulations for the restraining of vice and the encouragement of virtue, the greatest praise is due to this successful conqueror. In his general conduct may be observed a powerful mind, bent on self-aggrandizement, disregarding all laws, sacred and civil, afterwards vigorously exerted for the common good, and in gratifying the wishes of the citizens, both in matters of the utmost importance and of magnificent amusement. His attention was afterwards directed to the affairs of the country, which he greatly improved by public works, by just distribution of taxes, and by planting colonies. In the management of the provinces, he discovered the same ability and knowledge of business, and he appears an able politician in forming and preserving foreign alliances. Of his clemency and moderation many signal instances may be mentioned, as well as his delicacy with respect to honours. From the senate he received, with tears of gratitude, the title of Father of his country, but he shuddered at the impious appellation of Lord. On him first was bestowed the honourable appellation Augustus, and, from that period, his public character, as a ruler, requires neither defence nor eulogium. He encouraged literature by patronising the learned, and the men of genius, who flourished under his reign, stand quite unrivalled in any preceding, or future, period of Roman history. Simplicity characterized his taste in furniture, dress, and equipage, as well as in eating and drinking. Before he went to bed, he put down in his diary, every transaction of the day which had not been previously registered. His person was handsome, his countenance uncommonly serene, and his eyes bright. His eyebrows met, his ears were small, and he had an aquiline nose. His height did not exceed five feet nine inches, his hair was yellowish, but in dress he was careless, which proves that more important matters occupied his mind. From early youth, he devoted himself with unwearied application to the study of eloquence, and the liberal arts. His writings, both in prose and verse, show that he must have spent a great proportion of his time in his library. Elegance and perspicuity characterized his style, but his merits as an author do not in other respects seem to stand high. He expired in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and in the eleventh of the Christian era, at Nôla, in the same house, and in the same chamber, where his father, Octavius, had breathed his last. He first married Claudia, daughter of Fulvia, by P. Claudius, her first husband, and he divorced her a virgin, in consequence of a dispute with his mother-in-law. His next wife was Scribonia, then a widow for the second time, whose perverseness of temper was insufferable, and, after a separation had been effected, he took Livia Drusilla from her husband, Tib. Claudius Nero, to whom she was then pregnant. By Scribonia he had Julia, whom he married first to Marcellus, his sister's son, and, after his death, to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, at that time the husband of Marcella, by whom he had children. This second son-in-law did not live many years after his marriage with Julia, whom Augustus next contracted to his step-son, Tiberius, compelling him to part with his wife, then pregnant, and who had born him a child. By Agrippa, Julia became the mother of three sons, Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa, and two daughters, Julia and Agrippina. Caius and Lucius died in early life, and the emperor married Julia to L. Paullus, and Agrippina to Germanicus, his sister's grandson. The conduct of both his daughter Julia, and grand-daughter of the same name, was so infamous for lewdness, that he banished them both. The gross immoralities of his grand-son, Agrippa, rendered it necessary to banish him too, and, at his request, the senate passed a law to confine him for life, in the island Planasia, Pianosa. Of his own acts of adultery and intrigue, delicacy forbids any account. His friends alleged that policy and not lewdness induced him to these immoralities, that he might, by means of the wives, discover the designs of their husbands. If Martialis has done him justice, at one period his imagination must have been dreadfully polluted. His many excellences do not render less detestable his numerous vices, for which the depravity of Roman morals to a virtuous mind forms no excuse (Suet. Aug. Liv. Ep. 59—140).

C. Octavius Caesar Agrippa, C. Octavii Cæsaris Agrippæ, m. son of M. Vipsanius Agrippa, and Julia, daughter of the emperor Augustus, who died in Lycia, in consequence of a stroke from the hand of the governor Lollius. He was a youth of great promise (Suet. Aug. 65).

C. Octavius Lampadias, C. Octavii Lampadias, m. a grammarian, who divided the Punic war of Nævius into seven books (Suet. II. Gram. 2).

C. Octavius Rufus, C. Octavii Ruffi, m. the father of Cn. Octavius and C. Octavius, from whom descended two branches of the Octavian family, very different in circumstances and rank (Suet. Aug. 2).

Cn. Octavius, Cn. Octavii, m. son of C. Octavius Rufus, and brother of C. Octavius, whose descendants held all the great offices in the state, whilst his brother's posterity continued in the equestrian order until C. Octavius, the father of Augustus, obtained the rank of a senator (Suet. Aug. 2 seq.).—2. Obtained the prætorship and the government of Sardinia in 207 B. C., the year after he had been a plebeian edile. His success against the Carthaginian shipping, had the effect of procuring his continuance in the same office next year. His good fortune failed him in passing from Sicily, Sicily, to Africa, with two hundred transports, and thirty warships, in 205 B. C. In the situations which he afterwards held, he performed nothing memorable (Liv. xxviii. 38 seq.).—3. After he had been ambassador to Greece, was appointed prætor in 171 B. C., when he obtained the command of the fleet, with which he sailed to Samothrace, and, by menaces at one time, and inducements at another, endeavoured to prevail on Persæus, king of Mæcedonia, to surrender. The unfortunate monarch, to conceal one crime, committed another, which rendered him odious, and his faithful attendants availed themselves of the proclamation issued by Octavius, promising them liberty, security, and all their property, if they came over to the Romans. Entirely deserted, Persæus, with his eldest son Philip, the rest having previously gone on board the Roman fleet, surrendered to Octavius, who conveyed him to Rome, carrying along with him the spoils of Mæcedonia, for which he had the honour of a naval triumph. After his election to the prætorship, but before he set sail, he had been appointed a décemvir of sacred rites. It is unknown whether the command of the fleet had been given him on account of his nautical skill, or from his having been formerly sent an ambassador into Greece (Liv. xliii. 17—xlv. 42. Just. xxxiii. 2).

—4. Son of Cn. Octavius the colleague of T. Annius Læsus Rufus, in the consulship, 130 B. C. In his first canvass for a public office, he failed; but afterwards obtained the consulship in 89 B. C., with L. Cornélius Cinna, whom he drove from the city, and deprived of his consular authority; because he had carried some injurious laws by force and arms. At the same time, Octavius expelled six of the tribunes of the people, most probably from their having assisted Cinna in these iniquitous enactments. During his consulship, Octavius displayed a strength of argument, a command of language, and a talent for eloquence, which he was not previously supposed to possess. Overpowered by his colleague, Cinna recalled from Africa C. Marius with some other exiles, besieged Rome with four armies, and entered it like a foreign city taken by storm. The inactivity of Cn. Octavius during this formidable assault, has incurred great censure, and, if in fault, his life atoned for it. The conquerors not only put him to death, with the leading men who opposed them, but cut off his head, and fixed it up in the rostrum. He was the first who suffered that species of indignity, which was afterwards exhibited in other instances, particularly in that of M. Tullius Cicero, one of the greatest characters in Roman history (Liv. Ep. 79, 80). Adj. Octavianus, a. im. Octavianum bellum (Cic. Nat. Deor. ii. 5).

Cn. Octavius Rufus, Cn. Octavii Ruffi, m. during the Numidian war brought over a supply of money to Africa, and three Moorish deputies from Bocchus, king of Mauritania, accompanied him to Rome. Some consider him the same with Cn. Octāvius, who held the consulship with L. Cōrnēlius Cinna (89 B. C.), whom he banished from the city. Upon this, Cinna recalled C. Mārius from Africa, and they, having been admitted into the city, put Octāvius to death. In the consular calendar, which uniformly gives all the names of each consul, the colleague of Cōrnēlius is only called Cn. Octāvius, and, therefore, most probably a different person from the Cn. Octāvius Rūfus of Sāllūstius.

L. Octāvius Cēsar Agrippa, L. Octāvii Cēsaris Agrippae, m. son of M. Vipsānius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of the emperor Augustus, who died in early life at Marseilles (Suet. Aug. 65).

M. Octāvius, M. Octāvii, m. colleague of Tib. Sēmpronius Grāchus, whom that turbulent tribune deprived of his authority, because he opposed the Agrarian law, in 135 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 58). Florus calls him Cn. Octāvius (iii. 14).—2. An officer under Pōmpeius, who excited the Dalmatians and other nations to revolt from Cēsar. He also withdrew Issa from Cēsar's alliance, and besieged Sālōnē, Salona, but was repulsed by a sally from the town. Vātinius afterwards defeated him in a naval engagement off Tauris, an island in the Gulf of Venice, near Issa. Scribōnius Libo and he had the command of the Liburnian and Achaean ships in the civil war (Cēs. B. C. iii. 9 seq.). Adj. Octāvianus, a, um.

Octōdūrus, i, f. Martigny, a town, or village, of the Vērāgri (Vicus Vērāgrorum, Cēs. B. G. iii. 1), on Drāusa, the Drance, by which it is divided into two parts nearly equal. It was on the confines of the Vērāgri and Sēdūni, and the centre of trade between Italy and France in ancient times, which it is still. Inh. Octōdūrēnses, i, um, m. were neighbours to the Centrōnes, both states in the Cottian Alps (Cottianae civitates).

Octōgēsa, a, f. Mequinenza, a town of Spain, on the north bank of Iberus, the Ebro, where it is joined by Sicōris, the Segre (Cēs. B. C. i. 61).

Octolophus, i, f. v. Octolophum, i, n. a place in Illyricum, in the territory of the Dāssārēti, at which the Roman consul P. Sūlpicius Gālba encamped, when he was carrying on war against Phīlppus, king of Mācēdōnia, in 202 B. C. (Liv. xxxi. 36 seq.).

Ocylus, i, m. a competitor at the games exhibited by Alcīnōus (Hom. Od. viii. 111).

Ocyrhōē, es, f. daughter of Chīron, the centaur, and the nymph Chāriclō, who bare her on the banks of a rapid stream, and gave her that name. She possessed the gift of prophecy, and, whilst foretelling the future greatness of Esculāpius, passed into the form of a mare, to prevent her declaring more than the fates permitted (Ov. Met. ii. 638 seq.).

Odēnāthus, i, m. one of the wealthiest and noblest princes of Pālmyra, who, in early life, inured himself to great exertion and fatigue, by hunting wild beasts. The vigour, activity, and contempt of danger which he thus acquired, fitted him for the hardships and privations of a military life, and contributed to exalt his fame as a warrior. Sāpor, king of Persia, gained important advantages over the Roman armies, made the emperor Vālērīanus prisoner, and considered the east as his kingdom, over which he began to reign with insolence and cruelty. Odēnāthus interested himself in the fate of the fallen emperor, solicited in respectful terms his release, and sent as a present a long train of camels laden with the most uncommon and most valuable merchandise. The haughty conqueror expressed his greatest indignation at the presumption of Odēnāthus, for having written him, and ordered his presents to be thrown into Euphrātes, the El-Frat. This insult, added to the threatening and contemptuous speech with which it was accompanied, roused the vigorous powers of Odēnāthus, who collected a small army, annoyed the Persian host, cut off straggling parties, and took several of the women of Sāpor, besides a considerable part of the treasure. The military talents of Odēnāthus, and the bravery of his handful of men, compelled the Persian monarch to re-cross Euphrātes, the El-Frat, in precipitation, and established his own character as an eminent warrior. The Romans, grateful for the important services of Odēnāthus, with the concurrence of Gālīēus, obtained for him, from the senate, the title of Augustus, and intrusted him with the government of the east, which his own arms had obtained and secured. This accession of power stimulated the brave Odēnāthus to a more important enterprise, the conquest of the barbarians in the north; but one of his own relations deprived him of life, before he had time to execute the measures which he had planned. His death happened in the year 267, and his queen Zenōbia q. v. succeeded him in the throne (Eutrop. ix. 10—13).

Odēssos, i, f. a seaport town of lower Mēsīa, on the western shore of Pōntus Euxīnus, the Black Sea. The modern town Farna occupies, according to some authors, the site of Odēssos; but others think that of Diōnysōpōlis. A colony of Milesians built this town, hence Plīnīus, Odēssos Milesiorum (i. 442).

Odēum, i, n. a house in which musicians exercised, or learned their profession. Musical concerts might probably be held in places known by this name. There was one of great extent at Athens, which Aristion burned, lest Sūlla should have used the timber of it for machines against Piraeūs, Porto Leone (Ap. Bel. Mith. 195). The Roman emperor Dōmītiānus, raised a structure of this kind, which Eutrōpius mentions among the many public edifices erected by that emperor (vii. 23).

Odites, a, m. an Ethiopian, who, at the court of Cēphēus, was in rank next to the king. He fell by the hand of Clēmēnus (Ov. Met. v. 97).

Odōmāntes, arum, v. Odōmāntes, um, m. the inhabitants of a district of Thrācia, bounded on the west by Strymon, the Strumona. Adj. Odōmānticus, a, um. Odōmāntica tērra (Liv. xlv. 4).

Odōmānti, orum, m. a people of Paeōnia (Herod. v. 16).

Odōthēus, i, m. a king, or prince of the Grūthūngi, killed by Thēōdōsius, but, according to Claudīanus, by Hōnōrius, who thus obtained Spōlia Opima (Claud. viii. 631).

Odrūssa, a, m. a native of Cōlchis, whose name, some commentators suppose, Vālērīus Flāccus adopted from that of the river Odrýsses (v. 595). This does not appear very probable, since Odrýsses was a river not in Cölchis, but in Póntus (Strab. 797).

Odrýsæ, arum, m. an ancient people of Thrácia, Romania, whose territories extended, according to Thúcýdides, from Abdéra, at the mouth of Néssus, v. Néstus, the Mes-to, to Ister, the Danube, and were bounded on the E. by Hèlléspóntus, the Dardanelles, Própóntis, the Sea of Marmora, Bósphorus Thrácius, the Strait of Constantinople, and Póntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. Their limits on the W., from not being so strongly marked by nature, and unnoticed, or inaccurately described, by ancient authors, are not now exactly known. Adj. Odrýsius, a, um, of the Odrýsæ; Thracian. Odrýsius rex, Tércus (Ov. Met. vi. 490). Odrýsius (Pólymestor) (Ov. Met. xiii. 554). Odrýsia téllus, Thrácia (Sil. Ital. iv. 431).

Oulýssus, i, f. a town of Thrácia (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 4).

Oea, v. Oea, æ, f. Tripoli, a town of Africa, on the seacoast, between Sýrtis Minor, the Gulf of Kabes, and Sýrtis Májor, the Gulf of Zadic. It received the modern name (three cities) from absorbing the population of Sábrátha, Sabart, and Léptis, Lebeda. It is not large, but well inhabited, and fortified with good walls. Several remains of its ancient splendour are still visible, and give a respectable appearance to the place, which is the capital of a state to which it gives name. The Dey of Tripoli does not possess authority equal to those of Algiers, Tunis, &c., but yields a certain subjection to the Bashaw, appointed by the emperor of Constantinople (Sil. Ital. iii. 257). Inh. Oēnses, ium, m. the Oēnsians (Tac. Hist. iv. 50). Adj. Oēnsis, is, e. Oēnsis civitas (Plin. i. 637).—2. A town in the island Ægina, Egina (Herod. v. 83).

Oēger, v. grus, gri, m. a king of Thrácia, Romania, who was the father of Orphēus by the muse Cálliope. He is said by some to have given his name to Hēbrus, the Maritza, and others assert, that Oēgrus is one of the chief sources of that river. When the Thracian women murdered Orphēus on Hæmus, Eminehdag, they tore his head from his body, and threw it into Hēbrus, the Maritza. To this Ovidius alludes, Nondum Oēgrus Hæmus, not yet polluted by the murder of Orphēus, the son of Oēgrus (Met. ii. 219). Perhaps the poet simply meant, previously to the reign of that prince. Adj. Oēgrus, a, um, of Oēgrus, of Thrácia, Thracian. Oēgrus Hēbrus, the Thracian Maritza (Virg. G. iv. 524). Oēgrí nerói, the Oēgrian strings, i. e. the chords of the lyre of Orphēus, son of Oēger (Sil. Ital. v. 463).

Oēanthē, es, v. Oēanthēa, æ, f. Galaxithi (i. e. sour milk), a town of Greece, which stands on the western side of Crissæus sinus, the Bay of Corinth, and possesses considerable advantages for shipping.

Oebália, v, f. an ancient name of Lácōnia, which was so called from Oebálus, a king of that country. Claudíanus uses Oebália, to denote the district around Tárēntum, Taranto (l. 260). Oebalio de vulnere (Ov. Met. xlii. 396), from the wound of Hyácinthus, a Lacedonian, the son of Amyclas and Diómédē, according to Apóllodōrus, who was greatly beloved by Apóllō and Zephýrus. The same poet uses De Thērāpnæo sânguinē in the same sense, from Thērāpnē being a city of Lácōnia. The latter being slighted by the youth, sought an opportunity of revenging the affront. One day when Hyácinthus and his favourite were playing at coits, Zephýrus blew the one thrown by Apóllō, against the head of the boy with such violence, that he was instantly killed by the stroke. Grieved at his death, that god changed him into a flower of the same name, which grew up at first inscribed with the letters ai, a Greek interjection (ai) expressive of sorrow. Oebális, idos, f. Lacedemonian, or Laconian; used in reference to a female, or to a noun feminine. Oebálides, a, m. a patronymic of Póllux (Val. Flacc. iv. 294). Adj. Oebálius, a, um, of Lácōnia, or Lacedæmon. Oebáli fratres (Arg. ix. 114).

Oebálus, i, m. son of Tēlon and the nymph Sebēthis, was king of the Tēlēbōes, who took possession of the island Capræa, Capri, near the bay of Naples (Virg. Æn. vii. 734).—2. Son of Cynōrtas, was king of Lácōnia. By the nymph Bātia, he had Týndārus, Hippocōon, and Icarion. Oebálides, a, m. Hyácinthus, to denote his being a Lacedemonian (Ov. Met. x. 196). Oebálde, arum, m. Cāstor and Póllux (Ov. Fast. v. 705), whom Státius calls Gēmini Oebálida (Th. v. 438). Oebális, idis, f. of Oebálus, of Lacedæmon, or, Lácōnia, used in reference to females, or nouns feminine. Oebális nympha, Hēlēna (Ov. Ep. Her. xvi. 126). Adj. Oebálius, a, um. Oebáli népōtes, the inhabitants of Tárēntum, Taranto, which was built by a colony from Lácōnia (Sil. Ital. xii. 451). Oebália peltæx, Hēlēna (Ov. Rein. Am. 458).—3. A Lacedemonian, killed in the Theban war (Stat. Th. x. 492).

Oebásus, i, m. a Colchian, whose left eye Phálces pierced, in the war during the Argonautic expedition (Val. Flacc. vi. 245).

Oebreus, eos, m. a commander of the Scythians, in the war against the Argonauts (Val. Flacc. vi. 200).

Oechália, v, f. Carnasium, a town of Mēs-sēnia, the plain of which is now covered with cypresses (Plin. i. 415). Oechális, idis, f. of Oechália, applied to females, or nouns feminine (Ov. Met. ix. 331).—2. A town of Eubœa (Plin. i. 454). Pómpónius Mela only mentions one in Eubœa, which Strábo calls a village (633), and from whom it appears there were five towns of this name, with which Stéphanus agrees. Authors are divided in opinion respecting the one mentioned by Hómērus.

Oechárdes, is, m. the Selenga, a river of Scythia (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Oechárdi, arum, m. a people of Sérica (Amm. Mar. xxiii. 6).

Oecleus, eos, m. a son of Antiphates and Zeúxippē, who had Amphílarus, Pólybœa, and Iphiantra, by Hýpermnestra, daughter of Thēstius. He fell by the hand of Lāomēdon. Oecides, a, m. a patronymic of Amphílarus (Ov. Met. viii. 317).

Ocelus, i, m. a centaur, whom Ampýx wounded in the face with a pointless spear of the cornel tree, in the battle with the Lápithæ, at the nuptials of Pirithōus. Ovidius calls him four-footed, i. e. using both his hands and feet (Met. xii. 450).

Oedipódia, v, f. a fountain in Boeótia, so called from Oedipus q. v., who in it washed from his person the blood of his own father whom he had killed (Paus. ix. 18).

Œdipus, i, v. Œdis, et, Œdipodes, æ, m. son of Læus, king of Thēbe, and Iocæsta, whom some call Epicæsta. Alarmed at the prediction of an oracle, which declared, that, if ever he had a son, he would fall by his hands, Læus resolved never to have children, and persisted in that determination, until in a fit of intemperance, he forgot the oracular response. When his wife had born him a son, he pierced his feet through, then tying them together, gave the infant to his herdsman, with instructions to expose him. The servant obeyed the injunction, and left the child on Cithæron, Œlatea, where the neatherd of Pölybus, king of the Cöriñthi, found him, and his wife Përibœa brought him up as her own son. From the swelling of his feet (ὠδὴν καὶ πόδιν), she gave him the name of Œdipus; but the people of the neighbourhood, after he was grown up, called him in derision Spürilus, as he had excited their enmity, by surpassing them in strength. To ascertain the particulars of his birth, which were unknown to Pölybus and Përibœa, he inquired at the oracle of Apölo, and received for answer, that if ever he returned to his native country he would kill his father, and commit an incestuous crime with his mother. Supposing Cöriñthus to be the place of his birth, he determined not to return thither. In travelling through Phöcis, in a narrow path he met Læus, and Pölyphöñtes, his herald, by whom he was ordered to go out of the way with his chariot, but, refusing, Pölyphöñtes killed one of his horses. Enraged at this act, Œdipus put to death both Læus and Pölyphöñtes, thus fulfilling one part of the oracle; afterwards he proceeded to Thēbe, Thæba, where he explained the riddle of the Sphinx q. v., and received in marriage his mother Iocæsta, thus verifying the oracular response. By his mother he had two sons, Etæcles and Pölyñices, and two daughters, Ismēnē and Antigōnē. Some however maintain, that he had these children by Eurýgēnia. At a future period, the circumstances of his birth were correctly ascertained, on which Iocæsta hanged herself, and the Thebans drove Œdipus from the city; but not before they had put out his eyes. He cursed his sons, because they had witnessed his expulsion, and had not protected him from injury, then fled with Antigōnē to Cölönum in Attica, sat down as a suppliant in the grove of the Furies, where Theseüs took him up, and, soon after, he died. The grossest sins of Œdipus, having been involuntary, do not deserve that detestation in which writers generally hold up his character. The gods directed their vengeance against him, and his calamities excite the deepest commiseration; still if Stätius has done him justice, the horrible and unnatural imprecation in the first book of the Thebaid sinks him to the lowest infamy, and renders justification impossible. Œdipodes, æ, m. a patronymic of Etæcles and Pölyñices, sons of Œdipus; also a name of Œdipus (Stat. Th. i. 17), where perhaps the reading ought to be Œdipodis. Œdipodiönides, æ, m. a patronymic of Etæcles (Stat. Th. iv. 491); of Pölyñices (Stat. Th. i. 313; vi. 426). Œdipodiönidae, arum, m. Etæcles and Pölyñices (Stat. Th. vii. 216). Adj. Œdipodiönus, a, um. Œdipodiönia Thēbe (Luc. Phar. viii. 407). Œdipodiönia dōmus (Stat. Th. ii. 505).

Œdipodiönii frätres, Etæcles and Pölyñices (Stat. Th. x. 795).

Enänthē, es, f. the mother of Agäthöcles and Agäthöclēa q. v. (Just. xxx. 2).

Œneüs, eos, m. son of Pärthäion and Eurýtē, daughter of Hippödämas, was king of Cälýdon, and married Althæa, by whom he had Méléäger, whom some consider a son of Märs. When only seven days old, the fates assured his father, that he would die when the wood then burning on the hearth was consumed. On hearing this prediction, Althæa took the timber from the fire, and hid it in a chest, thus preventing its being reduced to ashes, and consequently preserving the life of her son. See Méléäger. On the death of Althæa, Œneüs married Përibœa, daughter of Hippödōus, whom, some say, he received as a reward on the taking of Olēñus; but this is told in different ways. According to some authors, she bore him Týdēus, who, on reaching manhood, killed Alcäthōus, his father's brother, and was banished. Another writer says, that when the sons of Mēlas laid snares for Œneüs, in which they were joined by his own brother Olēñus, he fled to the Argivi, and married a daughter of Adrästus, by whom he had Diömēdes. The sons of Agrius took possession of the kingdom of Œneüs, which they gave to their father, imprisoned Œneüs, and lacerated his person with stripes. Diömēdes put them all to death except two, and his kingdom, after he became an old man, was given to Andrēmon. Œneüs fell by the hands of the surviving sons of Agrius, and Diömēdes buried him at Argos (Apol. i. 7 seq.). Hyginius differs considerably from Apöllödōrus, with respect to the history of Œneüs, making Diömēdes son of Týdēus, and grandson of Œneüs. This author states, that Althæa, wife of Œneüs, bore Delänira to Bæchus, who in return for the hospitality which he received from that king, made him a present of a vine, showed how to cultivate it, and called the produce of the grape from him, Oenoc (129). Œnōc, es, f. a city built on the place where Œneüs was buried, and so called from his name. Œnides, æ, m. Méléäger (Ov. Met. viii. 414); Diömēdes, grandson of Œneüs (Ov. Met. xiv. 512); Týdēus (Stat. Th. ii. 481). Adj. Œneüs, et, Œneüs, a, um. Œneüs hēros, Týdēus (Stat. Th. v. 661). Œnēi agri, the lands of Œneüs, which Diana sent a huge boar to ravage, because he had presented to her no offering (Ov. Met. viii. 281).

Œnīāde, arum, f. a town of Acarnānia, near the mouth of Achēlōus, the Aspro-Potamo. M. Valērius Lævinus, proprætor, took it from the Acarnānes, and gave it to the Ætöli, in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxvi. 24).

Œnōānda, æ, v. Œnōāndos, i, f. a town of Lycia. Inh. Œnōāndēnses, ium, m. (Ap. Bel. Civ. 634).

Œnōc, es, f. a district of Attica, towards Bæötia (Herod. v. 74).

Œnömäus, i, m. son of Märs and Stëröpē, according to Erätösthēnes, and of Märs and Härpinna, according to Pausānias, was king of Pisa in Elis, a district of Pelöponnēsus, the Morea. Some authors state, that he married Evärētē, daughter of Acrisius, and others, Eurýthēa, daughter of Dänäus, by whom he had Hippödāmia. He built a town, which he called by his mother's name, Härpinna, of which the vestiges only were to be year 494, and continued there about sixty years, when Narses, general of the emperor Justinianus, finally subdued them. See Goths. They possessed part of Phrygia when Claudianus wrote (xx. 153).

Otaces, is, m. one of the three commanders of the Ibëri, in the contest between the Argonauts and the Scythians. The other two were Lætridas and Neurus (Val. Flacc. vi. 121).

Otaciulus, i, m. a poor man, who attempted to support a rank as high as Törquatus the consul, who was rich. Martialis ridicules this silly vanity of Otaciulus (x. 79).

Otaciulus Crassus, Otacili Crassi, m. an officer of Pömpëius, who had the command of Lissus, Alexia. He attacked two of Caesar's transports, promising the men their lives, if they would surrender. The newly-raised soldiers, on board one of the transports, accepted his offer, and he, disregarding the solemnity of an oath, instantly ordered them to be put to death in his presence; but the veterans in the other declined his treacherous proposal, and thus saved their lives (Cæs. B. C. iii. 28 seq.).

L. Otacilius Philæus, L. Otacili Philæti, m. a rhetorician, born in slavery, and afterwards obtained his freedom in consequence of his talents and love of literature. He was preceptor to Cn. Pömpëius Magnus, whose achievements, and those of his father, he recorded at great length, and in the opinion of Cörnëlius Nëpos, was the first freedman who composed history (Suet. Clur. Rhet. 3). He wrote severe lampoons against C. Julius Caesar, which, however, did not provoke the emperor to resentment (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 75). See Pitholæus. He is mentioned by Stätius, where some editions read L. Otacilius Pilitus (Syl. ii. 6. 81).

T. Otacilius, T. Otacili, m. a Roman who, both in his prætorship and after its expiry, distinguished himself by his activity in Sicily, crossed to Africa, ravaged the territories of the Carthaginians, and gained a victory over Hædrübal at sea, on his way home from Sardinia. Yet Q. Fabius Maximus, the uncle of his wife, objected to his being named as consul, because he had not prevented reinforcements, with money and provisions, being sent to Hannibal, nor had protected the coasts of Italy. He was, however, again elected prætor, obtained the command of the same fleet, and, after depopulating the country about Utica, returned to Sicily with a great quantity of grain, obtained by the capture of a number of transports, which prevented a famine at Syracüsæ. His command was continued, and he was again elected consul, but at the request of his colleague the tribes were recalled, and others named to that office. He held the office of pontiff at the time of his death, which happened in that island in 213 B. C. (Liv. xxii. 10 seq.).

Otanes, v. Otänis, is, m. son of Pharnäpes, a Persian nobleman, whose daughter Phedýma was among the royal concubines, and by her agency he discovered the imposition of Oröpästa q. v. (Just. i. 9).—2. Son of Sisäntes, administered justice sitting on the skin of his father (Herod. v. 25).

Otho. See Säteius.
Otho, önis, m. a man of infamous character (Catul. liv. 1).
Othryädes, äy, m. a Spartan, who remanded a limited number of his fellow-citizens against Thersänder, an Argive, who headed the same number of his fellow-citizens, to decide, by combat, a dispute between these two states, respecting the district off Thýrëa. Two of the Argives survived the engagement, quitted the field, supposing Othryädes dead, and returned home to report their victory. After their departure, Othryädes, though severely wounded, collected the spoils of the slaughtered Argives, and carried them into the Lacedæmonian camp, as a trophy of victory. Both parties then claimed the territory, and, referring the matter to the Amphictyons, the decision was in favour of the Lacedæmonians. Hërodötus states, that each party consisted of three hundred, and that Othryädes, after gathering the arms of the slain enemy, killed himself, not to survive his fellow-combatants. Ovidius makes a very happy allusion to this dispute (Fast. ii. 665).—2. A man mentioned by Ovidius, but the good editions read Actöräde, a patronymic of Eurýtus, or Ctëätus (Met. viii. 371).

Othryönëus, eos, m. of Cäbëus, a suitor of Cässandra. He promised to drive the Greeks from Troy; but was killed by Idömëneüs, who dragged him by the foot through the battle (Hom. Il. xiii. 363 seq.).

Othrys, ýis, m. one of the Märmäride, a man of prodigious size and proportionate strength, killed at the battle of Träsmënus, the Lake of Perugia, by the Roman consul (Sil. Ital. v. 437 seq.).

Othrys, ýos, m. Keta V. Othry, a mountain which, joining Pëlion on the W. and Pindus on the E., forms the southern boundary of Tëmpë. Nübilus Othrys (Stat. Ach. i. 238). Adj. Othryäus, a, um. Othryäus orbis (Mart. vii. 7. ix. 95). Some copies of Martialis read Odryäus, which is probably preferable.

Otos, i, m. brother of Ephältes q. v., a giant of prodigious size, whom Virgilius represents as bound with serpents (Cæ. 233).

—2. Of Cýllënus, commanded the Epëi, was the companion of Mëges, and killed by Pölydämas (Hom. Il. xv. 518).

Otreüs, eos, m. one of the Märiändýni, and brother of Lýcus, killed by Amýeus, king of Bëhrëia (Val. Flacc. iv. 162).—2. A Colchian commander (Val. Flacc. vi. 251).

Otryntëus, eos, m. father of Iphitiön, Otryntides, a, m. Iphitiön (Hom. Il. xx. 383).

P. Ovidius Näsö, P. Ovidii Näsönis, m. was a native of Sülmo, Sulmona (Sülmönënsis), a town of the Pëligni, about ninety miles east from Rome, and thirty-two from the Gulf of Venice. His birth is referred to the memorable year, in which the consuls, A. Hirrius and C. Vibius Pansa, were killed at Mütina q. v. Tibüllus, whose merits as an Elegiac poet are highly esteemed, was born on the same day. Ovid's parents were of Equestrian rank, and in possession of a good estate, to which he was indebted for an excellent education. His uncommon progress in his studies was a natural consequence of great application, united with great genius. That levity of disposition, not to use stronger language, which disgraced his riper years, did not interfere with his literary pursuits. At what period he first attempted to write verses, we have no certain information. Like Pope and Cowley, he seems to have lisped in gaven judicious opinion respecting the appearance of the Roman army, at the time they passed under the yoke, in 321 B. C. (Liv. ix. 7).

Ogūlnia, ae, f. a woman of extravagant prodigality, by which she ruined her fortune. (Juv. Sat. vi. 352).

A. Ogūlnus, A. Ogūlni, m. a military tribune of the second Roman legion, who fell in battle with the Boii, in 193 B. C. (Liv. xxxiii. 36).

Cn. Ogūlnus, Cn. Ogūlni, m. a tribune of the Roman people, who, with Q. Ogūlnus, carried a law, that the office of priesthood should be accessible to the plebeians, and that, since the number of priests was four, and also that of the augurs, the four additional pontiffs and five additional augurs should be chosen from the commons. When curule ediles, these two fined several usurers, and expended the money on brazen thresholds in the capitol, deposited vessels of plate for three tables in the chapel of Jūpiter, a statue of that god in his chariot drawn by four horses, placed on the roof, and the images of Rōmulus and Rēmus, when infants, under the teats of the wolf at the Raminal fig-tree. They also paved with square stones the foot-path from the gate Cāpēna to the temple of Mārs, in 298 B. C. (Liv. x. 6-23).

M. Ogūlnus, M. Ogūlni, m. a Roman who, with P. Aquillius, was appointed a commissioner to purchase grain in Etruria, for the citadel of Tarentum, Taranto, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 3).

M. Ogūlnus Gāllus, M. Ogūlni Gālli, m. a Roman, to whom the jurisdiction of the city fell, in 184 B. C. (Liv. xxxix. 56 seq.).

Q. Ogūlnus, Q. Ogūlni, m. a tribune of the commons, who, with Cn. Ogūlnus, carried a law that four additional pontiffs and five additional augurs should be chosen from the commons. He was afterwards a curule edile (Liv. x. 6).

Ogýges, is, m. a king of Thēba, at so remote a period, that nothing certain respecting him is known. Adj. Ogýgius, a, um. Ta Ogýgia became a proverbial expression, signifying uncertainty from antiquity (Pin. Nem. vi. 74).

Ogýgia, ae, f. an island in Sinus Scylaciū, the Gulf of Squillace. It is also called Cālīpsus, and supposed to have been the residence of Cālīpsō (Plin. i. 351). From it Ulysses sailed in a raft to Schēria. Some have supposed, that it was an ancient name of Malta, and others consider it as an invention of Hōmērus (Od. vi. 172). Its situation is doubted, and even the certainty of there ever having been such an island has been disputed.—2. e. Ogýgius, arum, f. one of the gates of Thēba, Theba, so called from Ogýges, who was the first king of that city. Crēon issued to the Theban war through this gate (Stat. Th. viii. 359).

Ogýgius, arum (Sing. Ogýgides, ae, m.) the Thebans (Stat. Th. ii. 586). Adj. Ogýgius, a, um, of Theba, Theban. Ogýgiā Mīnes (Stat. Th. xi. 420). Ogýgius vertēx, the top of Cithæron (Stat. Th. iv. 380). Ogýgia tūrris, the turret or fort at the gate Ogýgius (Stat. Th. x. 915).

Oicleūs, ēos, v. Oicles, is, m. son of Antīphātes, and father of Amphīlārus (Hom. Od. xxi. 243). Oiclides, ae, m. a son of Oicleūs (Pin. Ol. vi. 19). Oicleūs, is, v. ēos, m. a man in the Trojan army, killed by Agamēmon (Hom. Il. xi. 93).

—2. Son of Lēodōeus and Agrianōmē, was king of the Lōcri. He married Eriōpis, by whom he had Ajāx, called by Ovidius Mēdētātor, because he was of a milder temper than Ajāx, son of Tēlāmon. Apollōdōrus does not name Oicleūs among the Argonauts, but all the other writers on that subject account him amongst the number (Val. Flacc. i. 372). Oiclides, is, et, Oiclades, ae, m. a patronymic of Ajāx (Prop. iv. i. 117. Sil. Ital. xiv. 479).

Oibla, ae, f. afterwards Nicæa, Isaë, q. v. (Plin. i. 628).—2. Andalia, a town of Pāmphylia (Plin. i. 589).—3. Oczakow, a town of Sarmātia, built by the Greeks (Pom. Mel. ii. 1).—4. Terra Nova, a town of Sardinia, on the east coast of that island. Hanno, the Carthaginian general, fell here, in 261 B. C. (Val. Max. v. 1). The district round it was plundered by Hāmilcar with a Carthaginian fleet, in 212 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 6. Flor. ii. 2). To it Claudianus refers (xv. 519). Inh. Oibiēnses, ium (Sing. Oibiēnsis, is, m. Adj. Oibiēnsis, is, e. Oibiēnsis ager (Liv. xxvii. 6).—5. L'Eoube, a town of Gallia, France (Pom. Mel. ii. 5).

Oibus, i, m. a Colchian commander, who lost his life by the hand of Cōlāxes, in the war between the Argonauts and Scythians (Val. Flacc. vi. 638).

Olcādes, dum, m. a people of Spain, near the Ebro, attacked by Hānibal, about 220 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 5).

Olcīnium, i, n. Dolcigno, a town of Illīricum, on the confines of Dalmātia and Albānia. Inh. Olcīnīatē, arum, m. (Liv. xlv. 26).

Olcōba, ae, m. a Scythian, who first deserted from Mithridātes to Lūcillus, and afterwards from Lūcillus to Mithridātes, carrying Sōbadacus along with him (Ap. Bel. Mith. 225).

Olcāros, i, f. Rocchi, one of the Cylādēs, about seven miles distant from Pāros, peopled by a colony of the Sidonians.

Olēnus, i, m. a Theban in the army of Crēon, put to death by Thēseus (Stat. Th. xii. 741).—2. A Lemnian of some distinction (Val. Flacc. ii. 163). In book iii. line 206 of the same author, Olēni is an adjective, and the sentence, when resolved, will stand thus, Cūspia Olēni Tjēdōs subit illa (Cūcythi).—3. The father of Phōceūs. Olēnides, ae, m. a patronymic of Phōceūs (Val. Flacc. iii. 204).

Olēnnus, i, m. the first centurion of a Roman legion, who, on being appointed governor over the Frisians, forced them to take up arms against the Roman government, by his oppressive exactions. They gave first up their cattle, next their lands, and afterwards saw their wives and children carried into slavery, by way of commutation, in the year 28 (Tac. Ann. iv. 72).

Olēnus, i, m. a man who imputed to himself the crime of another, and willingly appeared guilty of what he was innocent. He suffered the punishment of the crime which he falsely acknowledged (Ov. Met. x. 69).

Olēnus, i, f. v. um, i, n. Caminitza, a town of Achāia Ἰσθμια, a northern district of Pēlōpōnnēsus, the Mōrea, near the mouth of the river Mēlas. It stood upon a rocky mountain, which Hōmērus calls Olēnia pētra (Il. xi. 756), now Olono. The goat Amālthēa was called Olēnia, from having been kept in this town. Adj. Olēlus, a., um. Olēlia capelle (Ov. Met. iii. 594).

Oligēthes, as, m. an illustrious Corinthian. Oligēthidae, arum, m. the descendants of Oligēthes (Pin. Ol. xiii. 137).

Olizon, ōnis, f. Kortos, a town of Māgnēsia, a district of Thēssālīa (Hom. Il. ii. 717). Is. Olizōnīl, orum, m.

Ollus, i, m. the Oglio, a river of Italy, which rises in the Rhetian Alps, flows through Lācus Sēvinus, the Lake of Isco, and, after uniting with other streams, falls into Pādus, the Po. To one of its branches, now called the Dermona, Tācītus alludes, without mentioning the name (Hist. iii. 17).

T. Ollus, T. Ollī, m. the father of Pōpaea Sābīna. His intimacy with Sējanus involved him in the ruin of that unprincipled minister (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45).

Ollōvico, ōnis, m. a nobleman of the Nitiōbriges, whom the Romans had honoured with the appellation of Friend. His son, Tēntimātus, was king of that nation during the wars in Gallia, France (Ces. B. G. vi. 31).

Ollus, i, m. a man whom Mārtialis mentions, as having been reduced from a state of affluence to abject poverty (iii. 48).

Oloaritus, i, m. a naval captain, one of the party sent by Nēro to murder his mother Agrippina. Perceiving him draw his sword, she said, "Strike me on the belly" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 8).

Olonicus, i, m. a Celtiberian, who headed a revolt of his countrymen against the Romans, in 172 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 43).

Olophēxus, i, f. a town on Mount Athos (Herod. vii. 22).

Olfheus, Olficus, c. Alphicus, i, m. a name given to Athenāgōras by Mārtialis, and is probably of his own invention (ix. 97).

Olus, i, m. a man to whom Mārtialis writes some epigrams (ii. 68 &c.).

Olvrius, i, m. a Roman, son of Prōbus and Prōba, who held the consulship with his brother Prōbinus, in the year 395. Claudīanus writes a panegyric on their consulship (i).

Olympia, as, f. Mirakā, a miserable Turkish village, which occupies part of the site of that ancient, and once celebrated, town. It stood on Alphēus, the Ronfia, a river of Elis in Pelōpōnnēsus, the Morea, at which the famous games were performed at the completion of every fourth year. Scarcely any of its ruins are visible; the modern cottages are composed of wicker-work, and thatched.

The temple of Jupiter contained a statue of that god, sixty feet high, remarkably well proportioned, and supposed to have been the finest which the world ever saw. The Olympic plain is now called Antilalla, probably from its situation, opposite the town Lalla, though others derive it from the modern Greek word antialla, an echo, for which Olympia, in ancient times, was remarkable. That echo must have depended on the situation of the houses with respect to each other, since it vanished with the town. Olympia, adis, f. a space of four years. The Greeks first began to compute time by Olympiads, 776 B. C. Before that period, their history, from want of chronological order, is almost fabulous. As a mode of computing time, it is preferable to that of the Romans by the names of the Consuls. The Latin poets sometimes seem to use Olympia in the sense of lustrum, which is inaccurate (Murt. vii. 39). Quinquēnnis Olympias (Ov. Ep. Pont. iv. 6. 5). Nisi una Olympias decesset numero, unless an Olympiad, or four years, were wanting to the sum (Manil. iii. 592). Adj. Olympiācus, Olympicus, et, Olympius, a, um. Olympiācus rāmūs, a branch of the wild olive, of which the chaplets of the conquerors at Olympia were made (Stat. Th. vi. 554). Olympiācus mercātus (Just. xiii. 5). Olympiācus Jūpiter (Ann. Mar. xxii. 13). Olympiāca pālma, the Olympian palm, which the conquerors carried in their hands (Virg. G. iii. 49). Olympicus pulvis, the dust of Olympia, i. e. in the chariot course (Hor. Od. i. l. 3). Olympia (cērtāmina), the Olympic games, which lasted five days, and consisted in races, of which there were three kinds, on foot, on horseback, and in chariots; leaping; wrestling; boxing; and throwing the quoit. The prize was a crown of olive, and the victor carried a branch of the palm tree in his hand. The games were said to have been instituted by Jūpiter, 1453 B. C.; others say by Hērclēs, in 1222 B. C., after he had conquered Augēas, king of Elis; others, that they were instituted in honour of Pēlōps. They are not alluded to by Hērclēs. After they had fallen into disuse, Iphitus is reported to have restored them, and, in this instance, to have acted by the advice of Lyeurgus, king of Sparta. The object of the games was the improvement of the youth in activity, strength, and courage. Women were forbidden, under penalty of death, from entering the lists, as combatants, at the Olympic games. Pausanias states, that Callipatra, called by others Phērenice, notwithstanding this law, appeared in man's dress, and, on being defeated by Pisicidus, discovered her sex in leaping over the enclosure. From the respect due to her father, brothers, and son, who had been victorious at the games, she was pardoned, and a law passed, that all the combatants should, in future, contend naked (Paus. v. 6). Olympiōnceis, as, c. Olympiōnceis, i, m. a conqueror at the Olympic games, who was accompanied to his native place with a pomp and splendour resembling a triumph. He was drawn in a chariot by four horses, did not enter the town by any of the gates, but by a breach made in the wall for his reception. Statues were erected to the successful combatants. None were allowed to enter the lists who were not of unblemished character, born in wedlock, and had been ten months previously exercised at Elis. Olympiōnceas, as, f. a statue erected at Olympia in honour of the conqueror at the Olympic games.

Olympias, adis, f. daughter of Nēoptōlēmus, king of the Molōssi, sister of Alexander, king of Epirus, and wife of Philippos, king of Mācedōnia, by whom she became the mother of Alexander the Great and Clēopātra. Revenge for having been repudiated by her husband, induced her to become accessory to his murder, and, according to Jūstinus, not without the knowledge of her son, who dreaded a rival in Attalus, his step-mother's son. The charge preferred against her was infidelity; but whether well or ill founded remains doubtful. The character of Philippos would induce a belief, that had her guilt been unquestionable, he would have under which, according to Ovidius, the left hand of the giant Typhoeus was buried (Met. v. 351). On the southern part of it stands a town of the same name (Pachynus, i. f.), which has a small harbour. Pachynus is about 115 miles distant from Pelorus, Cape Peloro, and 175 from Lilybæum, Cape Boco.

Pacæus, i. m. the surname of a noble family in Spain.

Pacōnus Agrippinus, Pacōni Agrippini, m. son of M. Pacōnus, was banished from Italy, on a charge of disaffection to the emperor Néro, in the year 66 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28 seq.).

M. Pacōnus, M. Pacōni, m. a lieutenant-general, who appeared in the prosecution against C. Julius Silius, in the year 22. The emperor Tiberius caused him to be put to death on a charge of treason (Suet. Tib. 61).

Pacōrus, i. m. elder son of Orōdes, king of Parthia, who made himself master of Judæa; but soon after, Ventidius, a favourite lieutenant-general of M. Antōnius, cut him off, with all the Parthian cavalry, in 39 B. C. (Tac. Hist. v. 9; Tac. Mor. Ger. 37). The loss on the side of the Parthians appears to have been very great, and considered by the Romans as sufficient expiation for the destruction of Crassus and his army (Flor. iv. 9). His father lamented his death in the deepest sorrow, which produced insensibility or derangement for a considerable time (Just. xlii. 4).—2. A king of Mædia, brother of Volōgēs and Tiridates (Tac. Ann. xv. 2 seq.).

Pactius, i. m. a man mentioned by Martialis, probably a wealthy physician; but nothing certain respecting him has been recorded (xiv. 78).—2. A Brutian of the most illustrious family of that people, who solicited for his countrymen, the same terms as the Roman consul Q. Fulvius Flaccus had granted to the Lucanians, in 211 B. C. (Liv. xxvii. 15).

Pactius Africānus, Pacti Africāni, m. a man of infamous character, who induced Néro to sacrifice to his cruelty the two Scribonii (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

Pactius Africānus, Pacti Africāni, m. the first captain of a legion, who served under Domitius Corbulo, and risked an engagement with the troops which he commanded, contrary to the orders of his superior officer, and was totally routed, for which he, his subalterns, and men, were marched out of the entrenchments, and left there in disgrace, where they remained until, at the request of the whole army, Domitius Corbulo permitted them to return within the lines (Tac. Ann. xiii. 36).

Pactolus, i. m. a river of Lydia, which takes its rise in mount Tmolus, Bowz-dag (i. e. the cold mountain), washes Sardes, Sardi, and afterwards falls into Hermus, the Sarabat. In ancient times this river was said to carry down gold dust amongst its sand, to which ancient writers often allude (Virg. Æn. x. 142). According to Lucianus, it had its source in gold mines (Phar. iii. 210).

Pactolis, Idis, f. of Pactolus, applied to females; or nouns feminine. Pactolides nymphæ, the nymphs of that river (Ov. Met. xiv. 16).

Pactyæ, es, f. a town on the west coast of Eubœa, the Sea of Marmora, near the Isthmus which joins Chersonesus Thracica, Gallipoli, to the continent (Plin. l. 444). It was built by Miltiades, and to it Alcibiades fled when his countrymen deprived him of his magistracy in his absence, and appointed another in his place (Cor. Nep. Alcib. 7).

Pactyes, um, m. a people bordering on India. Adj. Pactyicus, a, um (Herod. vii. 67 seq.).

Paculla Anna (v. Minia), Paculle Annæ, f. a woman of Cæmpania, and a priestess of Bacchus. She was the first who initiated men into the rites of that god, and changed the time of their celebration from day to night; in place of three days in the year, appointed five days in each month for initiations. Both these changes seem to have had an iniquitous effect (Liv. xxxix. 13). Her name is different in different authors.

Pacuvius, i. m. a native of Cæpua, who, after the battle of Cannæ, made a demand from the Romans, which he knew they would never grant, to serve as an apology for his own revolt, and that of his townsmen, to Hannibal (Sil. Ital. xi. 58).—2. A lieutenant-general, who had the command at Lacedæa, Latakia, in Syria, in the year 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 79).

Pacuvius Calpurnius, Pacuvii Calpurni, m. a native of Cæmpania, was chief magistrate of Cæpua, 218 B. C. By a dexterous manœuvre, he rendered the senators of that city indebted to him for their lives, hence he easily prevailed upon them to open the gates to Hannibal, who marched thither after the battle of Cannæ. The unjustifiable means by which he obtained his popularity, both with the nobles and the commons, rendered him more conspicuous than respectable (Liv. xxiii. 2—9). See Pærolla.

Pacuvius Ninnius Celer, Pacuvii Ninnii Celæris, m. a Campanian, distinguished both by high rank and wealth, in whose house Hannibal lodged on his admission into Cæpua (Liv. xxiii. 8).

M. Pacuvius, M. Pacuvii, m. grandson of Q. Ennius, and native of Brundisium, Brindisi, was the friend of Lælius, and wrote several tragedies which his countrymen read and admired. Cicero praises Ennius, Pacuvius, and Attius, for their successful imitation of the Greek tragedians, whose force and elegance they expressed without being indebted to their language. Many of the Romans read the tragedies of these authors in preference to those of Euripides and Sophocles. Pacuvius polished every verse into neatness and accuracy; but the orator adds, that he spoke Latin ill. He lived to a very advanced age, hence Horatius calls him Sênex (Epis. li. l. 56). A few fragments of his writings only now remain (Pers. Sat. i. 77). If he be the poet mentioned by Martialis, which can scarcely be supposed, it is manifest that the Epigrammatist had a very contemptible opinion of his verses (xi. 91). He wrote his own epitaph, which Gellius has transmitted (i. 24). Adj. Pacuvianus, a, um (Gel. xiv. 1).

Padaei, orum, m. an Indian nation, who killed and ate those who were sick, or supposed to be so, whether men or women, even although the persons declared that they laboured under no disease (Herod. iii. 99).

Pædus, i. m. a man in the army of Hannibal, killed by the Roman consul Scipio, in the engagement at the foot of the Alps (Sil. Ital. iv. 232).

Pādus, i. m. the Po, the largest river of Itālia, Italy, anciently called Eridānus, an appellation which is frequently used by Roman poets, and almost always by Grecian authors. Pādus is said to have been derived from a word in the language of the Gauls which denoted a poplar tree, in consequence of a great number of those trees growing on its banks. It has its source near the bottom of mount Vesūlus, Vio, as has also Drūentius, c. Drūentia, the Durance, runs in an eastern direction, and, after a course of 300 miles, and receiving a number of streams on both banks, it falls into Mārē Hādrīaticūm, the Gulf of Venice, by seven mouths, of which two were formed by nature, and the other five by art. The plain of the Po is a triangle, of which the northern and southern sides are each one hundred and eighty English miles, and the eastern side ninety English miles long. Pōlybius makes the northern side two thousand two hundred stadia, i. e. two hundred and fifty English miles, the southern three thousand and sixty stadia, i. e. nearly three hundred and forty-eight English miles, and the third side, or the shore of the Adriatic, two thousand five hundred stadia, i. e. two hundred and eighty-four English miles. The northern branches of the Po, descending from the Alps, render it largest in the warmest months of summer, by the melting of the snow on these lofty mountains. These streams too, by the rapidity of their currents, bring down a great quantity of stones and earth, which have filled up the channel, and rendered embankments, upwards of 30 feet high in some places, necessary, to prevent the inundation of the adjacent country. According to Lūcānus, it was anciently navigated in boats of wicker-work, covered with skin (Phar. iv. 134). This river divided Gāllia Cisalpīna (called also Citerior and Pōgita) into two parts, Gāllia Cispadāna and Gāllia Trāspadāna. The Roman armies first crossed the Po in 237 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 20). Phōthōntēs Pādus (Mart. x. 12). Pādinātes, um, m. a people living on the banks of the Po. Adj. Pādānēs, a, um.

Pādūsa, as, f. the southern branch of Pādus, the Po, supposed to be now called the Po d'Argenta. In ancient times, that river ran into the Gulf of Venice, by two mouths, of which this was the southern, and the northern was called Vōlāna, anciently Olānē (Virg. Æn. xl. 457). Stāgna rauca Pādūsa (Claud. xxxi. 109).

Pæon, ānis, m. a name of Apōllo. Adj. Pæāntius, a, um.

Pæniāni, orum, m. a people of Gāllia Belgica, on the east bank of Mōsa, the Meuse. They had the Ceresi on the S., the Trēviri on the E., and Silla Arduēna on the N. (Cæs. B. G. ii. 4).

Pæon, ōnis, m. a name of Apōllo, as the god of medicine. In ancient times, Pæon seems to have been accounted a god, and the physician of the gods, an honour afterwards bestowed on Apōllo, hence he is frequently called Pæon. Adj. Pæonius, a, um, of Pæon; medicinal. Pæonīa opē, by help of medicine (Qv. Met. xv. 535). Pæonius mos, the manner of a physician (Virg. Æn. xii. 401). Pæonia herba, healing, or medicinal, herbs (Virg. Æn. vii. 709). Pæoni fōntes, warm, or medicinal, springs (Sil. Ital. xiv. 27).

Pæonia, as, f. a district of Mācēdōniā, to the east of Dīrdāniā, which, according to Jūstinus, was the original name of the whole country (vii. 1), and is said to have received that name from the physician Pæon q. v. Inh. Pæones, um (Sing. Pæon, ōnis), m. Vālērīus Flācus calls the centaurs Pæones (iv. 280). Pæonīs, idos, f. a female of Pæonia, or, Mācēdōniā.

Pæstum, i, n Pesti, or, Pesto, a town of Lūcāniā, which the Greeks called Pōsidōniā, now in ruins. Alexander, king of Epirus, made a descent on the country adjoining to Pæstum, Pesto, and defeated both the Lūcāni and Sāmmites, in 332 B. C. (Liv. vii. 17). It produced roses of uncommon size and beauty, to which Claudīanus refers (x. 247), and Prōpértius (iv. 5. 50). Bīssum Pæstum, Pesti, producing two crops of roses annually (Mart. xii. 31). Inh. Pæstāni, orum, m. sent ambassadors to Rome, when Hāmūbal was in Italy, with a golden cup, which the senate did not accept; but thanked them for that proof of their attachment (Liv. xxii. 36). Adj. Pæstānus, a, um. Pæstānus sinus, the Gulf of Salerno (Plin. i. 335). Pæstāna rōsa (Qv. Ep. Pont. ii. 4. 28).

Pæsus, i, f. a town of the Troad, between Pārium and Lāmpsācus (Hom. Il. v. 612).

Pæstus, i, m. a friend of Prōpértius, whose death he laments (Prop. iii. 7). Nothing certain respecting him is known. He was drowned in a voyage to Pharos, appears to have been a merchant, and from the nature of the elegy was probably solicitous to acquire wealth.—2. A man with whom Mārtiālis had some money transactions (vi. 30 sc.).—3. A Roman, notorious for distressing his fellow-citizens with confiscations to the treasury. His fraud and imposition induced the senate to banish him, and to burn all his papers, intended to be used in treasury suits (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23).

Pæstus Thrāsca, Pæti Thrāsca, m. a native of Pātāvium, Padua, was a man of great strength of mind, and commended, by Tācitus, as a model of true fame. His integrity, resolution, and virtue, subjected him to the displeasure of the tyrant Néro, by whom he was condemned to lose his life, but allowed to choose the kind of death most agreeable to himself. The reason assigned for that murder by the emperor was, that Pæstus had "the more sulky countenance of a school-master" (Suet. Ner. 37). For praising him and Hēlvīdīus Prīscus as most upright men, Dōmītiānus doomed Jūnius Rūsticus to death. Mārtiālis commends him for his steadiness (iv. 54).

Pāgāni, orum (Sing. Pāgānus, i, m. rustic, peasants. Tācitus uses the term in opposition to soldiers, whom they sometimes joined and assisted, by throwing stones and discharging darts. Perhaps he understood by Pāgānus every person not trained to the use of arms (Tac. Hist. i. 53).

Pāgāsa, as, f. Pāgāsa, arum, f. Volo, the port of Phēria, a town of Thēssālīa, Thessaly; but no vestiges of either the town or harbour are said, by some, to remain. In ancient times, it gave name to the bay on which it stood. Sinus Pāgāseus, the Gulf of Volo, and was situated near the lake Boebis, about ten miles from the top of the Gulf. The ARGONAUTS sailed from this port, on the famous expedition to Cōlchis, in quest of the GOLDEN FLEECE. Adj. Pāgāseus, a, um, of Pāgāsa, of Thēssālīa.

Palia, Thessalian. Pāgāsa carina, a Thessalian ship, i. e. the Argo (Ov. Met. xiii. 24); which was built there, whence the name (αργὸς παγασίας). Strabo prefers its derivation, αργὸν παγῶν (632).

Pāgāsus, i. m. a man in the army of Æneas, whom Cāmilla killed (Virg. Æn. xi. 679).

Pāggæum, i. n. et. Pāggæus, i. m. a mountain of Thracia, celebrated for its golden mines, and inhabited by the Bōrēade (Pind. Pyth. iv. 320).

Pagida, n. m. the Moher, Abeadh, or, Fisato, a river of Nūmidia, or, Africa Prōpria (Tac. Ann. iii. 20). The ancient geographers do not mention this stream, for which reason considerable uncertainty respecting it prevails.

Pāgræ, arum, f. Begrus, a fort on Amānus.

Pālemon, ōnis, m. a name given by the Greeks to Melicerta, after he became a sea deity. By the Romans he was called Pōrtūnus. Idūs Pālemon, Pālemon, son of Idō, whom Virgilius represents as a sea god (Æn. v. 823). Adj. Pālemōnius, a. um. Pālemōnia cōrona, chaplets given to the conquerors at the Isthmian games, instituted in honour of Pālemon (Claud. xvii. 289). Pālemōnium Lēchaum (Stat. Th. ii. 381). See Melicerta.—2. A man in the Argive army, who informed Adrastus, that he had seen the earth open and swallow up Amphiarāus (Stat. Th. viii. 135).—3. Son of Vulcānus; others say, a bastard of Lernus, and call him Pālemōnius. Apōlōdōrus, and others make him one of the Argonauts. Like his father he was lame, but his strength and courage were remarkable (Apol. Rhod. i. 202).

Pālephārsalus, i. f. a town of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, which stood on the river Enipeus, a little lower down than Phārsalus, which appears to have surpassed it both in extent and population (Liv. xlv. 1). At this town, according to Eutrōpius, C. Jūlius Cæsar defeated Cn. Pōmpeius Māgnus (vi. 20).

Pālephārus, i. m. a town of Hēstiasōtis, a district of Thēssālīa, Thessaly, burned or destroyed by order of Philippus, king of Macedōnia, in 200 B. C., as it would soon fall into the hands of the Romans (Liv. xxxii. 13).

Pālephātus, i. m. a philosopher, whose works are all lost, excepting his first book "De Incredibilibus." On this subject he wrote five books, in which he attempted to account for the mythological fables of the Greeks, by reference to historical facts. The precise period in which he lived is unknown, but it must have been before the commencement of the Christian era. Adj. Pālephātus, a. um. Pālephātia vox (Virg. Cir. 88).

Pālepolis, is, f. a town not far from the site of Nēapolis, Naples. Iah. Pālepolītāni, orum, m. likewise occupied Nēapolis, and probably built it. They engaged in war with the Romans, to whom they submitted after a short resistance, in 325 B. C. (Liv. viii. 26). Adj. Pālepolītānus, a. um. Pālepolītāna res (Liv. viii. 27).

Pālestē, es, f. a seaport town of Epirus, Lower Albania, to the north of Oricum, Ric. Adj. Pālestinus, a. um.

Pālestina, n. f. Palestine, Canaan, or the Holy Land, a province of Syria, now part of Asiatic Turkey. It was bounded by the Mediterranean on the W., by Arabia Pētræa, Stony Arabia, on the S., and by Arabia Dēserta, Desert Arabia, on the southeast; but with respect to the precise line, which marked the limits of this celebrated country on the E. and N., ancient authors are either silent or unsatisfactory. The capital of Jūdæa was Hērōsōlūma, Jerusalem, and almost the only river is Iōrdānes, the Jordan, which rises not far from Mount Lāhānus, in a fountain named Panæas according to Plinius, runs in a southern direction, and enters Lācus Samōchonites. After leaving this lake, at the distance of 15 miles, it forms Lācus Genesera, v. Tarichæa, called also Mārē Tibērīas, v. Gālilæa, the Lake of Genesareth, the Sea of Tiberias, or, the Sea of Galilee. Of this lake, which may be reckoned 17 miles long, and 6 broad, the water is cool, sweet, and remarkably clear. The Jordan, on quitting the Lake of Genesareth, continues to run southward, waters the beautiful plain of Jericho, and after a course of about 90 miles, falls into Lācus Asphāltites, v. Mārē Mōrtūum, which the British call the Dead Sea, the Arabs Almotanah, and the Turks Ula Degvisi. The Dead Sea had the name Asphāltites from the quantity of bitumen on its shores, of Mōrtūum, from an idea which modern travellers have discovered, that, from its being five times saltier than ordinary sea water, it was equally pernicious both to animal and vegetable life. Regarding the extent of the Dead Sea, scarcely two writers, ancient or modern, agree. Its greatest length may perhaps be estimated about 70 miles, and its greatest breadth about 18 or 20 miles. Iah. Pālestini, orum, m. Adj. Pālestinus, a. um. Pālestina cōhōrtēs (Stat. Syl. iii. 2. 105).

Pāletyros, i. f. i. e. Ancient Tyre (Curt. iv. 2). See Tyros.

Pālāmēdes, is, m. an ingenious Grecian chief, the son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa, Negropont, by Clēmēnē, whom the Greeks put unjustly to death, through the craft and stratagems of Ulysses. To avoid going to the Trojan war, the king of Ithāca feigned madness, yoked animals of different kinds together, and then ploughed the sand on the shore. Pālāmēdes proved this insanity of Ulysses was only pretended, by laying his infant son Tēlēmāchus in the furrow before the cattle, on which he turned them aside, not to injure the child. On account of this discovery, he plotted the ruin of that prince, which he at last accomplished by the basest means. He forged a letter in name of Prīamus, to Pālāmēdes, in which it was stated, that the money agreed on for betraying the Grecian camp was sent, and that the king of Troy expected immediate fulfilment of his promise. This fabricated epistle, the crafty Ithacan gave to a Trojan captive, whom he caused one of his men to murder without the lines, that he might appear to have been the messenger of Prīamus to Pālāmēdes, and render the truth of that pretended correspondence unquestionable. Besides, he bribed the servants of that prince to allow a quantity of gold to be hid under ground in his tent. He then charged the innocent Pālāmēdes with treason, and proved his guilt to the satisfaction of the Greeks, by producing his own fictitious letter, and the gold which he himself had lately concealed. Sentence of death was passed on the Eubœan prince, who accordingly suffered as a traitor. During the Trojan war, he is said to have completed the alphabet of Cādmos, by adding θ ε ς ζ. But this statement seems extremely doubtful, since the completion of the alphabet implies a knowledge of writing, with which, it is by no means certain, that either the Greeks or Trojans were acquainted at that very remote period of antiquity. Besides, we know that some letters of the Greek alphabet were not in use for many centuries after the Trojan war.

Palamēdes was the first who put an army in line of battle, placed sentinels around the camp, and invented the use of watch-words. The regulation of the year by the course of the sun, of the months by the moon, the invention of weights and measures, and some other useful discoveries are attributed to him, of which Manilius has given a full account (iv. 206 seq.). It is not improbable, that these discoveries of Palamēdes, which indicate so much science and ingenuity, were the fictions of less ancient times. From his father he is called Naupliades; and Bēlides, from his being the grandson of Amymōnē, daughter of Dānāus, and grand-daughter of Belus (Virg. Æn. ii. 82). Adj. Palamēdeus, a, um, of Palamēdes; also inventive, ingenious. Palamēdea vires (Manil. iv. 206).

Pālāntia, m., f. a town of the Vācæi, in Spain. Inh. Pālāntini, orum, m. (Ap. Bel. Hisp. 285).

Palas. See Cāpēlātum.

Pālātium, i. n. a mountain in Italy, near the bank of Tiber, the Tevere, where Rōmulus founded Rome, 20th April, 753 B. C., and where he had taken the omen which portended to him the future sovereignty of that city. Līvius derives Pālātium from Pālāntēum, a town of Arcādia, the birthplace of Evānder, who conducted thither a colony of his countrymen, and called the town, which he built there, by the name of his native city; but Virgilius refers it to Pallas, the great-grandfather of Evānder (Æn. viii. 54). The Latins wrote this word variously, Pālātium, Pālātium, Pālāntium, and Pālāntēum. Adj. Pālātius, a, um. Pālātius Mons, Monte Palatino, the same with Pālātium, now uninhabited, and chiefly occupied with gardens. Pālātina aves, the birds which Rōmulus saw on this hill, and which secured to him the kingdom (Prop. iv. 6. 44).

Pālē, es, f. one of the four principal cities of Cephallēnia. Inh. Pālenses, ium, m. submitted to the Roman consul, M. Fulvius Nobilior, in 191 B. C. (Liv. xxxviii. 28).

Pālēa, m., n. Pālēa, arum, f. a town of Pāmphyliā, on the coast (Amm. Mar. xiv. 2).

Pālēs, is, f. the goddess of shepherds and pasturage. Adj. Pālilis, e. Pālilis, is, e. Hoc argumenti flamma Pālilis habet, the flame of Pālēs has this proof, i. e. proves this, has this meaning, viz., that fire was first obtained by shepherds striking one stone against another (Ov. Fast. iv. 798). This poet accounts for that custom in other ways (ib.). Pālilia sacra (v. solemnity), festivals in honour of Pālēs, which were celebrated on the eleventh of the kalends of May, i. e. the twentieth of April, which, according to Ovidius, either was, or was believed to be, the day on which Rome was founded (Fast. iv. 806 seq.).

Pālārtius Sūra, Pālārtii Sūre, m. a very distinguished orator, whom the Roman people with one voice begged the emperor Dōmītiānus to restore to his senatorian rank, of which he had long been deprived. To this request the emperor did not deign to reply, but simply commanded them by a common crier to be silent. The Schollasts on Juvēnālīs have given a very unfavourable account of him, which ought not to be received in opposition to Suetōnius, for had he been an informer, the Romans would not have made such an earnest application in his favour (Juv. Sat. iv. 53. Suet. Dom. 13). It is not improbable that the Pālārtius of Juvēnālīs and of Suetōnius were different persons.

Pālci, orum (Sing. Pālcius, i. Virg. Æn. ix. 585), m. twin-brothers, according to some, sons of Jūpiter and Thālia, and, according to others, of Vūlcānus and Ætna, a daughter of Ocēānus, who, during her pregnancy, prayed to be secured from the fury of Jūno, by being concealed in the bowels of the earth. Her request was granted, and Tēllus, at the proper time, opened, and brought to light the two boys. This fiction probably originated in the etymology of the term, a contraction of venire vel apparere, to come, or appear, again. They were worshipped with great solemnity by the Sicilians. Their temples stood near two small lakes, or springs, of the same name, strongly impregnated with sulphur, to which those, who wished to put an end to quarrels by oath, used to repair. False swearers are said to have been instantly punished there in a miraculous manner, whilst the innocent escaped without injury (Sil. Ital. xiv. 219). Of the manner of administering the oath, Aristōtēles has left a minute description. To these ceremonies and their consequences, that philosopher seems to have paid particular attention. He has given it as his opinion, which is confirmed by several critics of antiquity, that the perjured were destroyed by secret fire. Others think they were drowned in the lakes. Diōdōrus Siciliūs, who describes their temple minutely, states that they instantly died, without saying in what manner, or by what means. This temple, which was very rich, was also an asylum for slaves who had been cruelly used by their masters. Before the former could be demanded back, the latter had to take a solemn oath, that they would treat them humanely, and the dread of punishment commanded a faithful fulfilment; hence, Pinguis et placabilis ara Pālci, the rich and mild altar of Pālcius (Virg. Æn. ix. 585). From the Pālci, the town, or village, was called Pālciēs, es, f.

Pālīnūrus, i. m. son of Iāsus, was the pilot of the ship in which Ænās sailed from Troy. On the coast of Italy, Sōmnus, having shut his eyes in sleep, tumbled him into the sea, to no purpose begging the aid of his companions. Alarmed at the greatness of his danger, and, seeing the only hope of saving his life was by vigorous exertion, he continued for three nights to swim, and reached Vēlia, where he was murdered by the ruthless inhabitants. For this act of cruelty, they were visited with a pestilence, and, on consulting the oracle, were ordered to appease his shade. In consequence of this injunction, they consecrated a grove, and erected a monument to his memory, on the promontory of Lūcīnia, which was afterwards from his name, called Pālīnūrum Prōmōntōrium, Cape Palmaro. Hērāclūs reckons this promontory in the Sicilian Sea (Od. iii. 4. 28). Mārthialis gives a ludicrous etymology of Pālīnūrus (ex pallo, rorsum meire) (Sil. 78). From his father, he is called Iāsides (Virg. Æn. v. 845).

Pallacotta, v. Pallacopa, one of the branches of Euphrates, the El-Frat, which Apollonius calls a river, but was, properly speaking, a canal (Ap. Bel. Civ. 523).

Palladium, i. n. (Simulacrum), a remarkable statue of the goddess Minerva, who was also called Pallas, said to have fallen from heaven, near the tent of Ilus, king of Troy, at the time he was employed in building the citadel, and, according to others, at Pessinus in Phrygia, to which another is said to have been made exactly like, and set in the temple of Minerva. But the place of the original Palladium, was known solely to the priests, who had the charge of it, while the public were induced to believe, that the statue in the temple of Pallas, was the real and only Palladium. The accounts both of the image itself, and of the manner in which it was obtained, are exceedingly different. By some authors, it is described as an image of the goddess, about three cubits high, holding in her right hand a pike, and in her left a spindle and distaff; by others, as formed of the bones of Pelops; and, by Apollodorus, as a piece of machinery which moved itself. All agree that there was an ancient oracle which declared, that Troy could not be taken whilst the Palladium remained within the walls, hence, Fatalis Palladium (Virg. Æn. ii. 166), and, on that account, it was kept with uncommon care. The Greeks, aware of this prediction, sent Diomedes and Ulysses to carry it away during the night, which they accomplished (if confidence can be placed in the authority of some authors), by means of information obtained from Helenus. The Romans, who boasted of their Trojan descent, were unwilling to allow that the Greeks obtained possession of the Palladium, and, therefore, maintained it was the fabricated, not the true one, which these warriors took from Minerva's temple. On the same principle, they asserted that Æneas brought to Italia, Italy, with him that statue, and the Pennates Publici, which were afterwards guarded with so much solicitude in the Capitol at Rome.

Pallantium, i. n. Thana, a town of Arcadia, built by Pallas, the grandfather of Evander, who gave the same name to the city which he built on the bank of the Tevere. See Pallatium. Adj. Pallantius, a, um. Pallantia munita, the walls of Pallantium, built by Evander, on Mons Palaemus, Monte Palatino (Virg. Æn. ix. 196). Pallantius regius (Claud. xxii. 405).

Pallas, adis, f. a name of Minerva, probably from a Greek verb, to brandish, as she had frequently a spear in her hand; sometimes used as equivalent in signification to Palladium, q. v. Cum Pallada, with the Palladium, or, statue of Minerva (Ov. Met. xiii. 99). Adj. Palladius, a, um. Palladia sylva, a wood of olive trees; from Minerva being the discoverer of the olives (Virg. G. ii. 181). Palladia pigna, the battle of Minerva, viz., with the giants (Virg. Cir. 29).

Pallas, antis, m. an Arcadian, great-grandfather of Evander, who migrated at the head of a colony of his countrymen, and settled on the banks of the Tevere, where he built a town which he called Pallantium, either from his great-grandfather, Pallas, or from Pallantium, his native city (Liv. i. 5). Adj. Pallantius, a, um. Pallantius heros, Evander

(Ov. Fast. v. 647).—2. The son of Evander, whom his father sent with cavalry to the assistance of Æneas against Turnus. Pallas is one of the most interesting characters in the Æneid of Virgil. His early youth, his great intrepidity, and the ardour which he displays, fix the attention of the reader, and give a peculiar interest to every particular which concerns him. After performing feats of uncommon valour for his years, his love of military fame stimulated him to engage with Turnus, and this rash act cost him his life. Elated with this victory, Turnus decked himself in his armour, and this ostentatious display of his trophy, proved fatal to himself, when appealing to the sympathy of Æneas for the preservation of his own life. The tenderness of the Trojan hero would probably have secured his wish; had he not seen on Turnus the girdle of Pallas. Transported with rage at the bitter recollection, Æneas instantly sacrificed his rival to the Muses of his youthful friend (Virg. Æn. viii. 587 seq.).—3. A giant, the father of Atræa, according to some, which seems to have been the opinion of Ovidius. Pallantis, idis, et, Pallantis, adis, f. a patronymic of Atræa (Ov. Met. xv. 191 seq.).—4. Son of Nélus, the father of Clytus and Botes (Ov. Met. vii. 500).—5. A slave of Antônia, who obtained his freedom, became very powerful under the emperor Claudius, and was controller of the household. Agrippina prostituted herself to Pallas, and he gratified her ambition by effecting a marriage betwixt her and the emperor. Besides her own exaltation, this aspiring and unprincipled woman most probably expected by the union to raise her son to the empire, and the interest of Pallas procured the adoption of Domitius Ahenobarbus, better known by the name of Nero, a measure to which Claudius seems rather to have been averse. The Roman senate disgraced itself, by heaping upon him extravagant honours, the gift of fortune, not the effect of merit. Divested of his public employment by Nero in the year 56, an accusation was preferred against this freedman, whom the emperor ordered to be poisoned, on purpose to obtain his exorbitant wealth (Tacit. Ann. xi. 29 seq.).

Pallene, es, f. a town in Thræcia, Romania, according to some authors; but others consider it as part of Macedonia. The latter appears to be the more general, as well as the more accurate, opinion. It was of a triangular form, and stood on a cognominial peninsula, anciently called Phlegra, between Thermaicus Sinus, the Gulf of Saloniki, and Thracian Sinus, the Gulf of Cassandria. Cassandria, formerly Potidea, stood on the isthmus which connects this peninsula with the continent, and which was celebrated in ancient history for being the field of battle between the gods and the giants. Adj. Palleneus, a, um, et, Palleneensis, is, e. Pallene fulmina, the lightning, or thunderbolts, thrown at the giants (Luc. Phar. vii. 150). Pallenei triumph, the victory over the giants (Stat. Syl. iv. ii. 56). Palleneus ager (Liv. xiv. 10).

Palleneus, cos, m. one of the giants (Claud. xxxvii. 109).

Palmus, i. m. a Trojan, whom Mæcæntus hamstrung, and then gave his arms to Lausus (Virg. Æn. x. 697).

Palmýra, as, f. a town of Sýria, nearly equidistant from Dāmāscus and the Euphrātes. In Scripture, it is called Tadmor in the wilderness, and its foundation is referred to Solomon (1 Kings ix. 18). It appears to have remained a place of little importance, until Sýria was conquered by Adriānus, who added much to the beauty of the town, and from his own name, called it Adriānópolis. From that period it continued to increase both in power and riches, till the emperor Vālerianus gave it to Odenāthus, as a remuneration for his valuable services to the empire. The ambition of Zēnobia, widow of Odenāthus, who had subjected to her government Egypt, Sýria, Pālāstina, and a considerable part of Asia Minor, Natalia, excited the jealousy of the emperor Aurēlianus, who commenced hostilities against her. After some bloody engagements, the queen took refuge in Palmýra, which the emperor carried by storm, put to death her secretary, the celebrated Lónginus, and removed herself and children to Italy, where they adorned his triumph and were settled at Tibur. The inhabitants soon put to the sword the garrison which he left in the city, on which Aurēlianus caused it to be completely destroyed. Its ruins, which are considered among the most magnificent in the world, show its ancient magnitude and splendour, and are still known by its original name Tadmor. Inh. Palmýrenūm, m. (Ann. Mar. xxviii. 4). Adj. Palmýrenus, a, um.

Pāpētus, i, m. a man killed by Thiōdāmas, in the Theban war (Stat. Th. x. 313).

Pālūmbūm, i, n. a town taken from the Sāmītes by the Roman consul Sp. Cārvilius, in 295 B. C. (Liv. x. 45).

Pānālus, i, m. the Spirāzza, a river of Thessālā (Herod. vii. 129).—2. The Dhōpātāmo, a river of Māssēnū, which falls into the Gulf of Kalanata.

Pārmēnes, is, m. a Chaldean, famous for his skill in astrology, with whom Antistius formed a friendship, and, by that means, accomplished the destruction both of P. Anticus and M. Ostōrius Scīpiō (Tac. Ann. xvi. 14).

Pāmmon, ōnis, m. one of the nine sons of Prāmūs, who survived the war. The aged monarch upbraided them with great severity for their ungallant conduct, want of truth, and being better dancers and musicians than soldiers (Hom. Il. xxiv. 250 seq.).

Pāmphagus, i, m. (Gloss.), one of Aetion's dogs (Ov. Met. iii. 210).

Pāmphlidas, as, m. a commander of a Rhodian fleet, in 192 B. C., who relieved Dādāla, and several other forts of Cāria, which were besieged by the troops of Antiochus, king of Sýria (Liv. xxxvii. 22).

Pāmphilus, i, m. a man whom Mārtiālis charges with taking off four of his wives by poison (iv. 69). Some editions read Pāpulus.

Pāmphýlia, as, f. a country of Asia Minor, Natalia, bounded on the south by the Mediterranean Sea, on the west by Lýcia, on the north by Pisidia, and on the east by Cilicia. Its capital Pérga, Kara-hisar, stood between the rivers Calārrātes, the Duden-sou, and Cēstros, the Kopri-sou. According to Strābo, it was sixty stadia from the mouth of the Kopri-sou. Inh. Pāmphýlii, v. Pāmphýli, orum, m. fought in the army of Antiochus, king of Sýria, at the battle of Thēstira, in 192 B. C. (Liv. xxxvii. 40). Adj. Pān- phýliis, a, um. Pāmphýlium Mārē, the Gulf of Adalia (Cor. Nep. Hann. 8), which Livius calls by this name and also Pāmphýliis Sinus (xxxvii. 23). Pāmphýlia tēllēni (Lac. Phar. viii. 208).

Pāmphýlus, i, m. the head, or founder, of a tribe, called from him Pāmphýliis (Pind. Pyth. i. 121).

Pān, ōnis, v. os, n. the god of shepherds, and of the inhabitants of the country, was, in appearance, a monster, having two small horns on his head, a flat nose, and the thighs, legs, feet, and tail of a goat. He was the principal god of Arcādia, which was his native country, and particularly adapted to pasture, hence Tēgēus (Pān) (Virg. Georg. i. 18); and Lýcaeus Pān (Jen. viii. 344).

There is a famous Pāneion, or cave of Pān, near the summit of Mount Ropanna. His parentage is uncertain. We have him the son of Mērcūrius and Drýōpē, of Jūpteris and Callistō, of Jūpter and Thýmbris, of Mērcūrius and Pēnelōpē, and of the queen of Ithāca by all her lovers, hence his name.

The last account is perhaps the best supported. When the gods were terrified at the monstrous size and strength of the giant Týphōeus, by the advice of Pān, they concealed themselves under the forms of wild beasts. Jūpter assumed the appearance of a ram (hence perhaps Coraiger Ammon), Mērcūrius of an ibis, Apōllō of a crow, Bacchus of a goat, Diana of a cat, Jūno of a cow, Vēnus of a fish, &c. (Ov. Met. v. 327—331). He himself, at the same time, became a goat, and was, on that account, called by the Greeks Agōēron, and by the Latins, Cāpricōrnus.

From his unexpected and strange appearance, he often greatly alarmed, without injuring, the shepherds; hence such den and imaginary fears are, from him, called Panics.

The word is sometimes used in the plural (Ov. Met. xiv. 688). Adj. Pāneus, a, um, pertaining to, or occasioned by Pān.

Pānāchōicum, i, n. Foidhīa, a mountain of Achāia, at the foot of which stands the town Patras.

Pānetius, i, m. a native of Rhōdus, Rhodes, one of the most eminent of the Stoic philosophers.

P. Cōrnēlius Scīpiō Africānus, and C. Lālius, who had been his scholars, highly esteemed him, the former of whom had Pānetius always along with him, both at home and abroad. Cicēro acknowledges the advantage which he received from the study of his writings.

According to A. Gēllius, the orator borrowed liberally from the philosopher, particularly when composing his treatise De officiis. Many of his particular opinions have been preserved in the writings of the Roman orator, and, however great his ingenuity and acuteness, not a few of them will be found very erroneous. He wrote, with ability de officiis (sup. xabonvix), de dolorē patiēdo, de providentiā, and, de magistratibus (Hor. Od. i. 29. 14).

Pānetōlius, v. Pānetōlicus, a, um. Pānetōlīum (concilium) a council of the Atōli, at which games used to be celebrated, and magistrates elected every year in autumn (Liv. xxxi. 29).

Pānetōlicū concilium (Liv. xxxv. 32).

Pānāres, is, m. a commander of the Cydonians, whom Q. Caelius Metellus Crēscētius conquered (Flor. iii. 7). He and Lāsthēnes withstood the power of the Roman arms for three successive years (Val. Pat. ii. 34).

Pānāretus, i. m. a drunkard, on whom Mārtiālis writes an epigram (vi. 89).

Pānasāgoras, e. m. son of Sāgillus, a king of Scythia, whom his father sent with a great body of cavalry to the assistance of the Amazons (Just. ii. 4).

Pānchāla, e. f. a district of Arābia, or, according to some writers, a name of Arābia, and, according to others, the imaginary island Eūmērus, on the eastern coast of Arābia. Virgīlius calls it jūguis, probably from the resinous nature of the frankincense-tree, which grows only in sandy soils (G. ii. 159). Pānchāla (dabit thūriferos) rāmos (Claud. vii. 211). Adj. Pānchāus, Pānchāicus, et, Pānchālus, a. um. Pānchāi ignes, fires of frankincense (Virg. G. iv. 379). Pānchāi odores (Lucret. ii. 417). Pānchāica thūra, frankincense of Pānchāla (Virg. Cu. 86). Pānchāla tellūs, the country of Pānchāla (Ov. Met. x. 309).

Pānchāria, e. f. a Roman station in Africa. Adj. Pānchārianus, a. um. Pānchārkāna stātio (Amm. Mar. xxix. 5).

Pānchātes, is. m. the name of an Asturian horse, one of those which ran in the chariot-race, for the prize given by Scipio Africānus at the end of the Spanish war, in 208 B. C. (Sil. Ital. xvi. 348).

Pānda, e. m. a river in the country of the Sirai, a people of Asia, between the Black Sea, and the Caspian Sea (Tac. Ann. xii. 16).

Pāndārius, i. m. father of Mērōps, the Milesian. He had three daughters, Mērōpē, Clōthēra, and Aēdon. Later writers changed his name to Pāndion, his daughter's, Aēdon, to Prōcne, her husband's, Zethus, to Tērēus, and their son's to Itys (Hom. Od. xix. 518—523).

Pāndārus, i. m. a Trojan, the son of Lycāon, and brother of Eurytion. At the instigation of Minerva, he interrupted a proposal to terminate the contest between Trojans and Greeks by single combat, by throwing a dart among the Greeks (Virg. Aen. v. 496).—2. The son of Alcānor and Iera, e. f. Hiera, born on Mount Ida, was the brother of Bitias, and a man both of prodigious size and strength. Virgīlius has described the appearance and bravery of these brothers, with a liveliness and elegance, which possess the imagination of the reader, and present the formidable warriors full to view. Turnus killed Bitias by a well-aimed missile weapon, on which Pāndārus rushed furiously forward, and, after displaying astonishing strength and bravery, fell by the hand of the same hero, who cleft his head in two down to the neck by a single stroke (Aen. ix. 672 seq.).

Pāndātāria, e. f. Pāndātēria, e. f. Vento-Tieno, or, Santa Maria, an island off the coast of Cāmpānia, Campagna, in Italy (Tac. Ann. i. 53).

Pāndātes, is. m. the keeper of the treasury of Artāxerxes, king of Pērsia, who was a particular friend of Datānes, and informed him of all that passed at court respecting him. In consequence of a letter received from Pāndātes, Datānes, consulting his own safety, revolted from the king, not, however, before he had appointed Māndrōcles, a native of Māgnēsia, over the royal army, of which that monarch had given him the command (Cor. Nep. Dat. 5).

Pāndion, ōnis. m. king of Athēnae, Athens, was the father of Prōcne, Phlōmēla, and Erēthēus. The unhappy fate of his daughters overwhelmed him with grief, and occasioned his death. A splendid monument to his memory was erected at Athēna Minerva (Paus. i. 41). Adj. Pāndionius, a. um. Pāndionia volucres, swallows, from Prōcne being transformed into a swallow (Stat. Th. viii. 616). Pāndionia pūlla, the daughters of Pāndion, i. e. Prōcne and Phlōmēla (Virg. Cu. 250). Pāndionia Orthia, Orthia, daughter of Erēthēus, and grand-daughter of Pāndion (Prop. i. 20. 31).

Pāndocus, i. m. a man in the Trojan war, wounded by Ajax Telāmōnius, at the time he rescued Ulysses (Hom. Il. xi. 499 seq.).

Pāndōra, e. f. the first woman according to Hēsiodus, made by Vulcānus at the command of Jūpiter. To Minerva she was indebted for wisdom, to Vēnus for beauty, to Apōllo for music, and to Mērcūrius for eloquence. Provoked at the conduct of Prōmēthēus, Jūpiter sent her to Epimēthēus, with a shut box containing all the diseases and calamities incident to man. On the lid being thoughtlessly removed, the contents of the box spread over the earth, and have been the causes of innumerable evils (Paus. i. 24).—2. A daughter of Erēthēus, king of Athēnae.

Pāndōsia, e. f. Aidonati, a city in Epirus, Lower Albania. Alexander, king of Epirus, was ordered by the oracle of Jūpiter at Dōdona, to beware of Pāndōsia, which he understood to be this city; but there was another of the same name in Lūcānia, according to Livius, according to others in Brūtīagor, the site of which is doubtful; near it Alexander was killed, in 325 B. C. The latter surrendered voluntarily to the Romans, in 206 B. C. (Liv. xxix. 38).

Pāndrōsos, i. f. a daughter of Cērops, king of Athēnae. To her and her two sisters, Hērse and Aglauros, Minerva entrusted Erichōnius shut up in a basket, with instructions not to open it, or pry into her secrets. Both Pāndrōsos and Hērse obeyed this order with scrupulous exactness, but Aglauros disregarded the mandate of the goddess, opened the basket, and discovered the child (Ov. Met. ii. 559 seq.).

Pānēmus, i. m. a son of Thēsius, in the army of Etēocles, whose life Hippomēdon spared, killing his twin-brother, to whom he bore so strong a resemblance that their parents could not distinguish them (Stat. Th. ix. 293).

Pāngēus, i. m. Plur. Pāngēa, orum. n. Castagna, or, Negrokoss, a mountain of Thrācia, Romania, in which were gold mines anciently. Adj. Pāngēus, a. um. Pāngēa arx, a promontory of Thrācia (Val. Flacc. i. 575).

Pānnicus, i. m. a man to whom Mārtiālis addresses a number of epigrams.

Pānnōnia, e. f. a country of Europe, bounded on the south by Illyriūm, on the west by Noricum, on the north by Germānia, Germany, and on the east by the country of the Iazyges. Hungary coincides partly with Pānnōnia. Pānnōnis, idis. f. of Pānnōnia, applied to females, or nouns feminine. Pānnōnia ura (Luc. Phar. vi. 220). Inhe Pān-nūnū, orum (Sing. Pānōnūs, i), m. were conquered by Augustus, at the same time with the Iapydes and Dalmatæ, in 37 B. C. (Liv. Ep. 131). Adj. Pānōnīcus, a, um. Pānōnīcum bellum (Mart. viii. 15). Pānōnica Alpes, Alpē Giulī (Tac. Hist. ii. 98).

Pānōmphēus, i, m. an epithet of Jūpiter, from being ὁ πανόμφορος ἄνθρωπος, which the Scholiast on Hōmērus explains by stating, that Jūpiter hears the voices of all, or is worshipped by the voice of all. Potter understands it to denote that Jūpiter gave to all the other gods and to men the gift of prophecy (Ov. Met. xi. 198).

Pānōpē, es, v. Pānōpēa, æ, f. a daughter of Nēreus and Dōris. She and her hundred sisters received Iñō, with her son Mēlicēta, when she had thrown herself and him into the sea, and thus preserved both from injury (Ov. Fast. vi. 499).

Pānōpē, es, f. a town of Phōcis, an inland district of Græcia, Greece (Ov. Met. lii. 19).

Pānōpēs, is, m. a Sicilian youth, who attended on Aestes, king of that country. He was one of the unsuccessful competitors for the prize in the foot-race (Virg. Æn. v. 300).

Pānōpēus, ēos, m. one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar (Ov. Met. viii. 312).—2. An inhabitant of Tāgētus, Pentadaktulos, killed in entering Thēbe, Theba, during the siege of that city (Stat. Th. x. 491).

Pānōpōllis. See Pērinthus.

Pānōrmus, i, f. (Greek authors make it m.), v. Pānōrmum, i, n. Palermo, an ancient town of Sicily, said to have been originally founded by the Phœnicians, probably on account of the excellence of its harbour, from which it had its name (παρ ἰσκιος), which rendered it extremely useful for the convenience of trade. Greek authors inform us, that a colony of their countrymen afterwards settled there, and if the derivation above given be accurate, the name must be referred to them, not to the Phœnicians. When the Carthaginians had become powerful as a state, Pānōrmus fell into their hands, from whom the superior valour of the Romans afterwards wrested it, in 250 B. C., and the steady fidelity which it uniformly manifested to the latter nation, must have rendered it a valuable acquisition. It is the capital of Sicily, four miles in circumference, and a place of great trade. The streets are broad, the houses large, and many of the public buildings magnificent. It stands at the bottom of a gulf of the same name, and the country adjoining is both pleasant and fertile. To this Silius Itālicus refers, Fœcunda Pānōrmus (xiv. 261). Inh. Pānōrmītiūs, orum, m. (Sal. Frag.). Adj. Pānōrmītānus, a, um.—2. A town in the territory of the Sāmii, but on the coast of the Ephēsi (Liv. xxxvii. 10).—3. Tekēh, a promontory of Achāia (Paus. vii. 22).

Pānsa, æ, m. the governor of a province, who had been guilty of rapacity and extortion. Nothing further of his history is known (Juv. Sat. viii. 95).

Pāntāgāthus, i, m. a young man, beloved by his master, who died in early life. Mār-tialis writes the epitaph of Pāntāgāthus, and, from some expressions, it seems not improbable that he was the poet's servant (vi. 52).

Pāntāgia, æ, v. Pāntāgēs, æ, m. the Forcart, a small river of Sicily, southeast of Leontini, Lentini (Virg. Æn. iii. 689).

Pāntālōn, ōntis, m. an Ætolian of high rank, who resolutely continued with Eumēnes, when attacked by the assassins employed by Philēppus, king of Mācēdōnia, to take away his life, in 174 B. C. (Liv. xlii. 15).

Pāntauchus, i, m. a nobleman, whom Pēr-seus, king of Mācēdōnia, gave as a hostage to the Roman ambassadors, Q. Mārcius Philēppus, and A. Atilius Scīrānus, at the interview which he had with them in 173 B. C. The same monarch sent him, at a future period, to ratify a treaty with Gēntius, king of Illyrīcum. The esteem and confidence of his sovereign, did not prevent Pāntauchus joining Hipplās and Mīlo, in making a voluntary surrender of Bērœa to the Roman consul, after the fatal engagement in which Pērseus lost his kingdom (Liv. xlii. 39 seq.).

Pānthēon, i, n. Santa Maria Rotondo, a celebrated temple at Rome, built by Agrippa, son-in-law of Augustus, during the reign of that emperor, and dedicated to all the gods, hence the name (Ann. Mar. xvi. 10).

Pānthōus, i, m. a Trojan, of whose history little is known. He was the father of Euphōrbus, who is hence called Pānthōides, Pūthāgōras, who was among the Greeks, the founder of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, affirmed that he was Euphōrbus in the time of the Trojan war, and that he collected many circumstances which occurred when his soul inhabited the body of that prince. See Pūthāgōras.

Pānthus, i, m. son of Othrys, the priest of Apōllō at Troy, whose temple was in the citadel, hence Virgilius, Arctis Phœbiq̄ sacēdos. During the night that Troy was on fire, he eluded the Greeks, and, on his way to the house of Ænēas with the sacred things, the gods, and his young grandson, met that prince, and informed him that Troy was in the hands of the Greeks. Neither the sanctity of his character, nor the dignity of his office, protected him from the vengeance of the Greeks, by whom he was slain. From his father he is called Othryādes (Virg. Æn. ii. 319 seq.).—2. A rival of Prōpērtius for the favour of Cynthia (ii. 21. 1).

Pāntīcāpōn, i, n. Kirchē, called also Bōs-pōrus, from its standing on the western coast of Cimmērius Bōsphōrus, the Strait of Caffa, built by a colony of the Greeks. From Strābo it appears to have been a place of great note. Inh. Pāntīcāpōnes, ium, m. (Plin. i. 661).

Pāntīcāpes, is, m. a Scythian river, which forms a lake, and at last mixes its waters with the Bōrysthēnes (Herod. iv. 54).

Pāntīlius, i, m. a man whom Hōrātius, in contempt, calls cūcēx, a bug. It is said that this Pāntīlius was a buffoon, and an enemy of Hōrātius (Sat. i. 10. 78).

Pāntōlābus. See Mallius.

Pāntōmīmī, orum, m. pantomimes, persons who express their meaning by dumb show and gesture. No senator was allowed to enter the house of a pantomime performer, and Roman knights could not attend the players on the street (Tac. Ann. i. 77).

Pāphlē, es, f. a name of Vēnus, from Pāphos, Baffa, q. v. (Stat. Syl. iii. 4. 82).

Pāphlāgōnia, æ, f. a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the east by Pōntus, on the south by Gālātia, on the west by Bithynia, and on the north by Pōntus Euxīnus, the numbers. Warmth of affection and benevolence of heart, added to elegance of manners and brilliancy of wit, rendered him a most agreeable companion. His conversation was suited to all descriptions of men, cheerful, grave, lax, or rigid, according to the taste of those around him, or the train of thought prevalent in his own mind. The father of our poet appears to have been a man of strict morals, and his reproofs probably contributed to restrain the dissoluteness of his son. Intending him for the law, he directed his studies with that view, and to parental inclination, Ovidius, for a time, submitted. To that profession it cannot be denied that his talents were eminently adapted. Quickness of apprehension, felicity of language, and fluency of expression, would have soon placed him high among Roman Orators. But a few successful pleadings at the bar finished his career as an advocate. The bent of his mind induced him to forsake every pursuit for the cultivation of poetry. The irregularity of his life, from this period in particular, is greatly to be lamented. The impurity of his mind appears in the indelicacy of his verses. It is impossible to read many of his poems, but with the deep regret inseparable from contemplating the prostitution of splendid talents to so vile and criminal a purpose. Who, without horror, can reflect on the character of that man, who has been wicked in proportion to the means which he had, of excelling in virtue, and used the powers, which heaven had conferred, only to give allurements to vice, and lustre to crimes? The licentiousness of his poetry was the ostensible reason why Augustus banished him to Tómos, a town on the borders of Póntus Euxinus, the Black Sea. That this severe sentence was not a consequence of the immoralities of his life, or the indelicacy of his poetry, may be confidently maintained. Both were equally notorious, and, to a pure mind, equally loathsome, during the many years which he enjoyed not only the patronage, but the intimate friendship, and unreserved confidence of the emperor. Aurélius Victor states, that it was the three Books, on the "Art of Love" (Epit. 1). Ovidius justified his poetry, not on the ground of purity, but by the practice of numerous authors whom he mentions; and by the approbation of the emperor himself. From the allusion to a certain picture on a particular place, the vitiated taste of Augustus seems undeniable. The poet continued, to the end of life, to assert his innocence, and deny the crime for which he was driven from civilized society. His punishment must be referred to some action or occurrence which is not known. Few events recorded by antiquity have oftener been subject of discussion, than the true cause of Ovid's banishment. Since he has not chosen to mention it, the truth will most probably never be discovered. His fortitude deserted him in adversity, and he meanly flattered Augustus to recal his edict; but neither the importunity of the poet, nor the urgent solicitations of his numerous and powerful friends, altered the resolution of the emperor. The accession of Tiberius to the government of the Roman state, was productive of no advantage to the unfortunate exile. Neither the effusions of sorrow,
